

atic testing against experience raises difficult problems of observation and analysis. So many variables are involved in even the simplest political process that their disentanglement to create a basis for reflection on the significance of particular factors in the whole complex often taxes both energy and ingenuity. Although voting returns report only limited observations of the electoral process, they are readily available for many jurisdictions over a long period of time. Nominations of state legislators, since there are many of them, provide data in sufficient quantity to permit the differentiation of nominations under many types of circumstances and the identification of variables associated with particular types of behavior.

I

P 35,428

(44)

A first step toward an attack on the question of the relation between formal procedure and informal organization consists of an analysis of the utilization of the direct primary in state legislative nominations. That analysis will identify features of party behavior that exist under the primary system and raise the question whether they can be attributed to that system itself. In this description of the primary system its workings may be checked against a model that probably corresponds roughly to the broad expectations of early advocates of the primary. According to this model more or less spontaneous candidacies in the primaries would permit "the people," or more particularly the mass of the party, to choose between candidates. Thus, competition within each party would precede competition between candidates of opposing parties at the general election. In a perfectly balanced competitive situation each legislative district of a state would be characterized not only by competition at the general election but also by rivalry in each of the party primaries.³

A basic departure from the crude model consists in the variation among legislative districts in the degree to which they approach an even competition between parties. Although the form of the distribution varies from state to state and from time to time, districts range from those whose electorate is overwhelmingly committed to one party, through those that are closely divided, to those that are in high degree attached to the other party. Moreover, at individual elections the movement of districts from party to party tends to be largely in one direction. If the general shift of sentiment is to the Republicans, they capture districts that were Democratic by a narrow margin at the preceding election, but they lose few if any districts they already held. Or a similar selective movement occurs in the other direction. Table I, which relates the 1946 election of the Missouri House of Representatives to that of 1948, illustrates this observation. In 1948 the Democrats lost no district they had carried in 1946; they gained mainly seats that Republicans had won by a relatively narrow margin in 1946.

³ Part I of this analysis largely follows Julius Turner's study of congressional primaries, "Primary Elections as the Alternative to Party Competition in 'Safe' Districts." The Journal of Politics, Vol. 15, pp. 197-210 (May, 1953).

This variation in the competitiveness of legislative districts, which is partially shown in Table I, turns out to be most useful in analysis of the workings of the primary. Instead of there being a couple of Republi-

TABLE I. PARTY FORTUNES IN LEGISLATIVE RACES IN RELATION TO VOTE AT PRECEDING ELECTION: REPUBLICAN AND DEMOCRATIC VICTORIES IN 1948 MISSOURI HOUSE ELECTIONS RELATED TO DISTRIBUTION OF LEGISLATIVE DISTRICTS ACCORDING TO DEMOCRATIC PERCENTAGE OF 1946 POPULAR VOTE

Per cent Democratic, 1946	Number of seats 1946 (1)	Democratic, 1948		Republican, 1948
		Number (2)	Per cent (2) of (1)	Number (3)	Per cent (3) of (1)
0	14	2	14.3	12	85.7
10-29.9	13	0	0.0	13	100.0
30-34.9	8	1	12.5	7	87.5
35-39.9	21	7	33.3	14	66.7
40-44.9	20	11	55.0	9	45.0
45-49.9	23	19	82.6	4	17.4
50-99.9	39	39	100.0	0	0.0
100	16	16	100.0	0	0.0

cans who vie for their party's nomination and a pair of Democrats who contend for the right to oppose the Republican nominee, it turns out that a great many nominations go by default. The extent to which a party's nominations are contested in the primary by two or more aspirants apparently depends in large measure on the prospects for victory for the nominee in the general election. Uncontested nominations for legislative posts are almost the rule in those districts in which a party's cause seems hopeless, while a large proportion of nominations will be contested in relatively sure districts. A type situation is described by the graphs in Figure 1 which relate the proportions of nominations contested by two or more candidates in primaries for the Missouri House of Representatives to the division of the vote in the subsequent general election. The division of the district vote at the general election itself may be regarded, post facto, as a rough measure of expectations about the outcome of elections.⁴

⁴ The combination of five primaries in Figure 1 smoothes the curve but the funda-

Although the increase in the incidence of primary competition as the prospects for party victory improve, demonstrated by Figure 1, probably recurs from state to state, the proportion of all nominations contested varies from state to state with a variety of factors. Table II, with its data on Indiana's 1948 primary, indicates that in Indiana, as in Missouri, the greatest propensity to compete for a party's nominations occurs in those districts in which the nominees have the greatest assurance of victory in the general election. The table also reveals a considerably higher incidence of competition—with general election strength held constant—in Indiana than in Missouri. That difference doubtless damental relation shown appears at each election. Throughout, the combination of primaries usually smoothes a curve or pictures a more regular set of relations than appears from the data of a single primary. This effect is most marked in the cells of very small numbers. Enlargement of the sample by the cumulation of data on several primaries would probably iron out most of the irregularities that appear in cells of small numbers in some of the tables that follow. In the choice of data for presentation for illustrative purposes somewhat irregular tabulations were often used lest an exaggerated impression of the uniformity of the correlations be conveyed.

FIG. 1. Primary Competition and the Prospects for General Election Victory: Relation between Proportion of Nominations Contested and Percentage of General Election Vote Polled by Republican and Democratic Nominees for Missouri House of Representatives, 1942-1950.

TABLE II. PRIMARY CONTESTS IN RELATION TO GENERAL ELECTION VOTE: PROPORTIONS OF DEMOCRATIC AND REPUBLICAN LEGISLATIVE NOMINATIONS CONTESTED, INDIANA, 1948 IN RELATION TO 1948 GENERAL ELECTION VOTE IN LEGISLATIVE DISTRICTS

Nominees' General Election Percentage	Democratic		Republican
	Number of Nominations ^a	Per cent Contested	Number of Nominations	Per cent Contested
Under 40	3	0.0	9	44.4
40-44.9	14	7.1	21	61.9
45-49.9	18	33.3	30	76.7
50-54.9	30	76.7	18	66.7
55-59.9	20	85.0	13	84.6
60 and over	11	81.8	8	87.5

^a Included are those nominations made by party committee rather than by primary. Such nominations are in effect classified in the percentage computations as uncontested.

points to basic differences in the political structures of the two states, one of which is that a larger proportion of the Indiana districts is closely contested. Table II incidentally suggests some of the limits of the actual vote as a measure of the expectation of victory; note that the Republicans competed for nominations to a large proportion of those seats which they lost by a small margin, perhaps in part a reflection of the rosiness of Republican expectations before the 1948 upset.⁵

The high degree of association between primary competition and the prospect for general election victory points to another deviation from our crude model. Instead of lively competition in all primaries of both parties, the prediction now would be that simultaneous contests for both nominations would occur chiefly in those districts regarded as more or less evenly balanced between the two parties at the general election. In districts thought to be relatively safe for either party, competition for nominations would tend to be restricted to the primary of the dominant party. These expectations are on the whole fulfilled by the data of Table III relating to the Indiana primaries of 1948 and 1950.⁶ While the distribution in the table indicates that factors other than the estimate of the chances for victory may induce competition, save for an erratic exception consisting of a cell of small numbers simultaneous competition in both primaries tended to be most common in relatively

⁵ For relevant comments on Indiana experience, see Charles S. Hyneman, "Tenure and Turnover of the Indiana General Assembly," this REVIEW, Vol. 32, pp. 51-67, 311-31 (Feb., April, 1938).

⁶ The Missouri primaries of 1948 and 1950 parallel this expectation more closely than do the primaries analyzed in Table III.

TABLE III. PRIMARY CONTESTS ACCORDING TO PARTY PRIMARY IN WHICH THEY OCCURRED: CONTESTS FOR NOMINATIONS FOR INDIANA HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, SINGLE-MEMBER DISTRICTS, 1948-1950, ACCORDING TO GENERAL ELECTION VOTE FOR NOMINEES

Democratic Percentage General Election	Districts	Per Cent of Nominations Contested in Both Primaries	Neither Primary	Democratic Only	Republican Only
0	5	0.0	0.0	0.0	100.0
30-34.9	5	0.0	0.0	0.0	100.0
35-39.9	11	9.1	36.4	0.0	54.5
40-44.0	29	24.1	31.0	3.4	41.4
45-49.9	33	15.1	33.3	6.1	45.4
50-54.9	30	36.6	23.3	26.7	13.3
55-59.9	13	15.4	23.1	53.8	7.7
60-64	4	75.0	0.0	0.0	25.0
100	2	0.0	0.0	100.0	0.0

close districts.⁷ The data of Table III clearly point to the tendency for primary competition in safe districts to be limited to the primaries of the dominant party.⁸

While the preceding analyses account for a considerable part of the variation among districts in competition for party nomination, they also leave some of the variation unexplained. Factors other than prospects for victory also induce or discourage competition in primaries. The supposition that "one good term deserves another" suggests a test of whether primaries in which incumbents seek renomination are less likely to be contested than are those in which no incumbent is in the race, with prospects for party victory held constant. A test of the hypothesis appears in Figure 2 which records an analysis of the primaries of both parties in Missouri for the years 1946, 1948, and 1950. A less extensive collection of Ohio data is analyzed in Table IV. The data of Figure 2 and Table IV indicate that, at least in the safe districts as we have defined them, primaries in which incumbents seek renomination are less likely to involve competition than are those in which no incumbent is running. The Missouri data, however, reveal a higher rate of competition for incumbents in the lower ranges of party strength than in primaries involving no incumbents in districts similar in party strength at the general election. Districts in which the incumbents' party polled but 30 to 40 per cent of the general election vote obviously underwent a wide swing in popular vote from the preceding election and probably differed in some important respects from those in which the party had no incumbent but polled the same small vote at the general election. A better measure of expectation of party victory in the two types of districts would probably remove the discrepancy from the data in these lower ranges.⁹

⁷ Some of the irregularities of the distribution in Table III would probably be ironed out if there were a better measure of expectation of general election outcome than the vote itself.

⁸ If the argument may be anticipated, the pattern here points toward our main problem. A situation in which competition prevails in both primaries and the general election may represent equilibrium most difficult to maintain. Does such a state of affairs represent so unstable an equilibrium that over the long run it tends to be destroyed by a movement of decision and voter interest to one or the other party primaries?

FIG. 2. Incumbents and Primary Competition: Competition in Primaries Involving Incumbents and in Primaries Involving No Incumbents with Comparable Prospects of General Election Victory, Missouri House of Representatives, 1946-1950.

While a larger sample would probably reveal more regular relations than those in Table IV, examination of the data for other states suggests

⁹ The percentage in the incumbent curve in Figure 2 for the general election range of 30 to 40 per cent is based on only seven cases. All were in Republican primaries and six fell in 1948 when all the contests occurred. The chances are that the rout of the Democrats in 1946 resulted in the candidacy of Republican incumbents from traditionally Democratic districts in the 1948 primaries when the bleak Democratic prospects gave rise to rosy estimates of the Republican chances of holding districts they had won in 1946. See the analysis of the 1946-1948 shift in Table I.

TABLE IV. INCUMBENCY AND COMPETITION FOR LEGISLATIVE NOMINATIONS: PROPORTION OF OHIO HOUSE REPUBLICAN PRIMARIES IN SINGLE MEMBER DISTRICTS CONTESTED IN 1948, WHEN INCUMBENTS INVOLVED AND NOT INVOLVED

Republican Percentage General Election, 1948	Primary Involving
	Incumbents		No Incumbents
	Nomina- tions	Per cent Contested	Nomina- tions	Per cent Contested
30-39	2	100.0	3	0.0
40-49	10	20.0	5	80.0
50-59	19	47.4	6	83.3
60-69	6	50.0	0	0.0
70-79	2	0.0	0	0.0
100	20	40.0	3	66.6
Total	59	40.7	17	64.7

caution in the ascription of uniform significance to incumbency in relation to primary competition. The extent to which incumbents seek renomination and the customary public attitudes about the candidacies of incumbents no doubt differ from state to state and even from locality to locality. In any case in the data presented "incumbency" probably masks a more inclusive type of relation between the aspirant for nomination and his constituency and perhaps between him and other potential candidates. There may be a common denominator or denominators between uncontested incumbents and uncontested non-incumbents.

While several factors associated with primary competition have been identified other variables doubtless exist. Demographic characteristics of districts may be more or less conducive to primary competition, and, indeed, to political competition generally. Rural districts may, for example, be less given to political commotion than highly urbanized ones.¹⁰ A test of this supposition appears in Table V. That table compares rates of competition in urban and rural districts in Missouri primaries involving no incumbents, and thereby excludes from the comparison differences associated with incumbency. A sharp difference may be seen to exist in the proportions of such primaries contested in districts under 50 per cent urban and in those over 50 per cent urban, with the more placid politics in the rural districts.

A telescoped table such as Table V, with its broad categories, is rightly suspect. A further test of the ruralism-urbanism relation is provided by ¹⁰ On this point, see Key, "Partisanship and County Office: The Case of Ohio," this REVIEW, Vol. 47, pp. 525-32 (June, 1953); A Primer of Statistics for Political Scientists (New York, 1954), Ch. 5.

TABLE V. URBANISM AND CONTESTS IN PRIMARIES INVOLVING NO INCUMBENTS: DEMOCRATIC PRIMARIES TO NOMINATE FOR MISSOURI HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, 1948

Democratic Percentage in General Election	Nominations in Districts				Total
	Under 50 % Urban		Over 50 % Urban
	Number	% Con- tested	Number	% Con- tested	Number	% Con- tested
	Under 50	33	3.0	7	28.5	40
Over 50	28	17.8	25	56.0	53	35.8
Total	61	9.8	32	50.0	93	22.6

the more detailed breakdown for the Ohio Republican and Democratic primaries of 1948 which appears in Table VI. That table exhibits some irregularities which would probably disappear by the analysis of a larger number of cases, but generally, within similar ranges of party strength, a higher incidence of primary competition occurs in the more urbanized districts.¹¹ A lingering doubt remains about the nature of the

TABLE VI. URBANISM AND CONTESTS IN PRIMARIES: CONTESTS IN OHIO REPUBLICAN AND DEMOCRATIC PRIMARIES TO NOMINATE FOR STATE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, 1948, IN RELATION TO NOMINEES' STRENGTH IN GENERAL ELECTION AND TO URBANISM OF DISTRICT*

Nominees' General Election Percentage of District Vote	Nominations in Districts				Total
	Under 50% Urban		Over 50% Urban		Number	Per cent Contested
	Number	Per cent Contested	Number	Per cent Contested
25-29	2	0.0	0		2	0.0
30-39	8	25.0	8	50.0	16	37.5
40-49	26	15.4	66	66.7	92	52.2
50-59	26	40.6	67	73.1	93	68.8
60-69	8	50.0	7	42.9	15	46.7
70-74	2	0.0	0		2	0.0
100	21	33.3	4	75.0	25	40.0

* In counties electing two or more members at large, nominations were regarded as uncontested to the extent that the number of aspirants for nomination was less than twice the number of nominations to be made. In the computation of the percentage of the two-party general election vote for candidates in such counties a base was obtained by addition of the vote of a winning candidate to the vote of the highest losing candidate of the opposite party.

¹¹ An element that may influence urban rates in Ohio is the practice of electing many legislators at large from the metropolitan counties. This practice seems to be, at least in such areas, conducive to a multiplicity of candidacies for nomination.

association between urbanism and competition. It seems clear that the relation between urban population percentage and propensity to compete is not linear.¹² Moreover, metropolitan political systems in which no competition occurs in primaries are common enough. The multiplicity of centers of power and of aspiration in highly urbanized areas may, however, require the application of greater effort, ingenuity, and resources to monopolize party position than in otherwise comparable but predominantly rural areas.¹³

A final question about the incidence of competition for nomination needs to be raised. The preceding analyses have compared different districts at one primary. The fact that electoral decision is actually pushed back in many instances to the uncontested majority primary may lead to the conclusion that many such districts rarely have genuine political competition, whereas in an earlier day in every district candidates of the parties regularly did battle in the general election. Perhaps what occurs is that with the decay of party institutions whose reason for being is to do battle every two years, competition tends to occur less frequently than the two-year election interval. When an incumbent retires, when an issue happens to divide the community, or when the body politic undergoes disturbance for one reason or another, a contest will develop in the primary. Such events do not occur with the regularity of elections. To test these notions the history of individual districts must be traced through several primaries. Figure 3 records an analysis of individual Missouri districts through the three Republican primaries of 1946, 1948, and 1950. Those districts were identified in which at least one contest occurred in the three primaries as well as those in which at least one "close" contest took place. On the assumption that the incidence of these conditions would vary with party strength, the districts were grouped according to their Republican percentage in the legislative race in the general election of 1948.

¹² The absence of competition seems most noticeable at the extreme of ruralism. Thomas Page, in commenting on the low temperature of competition in rural Kansas districts, observes: "The cold statistics hint that a subtle, informal, and highly personal process of co-optation often goes on in the smallest legislative districts. This leaves no important role for the formal election but the registration of the previously implicit consent." See the suggestive analysis in his Legislative Apportionment in Kansas (Lawrence, Kansas, 1952), Ch. 4.

¹³ These remarks make relevant an exception to the theoretical proposition about the fixation of political practices and structures by social and demographic characteristics. When one pores over data, such as that processed for this article, he sees, for example, pairs of metropolitan counties with fairly stable and radical differences in political practice. Such contrasts suggest that political practices, developed through the application of human effort and hardened by custom, may exist independently of demographic and social determinants.

When the districts are followed through these three primaries, as may be seen from Figure 3, a much higher proportion of the districts have primary contests in at least one of the primaries than in a single year. Yet the relation between party strength and the incidence of primary competition emerges even more sharply than in the earlier analyses. All this suggests that such factors as urbanism and incumbency may affect the frequency of primary competition but that in the long run the incidence of primary competition is a function chiefly of the prospects for victory in the general election.¹⁴

FIG. 3. Incidence of Competition in Three Successive Primaries: Proportion of Districts with Republican Nominations for Missouri House of Representatives Contested at Least Once in Primaries of 1946, 1948, and 1950, and Proportions Contested Closely at Least Once, Related to Republican Percentage of District General Election Vote, 1948.

¹⁴ No entirely satisfactory explanation suggests itself for the sharp fall-off in primary competition in the high ranges of party strength which remains even in the analysis reported in Figure 3, although ruralism seems to be relevant. In the 1948 Missouri general election 34.5 per cent of the completely rural House districts went without contest; 20.3 per cent of the other districts up to 50 per cent urban, and only 6.7 per cent of the districts over 50 per cent urban went without party competition. Of the seats Republicans won by default, 95.2 per cent were from districts under 50 per cent urban, while the comparable figure for the Democrats was 83.3. The horrid thought has been suggested that districts

If Figure 3 is viewed from a different angle, it throws light on another question. From Figure 1 and other similar analyses based on individual primaries the conclusion might follow that among the sure districts for each party there were many in which the "organization" was so strong that no aspirant dared challenge its man in the primary while in many others the "organization" was so weak that a primary fight occurred. An analysis of several primaries in sequence, as that of Figure 3, indicates that in most of the safe districts the "organization" either is not strong enough to prevent occasional serious challenge or makes use of the primary to settle its internal disputes. Attention to the time aspect of the matter, at least in this instance, modifies the inference of "organization" invincibility that might be drawn from the absence of contest in a considerable number of districts at a single primary.

II

The salient fact that emerges from all this is that competition for popular primary endorsement is concentrated in the districts relatively sure for one party. This association between primary competition and expectation of party victory appears to outweigh other factors that bear on the incidence of competition in the nominating process. The primary procedure, to a varying extent, transfers popular decision from the general election to the primary of the party that has the advantage in voting strength in the district.

These findings return us to the broad problem stated at the outset, viz., whether the primary, by changing the rules of the game, has had consequences for the informal organization of party and of power-seeking activity generally. Does the channeling of actual decision into the primary of the stronger party, by its impact election after election over a considerable period, alter the role and structure of the inner party cliques within the legislative districts; attract voter interest to the primary of the party with the advantage in the general election; tend to bring to the ranks of the stronger party the politically ambitious; and perhaps lead to the atrophy of the informal district leadership once vested with the function of putting forward minority candidates?

While the location of the variations in incidence of primary competition provides material for discussion of such questions, their systematic that go by default may be controlled by so effective an organization that the certainty of being counted out discourages competition both in the machine party primary and from the opposite party. Undoubtedly such situations are concealed within the aggregate figures, yet for this factor to take on importance for the main argument that follows it would have to be assumed that this type of machine control has become more widespread over the past half-century, an assumption contrary at least to common supposition.

testing encounters most difficult problems of analysis, quite apart from the problem of obtaining relevant data. If consequences for informal practices flow from the primary, the chances are that they accumulate so gradually that they would be beyond capture by field observation unless it were prolonged for a generation. Yet some inferences may be drawn from the elections data.

The "machine" is said to control nominations as always save that it acts through the primary rather than the convention. Even the data presented to this point compel modification of that view at least with respect to the types of nomination under examination. Consider in particular Figure 3, especially as it describes the incidence and nature of primary competition in districts where the expectation of general election victory for the party is high. If in most such districts a close primary contest occurs at frequent intervals, the position and role of the "machine" or inner party clique in the district must have been radically altered by the forces loosed and the opportunities created by the primary procedure. Such an interpretation rests on assumptions about the power of the inner clique in settling nominations in pre-primary days. Even, however, if it should be supposed that the "machine" wins every close primary contest, the fact remains that it is frequently seriously challenged. If appropriate pre-primary information could be had, the chances are that it would point to a trend toward a weakening of political leadership within the stronger party in the districts, and to at least a net decline in cohesion of the inner core of the stronger party, with, of course, local exceptions.

If the attention of voters and the efforts of aspirants to leadership roles tend to be attracted to the primary of the majority party in legislative districts, the forecast would be that over time a larger proportion of districts would become "sure" districts. In a state in which districts were more or less normally distributed (i.e., a frequency distribution of districts according to party division of the general election popular vote assumed roughly the form of the normal curve of error), relatively more districts would become sure for both Democrats and Republicans. In a state with a skewed distribution of legislative districts, the proportion of sure districts would increase for whichever party had the advantage in safe districts at the outset. In either case the proportion of districts genuinely competitive between the parties would decline. The effects of these tendencies would be perceptible, of course, only in the absence of countervailing forces.

A test of these propositions appears in Figure 4, which compares the distribution of Missouri House districts according to the percentage division of the two-party vote in 1908, the first year of operation under the direct primary law, and in 1946, 1948, and 1950 combined. Observe that the distribution of districts became more widely dispersed between 1908 and 1950. At one end of the scale Republicans came to win, usually without contest, a block of seats; at the other end of the scale, the number of seats that went to the Democrats by default increased. The proportion of districts clustered about the 50-50 point declined. Whether or not the direct primary was the cause of it all, a point to be weighed shortly, a sharp change occurred in the district distribution in the period 1908-1950.

FIG. 4. Pre-Primary and Post-Primary Contrasts: Distribution of Missouri House Districts, 1908 and 1946-48-50 Combined, According to Percentage Division of District General Election Vote on Representatives.

A word needs to be said about the rationale for the comparison of two distributions so far separated in time. The assumption is that informal habits of political action—the activity of organizational cliques, the loyalty of electors to party symbols, and so forth—are altered only gradually, if at all, by such matters as primary procedures. Patterns of political action have a very considerable durability. If this is true, the effects of the direct primary procedure on political practice become visible only after a political generation or so, not after an election or two. It is, of course, perilous to assume that the two distributions at 1908 and 1946-50 represent observations of two points in a long-term, straight-line trend. Such examination as was made of the intervening period suggests that the change represented by Figure 4 is secular.¹⁵

¹⁵ The difference between the two Missouri distributions is accounted for in large measure by the growth in the number of seats uncontested at the general election. From 1908 to 1916 between 2 and 4 per cent of the House seats went by default at each election.

The broadened dispersion of Missouri districts between 1908 and 1948 shown in Figure 4 flows principally from the failure of parties to put forward candidates in some districts. Nevertheless, a check ought to be made to determine whether a tendency exists for voters to desert their party on local candidates in order, as the saying goes, "to have a voice in local affairs." Some voters thus might register in the dominant local party, participate in its primaries, vote for the local candidate in the general election, yet remain loyal to the state and national ticket of the opposite party. If such a tendency prevails, in weak Democratic districts the Democratic legislative candidate would run behind the presidential or gubernatorial candidate; in strong Democratic districts the Democratic legislative candidate would run ahead of the presidential or gubernatorial candidate. These disparities would presumably be most marked in states using the office-bloc ballot.

To test these questions the analysis of the 1948 Massachusetts primary in Table VII was made. No uniform tendency appears for the voters to behave according to the hypotheses stated. The Massachusetts data, however, may not adequately test the question, for the relations in the table undoubtedly are influenced by factors other than the two variables whose relationship is in question and the cases are few. A similar analysis of the 1948 Missouri election, in which the party-column ballot was used, revealed a closer matching of party division of the vote for governor and for legislator in those districts in which both parties had legislative nominees. The upshot seems to be that when there is a legislative candidate on the ballot, he is likely, on the average, to run about as strongly as the head of the ticket in the types of situations examined.

The inference follows, from the discussion of Table VII, that the type of broadening dispersion of legislative districts recorded in Figure 4 does not flow primarily from a movement of voters from party to party

In 1918 a sharp rise in the proportion of uncontested seats occurred and then the proportion of seats won by default settled down to a new plateau between 5 and 10 per cent of the total. In 1938, another abrupt upturn in the percentage of uncontested seats took place—to a peak of slightly over 30 per cent—and again the level settled down to another plateau in the neighborhood of 20 per cent. Missouri maintained a fairly even state-wide two-party competition over the period. In other states, with wider swings in party strength, it is probable that the cyclical factor would manifest itself in changes in the proportions of seats uncontested, i.e., apart from any long term decay in party leadership the proportions of seats uncontested might rise with an abrupt short-term decline in the strength of one of the parties. Or a sharp rise in minority party strength might increase the proportions of seats contested. Examination of the records of such states might result in the identification of variables other than nominating procedures with a significant bearing on competition and such effects might obscure or offset those factors on which attention is centered here.

TABLE VII. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN DEMOCRATIC PRESIDENTIAL VOTE AND VOTE FOR DEMOCRATIC LEGISLATIVE CANDIDATES IN MASSACHUSETTS SINGLE-MEMBER DISTRICTS, 1948

District's Democratic Presidential Percentage 1948	Number of Districts	Mean Democratic Percentage, Districts with Legislative Contests		Districts with No
		Presidential Vote	Legislative Vote	Democratic Legislative Candidate	Republican Legislative Candidate
10-19	1			1	0
20-29	4			4	0
30-39	15	36.5	39.6	7	0
40-49	27	44.8	41.4	13	1
50-59	15	54.8	59.2	0	1
60-69	12	64.4	64.9	0	1
70-79	15	76.6	67.3	0	6
80-89	7	84.0	73.3 ^a	0	6

^a Only one district is included in this cell.

but more from the atrophy of party leadership in the districts. That atrophy manifests itself in many districts in a failure to put forward candidates. This state of affairs exists not only in districts overwhelmingly attached to one party or another but also in districts in which minority legislative candidates would poll quite respectable votes and even on some occasions have a chance to win. The chances are also that the districts that show up in this analysis—those without enough of a party apparatus to turn up a candidate—differ only in degree of party decay from other districts in which the party has a self-appointed candidate. If so, our indicators detect only a part of the disintegration of party that has occurred.

Another check on the question of whether voter desertion or organizational atrophy underlies the widening dispersion of legislative districts may be made by considering the data recorded in Figure 5 concerning the single-member districts of Ohio and Indiana for 1908 and 1948. The distributions for these states are of considerable interest because they suggest an entirely unexpected clue to the nature of the relation between primary and party organization. The contrast between the 1908 and 1948 Ohio distributions resembles that previously shown to exist between similarly separated Missouri distributions. The Ohio distribution, however, curled up only at the Republican end of the spectrum which reflects in part a difference between the party systems of Ohio and Missouri. On the other hand, the Indiana distribution changed comparatively little between 1908 and 1948. It flattened out somewhat but in 1948 a large proportion of the districts remained in the 60-40 range in general election vote (83.1 per cent against 93.2 per cent in 1908), i.e., they were carried by a ratio of 3 to 2 or less. Figure 5 also provides a minimum measure of the effect of party "organization" in maintaining the 1948 Indiana distribution close to that of 1908. Shown there is the form the 1948 Indiana distribution would have taken if one regarded as

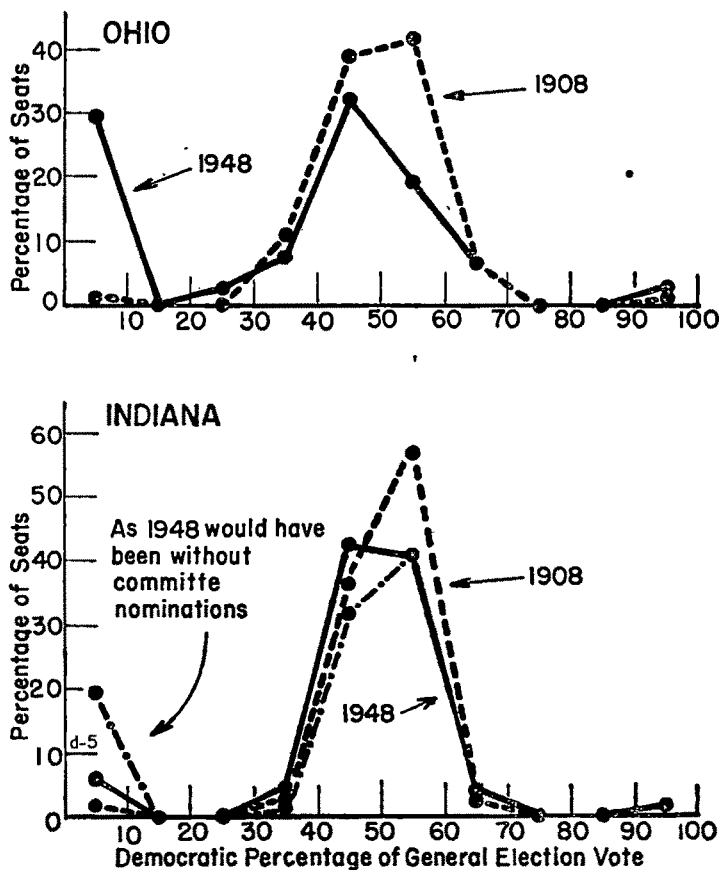

FIG. 5. Pre-Primary and Post-Primary Contrasts: Distribution of Single-Member House Districts, 1908 and 1948, Ohio and Indiana, According to Party Division of District General Election Vote for Representative.

uncontested those districts in which the nominee was named by party committee rather than by primary.¹⁶

The contrasts between the Indiana and Ohio patterns suggest a re-formulation of our notions about the bearing of primary procedures on the vitality of informal party groups and cliques. Indiana nominates its state legislative candidates by direct primary; its candidates for governor, United States senatorships, and other state-wide offices, by state convention. Ohio, on the contrary, nominates for state as well as for local offices by direct primary, although it uses conventions to draft platforms. The necessities of state nominating convention operation may stimulate the maintenance in all localities of party leadership cliques with at least the capacity to round up delegates to the state convention. A delegate from a county 20 per cent Democratic weighs as heavily as one from a county 80 per cent Democratic. Thus stimulated, the activity of party cliques may carry over into the recruitment of legislative candidates. On the other hand, similar external forces may not sustain the same degree of inner-core activity in all districts when a state nominates for state office by direct primary.¹⁷ The hypothesis, thus, might become that the atrophy of local or district party cliques derives not solely from local factors but more significantly from the erosion of the organizational superstructure that once linked local minorities to central points of power within the state. Or, conversely, that local minority cliques once gained vitality from their linkage with state leadership and from the functions they performed vis-à-vis that leadership.¹⁸

¹⁶ Undoubtedly in both states there occurred nominations by primary which resulted from draft or designation by party committee. The Indiana procedure segregates at least some of such nominations.

If the primaries so far dissected are representative, minority party cliques in sure legislative districts have tended to decay since the introduction of the direct primary. The vexing problem is how to establish whether the primary had anything to do with that development. From the beginnings of agitation about the primary, 1900-1910, to the present a variety of factors have been operative, all of which might be supposed to have had some effect on the system of informal groupings which make up a "party."

If party atrophy in legislative constituencies is associated with state-wide and local nomination by primary, the same sort of local decay of leadership cliques would not occur in states which retain the convention system for both state and local nominations. Since the use of the primary is so widespread, comparative experience from convention states is scarce. Connecticut, however, remains a more or less simon-pure convention state and its record may be laid alongside the data thus far presented. Figure 6 shows the distribution of Connecticut legislative seats according to the party division of the general election vote in 1908 and 1948. While the 1948 distribution, in comparison with 1908, flattens out a bit, it does so only in parallel with the shift in general party complexion of the districts as measured by their presidential vote.¹⁹ Moreover, the proportion of seats in the 40–60 range in 1948 differs very little from that of 1908. If attention is centered on the districts carried by one or the other party by default, striking differences appear between Connecticut and Indiana and the other states on which data have been presented. The proportions of seats uncontested at the general election were as follows:

¹⁷ If this theory is correct, the 1908 and 1948 distributions of New York legislative districts would resemble those of Indiana, for New York also nominates for important state-wide offices by convention. The 1948 New York distribution curls up at the extremes of the scale of party strength but this turns out to be the result of dual nominations mainly in the Bronx, presumably by inter-party negotiation. The New York data, hence, conform to expectation.

¹⁸ Compare, on the national scene, the historic reasons for being of Republican "machines" in the Southern states: to control national convention delegations and to dispense patronage. Or, consider the role of Democratic organizations in the northern New England states.

FIG. 6. Sustained Party Competition for Legislative Seats: Distribution of Connecticut House Seats According to Party Division of District General Election Vote for Representative, 1908 and 1948.

	1908	1948
Connecticut, all seats	2.4%	4.8%
Indiana, all seats	1.0	5.0
Indiana, single-member districts	1.4	7.6
Ohio, all seats	1.8	18.5
Ohio, single-member districts	2.6	32.1
Missouri, all seats	1.4	21.4

In these contrasts, the Connecticut distributions reflect the least movement of districts into the uncontested category. In Indiana, which retains the state nominating convention but uses the primary for local ¹⁹ That is, a pair of distributions of the Connecticut districts according to their presidential vote in 1908 and 1948 resembles the distributions according to legislative vote shown in Figure 6.

nominations, the rise in the proportion of uncontested seats has been comparatively small. On the other hand, in those states in which both state and local candidates are nominated by primary, sharp rises have occurred in the proportions of seats won without general election contest.²⁰

In the absence of contrary explanations for these different tendencies, they could be attributed to the effects of the direct primary and, perhaps more particularly, to the state-wide primary with its reduction of the necessity for the maintenance of going local party cliques in all counties for the operation of the state nominating convention. The problem then becomes one of whether an explanation other than the institutional one can be found for the differences in behavior of Connecticut and the full-fledged primary states. A genuinely rigorous demonstration of the association between primary procedures and organizational decay requires the exclusion of all other explanations of the differing behavior of the two types of states.²¹

FIG. 7. Sustained Party Competition in Presidential Politics: Distribution of Ohio Single-Member House Districts According to Division of Their Presidential Vote, 1908 and 1948.

²⁰ The 1948 Connecticut figure reflects in part the fact that in some rural towns the Democrats could muster only one candidate when two seats in the House were to be filled. Comparable New York figures for the two years are zero and 13.3 per cent. The uncontested 1948 seats were principally the result of dual nominations. If it is assumed that without the availability of this nomination procedure such seats would have been contested, 0.7 per cent of the 1948 seats went by default.

²¹ This step, it ought to be made most explicit, represents the crucial stage of the analysis. If it is conceded that inter-party competition occurs quite generally when state-

An alternative explanation of the broadening dispersion of legislative districts could rest on the theory that party competition has roots deep in the social structure of the state. The specific hypothesis might be that in our primary states the movements of population, from country to city, from city to suburb, and so forth, had nicely sorted out Democrats and Republicans among districts to make the cause of one or the other party hopeless in many districts with a consequent disappearance of minority candidates. Meanwhile, in the convention states the demographic trends might not have been such as to destroy the bases for party competition in many districts by this sort of polarization.

If this hypothesis were correct, it would be expected that the distribution of districts according to their presidential vote would have undergone a transformation similar to that of the distribution according to the division of legislative vote. The proportions of districts overwhelmingly Democratic or Republican in presidential voting would have increased sharply. Checks on the states analyzed indicate that the spreading of the legislative distribution 1908-1948 is not simply a reflection of alteration in the presidential distribution. Illustrative is Figure 7 which shows the distributions of Ohio single-member districts according to the Democratic percentage of the presidential vote in 1908 and 1948. Compare this with the legislative distributions for the same districts in Figure 5. The Missouri data are similar. The conclusion seems clear that if in such states there were enough of a party organization in each district to bestir itself to put up a candidate and to campaign a bit, the current legislative distributions would more nearly resemble the presidential.

Another type of check on the general point is provided by Figure 8 which shows the distribution of Massachusetts single-member legislative districts according to the division of their legislative and presidential vote at a single election, that of 1948. At both ends of the distribution the minority party does not put up either enough candidates or enough of a fight to realize its potential in the legislative voting. While a realignment of voters may in some instances produce an alteration wide nominating conventions are employed and considerably less generally when both state and local nominations are made by primary, the question remains whether some factor other than nominating procedure accounts for the differences. Since no means exists to determine whether all the other possibilities have been excluded, findings based on such reasoning must remain provisional. The entire analysis illustrates neatly the basic difficulties of comparative government. Even in the comparative analysis of American states, which should hold constant a great many factors that would complicate comparisons among nations, it is extraordinarily difficult to know when significant variables have been identified. For a treatment of the problem of method, see Roy Macridis and others, "Research in Comparative Politics," this REVIEW, Vol. 47, pp. 641-75 (Sept., 1953).

of the distribution of legislative seats quite independently of the primary, it seems apparent that that factor does not account entirely for the changes examined here although it may well have been of some effect.

Several other explanations, in addition to nominating practices, could be offered for the differences between 1908 and 1948 legislative distributions. Thus, the introduction of the popular election of senators may have eliminated centers of state leadership that took steps to assure that a legislative candidate ran in almost every district. While this constitutional change probably was of significance for the organization of state politics, had it been controlling the Connecticut party organization would have atrophied in a manner similar to the state organizations in states using the direct primary. Another explanation, and one more difficult to cope with, is the theory that the informal structures of the Connecticut party system have always had a strength exceeding that of the other states with which it has been compared. Otherwise the Connecticut organization would not have been capable of preventing the imposition of a mandatory direct primary system while other state organizations succumbed to the demand for reform. Unless the retention of the convention system alone be regarded as proof, the supposition would be extremely difficult to test.²² Another possibility is that over the past forty years those groups disposed to seek office and those groups able to support office-seekers have gravitated toward the Republican party. Nobody is left, so the argument goes, to run for office in many districts under the Democratic banner even though there may be a good many Democratic voters left. If this were the explanation of the tendency in the primary states, the same sort of trend would also probably exist and be felt in Connecticut. It is also possible that such a movement of leadership strata, if it has occurred, may have been, especially among office seekers, at least in part a consequence of the primary system itself.²³

FIG. 8. Contrasts in Presidential and Legislative Competition: Distribution of Massachusetts Single-Member House Districts According to Division of District Presidential and Legislative Vote, 1948.

²² The Connecticut convention system is said to persist in part because of the fact that delegates in the Republican state convention are apportioned in the same manner as the members of the lower legislative house. The small towns, greatly overrepresented, would lose advantage by the adoption of the state-wide primary.

III

The data make it difficult to reject the hypothesis that the creation by direct primary legislation of new channels to power, more readily accessible and less readily monopolized than antecedent procedures, operates over the long run to modify the nature of the informal structure of party leadership in bi-party systems. The inferences about the effects on informal party structure have, to be sure, been based largely on the indirect evidence of the presence, absence, or performance of candidates. That evidence deserves weight on the principle that where there are no bear tracks there are no bears. Yet the conclusions should be limited to the time and to the type of situation under examination and perhaps even to the specific cases studied. In particular, the observations should not be projected to primary nominations in large jurisdictions.²⁴

²³ While the governments of American states are notable for their surface similarities, even the most cursory examination unearths persistent peculiarities in their informal political organization and practice. The basic question here comes down to whether some feature of Connecticut, independent and separate from the convention procedure, operates to maintain an informal political order different from that of the primary states. One reader suggests a variation on the demographic theory tested in the text, viz., that the changing demography of the primary states oriented the rural districts toward anti-metropolitanism. Given a degree of independence between national politics and state legislative politics, that sentiment of anti-metropolitanism reflects itself in a lack of party competition for legislative seats in these districts even though they may have a substantial minority vote in gubernatorial and presidential elections. In Connecticut, on the other hand, the demographic fact of a sprinkling of smaller cities rather than a dominant metropolis or two has not provided the conditions for so high a degree of metropolitanism. The hypothesis is difficult to test. If it were correct, the Indiana and New York 1908-1948 distributions would behave as do those of Missouri and Ohio. Another reader suggests that the pay of legislators may be a factor. Their real compensation has probably declined, but it may be doubted that this factor bears significantly on our problem, which in a way is to explain why parties at one time or under some circumstances put up candidates without much of a chance to win low-paying offices and do not do so at other times or under other circumstances.

²⁴ Cortez A. M. Ewing concludes, from his extensive analysis of Southern nominations, that local constituencies show "distinctive characteristics which belie the facile assumption that a large constituency is only an overgrown small one." Primary Elections in the South (Norman, Oklahoma, 1953).

Moreover, the examination of local nominations points to state-wide party procedure and organization as a significant determinant of the character of political competition within the districts. Inquiry in that direction would complement and perhaps modify the conclusions. Furthermore, on many questions the data dealt with here can yield no information. The findings boil down about to the following:

1. The transfer, to a considerable extent, of the actual popular choice to the majority party primary probably has brought a basic change in the role and structure of the inner party leadership within the majority party in such legislative districts. Such a conclusion must rest on the assumption that in pre-primary days inner party cliques had a relatively free hand in nominations. That state of affairs must be contrasted with the genuine competition for popular favor that appears at majority party primaries, although the level and regularity with which it is sustained differ from district to district with factors such as closeness of the general election vote. The data tell little about the workings of party cliques within majority districts, other than that if or when they exist they do not ordinarily operate without at least occasional serious challenge.²⁵

2. The direct primary leaves a clearer trail in its effects on the minority party. Over the long run there seems to be associated with the primary a tendency for the district party cliques and leadership in the minority party to atrophy. The comparative analysis suggests that a critical factor underlying this drying up of local leadership is not the local primary alone but the combination of the local primary with the alterations in the structure and place of state leadership involved in the abandonment of the state nominating convention. This special case of organizational atrophy may be subsumed under the more general proposition that institutional decay follows deprivation of function.²⁶

3. These two broad effects combined alter the nature of political competitors, if not the character of the process of political competition itself. The transfer of actual choice to majority primaries, to the extent that it occurs, affects the monopoly of opposition enjoyed by the minority party, which, Schattschneider asserts, "is the most important asset of the second party."²⁷ The function of opposition comes to be carried out in considerable measure by candidates within the majority party primary. If carried to its extreme, this process would destroy the minority.²⁸ More commonly the atrophy of leadership of the second party may leave it less well equipped to perform the function of governance at critical moments when it is willy-nilly swept into office. All this rests on the assumption that the preservation of the monopoly of opposition and the exercise of the rights and duties of that monopoly build and prepare leadership for responsibility.

²⁵ Related questions on which the data throw no light are whether the shift from competition between candidates of parties to that between candidates within parties brings with it alterations in the nature of the issues of campaigns, in the conduct of campaigns, in the relation of legislators to their party group in the legislature, in the nature of the choice presented to the electorate, and so forth.

²⁶ Institutions are hard to kill but survival bereft of function tends to be associated with a metamorphosis of mission, as when an ancient and honorable volunteer fire company lives on to sponsor an annual ball and to appear in festive costume on ceremonial occasions.

4. Prudence dictates some hedge about the method of analysis and the interpretations that flow from it. Given the complexity of the sort of political phenomena with which we are concerned, it would be a wise conjecture that the institutional variable is only one of a bundle of factors or causes explicative of the contrasts that appear in different states and in the same state at different times. Variations in the proportions of these unidentified variables might even on occasion produce results that diverge from those in the states examined here and thereby lead to the identification of factors significant but not perceived in the situations examined here. An increase, for example, in the effort devoted to the development and maintenance of a state-wide integrated party system might offset institutional depressants of party life that operate when such effort remains more or less constant.

5. A word of caution for party reformers is in order. If the assumption is correct that changes in informal patterns of action occur only gradually, repeal of the mandatory primary laws would by no means restore tomorrow the party structure existent before their adoption. So firmly established are the forms and practices of direct primaries that probably in many constituencies even in the absence of statutory mandate they would be continued. Only over a longer term could significant alterations in informal party structure be expected to follow a change in nominating procedures.

²⁷ Elmer E. Schattschneider, Party Government (New York, 1942), p. 82.

²⁸ One is puzzled why in small constituencies forces set in motion by the primary do not draw practically all voters into the primary of one or the other of the parties at least for local purposes. The organizing influence of gubernatorial and presidential politics may maintain a bi-polarization that has its effects in a modicum of party identification vis-à-vis local candidates even in the smallest constituencies.

POLITICS OF BRITISH CONSERVATISM*

LEON D. EPSTEIN

University of Wisconsin

A rough measure of the resilience of the British Conservative party is indicated by the relatively rapid comeback from the electoral defeat of 1945. Instead of a twenty years' exile, like that of American Republicans, the Conservatives were out of office only six years. To be sure, their return to power was by a very slim parliamentary majority, representing less than half the popular vote cast in the General Election of 1951. And the ups and downs of the Conservative Government's popularity, as reflected in by-elections during 1952 and 1953, have shown little more than a capacity to hold the existing narrow margin.¹ For many it must still seem difficult, as it did for Professor Herman Finer in the late 1940's, "to conceive a policy which, within some decades even, might win back for the Conservatives enough votes to support a solid government."² Naturally the Conservatives themselves have hardly accepted the fate of serving only an occasional interregnum between periods of Labour rule. Almost entirely without the spectacular issues which have characterized recent electoral successes of American Republicans, the British Right has sought to refute the assumption that it is incapable of presenting a sufficiently attractive political alternative to socialism.

I. IDEOLOGICAL REVIVAL

The Conservative party has not been without an intellectual base from which to launch a counteroffensive against Labour's compound of Fabianism, non-conformist equalitarianism, and anglicized Marxism. Although party spokesmen are tireless in disclaiming the type of ideological prepossession considered the curse of socialism, they do hold that Conservatism is distinguished by "a habit of mind, a mode of feeling, a way of living."³ The Tory is said to reject

* First-hand observations included in this article were made in Great Britain during the author's tenure of a fellowship granted by The Fund for the Advancement of Education to enable him to broaden his qualifications for college teaching. The article represents the independent work of the author, however, and he is solely responsible for it.

¹ Following a period of apparent political adversity in the first nine months after the General Election of 1951, Conservative popularity seemed on the increase late in 1952 and during the spring of 1953. The most notable triumph was at Sunderland, South, where the Conservatives in capturing a Labour seat accomplished what no Government party had been able to do in a by-election against its opposition since 1924. The (London) Times, May 14, 1953, p. 8. However, in the fall of 1953 the voting trend in by-elections was favorable to Labour. No seats changed hands but particularly in the marginal constituency of Holborn and St. Pancras South the Conservatives appeared to have lost ground. The (London) Times, Nov. 20, 1953, p. 8.

² Theory and Practice of Modern Government, rev. ed. (New York, 1949), p. 317.

³ Introduction (by the editor) to The Conservative Tradition, ed. Reginald J. White (London, 1950), p. 1.

rationalistic and a priori doctrine, but to prize the values regarded as "given" in the British political inheritance.⁴

None of the sources of this outlook are new, and they have been amply explored elsewhere.⁵ What remains striking, however, is the extent to which the Conservatives have revived and refurbished their traditional ideology. The articles of faith stemming from Edmund Burke must always have won intellectual admiration, but they have been given a special prominence in the party's postwar campaign to equip the younger generation with a basically conservative approach to politics. Burke's rhetorical passages are profusely quoted in speeches and pamphlets, and one of the party's contemporary intellectual spokesmen advised Conservative students: "In him is contained all that is necessary to political salvation. 'Back to Burke' ought still to be our motto. Read and re-read the Reflections on the Revolution in France: this is an exercise that should be performed at least once a year."⁶

Reliance on the Reflections is natural enough in the party's circumstances. Burke's admiration for constitutional tradition, respect for the established religion, and belief in evolutionary and organic change all suit the Conservative temper. The present role of the party is not seen in such a very different light from the time when Tories, forgiving the fact that Burke had been a Whig, first found in his reaction to the French Revolution the intellectual fount of modern Conservatism. The problem is still to resist, in one way or another, the sharp breaks with tradition that Burke inveighed against so strenuously. Even while insisting on a national uniqueness relative to continental right-wing parties,⁷ British Conservatives have customarily accepted Lord Hugh Cecil's view that "from 1790 the whole of English politics was cut in two by the influence of the French Revolution and its principles; and those who stood emphatically against the revolutionary movement made the party in politics which we now call Conservative."⁸

The Burkean disbelief in the efficacy of radical institutional remedies for the ills of the world is applied against the utopian element of socialist doctrine as it was against the enthusiasm of the French Revolution.⁹ But now the party finds its traditional pessimism about man's capacity for large-scale social progress more nearly keyed to the popular intellectual mood than it was during

⁴ The word "given" is used here in the same sense employed by Daniel Boorstin to describe the general American belief that values are "in some way or other automatically defined: given by certain facts of geography or history peculiar to us." The Genius of American Politics (Chicago, 1953), p. 9.

⁵ Notably in Russell Kirk's entirely sympathetic appraisal of Anglo-American conservatism, The Conservative Mind from Burke to Santayana (Chicago, 1953).

⁶ T. E. Utley, "The State and the Individual," lecture published in the Conservative Political Centre's The Good Society (London, 1953), p. 41.

⁷ For example, Michael Oakshott, "Contemporary British Politics," Cambridge Journal, Vol. I, pp. 474-90, at p. 479 (April, 1948).

⁸ Conservatism (London, 1912), p. 40.

⁹ G. Kitson Clark, "The Historial Basis of Conservatism," in The Good Society, op. cit., p. 24.

much of the nineteenth century. No longer appearing hopelessly reactionary, an emphasis on the limitations of human nature can proudly be presented as a neo-orthodox foundation for Conservative political thinking. It is true that not everyone who has rediscovered a religious view of man's sinfulness is now a Tory. The Labour party, in addition to its non-conformist religious base, has a variety of church members. Yet the long-standing Conservative assumption of human sinfulness must appear especially congenial to the neo-orthodox believer. Furthermore, the Conservative party has always identified itself with the political defense of the established religion.

Nevertheless a considerable part of the Conservative intellectual revival may have little or nothing to do with religious neo-orthodoxy. One need not be convinced of man's sinfulness to be impressed with limitations on human progress, or with the obstacles in the way of rational and planned solutions of social problems. Two disastrous world wars and their unpleasant aftermaths have played their part in shattering the liberal optimism of Victorian days. And, more particularly, the opportunities to practice socialist principles in Russia and Britain have in their very different ways been disillusioning experiences for the intellectual community. In this context, it is not surprising to find teachers at Oxford and Cambridge remarking that politically-inclined students have been showing a more pronounced Tory preference than was true in the 1930's. It is still too soon to say that the trend to the Left, so discernible among intellectuals before and during World War II, has been reversed.¹⁰ Most Oxford and Cambridge students normally might be expected to have Conservative backgrounds, and it would be rash to generalize confidently about a postwar flight from socialism. The number of Labour intellectuals is impressive, and it includes many moderates in addition to the New Statesman variety. On the other hand, the postwar Conservative campaign has also been served by considerable academic and verbalist talent.¹¹ The Conservative Political Centre, established in 1945, has produced a sophisticated educational program, and, along with the well-developed party research departments, has furnished employment to aspiring intellectuals often on their way to parliamentary careers.

The invigoration of the party's deep anti-radical tradition has been accompanied by a continued emphasis, at a less intellectual level, of the closely related patriotic motif. In various rhetorical flourishes as well as in the prominence of the Union Jack and other British symbols at party meetings, Conservatives perpetuate their chosen role as the defenders of Queen and Country. This display of national sentiment is markedly different from the practice of the Labour party, whose symbolism largely remains that of the "working class" and of socialism. However, since Conservatism's patriotic appeal was customarily linked to the championship of Empire, its substance necessarily suffered some modification in the postwar years. At least since the time of Disraeli, the party had considered itself the only trustworthy guardian of the Empire. Originally in opposition to the anti-imperialism of the Liberals and later to that of Labour, the Conservative party had rallied the bulk of the nation's sentiment for overseas expansion. Of course, the cause was hardly forsaken in the postwar period. Conservative imperialism has still been expressed, very enthusiastically by one wing of the party, in diatribes against "scuttling" British overseas possessions and particularly in arguments favoring the extension of the Commonwealth's preferential tariff system which prewar Conservative governments had established.¹²

¹⁰ The pre-1945 undergraduate trend is readily associated with the subsequent rise in the proportion of Oxford and Cambridge men in the Parliamentary Labour party from fifteen per cent, as an interwar average, to thirty-seven per cent in 1951. J. F. S. Ross, "The 1951 House of Commons," Quarterly Review, Vol. 290, pp. 305-6 (July, 1952). Ross's figures make it clear that this was not at the expense of the Conservatives, whose proportion of Oxford and Cambridge products also rose in the same period—from fifty-two per cent to sixty-three per cent.

¹¹ Toryism's apparently thriving intellectual status raises some doubt concerning the broad applicability of Joseph Schumpeter's well-known dictum that the intellectual class accompanying the rise of modern capitalism inevitably becomes hostile to the existing order. Of course, some of the Tory intellectuals may not belong to a class accompanying the rise of modern capitalism. For Schumpeter's discussion, see his chapter, "The Sociology of the Intellectuals," and his additional paper, "The March into Socialism," both in the third edition of Capitalism, Socialism, and Democracy (New York, 1950).

What vitiates the maintenance of a distinctively Tory Imperial position is not only the anachronistic character of the traditional grounds for defending the diminishing Empire. Much, though not all, of the old Conservative faith is capable of transformation into an attachment to the newly-fashioned Commonwealth. But here Conservatives find themselves in apparent general agreement with the bulk of their Labour opponents. For example, the Labour party now appears only slightly less anxious to achieve—if it were possible to do so—an Imperial Preference tariff system designed to solve Britain's balance of payments problems. And, save for some polemics having to do with political tactics, there seems little room for difference between the two parties in the matter of preparing colonial areas for self-government within the Commonwealth. While the Conservatives may, when criticizing Labour's supposed weaknesses in foreign as well as Imperial policy, still invoke their status as the party of Empire, such a line does not imply a large-scale resurgence of really distinctive principles.

Much better suited than Conservative Imperialism for postwar revival has been the party's ideological position in relation to the economic order. Here a large portion of the Conservative inheritance appears relevant to the task of resisting socialist doctrines, and without exclusive reliance on a capitalist rationale of doubtful popularity. Defense of private property and of a leisured class based on property ownership were cardinal features of historical Conservatism. But it was not so much business wealth as landed property that Conservatives traditionally defended. Consequently a doctrinal devotion to free enterprise has never been as dominant a characteristic as it has among American Republicans—whose party origins coincided with the rise of industrial capitalism. The original basis of Conservative thinking is pre-capitalist, and it thus seems entirely appropriate that the Marquess of Salisbury, contemporary representative of the Cecil family, should describe the party's ideal of British society as neither socialist nor capitalist.¹³

¹² Party conference debates are illuminating in this respect, as reflected, for instance, in the 69th Annual Report of the National Union of Conservative and Unionist Associations (London, 1948), pp. 64-71.

Significantly, Conservatism now emphasizes the nineteenth-century opposition it offered to the laissez-faire theories of Manchester liberalism. Individual Tories like Lord Shaftesbury and Richard Oastler,¹⁴ who had pressed for legislation to regulate labor's hours and working conditions, are counted the precursors of the Conservative concern for the welfare of the working-class. Disraeli, credited with the political genius of identifying the party with that concern, is celebrated as the chief Tory hero. His insistence on calling the people to the Conservative cause is proudly presented as the party's real tradition, as opposed to the pure and simple defense of the status quo which has so often characterized Conservative statesmanship. In the present perspective, the failure in the period just before and after 1900 to associate Conservatism with the aspirations of the urban working class is considered an unfortunate deviation from basic principles. Belatedly, in other words, the status of prophet is accorded both to Lord Randolph Churchill, for his meteoric Tory Democrat campaign of the 1880's,¹⁵ and to Joseph Chamberlain, for his attempt to transplant the left-wing Liberal social program to his adopted party.¹⁶

In the forefront of the party's intellectual campaign is Lord Hugh Cecil's belief that "it is an indispensable part of an effective resistance to Jacobinism that there should be moderate reform on conservative lines."¹⁷ Consistent with this view, considerable emphasis has been placed on the positive measures of social amelioration attributed to Stanley Baldwin and Neville Chamberlain during the interwar years. Especially the redemption of Chamberlain's reputation has been largely in terms of the welfare and housing legislation which he advanced with the express purpose of softening class antagonisms.¹⁸ While it might be granted that such legislation was limited by the stand-pat element of the party temperament, Conservatives, in justifying welfare measures, have not had to ¹³ Radio address contained in Conservatism: 1945-1950 (Conservative Political Centre, 1950), p. 96.

¹⁴ A full account of Oastler's reforming career is given by Cecil Driver, Tory Radical (New York, 1946).

¹⁵ Of Lord Randolph's role his son wrote long ago: "... he urged that energetic sympathy with practical social reform and indifference to selfish class instincts which alone can convince democracy that time-honoured institutions are not merely safeguards but may be made effective instruments of progress." Winston Churchill, Lord Randolph Churchill, 2 vols. (London, 1906), Vol. 2, p. 404.

¹⁶ James L. Garvin, The Life of Joseph Chamberlain, 4 vols. (London, 1932), Vol. 2, pp. 155-59 and pp. 448-69.

¹⁷ Conservatism, p. 64.

¹⁸ The reformist spirit of Neville Chamberlain at the Ministry of Health, 1924 to 1929, is described by Keith Felling, The Life of Neville Chamberlain (London, 1946), pp. 126-48.

explain away any doctrinal inhibition on the use of governmental power in behalf of the economically underprivileged. They had been such long-standing champions of state authority against the individualism of British Liberalism that legislative and administrative intervention, as such, represented a continuity rather than a break in intellectual tradition.¹⁹ Characteristic of this attitude is the currently widespread preference among many party activities for the label "Tory," with its connotations of a more positive stand than the title "Conservative."

However, the contemporary Conservative party could hardly be content with an ideology which did no more than justify the welfare state. A party of the Right does not exist only by competing in the field of social legislation. For one thing, the business interests, which (regardless of tradition) have found political refuge in Conservatism, naturally favor certain limits on governmental intervention. And Conservatives also argue that their ideological juxtaposition to a socialist party requires that they now emphasize the value of preserving a large sphere of freedom from the state. In one sense, this gives the Conservative party a different political role than it once played. Yet it is easy to appreciate how a Tory intellectual like Quintin Hogg (now Lord Hailsham) can reasonably deny that there is anything "inconsistent in having opposed Whiggery in the interest of the Crown, Liberalism in the name of Authority, Socialism in the name of Liberty, and even of the Liberal State." In his widely circulated version of postwar Conservative doctrine, Hogg contended that each of the party's diverse stands was merely part of the true function of righting the balance against currently popular theories. "In fighting Socialism in the twentieth, as they fought Liberalism in the nineteenth century, Conservatives will be found to have changed their front to meet a new danger, but not the ground they are defending."²⁰

Essentially it appears that the intellectual ground being defended is the British tradition of balance and moderation which the party considers its own faith. Conservatives not only believe that there is much in the past worth preserving, but that they, because of their attachments to the past, can best decide what ought to be saved.

II. POSTWAR PROGRAM

Although the intellectual basis of Conservatism is flexible enough to justify wide departures from previous advocacies, this did not automatically insure the adoption of a new postwar program. There was always what Winston Churchill, in another period, had called "an obstinate but apathetic resistance to change,"²¹ and so the possibility that Conservatism would be identified only with desperate delaying action. This, in all probability, was what led critics to doubt whether the party had the capacity to evolve "a considered series of measures satisfactory to the majority of people."²² The handful of Tory intellectuals and reformers was thought no match for the inertia of the party mass, tacitly assumed to be tied to policies of the past if not to vested interests of the present.

¹⁹ "For the tradition of authority is naturally a Tory tradition, and, but for the influence of Conservative prudence and justice, the successors of the Tories might probably have been ready to use the authority of the State with a freedom which we associate with Socialism." Lord Hugh Cecil, Conservatism, p. 247.

²⁰ The Case for Conservatism (Harmondsworth, 1947), pp. 15, 53.

²¹ Lord Randolph Churchill (cited in note 15), p. 121.

It is questionable, however, whether Conservatives, en masse, would have been satisfied with the kind of program they had followed a few decades before. While hosts of unreconstructed Tories may have remained, there must have been others in the Conservative ranks who had themselves participated in and accepted the evolutionary process, accelerated by wartime circumstances, which had so greatly changed British society. Perhaps R. A. Butler, the acknowledged architect of postwar Conservative policy, was not wrenching the party from its moorings so much as he was plainly reflecting the contemporary view when he said: "It is the task of the present generation of Conservatives to found our modern faith on the basis of two features of this age, namely the existence of universal adult suffrage and the acceptance by authority of the responsibility for ensuring a certain standard of living, of employment, and of security for all."²³

Conservative adoption of the principles of the welfare state was signaled by the favorable reception given in 1947 to the Industrial Charter, the party pamphlet officially announcing the enlightened Tory faith. Many of the inarticulate rank and file may have been unimpressed with this product of the party intellectuals, but the pamphlet provoked open attack from only a small die-hard minority who considered the Charter to be "milk and water Socialism" or "pink Socialism." This opposition was harmlessly out-of-date and it was drowned in the chorus of approval that the Conservative conference gave to Butler's call for a "strong Government policy."²⁴ But there was an evident desire to distinguish this policy from the planning advocated by the Labour party. It was claimed that Conservatives would avoid any detailed interference in private business and would seek to encourage individual enterprise consistent with overall economic control. This was rather vague ground on which to stand in opposition to socialism, and the Industrial Charter was less important in this respect than it was in making clear that the Conservative party was committed to the full employment program which the British community now expected of any government.

Similarly the party offered reassurances that it would retain whatever means of rationing and price control were necessary to the "fair shares" policy instituted during the war but subsequently claimed by Labour as its own equalitarian-minded policy. Conservatives had to establish their good faith in "fair shares" without at the same time turning their backs on the rising discontent, especially among their own followers, over the bureaucratic annoyances of the rationing system. Consequently, there was an ambivalence about the party's statement:

²² Theory and Practice of Modern Government (cited in note 2), p. 317.

²³ Introduction to Conservatism: 1945-1950 (cited in note 13), p. 3.

²⁴ 68th Annual Report of the National Union of Conservative and Unionist Associations (London, 1947), pp. 46-54.

It follows that we should be able to take off the rations and controls far more quickly than the Socialists who scorn the practical methods of experience and enterprise. But we give this pledge. We will not remove the control from any necessity of life until we are certain that it is within the reach of every family.²⁵

In fact, when the Conservatives did return to power they were saved from the possible ideological embarrassment of having to retain economic controls roughly as they were. Conditions eased sufficiently in 1952 and 1953 so that it was possible, consistent with the party's pledge to consumers, to accelerate the process of derationing already begun by the Labour Government and so to claim a policy of "setting the people free."

A more concerted anti-socialist conception was that of a "property-owning democracy," increasingly prominent in the postwar literature of the Conservative party. Here, without challenging in the name of free enterprise any accepted values of the electorate, the party could stand on a set of principles it regarded as its own. Quintin Hogg stated it this way: "Just as political democracy and political freedom mean the diffusion, the sharing of political power, so economic democracy, economic freedom, means the sharing, the diffusion, of economic power, that is property, as widely as possible throughout the community. This diffusion Conservatives regard as the very antithesis of Socialism."²⁶ Following that theme, the party has proposed a society in which there would be more capitalists, in the sense of more Englishmen with a property-owning stake in land or in industry.²⁷

Programmatically much of the talk about a property-owning democracy is very loose, particularly with reference to what is called "co-partnership in industry,"²⁸ but there is one area in which the Conservative preference for individual ownership has been of direct political significance. That is in the matter of government-sponsored housing programs. Conservatives have displayed as definite a bias in favor of encouraging the building of houses for sale as the Labour party has in building for rent. At almost every postwar conference, Conservatives enthusiastically endorsed resolutions to aid the prospective owner-occupier either through new building or through the sale of already existing public housing. The party evidently agreed with the remarks made by a Member of Parliament in 1947: "I am absolutely convinced that a dynamic scheme of house ownership is not only a desirable thing in itself, but it is something which would win us hundreds of thousands of votes at the next General

²⁵ Industrial Charter (Conservative Central Office, 1947), p. 14.

²⁶ Quintin Hogg, The Case for Conservatism (cited in note 20), p. 63.

²⁷ Emphasized in Agricultural Charter (Conservative Central Office, 1948), pp. 4-5.

²⁸ For example, in Anthony Eden's electoral broadcast of Oct. 19, 1951, issued by British Information Services, ID 1109, pp. 7-8.

Election."²⁹ Not only did the encouragement of house-ownership constitute a non-socialist welfare measure, but it was even anti-socialist in its supposed effects on the social attitudes of the new property-holders. It is not surprising that a Conservative could write enthusiastically about raising the proportion of owner-occupied houses from the existing 30 per cent towards the 50 per cent cited for the United States.³⁰

Among the Conservative rank-and-file the popularity of outbidding the Labour party in the housing field was firmly established by a remarkable event at the party's annual conference in 1950. Ordinarily such conferences, attracting three or four thousand delegates, are docile gatherings designed to engender political enthusiasm. However, in 1950, during what started as another routine debate leading to approval of the usual resolution urging a more effective governmental housing program, so much floor support unexpectedly developed for a definite target of 300,000 houses annually that the figure was finally inserted in the resolution—quite obviously against the original wishes of the party leadership.³¹ The target of 300,000 was well above any annual accomplishment of the Labour Government and it was also so high as to seem beyond the reach of a prospective government concerned with a balanced distribution of scarce resources. But once committed to the magic number, the Conservative party made the most of it as a campaign slogan. In the 1951 General Election, it was hedged only slightly in the official campaign statement.³² And three-quarters of the individual Conservative candidates, in addresses to their respective constituencies, referred specifically to "300,000 houses." Altogether, some kind of reference to housing was made in 86 per cent of the Conservative election addresses, compared to 55 per cent in Labour addresses.³³

In office, after October, 1951, the Conservatives began the process of living up to their promise to expand the house-building program, as well as to stress more heavily the building of homes for sale. Whatever the effect on other construction activities, there was no doubt of the political necessity for exceeding the housing accomplishments of the Labour Government. Harold Macmillan, the responsible minister, was therefore very much the hero of the 1952 party conference when he announced, with pride, the beginning of an increased rate of

²⁹ L. D. Gammans, in 68th Annual Report (cited in note 24), p. 97.

³⁰ Michael Fraser, "The Ownership of Property," in The Good Society (cited in note 6), p. 54.

³¹ 71st Annual Report of the National Union of Conservative and Unionist Associations (London, 1950), pp. 56-65. First, the platform ruled out of order the suggested inclusion of the 300,000 figure, then attempted to conduct a vote on a much less specific amendment to the housing resolution, and only finally yielded to an uproar in behalf of the fixed number. Speaking for the leadership, Lord Woolton graciously said "This is magnificent," but he was also reported to have added sotto voce, "This is deuced awkward." Ivor-Bulmer-Thomas, "How Conservative Policy is Formed," Political Quarterly, Vol. 24, pp. 190-203, at p. 202 (April-June, 1953).

³² Britain Strong and Free (Conservative Central Office, 1951), p. 26.

³³ These figures are based on a study of one in four election addresses made by David E. Butler, The British General Election of 1951 (London, 1952), pp. 55-59.

home-building.³⁴ As the rate increased in 1953 to very near the cherished 300,000, Conservatives considered that they had scored a substantial popular triumph.

Politically the Conservative position has not been so fortunate with respect to the National Health Service. Although the party, as the dominant partner in the wartime coalition, had accepted the main outlines of the health program, a suspicion remained as to the wholeheartedness of the decision. The suspicion was aggravated by the fact that the Conservative parliamentary representation voted against the Labour Government's bill establishing the Health Service in 1946. The explanation that this vote was not against "the principle of a national, comprehensive, 100 per cent health service,"³⁵ but only against particular aspects of the Labour bill, might have been genuine enough, but it left a cloud of doubt. Subsequently, Conservatives were most careful to avoid any indication of opposition to the continuation of the tremendously popular service. Criticism was largely limited to what was called the "partisan spirit" in which Labour had carried out the plans of the coalition government.³⁶

This was not the only way in which Conservatives sought to distinguish their support of the health service (and of other welfare measures) from that of the Labour party. While openly welcoming some redistribution of wealth through the provision of social services, it was still insisted that the process should not aim at a complete economic equality. "We believe in fair shares in order to provide a basic minimum," R. A. Butler wrote. "We recognize that in any form of society there must be failures. But one of the greatest motive forces of society is success and it is the task of Government to encourage success."³⁷ More metaphorically, Winston Churchill made the same point in an election address when he said that the Conservatives wanted to preserve an economic ladder while providing a net in which to catch those whose ill luck required the attention of the social services.³⁸ But despite this non-socialist state of mind, no grounds were given for any significant departure from the social legislation enacted by Labour. Indeed, the Conservative Government's choice of Iain Macleod as Minister of Health tended to confirm the party's support of the most important postwar measure. Macleod, decidedly a Tory reformer and a Butler man, had been elected to Parliament as recently as 1950 and had a record that was neither hostile nor lukewarm toward the National Health Service. Even while arguing for the maintenance of minor charges in the generally free system of medical care, Macleod was convincing in his disavowal of a desire

³⁴ 72nd Annual Report of the National Union of Conservative and Unionist Associations (London, 1952), pp. 62-64.

³⁵ H. C. Deb., Vol. 422, col. 66 (April 30, 1946).

³⁶ The Right Road for Britain (1949) contained in Conservatism: 1945-1950 (cited in note 13), p. 204.

³⁷ "Conservative Policy," Political Quarterly, Vol. 20, pp. 317-325, at p. 325 (Oct.-Dec., 1949).

³⁸ Electoral broadcast of Oct. 8, 1951, issued by British Information Services, ID 1085, p. 4.

to transform the character of the service by imposing additional charges in the future.³⁹

A complicating feature of Conservative support for welfare measures was the party's virtually inevitable commitment to lower taxes. Not only was Conservatism, on principle, compelled to resist Labour's preference for taxation as a means for further redistribution of income, but insofar as the party embraced the cause of private enterprise it preached the gospel of reducing taxes to promote business incentive. Butler went so far as to declare: "It is on the weight of taxation that the clash between Conservative and Socialist policies is sharpest."⁴⁰ Conservatives did not, it is true, promise any very drastic reduction in the existing tax levels, but an admitted bias in that general direction was incompatible with any broad expansion in welfare expenditures—especially in light of the priority Conservatives ordinarily assigned to defense and rearmament.

The real problem for the Conservative Government was to avoid any sizable contraction in welfare programs while at the same time affording some measure of tax relief. In light of Britain's staggering income tax levels, no government interested in the preservation of the capitalist system could afford to neglect the tax issue, and Chancellor Butler's 1953 budget did eliminate a nearly confiscatory rate at the highest income bracket as part of a policy of relatively modest reductions in a wide range of incomes. The Conservative defense of this policy was a frank statement of the case for business incentives: "This Budget is primarily an industrial Budget. Its purpose is to help industry, and it is none the worse for that. If we help industry in a Budget we help everybody, rich and poor alike."⁴¹

An even more direct opportunity to champion private capitalism arose out of the Conservative resistance to the nationalization program of the Labour Government. In the last few years there has been a clear-cut battle line between the two parties on this issue, but, as a matter of fact, the postwar Conservative stand has not been entirely of one piece. In 1946, for example, when the Labour Government introduced its legislation to nationalize the coal mining industry, Conservatives, while voting against the measure in the House of Commons, did not declare themselves against nationalization as such. Mainly they objected to the bill's arrangements for administration and compensation.⁴² Subsequently, however, the tenor of Conservative opposition tended to vary with the industry being nationalized. The defense of private enterprise was a good deal more thorough-going with respect to road transport and steel than it was when Labour nationalized electricity and gas. This variation is compatible with the party's claim to be undogmatic about economic policy. With an absence of full faith in

³⁹ H. C. Deb., Vol. 515, cols. 1725–26, 1742 (May 18, 1953).

⁴⁰ "Conservative Policy," op. cit., p. 320.

⁴¹ G. E. P. Thorneycroft, President of the Board of Trade, H. C. Deb., Vol. 514, col. 671 (April 20, 1953). The Conservative defense was in the same vein at Vol. 516, cols. 481–554 (June 11, 1953).

⁴² H. C. Deb., Vol. 418, cols. 701–834 (Jan. 29, 1946) and cols. 874–1074 (Jan. 30, 1946).

private capitalism as an alternative to nationalization, Conservatives have been inclined to favor either a mixture of public and private ownership in a given industry, or a combination of public control with private ownership.

Party pronouncements reflected this moderate and compromising attitude. In 1949 the Conservative statement on nationalization, embodied in The Right Road for Britain, combined a justification of the party's opposition to all nationalization proposals with an acceptance of many as now accomplished facts. A Conservative government would, it was promised, "restore free enterprise where that is practicable," but would in other cases leave industries nationalized in order not to aggravate "industrial discord."⁴³ Although there was obviously a great deal to be said for the sheer impracticability of wholesale denationalization, at the same time this was also a convenient reason for Conservatives to avoid taking an unpopular rigid position which their "undogmatic" preference for private enterprise would not have justified in any case. In this connection, the party's final campaign promises, before being returned to office, are especially significant. Only in the cases of the iron and steel industry and of road transport did the Conservative election manifesto of October, 1951, commit the future government to denationalization. With respect to the Iron and Steel Act, which the Conservatives had consistently opposed without any inhibitions, repeal was flatly promised. Not only was this plank politically propitious, but it was one that was entirely possible to translate into governmental policy. The nationalization of iron and steel, partly because of its original conception and partly because it was still so recent, had not destroyed the identity of the old private firms but had simply transferred their ownership and overall direction to a national board.

Transport presented a less simple problem for the party. The need for both public and private enterprise in this field was admitted by the election manifesto, and nothing was said to indicate a desire to denationalize either the railways or road passenger services. On the other hand, the party was specific in its promise to give the private road haulers a chance to come back into their old business, which, like iron and steel, had been profitable. There was, in short, a strong probability that private enterprise would want to repurchase the assets. In other situations, the Conservatives were unpledged to any drastic change. Gas and electricity were to be administratively reorganized, and civil aviation developed in terms of a combination of public and private enterprise instead of the current nationalized monopoly. In the case of coal, where anything even approaching denationalization would have symbolized a return to the bad old days of underemployment and unplanned exploitation of resources, the Conservative party flatly stated: "We shall not denationalize the coal industry."⁴⁴ There was only some rather indefinite talk about reorganizing and decentralizing.

The actual policies of the first two years of the Conservative Government have been in accord with the practical circumspection of these campaign promises. No more thorough-going renunciation of Labour policies had been dictated by the election returns, and the new administration proceeded so slowly with its modest denationalization program that the party held office for more than a year before the appropriate legislation was introduced. The Government's transport measure included a plan for regionalizing the management of the publicly owned railways along with return of road haulage to private enterprise. Generally the proposal was advanced much more definitely in the name of improving efficiency than in the name of restoring private ownership for its own sake. "We believe," said the Minister of Transport, "and we think that a majority of the people in the country believe, that competition gives a better service than monopoly. We believe that the best way to have a good service is through decentralization; and that independent private enterprise, or, in the case of the railways, regional enterprise, is the best way to achieve this decentralization."⁴⁵ It should be added that road haulage as well as the railways was to be subject to a large degree of central regulation by governmental authority, which was to be somewhat more highly systematized than before.

⁴³ Conservatism: 1945-1950 (cited in note 13), p. 192.

⁴⁴ Britain Strong and Free (cited in note 32), pp. 20-22.

Iron and steel denationalization was justified along basically similar lines even though, in this instance, the argument for private enterprise was more prominently advanced than it was in the case of transport, which partook so much of the character of a public utility. The Conservative iron and steel bill was said to have two objectives—with some significance attached to the order in which they were discussed: first, to establish a "comprehensive system of public supervision embracing the whole iron and steel industry;" and second, to "restore independence, initiative and financial responsibility to the companies and so assure that they have the strongest incentives to produce as cheaply and efficiently as possible."⁴⁶ The minister responsible for the measure was most concerned, in the House of Commons, to emphasize the positive supervisory aspects of the legislation. Now, he said, there would be created an iron and steel board with broad powers over prices charged everywhere in the industry, and not limited in its scope to those basic industrial facilities which were under the authority of Labour's national board by virtue of ownership. Consequently the Conservatives were in the position of justifying their denationalization partly on the ground that it would involve a greater and a more effective system of public control than was possible under the national ownership established by the Labour Government.

Certainly there is nothing about the character of this type of measure to suggest that Conservatism is fostering a policy based primarily on the tenets of free enterprise as those tenets would be understood in the United States. The present Conservative Government seems content to fit its economic program to the very large measure of governmental intervention which the public has come to expect and apparently approve. The party's attitude toward the nationalized industries is much like its acceptance of welfare measures already enacted. This means that Conservative policy looks suspiciously like Labour's campaign program of a decade ago. In that light, the Conservative Government, defending the new status quo, could only hold on so long as the electorate is uninterested in any further advance towards socialism. While that might be a very long time—since just now the Labour party is not very clearly promising much by way of another advance to socialism—nevertheless it is a perspective which Conservatives would be unwilling to admit. Even without many positive measures to juxtapose against socialism, it would be argued that postwar Conservatism, fully converted to Tory Democracy, is capable of future reform in order to preserve British economic society against any need or demand for drastic change.

⁴⁵ H. C. Deb., Vol. 507, col. 1405 (Nov. 17, 1952).

⁴⁶ H. C. Deb., Vol. 508, col. 266 (Nov. 25, 1952).

III. THE PARTY AND ITS APPEAL

Not just the principles but also the tactics of the Tory Democrat have been adopted in the postwar Conservative campaign to attract and hold the loyalties of a non-socialist majority of British voters. The existence of such a majority has been presumed even on the basis of the 1945 General Election when, despite Labour's vast parliamentary majority, less than half the electorate had voted Labour. However, this superficial calculation would leave the Conservative party only a very small potential margin of non-socialists. Just how small was illustrated by the fact that in 1951 Labour, while losing parliamentary control, polled 48.8 per cent of the vote compared to a flat 48 per cent for the Conservatives. To have a popular majority, Conservatives would have to add most of the remaining Liberal vote. Along that line the party was encouraged by the fact that in 1951 it attracted an estimated six out of ten former Liberal voters in constituencies where there was no Liberal candidate.⁴⁷ The Conservative party's short-run fortunes have been linked to the recruitment of this or a higher proportion of the fading Liberal party's stubborn residue, but the effort to establish a really firm electoral base has not been so narrowly limited. On the reasonable assumption that many Labour voters are far from being convinced socialists, Conservatives have tried to detach a portion of the opposition's principally working-class following.

So far the postwar Conservative party's most impressive political accomplishment has not been any such gain at Labour's expense, but rather the organization of that part of the electorate already predisposed to its cause. In bringing into the fold of active membership large numbers of ordinarily passive supporters and in getting to the polls the maximum of potential voters, the party machinery (rebuilt after 1945 under Lord Woolton's managerial direction) proved to be a model of efficiency.⁴⁸ Effective local political associations were more obviously indispensable for Conservatives than for Labour, whose affiliated unions were a ready-made means for reaching a mass public. Therefore, an important manifestation of Conservative organizational success was the large-scale building of Young Conservative associations at the local level. Both in membership and in active political participation, the Young Conservatives operated on a much greater scale than the counterpart Labour youth movement, which customarily displayed a left-wing deviationism that was more a nuisance than an aid to the Labour party. Conservative central headquarters could afford to encourage the growth of its affiliate and even to provide that Young Conservatives should send two of every seven constituency representatives to the annual party conference. As a Labour politician enviously remarked: "These youngsters were taken seriously by the [Conservative] Party, and they took themselves seriously. They staged debates and discussions; they canvassed hard; they attended speakers' classes—and they had a strong social pull."⁴⁹

⁴⁷ The British General Election of 1951 (cited in note 33), p. 242.

⁴⁸ The important subject of party structure is not dealt with here in detail. On the basis of the available published materials, the postwar Conservative organization has already been described in an American journal. See Samuel Beer, "The Conservative Party of Great Britain," Journal of Politics, Vol. 14, pp. 41-71 (Feb., 1952). A more intimate

The social pull as a element in the success of the Young Conservatives becomes readily apparent in any first-hand observation of the associations. Ideology may well be the basic inspiration for the organization and much of its leadership, but no one would deny that the mass membership is attracted by the consequent social opportunities. This is not so simple as joining in order to attend Young Conservative dances. There is also the chance, greatly valued in middle-class circles, of mingling with the upper-crust of local society. For the ambitious young clerk or salesman, an entree to his community's Conservative clubhouse is a step on the road to well-being. No doubt social climbing serves similar political purposes elsewhere, but the British Conservative party has thoroughly systematized the process.

Probably only in a society like Britain's where great importance is still attached to class status could a political party make so much of the social prestige of its leadership. In this sense, the upper-class character of Conservative parliamentary representation is an advantage rather than a handicap in recruiting support. After the 1951 election, 264 of the 321 Conservative M.P.'s were products of the private and expensive British educational institutions known as "public schools." Plainly the party's effort to secure working-class votes did not involve any abrupt shift to proletarian spokesmen. Only ten of the Conservative M.P.'s had gone to the "elementary school" which provides the standard education for most Englishmen—including the bulk of the Conservative voters.⁵⁰ account is provided in the work of a former M.P. with experience in both major parties. Ivor Bulmer-Thomas, The Party System in Great Britain (London, 1953), Part III.

⁴⁹ Wilfred Fienburgh, "The Tory Machine," New Statesman and Nation, Vol. 43, pp. 636-37 (May 31, 1952).

⁵⁰ Figures on Conservative educational background are taken from Ross, "The 1951 House of Commons" (cited in note 10). Another analysis by Ross (of the 1950 House) included the summary statement that only one out of every forty Conservative M.P.'s had attended the elementary school, but that six out of seven Conservative voters had

These educational statistics do not mean that Conservative M.P.'s are predominantly of the aristocracy. The bulk of public school graduates are likely to be of middle and upper-middle class origins, since education of that standard is cherished by most parents of professional status. Nevertheless it is true that fully one-third of Conservative M.P.'s do have close connections with families of hereditary title, and that the top-level party leadership reflects the tradition of the British ruling class. An aristocratic element is, if anything, more prominent in the postwar party, especially in the 1951 Government, than it was in the interwar cabinets of Baldwin and Chamberlain. Men of the nation's traditional political class, like Churchill, Eden, and Salisbury, have not entirely superseded the businessman emphasis of the 1920's and 1930's, but there is no sign that the party regards their class status as anything but an entirely normal feature of Conservative leadership.

Traditional respect for the virtues of a ruling class is, in some sense, built into the structure of the Conservative party. Or at least it looks so in contrast to the deliberate equalitarianism of Labour party proceedings. Not only are Conservatives generally content to accept as party policy what is handed down from above, but they surround their Leader, as he is unabashedly called, with a ritual designed to elevate his status above that of ordinary intra-party debate. Whether he is the head of a government or merely of a parliamentary opposition, the Leader appears to deliver his address to the annual Conservative conference only after debate has formally concluded. Although he cannot presumably ignore the wishes of his followers, the Leader customarily issues the party's election manifesto as his own statement rather than that of any representative committee. More significant than the mechanical arrangements is the subtle atmosphere of respect for established leadership that pervades Conservative ranks. Despite well-known conflicts over position and policy, open attacks calling for repudiation of the party's top personalities would be outlandish behavior at a Conservative public meeting. The many rank-and-file activists who are of middle-class background emulate their social superiors in avoiding any such display of bad taste. Conservative conferences even perpetuate the address "My lords, ladies and gentlemen" as the customary way of beginning a speech.⁵¹

While maintaining the form and some of the substance of its aristocratic traditions, the Conservative party has tried to remove institutional barriers to the recruitment of fresh talent at the leadership level. No plainer sign could be found than the reform in the methods by which constituency associations choose their parliamentary candidates. The local selection process had long been subject to a nominal central control, formalized but not made stronger after the war by a specific provision that an association, if it wanted central done so. "The Personnel of the Parties," The British Party System, ed. Sydney D. Bailey (London, 1952), pp. 168-70.

⁵¹ An American should perhaps take care to avoid exaggerating the significance of this type of affront to his social equalitarianism.

campaign support, had either to name a candidate from an approved list drawn up by a committee operating from party headquarters, or secure (before adoption) the committee's approval of the prospective candidate.⁵² Taken alone, this provision left room for the continuation of the widely prevalent prewar practice of selecting from among several approved candidates the one who was willing to make the largest financial contribution to the local association. In 1944 the party had forbidden candidates to subscribe more than 100 pounds a year, but it was still possible, within this rather high limit, for local selection committees to collect bids, particularly in constituencies which Conservatives had a good chance to win. After the war a concerted effort was made to end this plutocratic bias. In 1948, the party ruled that no candidate should give more than 25 pounds, and no M.P. more than 50 pounds. Also it was established that "in no circumstance shall the question of an annual subscription be mentioned by any constituency selection committee to any candidate before he has been selected."⁵³

Whether this prohibition can be fully enforced may be questioned, but there can be no doubt of the party's genuine desire to emphasize political talent in the selection of parliamentary candidates. That the policy had some practical effect is attested by the universal admission that the large crop of young Conservative M.P.'s newly elected in 1950 contained an unusually high order of ability. Whatever sting might once have been carried by the old opposition taunt that Conservatives were the "stupid party" has assuredly become inappropriate in the present parliamentary situation. In light of the Tory intellectual revival already noted, it is plain that the British party of the Left has nothing like a monopoly of what Americans, inelegantly, have called "egg-heads."

Some of the party's postwar recruitment has been the result of a movement of previously Liberal or independent opinion. Take, for instance, the personal political history of Sir Arthur Salter, who (before he was accorded a lordship in 1953) first served from 1937 to 1950 as an Independent M.P. representing one of the now abolished University constituencies and then for two years after 1951 as a Conservative and a member of Churchill's ministry:

... in the years before the war I was opposed, on most issues, to the Conservative Governments of Mr. Baldwin and Mr. Chamberlain. In the 1945 Parliament I watched, still as an Independent, both Socialism in practice and the evolution of Conservatism in reaction to it. I came during this period to two definite conclusions: first, that socialism as understood and applied by the Socialist Government was undermining the national economy and threatening the personal liberties for which Liberalism has stood; second, that Conservatism had so evolved as to be much nearer to the prewar Liberalism than to either the older Conservative or present Socialist policy. I found myself, therefore, while applying the same principles as I had professed when I first stood as an Independent, consistently supporting the Opposition. It was, as far as I could judge, not that I had ⁵² Final Report of the Committee on Party Organization (approved by the Central Council of the Conservative and Unionist Associations, July, 1949), pp. 31-33.

⁵³ Interim Report of the Committee on Party Organization (approved by the Conference of Conservative and Unionist Associations, Oct., 1948), p. 13.

myself moved to the Right, but that the Right had moved towards what had been before the Center.⁵⁴

Despite its polemical quality, this passage does ring true as a description of the moderate's state of mind when almost forced to choose between the two major parties during the accelerated bipolarization of postwar British politics. Many Liberal activists, wedded to an anachronistic free trade doctrine, have still refused to make the choice, but for those willing to forsake the old party, Conservatism looks as hospitable as it does for Independents. A Liberal's social conscience is increasingly at home in the postwar Conservative party.

Moderate opinion tends to be further impelled in the Conservative direction by any appearance of left-wing ascendancy in the Labour party. Liberals and Independents are much less likely to be attracted by socialist doctrinaires than by Labour's humanitarian reform element. Consequently the Conservative party has a vested interest in the growth of Bevanism in the Labour movement. Convinced that root-and-branch socialism is incapable of winning an election, Conservatives feel they have something to gain politically by the rise of Aneurin Bevan and his followers to dominant positions in Labour councils. Even without such an unlikely event, Conservatives have found it expedient to emphasize the relatively minor but highly articulate Marxist component in Labour thinking. While ordinarily refraining, since 1945, from a simple condemnation of Labour as communism in disguise, Conservative leaders have not hesitated to describe a full development of British socialism as similar, in essentials, to the Russian system.⁵⁵

The Conservative stake in Labour's potential extremism is important in an area somewhat beyond the contest for the allegiance of former Liberals and Independents. It is also related to the patent desire to win increased working-class support and particularly to the long-range Conservative design of modifying the voting habits of the bulk of trade unionists. The latter is at once the most difficult and the most important of tasks. The unions do not merely support the Labour party. Practically speaking, they are the largest section of that party, and to date entirely capable of containing the doctrinaire socialist forces which have always pressed for a policy to the left of that favored by the hierarchy of union leadership. So long as that situation prevails, all that an increasingly favorable Conservative disposition toward unionism can do is to prepare for a still unforeseeable Labour defection, and in the meantime try to increase the number of trade unionists—now claimed to be 3,000,000—who vote Conservative despite the Labour party ties of their organizations.⁵⁶

⁵⁴ A. Salter, "British Conservatism Today," Yale Review, Vol. 41, pp. 1-12, at pp. 5-6 (Sept., 1951).

⁵⁵ For example, R. A. Butler's "We must never forget that the Socialist faith is simply an off-shoot of the Marxist doctrine" (May, 1948); Harold Macmillan's picture of the "Socialist State, when all the means of production, distribution and exchange—that means all industry, all shops and all banking,—become State enterprises, as in Russia" (July, 1949); and Winston Churchill's "there is no real difference between a full application of the Socialist system and Communism" (July, 1949). Conservatism: 1945-1950, pp. 91, 103, and 106.

Establishing their friendship to trade unionism has not been an entirely strained role for Conservatives. In spite of an inevitable identification with the old-time employer opposition to union organization and more particularly with the restrictive legislation that followed the 1926 General Strike, the Conservative party could fairly claim that for some time past it had accepted unionism as one of the facts of British economic life. The party remained opposed to a few union practices like the closed shop,⁵⁷ but generally in the postwar years Conservatives asserted that their policies were more favorable to unions than were the long-run aims of the Labour party. This superficially unconvincing assertion rested on the view that collective bargaining, involving the right to strike, was more secure under competitive private enterprise than under a prospective socialist order where there would be no alternative employer to the state.⁵⁸ The policy of socialism, in the words of one conference resolution, was "inconsistent with both the principles and practice of free Trade Unions."⁵⁹ The Conservative ideal of a union was one that would "look after wages and hours and conditions" and not "play politics."⁶⁰

A positive interest in unionism was largely a postwar phenomenon. Whereas before 1939 the Conservatives had "Labour Advisory Committees" whose role it was to support non-unionist workers in various constituencies, after World War II these were replaced by "Trade Union Councils" meant to encourage Conservative workers to be active unionists exercising as much internal political influence as possible. Unions were now officially recognized within the party structure and on a generous scale. Each constituency association was supposed to send one trade unionist representative to the annual conference, and also to have the chairman of the local Trade Union Council as a member of its own executive body.⁶¹ This recognition was not proportionate to the activities of unionists in the Conservative cause, but was a means of fostering increased future participation. So far, while the trade unionists who appeared at party ⁵⁶ The frequent Conservative claim of 3,000,000 trade unionist voters is cited by B. C. Roberts, "Trade Unions and Party Politics," Cambridge Journal, Vol. 6, pp. 395-98 (April, 1953). What the Conservative party would appreciate, but can hardly hope for, is an adoption by trade union leaders of the traditional American Federation of Labor policy of rewarding labor's friends and punishing its enemies—without any fixed arrangement with one party. Although at present this seems inconceivable, there are occasional signs of T.U.C. restiveness with the current Labour party relationship. See The Economist, Vol. 169, pp. 85-86 (Oct. 10, 1953), for an account of indiscreet remarks about a "candid examination" of the relationship made by Tom O'Brien, chairman of the T.U.C. in 1953. O'Brien was not considered typical, but subsequently there was a story concerning the plans of other and more important T.U.C. leaders to reduce their unions' contributions to the Labour party's general fund and to increase the sums given to individual Labour party candidates of the unions' own choice. The [London] Times, Oct. 31, 1953, p. 3.

⁵⁷ Industrial Charter (cited in note 25), pp. 21-22.

⁵⁸ Speech by Sir David Maxwell Fyfe (Nov., 1949), in Conservatism: 1945-1950, p. 122.

⁵⁹ 71st Annual Report (cited in note 31), p. 52.

⁶⁰ Sir David Maxwell Fyfe, ibid., p. 56.

⁶¹ B. C. Roberts, "Trade Unions and Party Politics" (cited in note 56).

conferences were more than "trained seals" (as Labour politicians called them), they were without large organized followings.⁶²

Nothing in postwar Conservatism's anxiety to court trade unionists has been more pointed than the party's changed position with respect to governmental regulation of labor organizations. While this item might have been considered as an aspect of the Conservative postwar program, its importance is more obviously tactical in nature. At issue were the terms of the Trade Disputes Act of 1927 which had forbidden general and sympathetic strikes, prohibited civil service unions from having outside affiliations, and made it necessary for unions collecting political contributions from members to get their express consent (contracting-in rather than contracting-out). The Conservatives while in office even through the war had always refused to alter the act to meet the continued objections of trade unionists. And in 1946 when Labour repealed the controversial legislation there was a vigorous Conservative opposition, particularly against the shift from the contracting-in requirement to the practice of allowing unions to collect a political contribution along with a member's dues unless the member specifically contracted out of the levy.⁶³ This procedure was manifestly to Labour's financial advantage,⁶⁴ but otherwise the repeal had no immediately important consequence except to satisfy unionists that the supposed punitive spirit of 1927 was wiped off the statute books.

Insofar as Conservatives continued to stand for the principles of the 1927 Act, they undoubtedly imposed a handicap on their campaign to recruit trade unionist support. Yet it was no easy problem for Conservatives to accept repeal of the regulatory legislation whose virtues they had insisted on for twenty years. Even in the deliberately progressive Industrial Charter of 1947 the party maintained its intention of restoring the principal features of the old Trade Disputes Act.⁶⁵ However, before the next General Election this stand was softened to the point of promising to consult the unions on issues where, it was admitted, "Conservatives have strong convictions of principle."⁶⁶ Finally, during the 1951 election campaign even this much of the party's attachment to the old law was officially suppressed in the interests of minimizing trade unionist suspicions.⁶⁷ In fact, when Labour campaigners seized on the promise to consult before introducing any legislation as only a thinly veiled Tory persistence in the principles of the 1927 Act, Conservatives responded with positive assur-

⁶² Individual unionists have taken part in Conservative campaigns, and there is a report of one successful parliamentary candidate who emphasized his union activism and was supported on a Tory platform by an official of his union. R. S. Milne, "A West Country Constituency," The British General Election of 1951 (cited in note 33), p. 217.

⁶³ H. C. Deb., Vol. 419, cols. 192-307 (Feb. 12, 1946) and cols. 386-490 (Feb. 13, 1946).

⁶⁴ From 1946 to 1950 the number of union members affiliated to the Labour party rose from 2,635,346 to 4,971,911. "Trade Unions and Party Politics" (cited in note 56), p. 390.

⁶⁵ Industrial Charter (cited in note 25), p. 22.

⁶⁶ This Is the Road (Conservative Central Office, 1950), p. 12.

⁶⁷ Britain Strong and Free (cited in note 32), pp. 17-18.

ances that they accepted repeal. Winston Churchill was now unequivocal: "The Conservative Party has no intention of initiating any legislation affecting trade unions should we become responsible in the new Parliament."⁶⁸ For maximum effect, Churchill subsequently repeated the statement, and it was echoed by Sir David Maxwell Fyfe, who had been associated with the framing of Conservative industrial policy and especially suspect in relation to trade union legislation. Maxwell Fyfe became most explicit when he said that the party had concluded that "whether the political levy is paid by contracting in or contracting out is an internal matter" for unions themselves to settle.⁶⁹

Not only was the Conservative Government faithful to this somewhat painful conversion but in its first two years of power it was also abundantly conciliatory to unions. Churchill's selection of Sir Walter Monckton as Minister of Labour was a happy one, since Sir Walter, new to Parliament in early 1951, had neither a political past to live down nor any kind of record of hostility to union interests. On the contrary, he enjoyed a nonpartisan reputation for fairness and ability. Monckton became the symbol of the Conservative Government's policy of proving to the Trades Union Congress that its influence, so direct in the case of the old Labour regime, could also be brought to bear—though in different channels—on the decisions of the new administration.

Conservative regard for the views of union leaders, particularly for the clearly moderate ones, was reflected in other ways as well. For example, following the denationalization of steel, the Government named a principal anti-Bevanite unionist, Sir Lincoln Evans (general secretary of the Iron and Steel Trades Federation), to the full-time post of vice-chairman of the new regulatory Iron and Steel Board, and also selected two other members of the T.U.C. General Council as part-time members of the board. There was a chorus of left-wing protest against the designated unionists for "selling out" to Labour's enemies, and it became necessary to find another trade unionist to replace one of the part-time appointees who withdrew under pressure.⁷⁰ But the significant political point was the Conservative success in gaining any appreciable degree of trade union collaboration. The circumstance had not been favorable, since unionists were so clearly being asked to make effective a particular industrial policy which their political party had opposed and had pledged itself to reverse by renationalization at the first opportunity.

Further cooperation of this sort with trade union representatives would still leave Conservatives some distance from the destruction of the class-consciousness that binds the majority of British industrial workers, at least as much as their leaders, to the Labour party. Such a change, if it comes at all, would have to be a very gradual one—perhaps equivalent to a growth in the proportion of the population able to think of itself as middle-class. Of course, that proportion is already high (49 per cent classified themselves as middle-class in response to a 1948 British Gallup Poll),⁷¹ and every election study agrees on the significant coincidence of such self-identification with Conservative voting habits and with Conservative political activism. For instance, it has been found that among workers in essentially similar occupations those who evaluated themselves as middle-class indicated a much higher percentage of Conservative voting preference than did those who called themselves working-class. This tendency held both for manual workers and for black-coated (or clerical) employees.⁷²

⁶⁸ The [London] Times, Oct. 13, 1951, p. 6.

⁶⁹ Ibid., Oct. 20, 1951, p. 4. Also Oct. 15, 1951, p. 2.

⁷⁰ Ibid., May 22, 1953, p. 8, and May 28, 1953, p. 4.

Speaking generally of Conservative political support, it is likely that the party would benefit not only from an increasing tendency toward middle-class self evaluation but also from a further growth in the proportion of non-manual workers. Conservative preferences rise markedly in relation to what is called "intellectual status." Thus in one survey while only 31 per cent of the manual workers were Conservative in their voting intentions, the figure rose to 48 per cent among those classified as intermediate and to 52 per cent among non-manualists.⁷³ Another study has made it clear that non-industrial workers such as clerks and shop assistants constitute one of the largest occupational classifications in which Conservatives can poll a majority vote.⁷⁴ The Conservative proportion in this category is not so high as it is among business proprietors and members of the professions, but the absolute numbers are, of course, much larger.

It was this section of the electorate to which the Conservative party was appealing in its most distinctive postwar program: the building of owner-occupied houses. The impact of that particular policy may not be so great in and of itself, but it is indicative of the stake contemporary Conservatism has in the aspirations of the middle class. Political identification with those aspirations, by encouraging home ownership or by other means, is as characteristic of the postwar Conservative party as association with the interests of the working class is of the Labour party. Whether Conservatism enjoys a long tenure of office may depend on the extent to which essentially middle-class attitudes thrive at the edges of the working class.

⁷¹ Cited by Roy Lewis and Angus Maude, The English Middle Classes (New York, 1950), p. 9.

⁷² F. M. Martin, "Social Status and Electoral Choice in Two Constituencies," British Journal of Sociology, Vol. 3, pp. 231-41, at p. 236 (Sept., 1952). Also Mark Benney and Phyllis Geiss, "Social Class and Politics in Greenwich," ibid., Vol. 1, pp. 310-27 (Dec., 1950).

⁷³ John Bonham, "The Middle Class Elector," ibid., Vol. 3, pp. 222-30, at p. 227 (Sept., 1952).

⁷⁴ A. H. Birch and Peter Campbell, "Voting Behavior in a Lancashire Constituency," ibid., Vol. 1, pp. 197-208, at pp. 201-2 (Sept., 1950).

"NEUTRALISM" IN ASIA*

ROBERT A. SCALAPINO

University of California (Berkeley)

Many Americans view "neutralism" as a new type of social disease. Its probable causes: intimacy in some form with communism; its symptoms: mental confusion and moral dereliction; its cure: unknown. This is a somber diagnosis, filled with implications of doom for the "victims." But our warnings and protests have been to little avail. Most "neutralists" have deliberately rejected them, and the "disease"—if that be its proper designation—has approached epidemic proportions in many areas. Among the centers of infection, Asia is certainly the region where "neutralism" has shown its most consistent strength and taken its most diverse forms. And however much they may lament it, Americans must recognize the fact that Asian "neutralism" can be neither ignored nor talked out of existence. In our own interests, therefore, we should seek a more complete understanding of this highly complex force—its causes and effects, and possibly its implications for future American policy. Understanding does not necessarily mean acceptance; it does permit a more accurate calculation of alternative risks, and this is the vital element in decision making.

At the outset, the problems of definition and terminology must be raised. It is not easy to define or describe "neutralism" in such manner as to obtain the largest measure of agreement from all parties concerned. Frequently, the word is intended as an epithet, with connotations similar to those suggested in our opening sentences. In other cases, the expression is used as if it were a symbol of virtue, a literary badge of honor. To attempt a dispassionate definition, it can perhaps be said that Asian "neutralism" in its current usage is a term applicable to those policies and attitudes representing a rejection of extensive commitment to either side now engaged in the cold war. It must be recognized, however, that while most of the Asian "neutralists" would accept this description of their position, many resent the label attached to it. Opposition to the term "neutralism" by those for whom it is intended stems from several considerations. There is the insistence that even when given its most generous interpretation, such an appellation is too negative and too passive. There is also the feeling that it suggests unfairly a lack of responsibility concerning world affairs. Some of the "neutralist" arguments on these points might be set forth briefly as follows: Ours is a position based upon positive actions and equally positive beliefs. Sometimes these coincide with Western desires and interests, sometimes with those of the Soviet Union, on many occasions with those of neither country. Our main objective, of course, is to maintain a position toward international affairs consistent with our own interests and values as we see them. We are confident, however, that it is not only a positive position, but one which contains constructive proposals for reducing world tension and developing a firmer basis of cooperation among nations. We have participated in international affairs to the limit of our capacities as long as it was consistent with our clearly-stated views. Indeed, we have achieved some measure of leadership in pressing for a solution to certain current world problems. We have followed the practice of abstention only when any other course would jeopardize our basic beliefs, not because we are afraid to stand up and be counted. The record will bear out the fact that we have not been neutral in terms of issues and principles; rather, we have been independent.

* This paper was first presented at the forty-ninth annual meeting of the American Political Science Association at Washington, D.C., September 11, 1953. I am grateful for the suggestions made by various colleagues at that time and subsequently.

It is the word "independent" which climaxes this defense, for those whom we call "neutralists" generally think of their policies and attitudes not as "neutralism" but as "independence." The above arguments are probably a fair representation of the views held by most of the leaders in India, Burma, and Indonesia—the so-called "neutral bloc" in East Asia. Modified somewhat, they could also be used by most of the individuals and groups espousing "neutralism" throughout Asia, although one of the complexities with which we must deal is the fact that "neutralism" stems from diverse interests and philosophies. It differs greatly in orientation and degree, and knows no single line of defense. The position outlined so briefly above comes closest to expressing some of the views of the moderates—those "neutralists" whose general opinions have the most in common with the values of the Western democracies.

Even so, this defense would not satisfy most Americans, including many who consider themselves sympathetic to the problems of modern Asia. Instead of seeking to present their rebuttal, however, let us turn directly to the basic issues. I shall continue to use the word "neutralism" in quotation marks, for while I do not accept its implications fully, neither do I find an adequate substitute in such a phrase as "independent policy." At the outset, it may be helpful to make a distinction between "neutralism" as a policy and "neutralism" as an attitude. If applied too rigidly, this distinction can be challenged as artificial, but used properly, it is not only a convenient technique to make clear certain major aspects of the problem, but also a method that can be defended in logic and fact. Neither the causal-effect relation between attitudes and policies nor the degree of correlation between the two can be defined by any simple formula. And this is true whether one is referring to an individual leader or to the larger components within a society. It is an error to study "neutralism" without these factors in mind.

"Neutralism" as an official policy in East Asia has thus far been identified primarily with the three countries previously mentioned: India, Burma, and Indonesia. The Indian role, moreover, has been so clearly predominant that it might seem preferable at this point in the analysis to concentrate on India alone and place heavy emphasis upon one man—Nehru. I am willing to make substantial concessions to this approach without adopting it. Indian foreign policy has certainly been the cornerstone up to date for the Asian "neutralist" bloc. Few if any innovations have been introduced by the others, although actions have not always been uniform. And no one would deny that Indian policy contains its strongly personalized elements. Nehru's philosophy and personality—ambivalent and complex—are easily discernible. His influence, moreover, extends far beyond India and is quite apparent in Burma and Indonesia. Is "neutralist" policy in South Asia, then, nothing more than Nehru's policy? The most fundamental answer, it seems to me, must be in the negative. Nehru, for all of his unique qualities, is in a certain sense a type. In this sense, there are many Nehrus in Asia—Nehrus without India, Nehrus without Gandhi, Nehrus, of right and left, with and without power. They are a response to the broad forces which have played upon them and their societies. And to the extent that the interaction of these forces creates similar national and personal problems, it creates also tendencies toward similar approaches. The most basic causes for a receptivity to "neutralism" among certain nations and groups are to be found in this realm; no highly personalized explanation will suffice. And evidence on this score can be garnered not only from contemporary Asia, but also from other eras and societies, as we shall note.

What, then, are the foundations upon which "neutralist" policy in South Asia rests? The Asian "neutralist" would answer this question by invoking that much debated concept, the national interest. It is not necessary here to explore the controversy which has raged over "the national interest" theme. It is sufficient to emphasize as forcefully as possible that the first line of defense for "neutralism" in India, Burma, and Indonesia has been built around this concept. To rely successfully upon such a broad thesis as "the national interest" is an obvious advantage as compared with such alternatives as reliance upon a thesis of class or group interest, or any given ideological adherence. It is also extremely difficult, and yet to a remarkable extent it has been accomplished, thus far at least, in the above countries. Any central explanation must focus upon what might be described as the two massive facts of these societies: first, the recency and nature of the nationalist revolution; second, the serious domestic problems of this transitional period.

The implications of nationalism will be discussed more fully later on, but here it must be noted that the so-called "neutral bloc" of South Asia share both a common timing and relatively common circumstances in their emergence from colonialism. And as a result of these factors, the nationalist argument can reach a level of intensity as an appeal comparable to that of arguments resting upon a thesis of religion or class, with the further advantage of being much more comprehensive in its coverage. While this is a significant aspect of all Far Eastern politics, conditions have given it particular force in the countries under discussion.

With regard to the second factor, it is certainly no exaggeration to describe the general domestic situation in the South Asian countries as critical. Political and economic stability remain to be achieved, and even national unification is incomplete. Economic problems are particularly pressing in India and Indonesia, and no basic solutions have been discovered. In all three of these countries, the political situation is precariously balanced, with the present governments in power representing a middle-of-the-road position and being subject to assaults of varying intensity from both right and left. The moral fervor and political unity achieved in the heat of the independence movement have shown an inevitable decline. Leadership faces the serious problem of combatting moral and political disintegration. And naturally the military strength of the present governments is scarcely equal to the task of preserving order even on the home front; in most cases it is a weak and uncertain element in the political picture. Even so, it is a serious drain upon the limited resources of the society.

Thus the immediate situation in these countries tends to reduce possibilities in the field of foreign policy to two broad alternatives. One is active partisanship in world affairs combined with extensive military and economic support from foreign sources. The other is a policy of international participation strongly conditioned by its possible influence upon the domestic scene and its impact upon the major powers. Both policies involve substantial risks. Any success with the first alternative depends upon such factors as the consistency of action by the major powers; the military feasibility of foreign protection; and, perhaps most important of all, the internal repercussions of dependency and a certain amount of foreign supervision and control. All of these risks, and especially the last, militate strongly against its being adopted at present by such countries as India, Burma, and Indonesia. There is grave uncertainty in Asia as to which general course American foreign policy will follow with regard both to the Far East and to the world; there are equally serious doubts as to the strength of the other Western democratic powers, and about some of their actions. In any case, grave doubts have been entertained as to how adequately and at what cost nations on the continent of Asia could be defended by means of Western power, even if events caused or forced them to consider it desirable. The lesson of Korea may not be a valid one for the future, but at this point it has been an impressive one to many continentals, and it is extremely doubtful whether it would have been less impressive had we scored a greater military victory, in view of the enormous sacrifices of the Korean people. On the other hand, the power of nearby Communist China is now treated as a fact by many Asian leaders besides Nehru.

But the greatest problem to be surmounted, should the first alternative be chosen, would undoubtedly be that of losing control of the nationalist movement. Practically all the statesmen of these three countries are both leaders and prisoners of that movement. At present, it is not merely advantageous to cast political appeals in nationalist terms; it is a necessity. The political struggle in these areas still focuses around the battle to capture the nationalist symbols. Each competing group must claim to have inherited that revolutionary movement which had as its central emblem the struggle against Western imperialism. In South Asia, such epithets as "imperialist" and "supporter of Western exploitation" are as dangerous as terms like "fellow-traveler" and "Communist" in America. Thus a foreign policy which can be easily defended as "independent" is the most potent weapon available to men like Nehru and U Nu against some of their opponents, particularly the domestic Communists. Moreover, any other policy would represent a break with a tradition composed of concrete pronouncements and actions as well as generalities. An examination of the numerous foreign policy statements of the Indian Congress party during the period of British rule reveals clearly the strong element of continuity involved in present Indian foreign policy. In this connection, one must not forget that leadership for the most part is in the hands of first generation "revolutionaries," including men whose prestige in South Asia is connected with a lengthy public record on most of the current issues. In this as in other respects, the colonial era still casts a long shadow over the policies of people who have just gained political independence.

Hence the second alternative, despite its obvious risks, becomes the most natural choice, and in the eyes of present leaders the most reasonable. Its dictates are simple but compelling. It must take account of internal weakness and the urgent nature of domestic problems. Thus, foreign partisanship, at either the individual or the national level, is regarded as a development likely to produce further cleavages in an already confused situation. And under the circumstances foreign policy must be the pillar of strength, capable of being sustained on the basis of its own emotional and political appeal, so that the governments in power can fight with some advantages the inevitable crucial battles over domestic policy. Involved in this second alternative also is the necessity for appraising in realistic fashion power abroad, both actual and potential, and then seeking to reduce any threats by relying largely upon a policy of conciliation and compromise, at least until that time when military strength and internal stability may permit the consideration of other approaches. But it need not be a policy resting upon moral suasion and compromise alone. There is also the possibility of creating a position of power not through military strength but rather through a strategic political position attuned to the nature of power politics in the modern world.

A very considerable part of "neutralism" in its official policy forms may be explained in these terms. And actually, when Americans read their own history, they can find interesting parallels. When Citizen Genet threatened to disrupt further the precarious political situation in post-revolutionary America and plunge this weak and struggling country into a large-scale conflict between major powers, many of our governmental leaders registered their emphatic opposition. It was during this period that President Washington issued his famous Neutrality Proclamation of 1793, an important landmark in the history of early American diplomacy. Our military strength was negligible; our economic problems were critical; our political cleavages were serious, and they were being exacerbated by the threat of violent partisanship in America over European politics. There were those who argued convincingly that we could not stand by idly in the struggle between democracy and autocracy in Europe. Men like Genet were doomed to bitter disappointment because their cause was not given the full measure of support from our leaders which they thought it deserved. There is no doubt that in a man like Hamilton ambivalence toward the democratic creed—and particularly toward such a movement as the French Revolution—played an important part in causing the rejection of such proposals. Indeed, since a Hamilton had his counterpart in a Jefferson, the internal balance of foreign favoritism was an additional drag upon official partisanship. Yet essentially the decision was based upon the realities of American weakness; the concept of non-involvement with the major powers was argued most forcefully by reliance upon the thesis of the national interest.

It was this concept that has been termed American isolation, and despite the fact that American attitudes were much more unified on behalf of the democratic creed than those of modern Asia, our policy of official aloofness from European causes and conflicts remained relatively stable throughout the nineteenth century. Not only in its major facts, but also in many of its nuances, this era of American diplomacy bears a certain resemblance to the current situation in the Asian "neutralist" states. For instance, our policy naturally placed heavy emphasis upon American moral superiority and even used the thesis that old world evils were almost indistinguishable in kind and degree. Perhaps we can appreciate today how much these tendencies infuriated the people of Europe.

One must resist the temptation to draw a closer parallel here than actually exists. There are differences and some of them are very important. It is not possible, of course, for the contemporary South Asian societies to follow a policy of isolation, even to the extent that this term is applicable to early American policy. This is the twentieth, not the nineteenth, century and we have now a much more interdependent world. In a sense, however, the present foreign policies of India, Burma, and Indonesia constitute a kind of modern substitute for the outmoded isolationist approach that contains some of its elements. "Neutralism" is a basic technique of limiting involvement with the major powers and thereby avoiding the kind of crisis which such involvement might well produce. In a situation where isolation in its old forms lacks political realism and is also incompatible with the ideological tone of the Asian revolution, and yet retains some of its historic justification, the present policy offers a solution fairly consistent with both the interests and attitudes of these societies. This policy seeks to protect and advance so-called "national interests" in the international arena while at the same time seeking to retain, as much as is possible in our present world, safeguards against heavy involvement with the great powers of today. It attempts this by avoiding a pattern of consistent alignment on one side—by using abstention and "concurring opinions" (to borrow a phrase from our judicial system), so as to establish a position which cannot be identified completely with either power center. Naturally, factors of ideology and attitude lend essential support and make such a policy feasible, but it is important to establish first its basis in real politik.

"Neutralist" exponents do not push the claim that their policy will prevent involvement should another world war occur, although popular hopes in this direction generally accrue to their advantage. Much of the nineteenth-century optimism that participation in war could be avoided has gone with the tide of recent events, and the classical defense of isolation on this score represents a relatively minor part of "neutralist" arguments. The present defense of "neutrality" is that it can help prevent war. A substantial part of this theory is based upon the old balance of power theme, though that phrase is rarely used. It is the "neutralist" contention that we now have a bi-polar world and that this represents the most dangerous political form in terms of reducing tensions and avoiding conflict. Most "neutralists" like to consider themselves a "third force" holding a position that can save the world from self-destruction.

The "third force" concept deserves close examination, so important is it to the general attitudes and actions of all "neutralists." Once again, our initial discussion will revolve largely around its strategic implications, with the vital ideological-attitude factors reserved for a later point. Again, the problem of power is centrally involved. The idea of a "third force" can be attractive as a method of developing influence and power in the international scene despite internal conditions of great weakness. The political advantages of non-commitment—the power of the floating vote—are not inconsiderable under contemporary conditions. In addition, there is the prospect of becoming an important channel of communication between major power blocs and the initiator of both the ideas and institutions of international compromise. If these possibilities could be translated into realities, it would be the supreme vindication for leaders who have only recently emerged from the status of subversives. And like most leaders, these are not men without ego and ambition. Moreover, the prospect of importance is a great stimulant to the society as a whole, coming as it does so soon after the colonial era and the complexes produced thereby.

The "third force" idea is also an ally of regionalism, an objective of both historic and current importance to many people in the Far East. In its indigenous forms, the drive for Asian regionalism has been closely connected with the struggle against Western control. Under Japanese aegis, such slogans as "Asia for the Asians" and even "The Greater Co-Prosperity Sphere" had potency because of this fact. But now the concept of regionalism has new and dynamic implications. Many Asians would like to think of the "third force" as a group of nations recently freed from colonial status which together with peoples still under foreign control would act in concert on the international level. Such a union, they believe, can serve as a formidable pressure group to secure justice and recognition for its members. Actually this is an idea that goes beyond regionalism in many cases, to conceive of incorporating societies from diverse areas facing common problems of timing and development. Its basis for political unity supposedly lies in common nationalist aspirations and opposition to dictation by major powers, and in its common economic interests in such problems as technological development and safeguards against foreign exploitation. In some respects, the so-called "Arab-Asian bloc" has symbolized the bond between a "third force" and a "regionalism" of under-developed societies. The record of this group, together with the growing Asian interest in the African nationalist movements, has been hailed as evidence of the practicality of such a plan.

It is not difficult, of course, to discern many serious obstacles to this theory, especially as it is spelled out by some of its supporters. Among the "underdeveloped" and "late-developing" societies, there are important differences in attitudes and problems; some of these have been graphically depicted both through historic rivalries and recent episodes. There is no inherent asset for regionalism in common problems, particularly those of an economic nature; they breed competition as frequently as cooperation, with the latter usually more dependent upon diversity. Moreover, it is impossible to conceive of such a group as a society of political equals, and there are already three potential leaders in Asia alone: India, China, and Japan. Problems of power and influence among these countries are likely to contribute at least as much to disunity as to unity. Despite these factors, it is easy to understand why there is a great appeal in the dream of a union of the "suppressed peoples", directed in many senses against the West, especially against what are considered Western excesses and prejudices. And whatever the deterrents to its complete realization, this dream will undoubtedly continue to find some forms of concrete expression. Certainly it has provided a powerful stimulus to the idea of a "third force" and the general policy of "neutralism."

Already we have moved toward a discussion of attitudes, and the preceding comments may serve as the transition. In this connection "neutralism" must be viewed at its broadest and most complex level, one encompassing philosophy, ideology, prejudice, and emotionalism. The setting can no longer be restricted to a few countries, but must extend to the whole of the Far East and, by inference, to many other areas as well. At the beginning, one must admit that there is no easy method whereby every pertinent factor can be included and assigned its appropriate weight. It may be wise to start with an attempt to relate to the problem three comprehensive forces which have been so important in contemporary Asian thought and life: the forces of eclecticism, nationalism, and Marxism.

The first of these, eclecticism, might be called the "tolerant component" of the modern Far East. It is deeply imbedded in the entire traditional background, and finds its current expressions in both the philosophies and the institutions of Asian societies. The quest for the greater harmony, for the complete synthesis of conflicting ideas, is still a primary objective. Challenges, to be sure, have not been absent in the modern period. Whatever its ultimate possibilities, Western science in its philosophic reaches has thus far been mainly the science of differentiation, with an emphasis upon empirical research aimed at identifying and categorizing the vast body of fact and ideas. Tendencies toward exclusivism have gained considerable strength from this trend. Out of the process of rigid logical and value distinctions, theories essentially exclusivist in nature emerged. If Western society has been generally characterized by exclusivism at the level of individual theories, it has, by the same token, emphasized vigorous competition among such theories, rather than placing any great premium upon harmonization. And certainly, in their impact upon Asia, Western ideology and religion have presented the case for such competition and the necessity for rigorous selectivity in very powerful terms. This has had a significant influence, and in fact the area is not without some subordinate traditions which lend support.

At the same time, however, the nature of modern Asian problems and certain recent trends in the West itself have served to sustain the eclectic tradition in general, and actually increase its appeal in some important respects. The Asian problem of adjustment to modern Westernism is the largest and most complex problem of synthesis that has ever faced these societies. The difficulties of adopting Western patterns intact and the impossibility of duplicating earlier Western evolution have strengthened the conviction among many Asians that they cannot use the old roads to reach their objectives, but only the old implements used to build those many roads, now to be borrowed from the diverse Western sources and refashioned into a uniform set of equipment for future tasks. If there is a fundamental logic in this position, there is also the risk of very great confusion at both the academic and the operating political levels on such issues as basic values and the degree to which seeming incompatibles can be rendered compatible. To many of us, this type of confusion is an impressive aspect of the Asian scene, ranging in form from simple naïveté to the tormented ambivalence of some of the most powerful minds in the Far East. But perhaps the supreme irony lies in the fact that most Asians do not recognize the degree to which the West now shares in this problem. The reaction here against exclusivism has been compounded out of many forces, but essentially it comes from the pressing necessity of developing new approaches to current problems, approaches involving synthesis and running similar risks of confusion. Still, Asia sees us—and particularly America—largely in the old image, the image of a rigid, inflexible society governed by a set of exclusive principles, and basically intolerant whether of people or ideas. Communist interpretations of us have certainly contributed to this belief; their attempt to posit our rigidity as the only alternative to theirs often produces a firmer desire on the part of Asia to avoid both if possible. But our interpretations of ourselves are often a great disservice to truth and to our own interests; if we were to take our stand with the concept of selective synthesis more positively, there would still be differences, some of them basic, but the real issues could be more easily posed.

The preceding discussion is closely connected with the psychology of "neutralism." The tendency of the "neutralist" is to regard each contemporary Western ideology as in and of itself inapplicable, and to see all as having a common denominator in their absolutist base. The commitment, therefore, to any specific ideological position as reflected either through a single Western nation or through a group of allied countries, is limited. There is a natural urge to maintain independence toward political and ideological lines that are considered in some measure artificial, and certainly incomplete. But complementing this critical attitude is a kind of broad tolerance toward rival ideologies which many Western liberals feel is indiscriminate. In this connection, I would venture the somewhat heretical view that in an important sense the bent of contemporary Asia is more practical than ideological, to the extent that such a distinction has validity. The primary test of an idea is its success in the practical field of governing, not its inner consistency or its adherence to the body of thought from which it sprang. There is, to be sure, a strong element of conflict in some cases between the desire for ideological consistency and policy defenses couched in terms of "ideological purity" on the one hand, and the urgent necessity for pragmatic action at the policy level on the other. But it is the latter course which largely governs actual policy in Asia, including its Communist as well as its non-Communist spheres.

If eclecticism can be called in some respects the "tolerant component" of the modern Far East, then nationalism is the "intolerant component." This is not to deny the Asian nationalist movement its justification and its quota of laudable goals. Nor is it to ignore the fact that Asian nationalism in many of its forms is striving for some type of synthesis with internationalism. It is simply to make the point that Asian nationalism like nationalism everywhere rests centrally upon an emotional appeal with hate, prejudice, and general irrationality playing an important part. And in connection with Asian nationalism, two facts are significant in analyzing "neutralist" attitudes. First, it has been a movement directed quite naturally against the West. Secondly, in its "progressive" forms, it has had considerable stimulus from Marxism in general and communism in particular. To mention this latter fact is to introduce the third and final comprehensive factor relating to Asian "neutralism."

It is obvious to anyone that nationalism is the only political movement that has approached mass proportions throughout modern Asia. It is also a movement dominated by the concept of a counterattack against Western power and attitudes of superiority; in recent decades, this attack has been fierce, unrelenting, and operating at all levels of sophistication. It still contains some of the most appealing symbols for the Asian mind. This is partially because they are symbols with continuing validity. But in any case the recency and the intensity of the attack make difficult any re-evaluation of the current Western position which would give full credit to the West when credit is due, and would raise before the public the more recent evidences of Communist imperialism. Consequently, the Western threat in both its political and its economic forms still looms up before many Asians, including almost all "neutralists," as the most immediate threat to be faced; as compared with it, the dangers of communism, and particularly external Communist aggression, are frequently considered remote. The term "imperialism" is still reserved almost exclusively for the West; even when the native Communists show sufficient power to make themselves respected or feared, the movement is viewed largely as an internal problem and a part of the indigenous revolution.

Actually, it is possible to make two broad divisions in the Asian nationalist movement, with reference to groups stemming from it. The first group might be called the traditionalists. In seeking to defend their society against the onslaughts of Westernism, they have relied largely upon traditional values and presented a defense that is distinctly anti-modernist. Their attack has ranged broadly over the fields of urbanism, commercialism, liberalism, and secularism. Their portrait of the West has placed its emphasis upon the surfeit of materialism and the paucity of cultural or spiritual values, and it has achieved particular depth of feeling when dealing with American society. It must never be forgotten that "neutralism" has its "right-wing" as well as its "left-wing" derivations; in Asia, this can be found wherever "neutralism" exists as an important force.

The traditionalist approach has complemented in a sense the attack of the modernists upon the West. If the latter group have accepted as desirable many of the end-products of Western civilization, such as industrialization and centralized power, they have been equally vigorous in opposing what they consider to be the use of these by the West against their own societies. And in many respects they have been strongly influenced by Marxism. The concepts of economic exploitation and of the state as an instrument of oppression fitted well into the pattern of nationalist attack upon the Western powers. Capitalism has borne odious connotations in the Far East partly because it was under simultaneous attack by both the traditionalists and the modernists; in Asia, certain forces of the Western seventeenth and twentieth centuries seem almost to be joined together under anti-imperialist banners.

In a broader sense, however, the influence of Marxism in Asia, especially among the intelligentsia, must be ascribed to the fact that Marxism has had greater applicability to the Asian scene than any other Western philosophy. The refinements of modern Western economic and political thought have generally been tailored to the problems of societies reaching increasingly complex levels within the industrial process. Thus the issues have been more and more removed from those societies whose basic economic and political forms are still relatively simple as related to this particular stage. The West has had the greatest opportunity to reveal the inadequacies of Marxism, with regard both to its initial premises and to its subsequent evolution. But in Asia Marxism has not only achieved a measure of integration with the nationalist revolutionary movement; it has also benefitted from the degree to which some of its central theses fit this stage of Asian development. As a result, while only a small portion of the Asian intellectuals are Communists, a very substantial number are deeply influenced by Marxism. And the intellectuals are important in the Asian "neutralist" movement not only because they are well represented in its ranks, but also because they are the leading publicists in many Asian countries, interpreting to the people their own and foreign societies.

Thus far we have been considering the broad forces of eclecticism, nationalism, and Marxism, in an attempt to discern the various sources of "neutralist" thought. Though these are what might be called the massive factors in the picture, there are other elements of importance. Certainly one is the great weariness of conflict and the omnipresent fear of involvement in another war. This is a widespread sentiment in the Far East, and while it does not represent automatic support for "neutralism," there can be no doubt that many consider the risks increased under conditions of open dependence upon or alliance with the United States or any bloc of Western powers. Another aspect of "neutralist" thought is related to economics: there is an inevitable desire on the part of most Asian business groups, and particularly those in Japan and overseas Chinese communities, to have trade and financial relations with all possible sources. While this does not always lead to a "neutralist" attitude, it frequently contributes to a position of political aloofness on the major issue here posed. And it must not be forgotten that such a position has had a certain historic rationality for the Asian business class. A basically apolitical attitude or opportunism has often been the staff of life for the Far Eastern entrepreneur. Another factor lies in the political realm, and is perhaps connected more with policy than with attitude, though in reality it is an excellent representative of that element of fusion between the two. "Neutralism" in Japan, for instance, is promoted by some socialist groups because it appears to be a promising issue by which to attack those in power. This is not to belie the obvious sincerity of many Japanese "neutralists," but merely to underline the fact that policy-attitudes are affected by the degree of responsibility held and by the dictates of opposition strategy. And a final factor—to which various names might be applied—is, basically, indifference or ignorance. The greater number of "common men" in Asia are, for all real purposes, "neutralists" by default; their only deep commitments are to the immediate problems of livelihood and personal tension which contact with modernism has introduced. Mass indoctrination on an intensive scale has just begun in parts of the Far East, and in any case is likely to follow government policy in most areas.

Implicit in this analysis of "neutralism" both as a policy and as an attitude has been the fact that the causal factors presented have application in regions other than Asia. The emphasis, to be sure, would vary with different areas, and some points would have to be modified or omitted, but in spite of diversity and complexity "neutralism" in all parts of the world has its connecting links.

There remains the necessity of discussing briefly the implications of Asian "neutralism" to American foreign policy. First, it might be well to note the major points of opposition between the United States and most of the "neutralists" as they relate to current policy problems. Perhaps the most important cleavage over the past few years has involved our China policy. When Nehru said recently that the rise of China as a great power in Asia was the most significant fact of the postwar period, he was undoubtedly echoing the sentiment of a great number of Asians, including almost all of the "neutralists." Chiang Kai-shek and the Kuomintang have been written off by them as lost causes, and American policy is considered both unrealistic and an obstacle to reducing tension in the Far East. There is a strong feeling that realities demand the recognition of Communist China as the de facto government of the Chinese people, and there is an equally strong belief among the "neutralist" group that the nationalist element of the Chinese revolution will predominate, making China independent of Soviet power. This is an issue upon which both the stakes and the emotions run high, and the crucial facts are subject to widely varying interpretations. There is also opposition to American policy toward Japan. The common complaints are that we not only have failed to democratize Japan but now threaten to drive her down the path of renewed militarization. The Japanese "neutralists" have led this attack, supported of course by the Communists, and have given ammunition to "neutralists" in all parts of the Far East.

Finally, there is opposition to current trends of American policy in South and Southeast Asia; to the substitution of MSA with its military strings for the original Point Four Program; to the prospect of any military alliance in this area backed by American power; and to what is regarded as our support for French and British colonialism in this area.

Behind all of these objections there lie three focal points of difference between ourselves and the Asian "neutrals." They do not agree at present with our position that Russian-Communist aggression is a most serious and imminent threat to them. They believe that the danger of communism is primarily an internal threat based upon failures at home which might allow the Communists to move into a vacuum. And they believe that this threat, to the extent that it exists, can be best met by following a "neutralist" foreign policy. Secondly, the "neutrals" do not feel that our policy, on balance, will reduce world tensions; some would insist that it increases the risks of war, and this is their greatest fear. Finally, they are skeptical as to whether we understand or even approve of what they call the Asian revolution, and whether we are willing to modify our position in any significant respects to accommodate what they consider to be their interests.

All of these differences—both those on concrete policies and those on more fundamental points—indicate clearly that there is little likelihood of attaining complete harmony, and there is no point of talking in such terms. "Neutralism" is here to stay, not only as the official policy of certain countries, but also as an attitude in almost every country outside the Communist bloc (where there is probably more violent partisanship for as well as against us than anywhere else). Even among some of our allies, there are strong "neutralist" elements and, what is even more important, there is official agreement with certain of the specific positions which the "neutralists" take.

This suggests one of the objectives toward which we should strive: namely, to prevent difference from becoming antagonism, as regards either our allies or the so-called "neutrals." We cannot necessarily change their positions and we cannot always accommodate our position to theirs, but we can exercise more self-restraint with respect to the use of epithets which contain charges of stupidity, immorality, or cowardice. Admittedly this is difficult in a democratic society. It requires more leadership and courage on the part of our government than has yet been shown. If it can be achieved, however, it will pay dividends both to ourselves and to the world. We must discard the time-honored American thesis that all those who are not for us are "agin" us.

Moreover, we must interpret our society and its trends in line with the realities of the last three decades, not in conformity with the platitudes of the last century. We cannot hide our differences from the rest of the world, nor our major shortcomings. These have been thoroughly explored by our opponents, and usually exaggerated. The prevalence of fear in the United States, however, and various other signs of insecurity are very real, and until we conquer them we will be placed under severe handicaps in our relations with other people. There are some honest and intelligent "neutralists" in the Far East who sincerely believe that the United States has become a fascist society. It is easy to blame the Communists for this, but the fault also lies within ourselves. We have done a fairly effective job of hiding some of the encouraging and dynamic facts that might aid the "neutralists" in obtaining a more balanced picture of American society. The United States is too frequently presented in ultra-conservative terms, and through clichés that are considered politically safe here at home. This fits Communist tactics perfectly.

There remains, of course, the question of policy itself, for in the final analysis this is the crucial test. It is not the purpose of this essay to present a detailed discussion of our foreign policy, especially as it relates to specific areas and issues. The "neutralist" problem, however, points up clearly the major dilemma confronting the American people. It is simply the question of whether we will accept the premises of international organization. We cannot hope to control all of the decisions of the United Nations, even though we have at present great advantages over the Communist bloc. Some important votes will go against us, despite our most energetic efforts. In our desperation, we may threaten secession with temporary effect, but as a long-range tactic it cannot possibly work. It will not only have a devastating effect upon our allies, thereby increasing "neutralism" in its most hostile forms; it will also develop further among ourselves the unhealthy psychology of self-righteousness, omnipotence, and omniscience to which we have been prone for understandable reasons. This psychology may be compatible with totalitarian leadership, and even necessary, but it can only destroy leadership in an association of free nations. And if this tactic will not meet the test of success, it is also possible that it will not meet the test of justification in terms of the correctness of our stand on the particular issue involved. The mark of liberalism has always been the acceptance of the possibility of error; there is no reason why we should abandon this tradition when operating at the international level.

Nor can we build further upon a psychology of fear and defense with any great hope of success. There are real dangers from modern totalitarianism, and these should not be ignored. Moreover, it has probably been necessary to approach our own people as well as others in this vein, so as to call forth sacrifices immediately which might not otherwise have been forthcoming. But now we have reached the point of diminishing returns both at home and abroad. Many of the repercussions in this country are alarming. The effect overseas has been to give the Communists almost all the advantages of the initiative. It has left us open to Communist strategy in the form of a broad peace offensive for which we have been too often in the past both politically and psychologically unprepared. We are now making certain attempts to meet this problem, but whether they will be sufficient is still unclear. The future power and tendencies of "neutralism" in Asia and elsewhere will be strongly affected by our ability to add more dynamic and positive qualities to the old approach. "Neutralism" will also be affected, of course, by Communist moves and by internal developments in the various countries themselves. But if our role is not the sole determinant, it is an important one, and this should be considered carefully in choosing our course of action.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW IN 1952-1953

DAVID FELLMAN

University of Wisconsin

There was no change in the personnel of the Supreme Court during the 1952 Term. But following the close of the Term, on September 8, 1953, Chief Justice Fred M. Vinson, who had been appointed to the Court by President Truman in 1946, died unexpectedly at the age of 63. To replace him President Eisenhower gave a recess appointment to Governor Earl Warren of California on October 2. The new Chief Justice was sworn in on October 5.

Two important developments in the constitutional law field during the period under review occurred outside the Court. One was the publication by the Government Printing Office, in 1953, of a newly revised annotated Constitution of the United States,¹ prepared by the Legislative Reference Service under the editorship of Edward S. Corwin. The annotations come down to June 30, 1952. The last annotated Constitution was published in 1938 under the editorship of W. C. Gilbert. The new work, an ample book of about 1400 large pages, is indispensable for students of American government.

Noteworthy also was the appearance of the first two volumes of William Winslow Crosskey's monumental study of the American Constitution, under the title of Politics and the Constitution in the History of the United States.² Professor Crosskey, who is a member of the faculty of the University of Chicago Law School, undertakes to prove, through the marshalling of a prodigious amount of contemporaneous evidence, that the framers of the Constitution intended to create a unitary and not a federal system of government. He believes that the Founding Fathers thought they were giving Congress a general legislative power over all national subjects, and that in addition the Supreme Court was intended to have general and final jurisdiction over all common-law questions heard in the state courts. If Crosskey is right, then every extant text on American government will have to be rewritten. The book is being discussed in unusual detail in the law reviews, other learned journals, and popular publications.³ On the whole, historians and political scientists seem to be far less enthusiastic than legal scholars. The present writer is deeply impressed by the author's industry, but is not convinced of the soundness of his thesis or of his underlying constitutional theory.⁴ Nevertheless, no serious student of American constitutional law can possibly ignore this study, which is full of extraordinary historical insights.⁵

¹ Printed as Sen. Doc. 170, 82d Cong., 2d sess. The price is $6.25.

² University of Chicago Press, 1953, 1410 pp.

³ The Autumn, 1953 issue of the University of Chicago Law Review, Vol. 21, pp. 1-92, contains four full-length articles on the Crosskey opus, written by Abe Krash, Charles E. Clark, Charles Fairman, and Walton H. Hamilton. For other reviews and review articles see: Arthur L. Corbin and George D. Braden, Yale Law Journal, Vol. 62, pp. 1137-54 (June, 1953); James A. Durham, California Law Review, Vol. 41, pp. 209-29 (Summer, 1953); Roger Paul Peters, Notre Dame Lawyer, Vol. 28, pp. 307-32 (Spring, 1953); William B. Jeffrey, Jr., Louisiana Law Review, Vol. 13, pp. 638-41 (May, 1953); Allan Nevins, New York Times Book Review, May 31, 1953, p. 7; Carl B. Swisher, Saturday Review of Literature, Vol. 36, pp. 33-34 (April 4, 1953); Lucius Wilmerding, Jr., Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 68, pp. 467-70 (Sept., 1953); Charles E. Clark, The Nation, Vol. 176, pp. 505-8 (June 13, 1953); C. P. Nettels, Chicago Sunday Tribune April 19, 1953, p. 9; Daniel J. Boorstin, Commentary, Vol. 16, pp. 602-4 (Dec., 1953); and Robert G. McCloskey, this REVIEW, Vol. 47, pp. 1152-58 (Dec., 1953).

The Supreme Court disposed of 1278 cases during the 1952 Term. There were 104 signed and six per curiam opinions. During the previous Term there were only 83 signed opinions. Of the 110 dispositions with full opinion, only 24, or 22%, were unanimous. Of 61 dispositions by memorandum order, 41, or 67%, were unanimous. In all, 198 cases were decided on the merits. Of these, 49 came from the federal district courts, 86 from the courts of appeals, four from specialized federal courts, and 59 from state courts. Of these cases, 88 came up on appeal, including three on certificate from courts of appeals, and 110 came by way of certiorari. The record for certiorari followed the pattern of recent years.⁶ On the appellate docket the Court denied certiorari in 540 cases, and granted 104 petitions, or 16.1% of the total (15.2% in 1951). As for the miscellaneous docket, the Court refused petitions for certiorari in 429 cases, and granted only eleven, or 2.5% (4.7% a year ago). Furthermore, the Supreme Court dismissed appeals in 36 cases, 19 for lack of a substantial federal question. In the previous Term appeals were dismissed in 50 cases, 37 because a substantial federal question was wanting. Again the discretionary element inherent in the Court's so-called compulsory jurisdiction is to be noted.

Dissenting opinions during the 1952 Term numbered 89 (as compared with ⁴ See my review in The Progressive, Vol. 17, pp. 36-39 (Oct., 1953).

⁵ For other writings during the period under review dealing with various aspects of constitutional and Supreme Court history see: The Words of Justice Brandeis, ed. Solomon Goldman (N.Y., 1953); Ernest R. Bartley, The Tidelands Oil Controversy (Austin, Texas, 1953); Roscoe Pound, The Lawyer from Antiquity to Modern Times (St. Paul, 1953); Arthur T. Vanderbilt, The Doctrine of Separation of Powers and Its Present-Day Significance (Lincoln, Nebraska, 1953); Note, "Judge Spencer Roane of Virginia: Champion of State Rights," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 66, pp. 1242-59 (May, 1953); Edward F. Waite, "How 'Eccentric' was Mr. Justice Harlan?," Minnesota Law Review, Vol. 37, pp. 173-87 (Feb., 1953); Donald G. Morgan, "The Origin of Supreme Court Dissent," William and Mary Quarterly, Vol. 10, pp. 353-77 (July, 1953); Carl B. Swisher, "Needed: A Rededicated Supreme Court," The Johns Hopkins Magazine, April, 1953, pp. 3-14; Arthur E. Sutherland, "The Supreme Court and the General Will," Proceedings of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, Vol. 82, No. 4, pp. 169-97 (April, 1953); Eugene V. Rostow, "The Democratic Character of Judicial Review," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 66, pp. 193-224 (Dec., 1952); Eugene C. Gerhart, "A Decade of Mr. Justice Jackson," New York University Law Review, Vol. 28, pp. 927-74 (May, 1953); Alpheus T. Mason, "The Supreme Court: Instrument of Power or Revealed Truth, 1930-1937," Boston University Law Review, Vol. 33, pp. 279-336 (June, 1953); Merlo J. Pusey, "Chief Protector of the Constitution," N. Y. Times Magazine, September 20, 1953, pp. 13, 32-33. See also: Judicial Administration and the Common Man, Annals of the American Academy, Vol. 287 (May, 1953).

⁶ See Fowler V. Harper and George C. Pratt, "What the Supreme Court Did Not Do during the 1951 Term," University of Pennsylvania Law Review, Vol. 101, pp. 439-79 (Jan., 1953); Robert L. Stern, "Denial of Certiorari Despite a Conflict," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 66, pp. 465-72 (Jan., 1953).

73 a year ago); Justice Douglas led all the rest with 33; Justice Frankfurter wrote 15, and Justices Black and Jackson each filed 13; Justice Minton wrote six, Chief Justice Vinson three, and Justices Burton, Clark, and Reed each wrote two. Of the 32 concurring opinions, Justice Frankfurter contributed 14, three Justices wrote four each, two Justices two each, two Justices one each, and the Chief Justice none. In all cases decided on the merits, whether with full opinion or by memorandum order, Justice Douglas, with 62 dissenting votes, and Justice Black, with 49, were most frequently in disagreement with the Court's majority. Justice Frankfurter cast dissenting votes in 31 cases, Chief Justice Vinson in 21, and Justice Jackson in 20. At the other extreme, Justice Clark dissented only six times; Justice Reed dissented eleven times, Justice Burton 13 times, and Justice Minton 15 times. Six cases were disposed of by an equally-divided Court. In addition, in connection with memorandum orders denying petitions for certiorari or disposing of miscellaneous applications, Justice Black dissented 25 times, Justice Douglas 22, Justice Reed five, and Justice Jackson two. In keeping with his custom, Justice Frankfurter filed explanatory "memoranda" in three instances.⁷

Cases involving some of the nation's most notorious defendants, the Rosenbergs, Harry R. Bridges, and Alger Hiss, reached the Supreme Court during the 1952 Term, but none involved substantial constitutional questions. Hiss filed a motion for a new trial on January 24, 1952, on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, before Judge Henry W. Goddard, of the federal district court for the Southern District of New York. Judge Goddard wrote a lengthy opinion in July in which he held that the newly-discovered evidence was not such as would, if presented to a jury, probably result in an acquittal.⁸ The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit affirmed unanimously, without opinion, in January, 1953,⁹ and the Supreme Court denied certiorari in April.¹⁰

The Bridges case was one of an incredibly large number of legal maneuvers which began in 1936.¹¹ Harry Bridges, who immigrated from Australia in 1920, had been naturalized in 1945. In 1949, he and his two character witnesses were convicted of procuring a naturalization certificate through fraud, the fraud consisting in knowingly making false statements to the effect that Bridges was not a Communist. By a 4-3 vote, the Supreme Court held that the Wartime Suspension of Limitations Act did not suspend the running of the general three-year statute of limitations in Bridges' case.¹² The majority decided that the war-

⁷ See especially Rosenberg v. United States, 344 U.S. 889 (1952).

⁸ 107 F. Supp. 128.

⁹ 201 F. 2d 372.

¹⁰ 345 U.S. 942.

¹¹ A complete log of all the legal proceedings in the Bridges saga is given by Milton R. Konvitz, Civil Rights in Immigration (Ithaca, N.Y., 1953), pp. 114-20. See especially Bridges v. Wixon, 326 U.S. 135 (1945).

¹² Bridges v. United States, 346 U.S. 209 (1953). The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit had ruled on a variety of constitutional issues, including double jeopardy and due process questions, 199 F. 2d 811, but the Supreme Court's grant of certiorari limited drastically the scope of review, 345 U.S. 904.

time act applied only to frauds of a pecuniary nature or frauds concerning property, relying upon legislative history and the rule that a statute of limitations dealing with crimes ought to be construed liberally in favor of a "policy of repose." The Court also held that the wartime act was limited strictly to offenses in which defrauding the government was an essential ingredient, and that Bridges' offense was not of this character.¹³

The most widely-publicized litigation of the year involved the Rosenbergs, who were convicted in a federal district court, on August 17, 1950, of violating the Espionage Act of 1917 by communicating atomic secrets to Russia in time of war. They were executed on June 19, 1953. In the interim they had their day in court, indeed many days in many courts. It must suffice here to note that after full review by the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit,¹⁴ the Rosenberg case was considered by the Supreme Court seven times. On June 15, the last day of the Term, the Court denied an application for a stay of execution.¹⁵ On the same day, meeting in a Special Term, the Court denied a petition for an original writ of habeas corpus.¹⁶ Then, on June 17, Justice Douglas granted a stay of execution to counsel who had never before been employed by the Rosenbergs,¹⁷ on the ground that a new and "considerable" question was raised. That question was whether the case should not have been prosecuted under the Atomic Energy Act of 1946, which provides that the death penalty can be imposed only upon recommendation of the jury. Without ruling on the merits, Justice Douglas merely held that the issue was not frivolous, but "a substantial one which should be decided after full argument and deliberation."

The uproar touched off by Justice Douglas' stay subsided when the Court reconvened in Special Term on June 18, on the application of the Attorney General, and vacated the stay by a 6-3 vote.¹⁸ Chief Justice Vinson announced that the full Court had considered the new issue on its merits, and found it not to be a substantial question. He had no doubt that the Atomic Energy Act did not repeal or limit the Espionage Act. Justice Jackson pointed out that the ex post facto principle forbade application of a 1946 statute to acts which took place in 1944 and 1945. He also expressed disapproval of the irregular manner in ¹³ In United States v. Grainger, 346 U.S. 235 (1953), by a 5-3 vote, the Court held that an attempt to obtain payments from the Commodity Credit Corporation based upon knowingly false allegations of purchases not in fact made, and a false certification of a price actually paid, was a fraud covered by the Wartime Suspension of Limitations Act because the fraud was pecuniary in character, and because fraud was the essential element of the offense.

¹⁴ Circuit Judge Frank said: "Since two of the defendants must be put to death if the judgments stand, it goes without saying that we have scrutinized the record with extraordinary care to see whether it contains any of the errors asserted on this appeal." 195 F. 2d 583, 590. The Supreme Court denied certiorari, 344 U.S. 838 (1952) and a rehearing, 344 U.S. 889 (1952), with Justice Black dissenting on both occasions.

¹⁵ 345 U.S. 989 (1953). The Court also declined to hear oral argument. Four Justices thought oral argument should have been allowed.

¹⁶ 346 U. S. 271 (1953).

¹⁷ For Justice Douglas' opinion see 346 U.S. 313 (1953).

¹⁸ 346 U.S. 273 (1953).

which the new issue was originally presented by lawyers not authorized by the Rosenbergs. He thought the elbowing out of "able and zealous counsel" of the defendants' own choice presents "a threat to orderly and responsible representation of accused persons." Justice Clark discussed the more technical question of partially overlapping statutes, pointing out that repeal of statutes by implication is not favored, and that where two statutes deal with the same subject, the rule is to give effect to both if possible.

Justice Black protested against what he regarded as the unseemly haste of the Court, and even expressed doubt whether the Court has the power to set aside a stay granted in vacation. Justice Frankfurter dissented only on the ground that more time should have been allowed to consider adequately a novel and complicated legal issue. Justice Douglas declared not only that the issue was substantial, but also that on further study and reflection he knew he was right on the law, "deep in my heart." He insisted that since a large part of the crime took place after its effective date, the Atomic Energy Act was in the picture. It is elemental, he argued, as did Justice Black, that where two penal statutes may apply, the court has no choice but to impose the less harsh sentence.

I. QUESTIONS OF NATIONAL POWER

1. FEDERAL RIGHTS

Aliens: Deportation and Exclusion. In *Heikkila v. Barber*¹⁹ the Court held that the validity of a deportation order issued under the Immigration Act of 1917 may be challenged in court only by way of habeas corpus. Injunctive and declaratory relief under the Administrative Procedure Act and the Declaratory Judgments Act was therefore denied. Section 10 of the Administrative Procedure Act provides for court review of agency action in broad terms, "except so far as statutes preclude judicial review." Section 19(a) of the Immigration Act of 1917 declares that in every deportation case, "the decision of the Attorney General shall be final." While the Court agreed that the purpose of the Administrative Procedure Act was to expand greatly the availability of judicial review, it ruled that the concept of administrative finality in immigration legislation has a history, the teaching of which is that Congress intended to make deportation orders nonreviewable to the fullest extent possible under the Constitution. A quarter of a century of judicial interpretation has established that habeas corpus satisfies this minimum measure of review.

¹⁹ 345 U.S. 229 (1953). See generally: "Developments in the Law: Immigration and Nationality," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 66, pp. 643-745 (Feb., 1953); Stimson Bullitt, "Deportation as a Denial of Substantive Due Process," Washington Law Review, Vol. 28, pp. 205-22 (Aug., 1953); Jerome H. Heckman, "Our Immigration Laws, A Continuing Affront to the Administrative Procedure Act," Georgetown Law Journal, Vol. 41, pp. 364-93 (March, 1953); Note, "Constitutional Restraints on the Expulsion and Exclusion of Aliens," Minnesota Law Review, Vol. 37, pp. 440-58 (May, 1953); Jack Wasserman, "The Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952—Our New Alien and Sedition Act," Temple Law Quarterly, Vol. 27, pp. 62-89 (Summer, 1953); Comment, "The Alien and the Constitution," University of Chicago Law Review, Vol. 20, pp. 547-69 (Spring, 1953).

Speaking for the Court, Justice Clark said that there was quite a difference between judicial review in the sense of the Administrative Procedure Act and review by habeas corpus, since the former embraces the whole record to see whether there is substantial evidence, whereas the latter is limited to the enforcement of due process requirements. Justice Frankfurter took the position that this distinction was unsound, since a declaratory judgment action can be limited to the scope of review appropriate to habeas corpus. The real difference, he noted, lies in the fact that if the individual can resort only to habeas corpus, he must wait until he is in physical custody before he can go to court, a point which is "legally narrow but practically important." Furthermore, as Attorney General Brownell pointed out in his recent report to the Judicial Conference, since the substantial evidence rule is actually employed by the courts in deportation cases, it is doubtful whether the scope of review in habeas corpus is much different from what is possible under statutory review.²⁰

The same question has been raised in connection with the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952. On June 11, 1953, the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia held that under the new statute deportation orders may be reviewed in an action for declaratory and injunctive relief.²¹ On November 9, 1953, the Supreme Court granted the government's petition for certiorari.²² The Attorney General has made the sensible suggestion that Congress ought to settle the matter by enacting clarifying legislation.²³

A resident alien held for deportation has some due process rights; but an alien excluded at the gates of the country has none. It is important, therefore, whether the situation is one of deportation or exclusion. This was the issue in Kwong Hai Chew v. Colding.²⁴ Chew, a Chinese seaman, was a resident alien, married to a native American, and owner of a home in New York. He served creditably during World War II in the U.S. merchant marine, and had never had any difficulty with governmental authorities. A petition for citizenship filed in April, 1950, was still pending. After being screened and passed by the Coast Guard, in November, 1950, he went on a voyage as chief steward of an American ship. When the ship returned to New York, he was excluded as an alien whose entry was prejudicial to the public interest. The Attorney General denied Chew a hearing and refused to inform him of the accusations against him, on the ground that the information was confidential. The lower federal courts denied Chew's petition for habeas corpus on the authority of the recent Knauff case.²⁵

The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the Knauff case was not controlling since Ellen Knauff had been an alien entrant, whereas Chew was a resi-²⁰ Report of the Proceedings of the Regular Annual Meeting of the Judicial Conference of the United States, September 24-25, 1953, pp. 42-43.

²¹ Rubinstein v. Brownell, 206 F. 2d 449.

²² 74 S. Ct. 122.

²³ Report (cited in note 20), p. 43.

²⁴ 344 U.S. 590 (1953). Justice Minton dissented without opinion.

²⁵ U.S. ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537 (1950).

dent alien, so far as the constitutional right to due process is concerned. It is established that an alien who is a lawful permanent resident of the country may not be expelled or deported without notice of the charges and some sort of a hearing. The Court ruled that Chew's previous constitutional status was not terminated by the voyage. Justice Burton noted that this accords with our immigration and naturalization law, which, for example, counts service on American vessels, after lawful entry, as part of residence. Justice Burton did not believe that the preservation of Chew's right to due process left an unprotected spot in the nation's armor. Chew had to satisfy Congress and the Attorney General before he was admitted to permanent residence in the first place, he was cleared by the Coast Guard, and he will have to offer assurances that he is not a security risk when he comes up for naturalization.²⁶

But by a 5-4 vote the Court reached a different conclusion in Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei.²⁷ Of course the facts were different, but perhaps not too different. Mezei, an alien, lived in the United States from 1923 to 1948. In May, 1948, he went to Europe to visit his dying mother in Rumania. Denied entry there, he remained in Hungary for some 19 months, due to difficulty in getting an exit permit. He received a quota immigration visa from the American Consul in Budapest, and when he arrived at New York the Attorney General excluded him without a hearing on the "basis of information of a confidential nature, the disclosure of which would be prejudicial to the public interest" for security reasons. Mezei then applied for and was denied admission to some 15 countries. At long last this dangerous character gave up trying to depart. During all this time he remained in compulsory residence at Ellis Island. Finally, in November, 1951, the federal district court granted habeas corpus, holding that after 21 months further detention was excessive, and justifiable only by affirmative proof that he was in fact a danger to public safety. The government had declined to divulge its evidence, even in camera. The Court of Appeals affirmed on the theory that the power to hold an alien in confinement ends when deportation becomes impossible. The Supreme Court reversed.

Resting his opinion upon the proposition that what the political departments of the government do in regard to the expelling or excluding of aliens is largely immune from judicial control, Justice Clark pointed out that, unlike the situation concerning resident aliens, whatever procedure Congress authorizes for alien entrants is due process. In exclusion cases the Attorney General cannot be compelled to disclose the evidence underlying his determination, and the courts cannot retry it. The basic point, of course, was the holding that Mezei was an entering alien. Neither his prior residence in this country nor his "harborage" at Ellis Island transformed this proceeding into something other than an exclusion proceeding. Justice Clark also stressed the point that Mezei left this country without re-entry papers and, unlike Chew, stayed behind the Iron Curtain for 19 months. Under the applicable statutes, he thought Mezei's protracted absence constituted a clear break in the alien's continuous residence here. As for Mezei's continued confinement at Ellis Island, Justice Clark said that the government could keep an alien on a ship, and that Congress as a matter of grace chose the more generous course of temporary harborage, which bestows no additional rights. Since the statute provides that such shelter ashore shall not be regarded as a landing, the continued exclusion of Mezei does not deprive him of any statutory or constitutional right. The Court ruled, finally, that neither statute law nor reason requires temporary release on bond. Justice Clark took note of the hardship in this case, but, he said, "the times being what they are, Congress may well have felt that other countries ought not shift the onus to us; that an alien in respondent's position is no more ours than theirs." This argument is as broad as it is long: one might argue that precisely because the times are what they are, the Supreme Court should be especially alert to protect a simple right to fundamental justice.

²⁶ In Yanish v. Barber, 73 S. Ct. 1105 (1953), Justice Douglas, sitting alone, ruled that an alien held for deportation has a right to release on bail while appealing to a Court of Appeals a denial of habeas corpus by a district court where the appeal presented a substantial question. Bail is designed not only to provide security for the appearance of the prisoner, but also to protect his right to appeal. Justice Douglas also ruled that while the discretion of the Attorney General in regard to bail is very broad, its exercise is subject to judicial review, in accordance with the teaching of Carlson v. Landon, 342 U.S. 524 (1952). The habeas corpus action arose from a refusal of Yanish to execute a bond required by the Attorney General which attached a number of conditions he found objectionable, such as giving up familial associations.

²⁷ 345 U.S. 206 (1953).

So argued the four dissenters in this case. Justice Black castigated a procedure where "government makes one person's liberty depend upon the arbitrary will of another" as violative of due process and smacking of dictatorship. While Justice Jackson agreed that as a matter of law this was an exclusion case, he also noted that actually Mezei had been a law-abiding inhabitant of this country for a quarter of a century, and "seems to have led a life of unrelieved insignificance." He ventured the opinion that Mezei "must have been astonished to find himself suddenly putting the Government of the United States in such fear that it was afraid to tell him why it was afraid of him." It is not at all surprising that other countries will not take him. "Since we proclaimed him a Samson who might pull down the pillars of our temple, we should not be surprised if peoples less prosperous, less strongly established and less stable feared to take him off our timorous hands." Justice Jackson insisted that Mezei was deprived of his liberty at Ellis Island; to tell him he is free to leave in any direction but west "might mean freedom, if only he were an amphibian!"

While courts pay great deference to the judgment of the legislative and executive departments in matters of substantive due process, and particularly as regards policies affecting security and alien exclusion, Justice Jackson maintained that procedural due process is another matter. It is what due process requires "most uncompromisingly"; is it "more elemental and less flexible than substantive due process." Procedural due process "yields less to the times, varies less with conditions, and defers much less to legislative judgment." Furthermore, this is technical law, a specialized responsibility of the judiciary. Questions of due process matter a great deal. "Only the untaught layman or the charlatan lawyer," Justice Jackson declared, "can answer that procedures matter not. Procedural fairness and regularity are of the indispensable essence of liberty." This is especially important here, since aliens are more handicapped than citizens, and since the occasion of this detention was fear of future misconduct rather than crimes already committed. Justice Jackson thought that while Mezei had no right of entry, it did not follow that he had no rights at all, and that when indefinite confinement becomes the means of enforcing exclusion, due process requires that the alien be told of the charges and be given a chance to overcome them. And he observed: "I have not been one to discount the Communist evil. But my apprehensions about the security of our form of government are about equally aroused by those who refuse to recognize the dangers of Communism and those who will not see danger in anything else." Justice Jackson could not believe that giving Mezei fair notice of charges and a fair hearing would menace our security. "No one," he declared, "can make me believe that we are that far gone."

Expatriation. Mandoli was born in the United States of unnaturalized Italian parents, thus becoming an American citizen by virtue of our Constitution and a national of Italy by force of Italian law. While a "suckling" his parents returned to Italy. At the age of about 15, he tried to come to the United States, but the American Consul at Palermo refused permission on the ground that he was too young to make the journey unaccompanied. In 1931 he served briefly in the Italian army. After failing in efforts to come here in 1937 and 1944, he was finally admitted in 1948 for the purpose of bringing an action for a declaratory judgment to establish his citizenship. The district court held that Mandoli had expatriated himself, finding (1) that his service in the Italian army had been voluntary, and that he had taken an oath of allegiance to the King, and also (2) that his continuing to reside in Italy after attaining his majority constituted an election between his dual citizenships in favor of that of Italy. The government then abandoned the first ground because the Attorney General ruled that Mandoli's service in the Italian army and the attendant oath could only be regarded as having been taken under legal compulsion amounting to duress. But the Court of Appeals affirmed on the second ground. In the Supreme Court only five Justices voted to reverse, even though the government agreed that the Court of Appeals should be overruled.²⁸ Justice Jackson noted that the Act of 1907 limited the presumption of expatriation resulting from foreign residence to naturalized citizens only. The Nationality Act of 1940 had no purpose of subjecting a citizen by birth to the hazard and burden of election at majority. A proposal to this effect had been presented by the State Department, but refused by Congress. In short, then, a native-born citizen has a right to return to this country, but it is not mandatory that he do so at any particular time.²⁹ Speaking for the minority of four, Justice Douglas took the position that the controlling fact was that Congress made the taking of "an oath of allegiance to any foreign state" a ground for loss of citizenship.

²⁸ Mandoli v. Acheson, 344 U.S. 133 (1952). See Emanuel L. Gordon, "Loss of Citizenship by Continuous Residence Abroad," Columbia Law Review, Vol. 53, pp. 451-75 (April, 1953).

²⁹ Such was the teaching, Justice Jackson noted, of Perkins v. Elg, 307 U.S. 325 (1939).

Equal Rights in the District of Columbia. An 1871 act of Congress created a bicameral Legislative Assembly for the District of Columbia, with power over "all rightful subjects of legislation" within the District, consistent with the Constitution, and subject to repeal or modification at any time by Congress. This Assembly, which was abolished in 1874, enacted statutes in 1872 and 1873 forbidding discrimination by restaurants and other places of public accommodation solely on account of race or color. Overruling a 5-4 decision of the Court of Appeals of the District sitting en banc, the Supreme Court unanimously ruled that these statutes were still enforceable.³⁰ Justice Douglas observed that the characterization of this District government as a "territorial government" was an apt analogy, since the grant to the Legislative Assembly was substantially identical with the grant of legislative power to the territorial governments. Furthermore, he noted that the territorial and District clauses of the Constitution are phrased in very similar language. It follows that the power of Congress to grant self-government to the District is as great as its authority to do so in the case of territories. The Supreme Court rejected the distinction made below between the delegation of "municipal" and "general" powers, holding that the power of Congress over the District includes all powers of legislation which a state possesses. A state clearly may grant home-rule municipalities a police power as broad as that of the state, and legislation forbidding race discrimination in facilities serving a public function is within the police power of the states. Justice Douglas concluded "that on the analogy of the delegation of powers of self-government and home rule both to municipalities and to territories there is no constitutional barrier to the delegation by Congress to the District of Columbia of full legislative power, subject of course to constitutional limitations to which all lawmaking is subservient and subject also to the power of Congress at any time to revise, alter, or revoke the authority granted." Finally, the Court ruled that the acts of 1872 and 1873 survived all later changes and are still part of the governing body of laws applicable in the Dis-

³⁰ District of Columbia v. John R. Thompson Co., 346 U.S. 100 (1953). See Helen M. Rosenthal, "Delegable Powers and the District of Columbia," George Washington Law Review, Vol. 21, pp. 337-53 (Jan., 1953); Phineas Indritz, "Racial Ramparts in the Nation's Capital," Georgetown Law Journal, Vol. 41, pp. 297-329 (March, 1953).

In Western Pacific R. Corp. v. Western Pacific R. Co., 345 U.S. 247 (1953), the Court held that Section 46(c) of Title 28 of the U. S. Code does not require each circuit judge of a Court of Appeals to consider every petition for a hearing or rehearing en banc, but that each Court may, if it wishes, delegate this responsibility to a division. The statute, adopted in 1948, was a legislative ratification of Textile Mills Securities Corp. v. Commissioner, 314 U.S. 326 (1943), which merely held that the Court of Appeals has the power to order a hearing en banc. To hold that on request the court must sit en banc to entertain a motion for an en banc hearing would impose an unwarranted burden upon it. Litigants are always free to suggest that a particular case is appropriate for consideration en banc, and of course the court itself has the power to initiate en banc proceedings sua sponte.

trict, and that they were not abandoned or repealed as a result of non-use and administrative practice. Justice Douglas pointed out that "the failure of the executive branch to enforce a law does not result in its modification or repeal. . . . The repeal of laws is as much a legislative function as their enactment."

The Investigative Power of Congressional Committees and Freedom of Speech. At long last someone who challenged the scope of activity of a congressional investigatory committee won an appeal in the Supreme Court, and by a unanimous vote at that.³¹ Rumely, secretary of an organization called the Committee for Constitutional Government, sells books and pamphlets which reflect a political coloration commonly described as right wing. He refused to disclose to the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities (the Buchanan Committee), which was set up to study the operation of the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act of 1946, the names and addresses of those who made bulk purchases of these books for further distribution. Both Rumely and his organization were registered under the Lobbying Act. Its reports indicated that it spent about $2,000,000 between October, 1946 and August, 1950. Since the Lobbying Act requires the reporting of all contributions over $500, the Committee for Constitutional Government adopted the policy of accepting payments of over $490 only if the contributor specifies that the money is to be used for distributing books and pamphlets. It described such transactions as sales and hence did not report them.³² The resolution of Congress setting up the Buchanan Committee declared that "the Committee is authorized and directed to conduct a study and investigation of . . . all lobbying activities intended to influence, encourage, promote, or retard legislation."

Starting with the premise that the resolution determines the scope of the power of the Committee to exact testimony, Justice Frankfurter held that in construing the term "lobbying activities" the Court must, if it is possible, choose the construction which avoids serious constitutional issues, just as it does in the case of ordinary legislation.³³ He thought the government's position, that the Committee had the power to inquire into all efforts of private individuals to influence public opinion through books and periodicals, however remote from the legislative process, raised doubts of constitutionality under the First Amendment not of a "fanciful or factitious" nature. He also felt that the Court ought not to apply constitutional limitations to the investigative power of legislative committees unless Congress has authorized an inquiry of dubious limits in unequivocal language. He then proceeded to rule that "as a matter of English" the phrase "lobbying activities" means ordinarily representations made directly to Congress, its members or committees, and does not include attempts to influence the thinking of the community. He said that if Congress had wanted to cover all efforts to influence public opinion, it would have used more explicit language. He insisted that his interpretation was "not barred by intellectual honesty."³⁴ In a concurring opinion Justice Douglas, with whom Justice Black agreed, took the less strained position that the resolution in question did authorize the sort of investigation the Buchanan Committee attempted, and that, so construed, it violated the First Amendment.

³¹ United States v. Rumely, 345 U.S. 41 (1953). See Comment, "Limits on Congressional Inquiry," University of Chicago Law Review, Vol. 20, pp. 593-97 (Spring, 1953); Paul J. Liacos, "Rights of Witnesses before Congressional Committees," Boston University Law Review, Vol. 33, pp. 337-86 (June, 1953).

³² The books in question included: John T. Flynn, The Road Ahead; Thomas J. Norton, The Constitution of the United States; Melchior Palyi, Compulsory Medical Care; Irving B. McCann, Why the Taft-Hartley Law.

³³ See Note, "Supreme Court Interpretation of Statutes to Avoid Constitutional Decisions," Columbia Law Review, Vol. 53, pp. 633-51 (May, 1953).

Procedural Due Process. The proposition that a vague criminal statute violates due process because it does not give fair warning was applied in United States v. Cardiff.³⁵ Section 301(f) of the Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act prohibited "the refusal to permit entry or inspection as authorized by Section 704." Section 704 authorized federal officials "after first making request and obtaining permission of the owner, operator or custodian" of the plant, "to enter" and "to inspect" the establishment "at reasonable times." Cardiff refused inspectors permission to enter or inspect his plant. The Court of Appeals reversed a conviction on the ground that the statute prohibits a refusal to permit inspection only if such permission has previously been granted. The Department of Justice, on further appeal, argued that the statute ought to be read as prohibiting a refusal to permit inspection at any reasonable time. The Supreme Court agreed with the government's contention that only through inspection of factories can the benign purposes of the statute be achieved, but held, in affirming the Court of Appeals, that nowhere does the statute say that a factory manager must allow entry and inspection at a reasonable hour. The statute, on the contrary, seems to prohibit refusal to permit inspection only if permission has been granted previously. But this interpretation breeds problems. For example, if permission is once given may it be revoked? The alternative construction is equally treacherous, since it gives conflicting commands, making inspection depend upon consent and refusal to allow inspection a crime. The Court thus threw up its hands and said that this was a bad statute because it did not give fair and effective notice of what is forbidden. "Words which are vague and fluid . . . may be as much of a trap for the innocent as the ancient laws of Caligula. We cannot sanction taking a man by the heels for refusing to grant permission which this Act on its face apparently gave him the right to withhold."³⁶

³⁴ Justice Frankfurter also took comfort from the fact that in United States v. CIO, 335 U.S. 106 (1948), the Court, with a view to avoiding a serious constitutional doubt, strained words even harder.

³⁵ 344 U.S. 174 (1952). Justice Burton dissented without opinion. I believe this is the first case holding a federal statute unconstitutional since United States v. Lovett, 328 U.S. 303 (1946). The only other decision invalidating an act of Congress since the holocaust of 1935-1936 was Tot v. United States, 319 U.S. 463 (1943). For an up-to-date list of acts of Congress held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court see Constitution of the United States, Revised and Annotated (Washington, 1953), pp. 1241-54.

³⁶ Congress promptly rewrote Section 704 to authorize inspection in clear and unambiguous language, Public Law 217, Chapter 350, 83d Cong., 1st sess., approved August 7, 1953.

A very important issue relating to the meaning of a fair hearing was decided by a divided Court in United States v. Nugent.³⁷ Under the Selective Service Act, religious conscientious objectors are exempt from military service. If the local draft board denies a claim, the individual concerned may get review by an appeal board. All such appeals are referred to the Department of Justice for an "appropriate inquiry" and a "hearing." Then the Department makes its recommendation to the appeal board, which is free to accept or reject it. The Department of Justice uses the FBI to investigate the registrant's background and reputation for sincerity. At the departmental hearing the registrant may appear with an advisor and witnesses, and upon request he is entitled to be told "as to the general nature and character" of any unfavorable evidence developed by the FBI, but he is not permitted to see the FBI report, nor is he informed of the names of the persons interviewed. Five Justices held that this procedure satisfies the statute, which merely guarantees a "hearing" without more, and the Fifth Amendment. They ruled that the Department of Justice has fulfilled its duties under the statute if the registrant is given a fair opportunity to speak his piece and submit his evidence, and is given a fair résumé of adverse evidence in the investigator's report. They insisted that the statutory requirement of a "hearing" ruled out any "sham substitute," but that the word does not comprehend "the formal and litigious procedures." The final duty to classify rests with the local and appellate boards, and the Department of Justice merely renders an advisory or auxiliary service which Congress is not obliged to provide. As for the Fifth Amendment, the majority ruled that this procedure was a valid exercise of the war power, considering the perilousness of the times, difficulty of the issues, and the "imperative needs of mobilization and national vigilance."

Justices Frankfurter, Black, and Douglas dissented. Justice Frankfurter said that the whole point of the hearing, since the registrant has already had a chance to put all his evidence before the draft board, is to permit him to rebut the contents of the FBI report. He thought "the enemy is not yet so near the gate that we should allow respect for traditions of fairness, which has heretofore prevailed in this country, to be overborne by military exigencies." Indeed, he asserted that "in a country with our moral and material strength the maintenance of fair procedures cannot handicap our security." On the contrary, our strength and security are reinforced by adhering to our moral professions. In a brief opinion Justice Douglas observed that "the use of statements by informers who need not confront the person under investigation or accusation has such an infamous history that it should be rooted out from our procedure. A hearing at which these faceless people are allowed to present their whispered rumors and yet escape the test and torture of cross-examination is not a hearing in the Anglo-American sense."

After due notice and full hearings, including final oral argument on published proposed rules, the Interstate Commerce Commission promulgated important new rules drastically regulating trip leasing, that is, the use of equipment by authorized motor carriers when the equipment is not owned by the carrier but is leased from the owner or obtained by interchange with another authorized carrier. The Supreme Court held that it was not error for the district court to refuse to grant a de novo hearing, including the introduction of additional oral evidence.³⁸ Justice Reed said that the right to be heard in court "is not to be construed as an avenue toward delay. The claim of confiscation must be substantial, the import of the proffered evidence clear, and the inability to test the question before the Commission patent, in order to justify an oral hearing on the question in the courts." In this context, the right to a trial de novo was not automatically established merely because the Commission denied a petition for a rehearing which invoked constitutional principles. The Court noted that a great deal of evidence had been presented to the Commission dealing with the economic impact of the new rules, and that parties had every opportunity to introduce such evidence in the agency proceedings.³⁹

³⁷ 346 U.S. 1 (1953). See Mulford Q. Sibley and Philip E. Jacob, Conscription of Conscience (Ithaca, N.Y., 1952); Francis Heisler, "The Law versus the Conscientious Objector," University of Chicago Law Review, Vol. 20, pp. 441-60 (Spring, 1953).

Substantive Due Process. In *Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. v. United States*⁴⁰ the Court rejected a claim that rates prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission for carrying certain kinds of fresh vegetables were "confiscatory" in violation of due process, on the ground that the rates would produce less money than it would cost the railroads to carry them. There was no claim that the challenged rates would make any one of the complaining railroads operate its entire business at a loss, or even carry all fresh vegetables at a loss. The prescribed rates were merely minor alterations in a vast, complex network of rates.

The Court held that a great deal of flexibility in rate-making is absolutely necessary, and "so long as rates as a whole afford railroads just compensation for their over-all services to the public the Due Process Clause should not be construed as a bar to the fixing of noncompensatory rates for carrying some commodities when the public interest is thereby served." Justice Douglas and Chief Justice Vinson dissented on the ground that the record before the ICC, described as "largely a hodge-podge of statistics," did not show that the prescribed rates were reasonable.

Disbarment. Abraham J. Isserman, one of the attorneys for the Communist leaders who were convicted in the Dennis case,⁴¹ was given a jail sentence by Judge Medina for contempt, which was confirmed by the Supreme Court in the ³⁸ American Trucking Associations v. United States, 344 U.S. 298 (1953).

³⁹ Justices Black and Douglas dissented on the ground that the administrative rules were not within the terms of the statute.

⁴⁰ 345 U.S. 146 (1953). In King v. United States, 344 U.S. 254 (1952), the Court approved an ICC order requiring Florida railroads to charge intrastate freight rates which would reflect the same increases that had been authorized for comparable interstate traffic, although the interstate rates were increased partly to make up a deficit in passenger revenue.

⁴¹ Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951).

Sacher case.⁴² Following that he was suspended from practice by the federal district court for the Southern District of New York for two years. Then by unanimous vote the Supreme Court of New Jersey disbarred him, and the Supreme Court of the United States denied certiorari, over the objections of Justices Black and Douglas.⁴³ They thought that the New Jersey court had not given Isserman the kind of hearing required by due process, but merely acted on the basis of a summary conviction for contempt, without a hearing, by a federal district judge. Finally, after the issuance of a show cause order, the United States Supreme Court disbarred him.⁴⁴ The Chief Justice explained that under Rule 2(5) disbarment by a state does not automatically disbar members of the bar of the Supreme Court, but that in the absence of some "grave reason" to the contrary, it will follow the state court's finding. In reply to the argument that Isserman had already been punished sufficiently, the Chief Justice pointed out that this misconceives the purpose of disbarment, which is to protect the Court, and hence society, as an instrument of justice. But he said that the Court had considered Isserman's case on its merits, and is not laying down a rule that disbarment must necessarily result from contempt. The four dissenting Justices thought that Isserman had already been punished severely, remarking that "if the purpose of disciplinary proceedings be correction of the delinquent, the courts defeat the purpose by ruining him whom they would reform."

Fair Compensation. In *United States v. Caltex*⁴⁵ the Court held that the destruction by the army of privately-owned terminal facilities of oil companies in Manila to prevent their falling into the hands of the advancing enemy did not constitute a compensable taking.⁴⁶ It was noted that if the facilities had been destroyed after the retreat, there would certainly have been no right to compensation. The Court could see no legal significance in the fact that the property was destroyed before the withdrawal. The common law has long recognized that in times of imminent peril the sovereign may lawfully destroy the property of a few to save the property of many. In this case the property had been destroyed, not appropriated for subsequent use. Said the Chief Justice: "The terse language of the Fifth Amendment is no comprehensive promise that ⁴² Sacher v. United States, 343 U.S. 1 (1952).

⁴³ Isserman v. Ethics Committee of the Essex County Bar Association, 345 U.S. 927 (1953). See: David L. Weissman, "Sacher and Isserman in the Courts," Lawyers Guild Review, Vol. 12, pp. 39-47 (Winter, 1952); Note, "The Imposition of Disciplinary Measures for the Misconduct of Attorneys," Columbia Law Review, Vol. 52, pp. 1039-53 (Dec., 1952); Ralph S. Brown, Jr. and John D. Fassett, "Loyalty Tests for Admission to the Bar," University of Chicago Law Review, Vol. 20, pp. 480-508 (Spring, 1953).

⁴⁴ In re Isserman, 345 U.S. 286 (1953). The vote was 4-4, Justice Clark not participating. The explanation for the outcome, with this vote, would seem to be that under the applicable Rule of the Court a lawyer already disbarred by a state court has the "burden" of showing cause why he should not be disbarred in the Supreme Court. If the Justices are evenly divided as to whether he has shown good cause he loses, since the burden was upon him to demonstrate that he should not be disbarred.

⁴⁵ 344 U.S. 149 (1952).

⁴⁶ The controlling precedent was United States v. Pacific R. Co., 120 U.S. 227 (1887).

the United States will make whole all who suffer from every ravage and burden of war." Justices Douglas and Black, dissenting, argued that this property had been as clearly appropriated for the war effort as requisitioned food or supplies.

2. THE FEDERAL TAXING POWER

*United States v. Kahriger*⁴⁷ sustained the constitutionality of the Gamblers' Occupational Tax Act of 1951, which levies an occupational tax of $50 a year upon all persons "engaged in the business of accepting wagers," and also requires them to register with the Collector of Internal Revenue. The statute in addition levies a tax of 10% upon all wagers except parimutual wagering licensed by a state. The district court dismissed an information on the authority of the Constantine case,⁴⁸ holding that the act invaded the reserved police powers of the states. The Supreme Court pointed out that the Constantine case dealt with a federal tax of $1,000 levied upon all persons carrying on a liquor business in violation of state law, whereas here the wagering tax applied to all persons engaged in the business of receiving wagers, whether or not such activity violated state law. Many similar regulatory taxes have been upheld, such as those on lottery tickets, state bank notes, colored oleomargarine, narcotics, firearms, and marihuana. It is now established, said Justice Reed, that a federal excise tax is not invalid merely because it discourages the activities taxed, or because the revenue obtained is negligible. "It is axiomatic that the power of Congress to tax is extensive and sometimes falls with crushing effect on businesses deemed unessential or inimical to the public welfare, or where, as in dealings with narcotics, the collection of the tax also is difficult." The remedy for excessive taxation, he suggested, was in the hands of Congress, not the courts. He found it "hard to understand why the power to tax should raise more doubts because of indirect effects than other federal powers." Unless there are provisions extraneous to any tax need, he thought the Court cannot limit the exercise of the taxing power. Here he found that all the provisions of the statute were adapted to the collection of a valid tax. The registration requirement of name, residence, and place of business was, he believed, "quite general in tax returns," and facilitates the collection of the tax.

The court also held that the registration requirement did not violate the self-incrimination clause in this case because, since Kahriger had failed to register, he cannot claim the privilege, even assuming that the disclosure of violations of law is called for. The court relied upon a previous holding that one who is required to file an income tax return must file one, and if the form calls for answers that are privileged, he must raise that objection in the return.⁴⁹ But still one has to file a return. Furthermore, the Court ruled that assuming Kahriger can raise the self-incrimination issue, the privilege has relation only to past acts, and not to future acts that may or may not be committed. Under the wagering act he is not compelled to confess to acts already committed; he is merely informed by the statute that in order to engage in the business of wagering in the future, he must fulfil certain conditions.

⁴⁷ 345 U.S. 22 (1953). See R. L. Berry and J. M. Sullivan, "The Constitutionality of Federal Taxation as an Exercise of Federal Police Power," Notre Dame Lawyer, Vol. 28, pp. 127-36 (Fall, 1952).

⁴⁸ United States v. Constantine, 296 U.S. 287 (1935).

⁴⁹ United States v. Sullivan, 274 U.S. 259 (1927).

Justice Jackson concurred, "but with such doubt that if the minority agreed upon an opinion which did not impair legitimate use of the taxing power" he said he would probably join it. What disturbed him was that this tax falls only on specified gamblers whose calling in most states is illegal, and requires them to identify themselves, not because they have incomes like other people, but because of the source of their incomes. He found it difficult to regard this as "a rational or good-faith revenue measure," in spite of the deference judges pay to Congress. Furthermore, he pointed out that our system is one of taxation by confession, and depends upon the good will of the people, of which there is a great deal. He was afraid this good will might be frittered away by using the taxing power to achieve moral reforms which are outside the scope of direct legislation.

Three Justices dissented. Justice Frankfurter argued that of course Congress may make an oblique use of the taxing power in dealing with activities with which it may deal directly, under the commerce power, for example. But he said the Court cannot shut its eyes when Congress tries to control conduct which the Constitution left to the states, merely because Congress "wrapped the legislation in the verbal cellophane of a revenue measure." He thought that legislative and general history supported the conclusion that what is formally a taxing measure is essentially an effort to deal with professional gambling. He also thought that the statute was unconstitutional because the enforcing provision was designed for the systematic confession of crimes with a view to prosecution under state law. Justice Douglas agreed to the extent that this tax was an attempt by Congress to control conduct which the Constitution left to the responsibility of the states. Justice Black dissented on Fifth Amendment grounds, arguing that the statute requires a man to register and confess that he is engaged in gambling; thus, "it creates a squeezing device contrived to put a man in federal prison if he refuses to confess himself into a state prison as a violator of state gambling laws."

3. THE FEDERAL COMMERCE POWER

The Fair Labor Standards Act covers employees "engaged in commerce or in the production of goods for commerce." The Court held that the Act applies to all the employees of a Pennsylvania road contractor who manufactures a road surfacing mixture, made of local materials, 85½% of which is used on interstate roads or railroads by the contractor or his customers.⁵⁰ All of the product is produced in Pennsylvania, and none is manufactured for shipment across state lines. Justice Black held that the phrase "production of goods for commerce" does not necessarily mean "production of goods for transportation in commerce." The Court had previously ruled that interstate roads and railroads are indispensable instrumentalities in the carriage of goods and persons moving in interstate commerce, and that employees engaged in repairing them are in commerce. "Consequently he who serves interstate highways and railroads serves commerce. By the same token he who produces goods for these indispensable and inseparable parts of commerce produces goods for commerce." It is interesting to note that Justices Douglas and Frankfurter, who dissented, raised no constitutional objection, but merely argued that the Court's interpretation of the statute went beyond the intent of Congress.

⁵⁰ Alstate Construction Co. v. Durkin, 345 U.S. 13 (1953). A similar decision was reached in a companion case, Thomas v. Hempt Brothers, 345 U.S. 19 (1953). Here the Court ruled that the Act covers employees of the operator of a stone quarry whose customers included the Pennsylvania Turnpike, the Pennsylvania Railroad, and an airport, all of which

The scope of federal power over the interstate transmission of electricity was involved in United States v. Public Utilities Commission of California.⁵¹ The California Electric Power Company produces electricity in California and markets most of it in the state, subject to the authority of the state commission. But it sells some power, at wholesale rates, to the Navy and a Nevada county for consumption in Nevada. The power is transmitted to a substation in California near the state line, where it is taken over by the Navy and the county and delivered at the same high voltage to Nevada, where it is stepped down for local distribution and consumption. About a fourth of the Navy's power and all of the county's is resold to local consumers. The Supreme Court ruled that the Federal Power Commission, and not the state commission, has authority over these sales at wholesale. It is firmly established, Justice Reed pointed out, that the concept of commerce includes the transportation of public property.⁵² The fact that the electricity was transmitted across the state boundary over lines owned by the buyers was regarded as irrelevant. But the federal statute declared that the authority of the federal commission was "to extend only to those matters which are not subject to regulation by the States." Justice Reed ruled that the Atleboro case⁵³ had established the proposition that state authority did not extend to an interstate sale in wholesale quantities to distributing companies for resale to consumers.

Still another interpretation of the nature of interstate commerce was propounded in the case of a woman who had purchased a railway ticket for a trip from Meriden, Connecticut, to Fall River, Massachusetts, via New Haven.⁵⁴ The passenger had a stopover of about an hour in New Haven, where she had to change trains. She gave her suitcase to a redcap employee of the railroad, the handle interstate traffic. The employer manufactured cement mixtures and hauled them in trucks to his customers. In United States v. Universal C.I.T. Credit Corp., 344 U.S. 218 (1952), it was decided that the offense made punishable under the Fair Labor Standard Act is a course of conduct and not individual acts.

⁵¹ 345 U.S. 295 (1953).

⁵² Powell v. U.S. Cartridge Co., 339 U.S. 497 (1950).

⁵³ Public Utilities Commission v. Atleboro Steam & Electric Co., 273 U.S. 83 (1927).

⁵⁴ New York, New Haven & H. R. Co. v. Nothnagle, 346 U.S. 128 (1953).

suitcase vanished, and she sued the company. Disagreeing with the state court, which regarded the trip as having been suspended for a substantial period of time, thereby making state law applicable, the Supreme Court held that this was clearly a transaction incidental to an interstate journey within the scope of the Interstate Commerce Act. "Neither continuity of interstate movement nor isolated segments of the trip can be decisive." The determinative fact was the destination of the passenger when she began her journey. The stopover was described as temporary, for transfer purposes merely. Thus the redcap, a railroad employee, was performing services in connection with an interstate trip. Incidentally, this decision made no difference to the passenger, since both the federal and the state law were on her side.

While a state may not invade the interstate commerce coverage of the Federal Employers' Liability Act by arbitrarily presuming a renunciation of rights which it confers, or by compelling parties to elect between their federal remedies and an alternative state compensation plan, a state may, absent overreaching or fraud, give awards to employees engaged in interstate commerce if the parties voluntarily agree.⁵⁵ The difference between coercion and permission was regarded as decisive. On the other hand, since FELA permits an employee to bring his suit wherever the carrier "shall be doing business," a Georgia court may not enjoin a resident of the state whose injury took place in Georgia from suing in an Alabama court.⁵⁶ The deliberate policy of Congress displaces the traditional power of a state court to enjoin its citizens from suing in the courts of another state on the ground of oppressiveness. The federal forum non conveniens doctrine, formulated in Section 1404(a) of the Judicial Code of 1948, applies to FELA cases, but only to those in the federal courts. Justice Frankfurter thought that since judicial process is abused in state as well as federal courts, the federal forum non conveniens statute was being read with "blind literalness," "the cardinal sin in statutory construction."

There were two decisions in the field of foreign commerce during the 1952 Term which are worth noting here, though both turned on questions of statutory interpretation. In one case the Court held that a federal district court has jurisdiction, under the Lanham Trade-Mark Act of 1946, to award relief to an American corporation for acts of trade-mark infringement and unfair competition consummated in a foreign country by a United States citizen and resident.⁵⁷ So the Court read the statute, which declared that it reached "all commerce which may lawfully be regulated by Congress." Two dissenting Justices thought that this reading was inconsistent with the established canon of construction that an act of Congress is meant to apply only within the territorial jurisdiction of the country unless a contrary intent is spelled out. In the other case the Court remanded to the Federal Communications Commission an authorization of new radiotelegraph circuits between the United States and certain foreign countries, in competition with existing facilities of another carrier, where the decision was on the ground that our national policy favors competition rather than on the ground that it would result in lower rates or better service.⁵⁸ Justice Frankfurter declared that it was simply not true that there is a national policy favoring competition under all circumstances, even under the Sherman Act. The standard under the Communications Act is the "public interest," and while competition may be a relevant factor, he held that the FCC's finding was arrived at "in an abstract, sterile way." It was therefore directed to reconsider the problem by evaluating the needs of the industry.

⁵⁵ South Buffalo Railway Co. v. Ahern, 344 U. S. 367 (1953). For a complete analysis of FELA see: "The Federal Employers' Liability Act," Law and Contemporary Problems, Vol. 18, Part I, pp. 107-255 (Spring, 1953), and Part II, pp. 257-431 (Summer, 1953).

⁵⁶ Pope v. Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Co., 345 U.S. 379 (1953).

⁵⁷ Steele v. Bulova Watch Co., 344 U.S. 280 (1952).

There was one important anti-trust case during the Term, in which the Court held, in a 5-4 decision, that the owner of a morning newspaper and an evening paper in New Orleans who requires advertisers to buy space in both has not violated the Sherman Act.⁵⁹ There is no other morning paper in the city, but one other evening paper is published. Justice Clark declared that the teaching of the cases on tying arrangements is that the law has been violated when the seller enjoys a monopolistic position in the market for the "tying" product, or if a substantial volume of commerce in the "tied" product is restrained, because a reduction of competition is inferred from either factor. Declaring that the critical question is the dominance of this publisher in the New Orleans advertising market, the majority found that he did not have the requisite dominant position, as was indicated by the good health of the competing newspaper. In fact, the Court held that no one is forced to purchase a second distinct commodity; the two papers are under a single ownership and sell indistinguishable products in the same market. Thus, "no leverage in one market excludes sellers in the second, because for present purposes the products are identical and the market the same." Finally, the Court could find no showing of an intent to attempt to monopolize or to destroy competition or build monopoly. The publisher, it was concluded, was motivated by legitimate business aims. The four dissenting Justices thought it was clear that the publisher had a complete monopoly of the morning readers and used it to restrain unreasonably competition between its evening paper and the competing newspaper.⁶⁰

⁵⁸ Federal Communications Commission v. RCA Communications, 346 U.S. 86 (1953). The vote was 5-2. Justice Black dissented on the ground that the Commission's findings had substantial evidential support. Justice Douglas dissented on the ground that the record clearly supports the opposite conclusion, and that the Commission is so obviously wrong that a remand could serve no useful purpose.

⁵⁹ Times-Picayune Publishing Co. v. United States, 345 U.S. 594 (1953). See S. C. Oppenheim, "Federal Antitrust Legislation: Guideposts to a Revised National Antitrust Policy," Michigan Law Review, Vol. 50, pp. 1139-1244 (June, 1952).

⁶⁰ For a first interpretation of Section 2(f) of the Robinson-Patman Act, which prohibits buyers from knowingly inducing or receiving a discrimination in price, see Automatic Canteen Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 346 U.S. 61 (1953). The Court held, with an eye to encouraging price bargaining, that the burden of proof relating to the justification of the price differential does not shift to the buyer once the Commission has shown that the buyer knew about it, largely on the theory that the buyer doesn't have Finally, there were two decisions during this Term which held, in effect, that the anti-featherbedding section of the Taft-Hartley Act was not designed to outlaw all forms of featherbedding.⁶¹ The statute makes it an unfair labor practice for a union to compel payment "for services which are not performed or not to be performed." In each case the decision turned on the fact that some service was actually performed, whereas three Justices dissented on the ground that the service was neither wanted by the employer nor useful to him.

4. FEDERAL JUDICIAL POWER

Nature of Judicial Power. The Federal Power Commission granted a company a license to build and maintain a hydroelectric project on the condition that the United States be allowed to use its transmission lines. On review, the Court of Appeals held that the Commission had no authority to attach the condition, ordered that it be stricken, and affirmed the order so modified. The Supreme Court held that when the lower court decided that the license should be issued without the condition, it usurped an administrative function.⁶² The reviewing court's function ends when an error of law is identified; then the matter goes back to the agency for reconsideration. The statutory power of the court "to affirm, modify, or set aside" an order of the Commission, "in whole or in part," does not authorize it to decide whether the objectives of the federal statute may be achieved if the contested condition is stricken from the order.

The Court also had occasion to reaffirm the proposition that the normal requirements of a case or controversy must be met before a federal court can give relief under the Federal Declaratory Judgment Act of 1934.⁶³ A company had applied to a federal district court for a declaratory judgment to the effect that its carriage of motion pictures between points in Utah was interstate commerce, alleging that the state commission was threatening to regulate the traffic. Since the company was not requesting an adjudication that it has a right to do or have anything in particular, and was not asking the commission to make a specific order or take a concrete step, the Court held that it was in effect trying to win a case before it is commenced. Furthermore, the declaratory judgment procedure will not be used to prejudge issues committed for initial decision to an administrative body. The Court finally argued that "anticipatory judgment by a federal court to frustrate action by a state agency" was not com-information about the seller's costs. On the other hand, since the Commission is armed with investigatory and subpoena powers, it is in a better position to get the facts. Three dissenting Justices protested against what they regarded as an "enervating" reading of the statute.

⁶¹ American Newspaper Publishers Association v. NLRB, 345 U.S. 100 (1953) (reproduction by printers of "bogus sets" of advertising matter already supplied by the advertisers); NLRB v. Gamble Enterprises, Inc., 345 U.S. 117 (1953) (employment of a local orchestra by a theatre in connection with appearance of traveling bands). See Note, "Featherbedding and Taft-Hartley," Columbia Law Review, Vol. 52, pp. 1020-33 (Dec., 1952).

⁶² Federal Power Commission v. Idaho Power Company, 344 U.S. 17 (1952).

⁶³ Public Service Commission of Utah v. Wycoff Co., 344 U.S. 176 (1952).

patible with a proper federal-state relationship. Review procedures are normally ample to protect federal rights.

The Tompkins Rule. The Court held that since the Railway Labor Act does not prevent resort to a state-recognized cause of action for wrongful discharge, a plaintiff in a diversity action filed in a federal district court must show he has exhausted his administrative remedies under his employment contract if the state law so requires.⁶⁴ On the other hand, when a federal district court hears a suit in admiralty, its jurisdiction not deriving from diversity, the Tompkins rule is irrelevant.⁶⁵

Habeas Corpus and State Prisoners. In 1950, in Darr v. Burford,⁶⁶ it was decided that a state prisoner may not apply to a federal district court for habeas corpus without first exhausting his state remedies, and that this included a petition to the Supreme Court for certiorari from a denial of habeas corpus on the merits by the highest state court. Whether the federal district court should give any weight to the fact that the Supreme Court denied certiorari was left unanswered. In Brown v. Allen,⁶⁷ a joinder of four cases, it was finally ruled formally that it is error for the district court to do so. Speaking for a majority of five on this aspect of the litigation, Justice Frankfurter repeated his well-known position⁶⁸ that no significance attaches to a denial of certiorari.⁶⁹ All it means is that for reasons seldom disclosed four Justices do not think the case ought to be reviewed. Since the Justices give less attention to habeas corpus petitions than to other applications for certiorari, and since many such petitions are badly drawn by the prisoners themselves, a denial of certiorari is not and cannot be res judicata. It is equally impossible to leave the district judge free to decide whether in denying certiorari the Supreme Court passed on the merits, since he "ordinarily knows painfully little of the painfully little we knew." In most cases the district judge would merely be speculating without information. He cannot be permitted to "give meaning to something that almost always must to him be meaningless."

Speaking for the minority on this point, Justice Reed took the position that the district judge should be free to accord a previous denial of certiorari such weight as he feels the record justifies. While not asserting that a denial of certiorari is res judicata of the issues presented, the minority thought that at least where the records are adequate the district court should be able to consider the denial of certiorari as relevant. Justice Frankfurter's reply was that this would vest an undefined discretion in the district judges to exercise "judicial impressionism," whereas the discretion imposed by the Habeas Corpus Act of 1867 must be subject to rational criteria.

⁶⁴ TWA v. Koppal, 345 U.S. 653 (1953).

⁶⁵ Levinson v. Deupree, 345 U.S. 648 (1953).

⁶⁶ 339 U.S. 200.

⁶⁷ 344 U.S. 443 (1953).

⁶⁸ See memorandum in Maryland v. Baltimore Radio Show, 338 U.S. 912 (1950).

⁶⁹ The Frankfurter opinion on this issue is printed under the title Daniels v. Allen, 344 U.S. 443 (1953).

Nevertheless, Justice Frankfurter discussed at great length the bearing of state court proceedings on habeas corpus applications in the federal district courts. He recognized that in these attempts to get federal examination of state convictions most claims are without merit, and that an unrestricted opening of the doors of federal courts would burden them unduly and weaken state law enforcement. On the other hand, not all applications can be dismissed as frivolous, since this would in fact abolish this jurisdiction. At the same time the federal judge cannot ignore all that has gone before. While it is impossible to formulate fool-proof standards which can be applied automatically, Justice Frankfurter discussed certain standards for guidance of the district courts.

Justice Frankfurter thought that the concern about federal district courts discharging state prisoners was "a baseless fear, a bogey man." He pointed out that during the past four years only five state prisoners won ultimate release in this fashion, though many hundreds tried. He also denied that this is a case of a lower federal court sitting in judgment of a higher state court; it is merely an aspect of federal supremacy under which federal law is higher than state law. State judges think otherwise. The Committee on Habeas Corpus of the Conference of Chief Justices, reporting in June, 1953, suggested changing the federal statute to provide that federal district courts should have power to act only if the U. S. Supreme Court, in denying relief on review of the state court, expressly reserves the right of the prisoner to apply for habeas corpus in a federal district court. But the whole Conference went even further, on August 22, 1953, by reaffirming a 1952 resolution which favored review of the final judgments of the state's highest court only by the U. S. Supreme Court. At the same time both the Committee and the Conference agreed that the states should see to it that their post-conviction procedures are as broad in scope as federal process under habeas corpus, and that there should be a complete record in each case showing how the merits of claimed federal constitutional rights were considered and disposed of.⁷⁰

The views of the state judges were given support by Justice Jackson, who objected to the Supreme Court's use of the general language of the Fourteenth Amendment to subject state courts to increasing federal control, especially in the field of criminal law, and to ad hoc determinations of due process issues "by personal notions of justice instead of by known rules of law." He complained that "this Court has sanctioned progressive trivialization of the writ until floods of stale, frivolous and repetitious petitions inundate the docket of the lower courts and swell our own." The fact that only a tiny number of the hundreds of petitions filed are granted was proof to him that the procedure encourages frivolous cases. He insisted that a denial of certiorari must mean something, since "it is just one of the facts of life that today every lower court does attach importance to denials." While a denial of certiorari creates no precedent, and therefore has no significance as stare decisis, Justice Jackson thought it is res judicata for the case in which it was brought up. His conclusion was that whether or not certiorari has been denied, no lower federal court ought to entertain the habeas corpus petition of a state prisoner unless the petition raises a jurisdictional question involving federal law as to which there is no state remedy, or unless the prisoner was improperly prevented from making a record on a question which could be presented.⁷¹ The view that a denial of certiorari should be res judicata for most cases is open to the objection that it would require the Court to consider every petition on its merits. This would saddle the Court with a tremendous burden of work now better done through hearings in the district courts, and would tend to defeat the very purpose of the discretionary writ.

⁷⁰ State Government, Vol. 26, pp. 241-45 (Oct., 1953). See also the suggestions of the Attorney General of Indiana, James A. Emmert, "Use and Misuse of Habeas Corpus Writ by Prisoners," Proceedings of the Conference of the National Association of Attorneys General (1946), pp. 53-59. Consult: O. John Rogge and Murray A. Gordon, "Habeas Corpus, Civil Rights, and the Federal System," University of Chicago Law Review, Vol. 20, pp. 509-28 (Spring, 1953); Melvin E. Beverly, "Federal-State Conflicts in the Field of Habeas Corpus," California Law Review, Vol. 41, pp. 483-98 (Fall, 1953).

Another aspect of the exhaustion of state remedies doctrine in connection with federal habeas corpus was litigated in Sweeney v. Woodall.⁷² The issue was left over from Johnson v. Dye,⁷³ where a fugitive from a Georgia chain gang, after arrest in Pennsylvania, without going as far as he could in the state courts through habeas corpus, tried the federal courts. The Court of Appeals ruled in the Johnson case that the doctrine of exhaustion of state remedies in habeas corpus cases did not apply to extradition. The Supreme Court reversed in a one-sentence per curiam opinion which merely cited Ex parte Hawk.⁷⁴ While the Hawk rule was that a state convict must exhaust all of his state remedies before going to a federal court, the question still remained whether this referred to the remedies available in the demanding or in the asylum state. In the Sweeney case, the Court held that the fugitive must exhaust the remedies of the demanding state. Woodall was a fugitive from an Alabama prison who was arrested in Ohio. Alleging brutal mistreatment in Alabama, to which he would again be subject if returned, he litigated an application for habeas corpus all through the Ohio courts, including a petition for certiorari in the Supreme Court of the United States. Then he started over again in a federal district court. The Supreme Court ruled that Woodall made no showing that relief was unavailable to him in the courts of Alabama. By resorting to self-help, he had changed his status from a prisoner of Alabama to that of a fugitive from Alabama. "But this should not affect the authority of the Alabama courts to determine the validity of his imprisonment in Alabama." Both the rendition clause of the Con-

⁷¹ While a majority of the Court agreed that it was error for the lower federal courts in the Brown v. Allen litigation to give weight to the previous denial of certiorari, a majority of six also held that on the facts it was not reversible error. On this point see Justice Black's dissenting opinion at 344 U.S. 548-50, and Justice Frankfurter's at 344 U.S. 554-60.

⁷² 344 U.S. 86 (1952).

⁷³ 175 F. 2d 250 (3d Cir. 1949), reversed, 338 U.S. 864 (1949).

⁷⁴ 321 U.S. 114 (1944).

stitution and the federal extradition statute, the Court noted, contemplate the prompt return of a fugitive from justice as soon as the demanding state asks for him. "Considerations fundamental to our federal system," including considerations of convenience, require the prisoner to test the claim of unconstitutional treatment by Alabama. In a concurring opinion Justice Frankfurter argued that it ought to be assumed that Alabama's prison officials will not prevent Woodall from invoking the aid of the local courts. Justice Douglas, who dissented alone, said that if Woodall's allegations are true, he will suffer torture and even risk death if he tries to get relief in Alabama. He rebelled at the thought "that any human being, Negro or white, should be forced to run a gamut of blood and terror in order to get his constitutional rights."

Relations of Federal and State Courts. That ordinarily it is preferable for the state courts to construe new state statutes before federal courts undertake to do so was underscored in Albertson v. Millard.⁷⁵ Five days after the Governor of Michigan signed a Communist Control Act, the Communist party of Michigan asked for an injunction and declaratory judgment in the federal district court on due process grounds. Losing there, the party appealed to the Supreme Court, which vacated judgment and remanded the cause with directions to hold all proceedings in abeyance a reasonable time pending construction of the statute by the state courts. Justice Douglas thought that the issues would not be made any clearer by any decision of the state courts.

In another case, Edelman v. California,⁷⁶ the Court held it is without power to decide whether constitutional rights have been denied by a state when the federal questions are not seasonably raised in accordance with the requirements of state law. Edelman had been convicted of violating a vagrancy statute, and the appellate court affirmed by default. Since California permits affirmance in criminal cases where the defendant fails to appear, the noncompliance with local law was an adequate state ground for the decision below.⁷⁷

In deference to the dignity of the states, it has always been the policy of both Congress and the Supreme Court to review a judgment or decree of a state court only if the judgment or decree is final.⁷⁸ Accordingly, the Court refused to review, by certiorari, a temporary injunction issued by an Alabama court to enjoin peaceful picketing by a union.⁷⁹ The Court insisted that far from being a technicality, this policy is an important factor in the smooth working of our federal system. Justices Black and Douglas dissented on the theory that since the damage done by an interlocutory order is often irreparable, the assertion

⁷⁵ 345 U.S. 242 (1953). See Note, "Power to Decline the Exercise of Federal Jurisdiction," Minnesota Law Review, Vol. 37, pp. 46-64 (Dec., 1952).

⁷⁶ 344 U.S. 357 (1953). See Paul J. Mishkin, "The Federal 'Question' in the District Courts," Columbia Law Review, Vol. 53, pp. 157-96 (Feb., 1953).

⁷⁷ In Dixon v. Duffy, 344 U.S. 143 (1952), a state judgment was vacated and the case remanded in order to give the Supreme Court of California a chance to determine officially whether or not the judgment rested on an adequate state ground.

⁷⁸ U.S. Code, Title 18, Section 1257.

⁷⁹ Montgomery Building & Construction Trades Council v. Ledbetter Erection Co., 344 U.S. 178 (1952).

by the state court of the power to act in an interlocutory way is final unless the rule of finality is regarded as purely mechanical.

Judicial Review of the Military. There were two important cases during the Term testing the scope of judicial review of military decisions. *Burns v. Wilson*⁸⁰ dealt with two soldiers who had been tried by Army courts-martial on the Island of Guam for rape and murder and sentenced to death. The sentences were confirmed by the President, and the defendants exhausted all remedies available under the Articles of War for review by military tribunals. Then they applied for habeas corpus in the District Court of the District of Columbia, alleging denial of several due process rights, with some special emphasis upon the use of coerced confessions. The District Court dismissed without hearing evidence, holding merely that the court-martial had jurisdiction over the defendants, the crime, and the sentence. The Court of Appeals affirmed, but reviewed in detail the mass of evidence in the transcripts and other proceedings. By a 6-2 vote the Supreme Court affirmed. Because of the peculiar relationship between the civil and military law, the Chief Justice declared, the court's inquiry in military habeas corpus has always been narrower in scope than in civil cases. Like state law, military law is a separate jurisprudence, and the Supreme Court has no supervisory powers over the military courts. Congress, to whom the whole matter is entrusted by the Constitution, has provided a complete system of review within the military system. Only recently Congress revised completely the Articles of War and adopted a Uniform Code of Military Justice, thereby furnishing careful guarantees of a fair trial and review, including a post-conviction remedy for collateral attacks on judgments. Thus, like the state courts, the military courts have the same responsibilities that the regular federal courts have to protect constitutional rights.

Nevertheless, the Chief Justice declared, the civil courts do have jurisdiction over an application for habeas corpus from a military prisoner, but if the military decision has dealt fully and fairly with an allegation raised in the application, the civil court may not grant the writ merely to reevaluate the evidence. If the military courts had refused to consider the serious due process claims advanced by the petitioners, then the District Court would have had the power to review them de novo. The records show, however, that the military courts considered all allegations now made. The rule of the McNabb case⁸¹ against the use of coerced confessions, it was held, is a rule of evidence only in the federal civil courts, since the source of the rule is not due process, but rather this Court's power of supervision over the administration of justice in the federal courts. Petitioners have failed to show that military review was inadequate legally, and they have no right to make a new record and prove their case de novo in the District Court. In dissent, Justices Douglas and Black took the position that in reviewing military trials civil courts are not limited to the question of "jurisdiction" in the historic sense of the term. They believed that the undisputed facts made out a prima facie case that the rule on coerced confessions had been violated, since the defendants had been held incommunicado and questioned repetitiously without benefit of counsel for a period of five days.

⁸⁰ 346 U.S. 137 (1953). Cf. Hiatt v. Brown, 339 U.S. 105 (1950). See the symposium on military justice in Vanderbilt Law Review, Vol. 6, pp. 161-365 (Feb., 1953), and particularly James Snedeker's article, "Habeas Corpus and Court-Martial Prisoners"; James Snedeker, Military Justice and the Uniform Code (Boston, 1953); Mandeville Mullally, Jr., "Military Justice: The Uniform Code in Action," Columbia Law Review, Vol. 53, pp. 1-27 (Jan., 1953); Henry M. Hart, Jr., "The Power of Congress to Limit the Jurisdiction of Federal Courts," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 66, pp. 1362-1402 (June, 1953).

⁸¹ McNabb v. United States, 318 U.S. 332 (1943).

In Orloff v. Willoughby,⁸² by a 6-3 vote, the Court declined to interfere with the Army's classification of a physician inducted under the Doctor's Draft Act. Because of age, Orloff was not liable to induction except under the special act. Although doctors have always been given commissions in the Army, Orloff was refused because he declined on grounds of conscience and constitutional privilege to execute a loyalty certificate requiring disclosure of membership in organizations on the Attorney General's list. While the Army finally agreed that he was entitled to serve as a doctor, Orloff claimed that he was either entitled to a commission or to a discharge, and petitioned for habeas corpus. The Supreme Court ruled that the statutes do not require all personnel inducted under the Doctor's Draft Act to be either commissioned or discharged. Justice Jackson said that the commissioning of Army officers is a matter of discretion within the province of the President as Commander-in-Chief, not subject to control by the courts. Orloff was subject to conscription under the special act. "But, if he is the first to be denied a commission," said Justice Jackson, "it may also be that he is the first doctor to haggle about questions concerning his loyalty. It does not appear to us that it is the President who breaks faith with Congress and the doctors of America. We are not easily convinced that the whole military establishment is out of step except Orloff." There is no doubt of the fact that Orloff may refuse on the basis of constitutional privilege to withhold facts about membership in the Communist party, but it does not follow that even so he is entitled to an appointment to a position of honor and trust. Finally, the Court ruled that one who has been lawfully inducted may not by habeas corpus obtain judicial review of his assignments to duty. Commanding officers must have large areas of discretion in such matters, and "judges are not given the task of running the Army."

In his dissenting opinion Justice Black pointed out that since 1847 Army doctors have served only when commissioned as officers, and that in Orloff's case the Army was breaking faith with Congress and the country's doctors. Although the government conceded that Orloff was entitled to be assigned medical duties, Justice Black thought that this point was still in controversy and ought to be resolved by the District Court through a remand. In a separate dissenting opinion, Justice Frankfurter took the position that a doctor-draftee who is found unfit for a commission is entitled, under the special act, to a discharge. In this fashion the courts will not be required to meddle with the management of the Army by issuing direct orders, since the draftee is simply released from duty.

⁸² 345 U.S. 83 (1953). See Note, "Habeas Corpus and Judicial Review of Draft Classifications," Indiana Law Journal, Vol. 28, pp. 244-56 (Winter, 1953); Jacobus tenBroek, "Wartime Power of the Military over Citizen Civilians within the Country," California Law Review, Vol. 41, pp. 167-208 (Summer, 1953).

Eleventh Amendment. In an original suit by New Jersey against New York and New York City for injunctive relief against water diversion, Pennsylvania was permitted to intervene. The Court denied Philadelphia's motion to intervene, but held that this ruling involved no interpretation of the Eleventh Amendment.⁸³ The parens patriae doctrine, it was noted, means that when a state is a party to a suit "involving a matter of sovereign interest" it must be assumed that it represents all of its citizens. Since Philadelphia represented only a part of the citizens of the state residing in the watershed, the Court was apprehensive of being drawn into an "intramural dispute." There are also New Jersey cities and even large industrial plants which might insist upon the right to intervene. The Court's original jurisdiction, it was stated, "should not be thus expanded to the dimensions of ordinary class actions."

International Law. Larsen, a Danish seaman, while temporarily in New York, joined the crew of a ship of the Danish flag, owned by a Danish citizen. He signed the ship's articles, which were written in Danish, and which provided that the rights of the crew members would be governed by Danish law and by the owner's contract with a Danish union, of which Larsen was a member. Larsen was injured in the course of employment, while aboard the ship in Havana harbor. He brought suit in the federal district court for the Southern District of New York, under the Jones Act of 1920, which permits "any seaman" to sue under it. The Supreme Court ruled that Congress did not intend to give all alien seamen anywhere in the world access to our courts, and thus reversed a verdict in favor of Larsen.⁸⁴ The Jones Act, said Justice Jackson, was enacted "with regard to a seasoned body of maritime law." The Court is committed to the proposition that an act of Congress ought never to be construed to violate the law of nations if any other interpretation is possible. It is also established that if possible a statute will not be construed as applying to foreigners in connection with acts done by them outside this country.

The Court held that it was not conclusive that the owner had many commercial contacts with United States ports; this is the virtue of sea-borne commerce. If every contact is exploited to the full, there is the danger that a "multiplicity of conflicting and overlapping burdens would blight international carriage by sea." That is why the courts of commercial nations prefer to defer to "international maritime law of impressive maturity and universality," which has the force of law through general acceptance. In this case, Justice Jackson ruled, most of the "connecting factors" favored application of Danish law. For example, both the sailor and the shipowner were nonresident aliens, the wrongful act took place outside the United States, the flag was foreign, the parties to the contract intended to apply Danish law, and a ready remedy was available under Danish law.

⁸³ New Jersey v. New York, 345 U.S. 369 (1953). Two Justices dissented on the ground that the claim of Philadelphia to becoming a party was as good as that of New York City, which was already a party.

⁸⁴ Lauritzen v. Larsen, 345 U.S. 571 (1953).

Federal Trial Examiners. By a 6-3 decision, the Court made it clear that while trial examiners appointed under Section 11 of the Administrative Procedure Act were intended by Congress to be a special class subject to special control by the Civil Service Commission, their position is not a constitutionally protected one, but one which depends entirely upon the will of Congress.⁸⁵ Accordingly the Court approved a number of rules worked out by the Commission. For example, the Court rejected the claim that all hearing examiners in any one agency must be classified in the same grade, and approved a Commission classification according to skill, experience, and ability. The Court also regarded as permissible a rule which permits the agency to decide whether or not a vacancy should be filled by promotion from among present examiners, and decided that cases do not have to be rotated among the examiners in a mechanical fashion. The three dissenters thought that these regulations frustrated the intent of Congress to give trial examiners "a new status of freedom from agency control" by permitting agency heads to influence cases through the power of classification and assignment.⁸⁶

II. QUESTIONS OF STATE POWER

1. DUE PROCESS OF LAW

Loyalty Oaths. The 1952 Term again illustrated the importance in our day of litigation posing civil liberties issues.⁸⁷ This was especially true of cases coming up from the state courts involving due process questions. Among them, the loyalty oath case of Wieman v. Updegraff,⁸⁸ where all the Justices were, mirabile dictu, in agreement, is of outstanding significance. As part of the effort of the states to combat subversive activities, Oklahoma adopted a statute in 1951 which required all state officers and employees to take an oath. Among other things, they were required to swear that they had not been members of subversive organizations within the last five years. Organizations were described as subversive if they advocate, teach, or justify the overthrow of government by any unlawful means, including the Communist party, any organization affiliated with it directly or indirectly, the Third International, and any association on the list of the Attorney General or of any other authorized agency of the United States.

⁸⁵ Ramspeck v. Federal Trial Examiners Conference, 345 U.S. 128 (1953). See Note, "The Status of the Trial Examiner in Administrative Agencies," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 66, pp. 1065-81 (April, 1953); Simon Tucker, "The Administrative Law of Federal Hearing Examiner Personnel," George Washington Law Review, Vol. 21, pp. 38-60, 198-240 (Oct., Dec., 1952); Lloyd D. Musolf, Federal Examiners and the Conflict of Law and Administration (Baltimore, 1953).

⁸⁶ In United States v. L. A. Tucker Truck Lines, Inc., 344 U.S. 33 (1952), the Court held that an objection to an ICC hearing on the ground that the examiner had not been appointed pursuant to Section 11 of the Administrative Procedure Act must first be made before the agency itself, and that it is too late to make it for the first time in a reviewing court.

⁸⁷ See Zechariah Chafee, Jr., How Human Rights Got into the Constitution (Boston, 1952); American Jewish Congress and National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Civil Rights in the United States: 1952 (New York, 1953); American Civil Liberties Union, Freedom, Justice, Equality: Report on Civil Liberties, January 1951-June 1953 (New York, 1953); John Lord O'Brian, "New Eneroachments on Individual Freedom," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 66, pp. 1-27 (Nov., 1953); Charles R. Nixon, "Freedom vs. Unity: A Problem in the Theory of Civil Liberty," Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 68, pp. 70-88 (March, 1953); Howard Jay Graham, "Procedure to Substance—Extra-Judicial Rise of Due Process, 1830-1860," California Law Review, Vol. 40, pp. 483-500 (Winter, 1952-3); Kenneth A. Poole, "Statutory Remedies for the Protection of Civil Rights," Oregon Law Review, Vol. 32, pp. 210-53 (April 1953); Marion S. Riggs, "The

A citizen-taxpayer brought an action to enjoin the payment of salaries to certain members of the staff of Oklahoma A. & M. College who failed to take the oath within the allotted thirty days. Limiting the list of proscribed organizations to those on the Attorney General's list at the time of its passage, the Oklahoma Supreme Court held the act valid. The Supreme Court of the United States reversed. Justice Clark pointed out that in all previous cases involving loyalty oaths, such as the Garner, Adler and Gerende cases,⁸⁹ the Court was assured that knowing membership in a proscribed organization, or scienter, was a requirement of the statute. Since the Oklahoma Supreme Court refused to give these non-jurors a chance to take the oath as interpreted, and on petition for rehearing rejected the argument that failure to permit them to take the oath as interpreted in the federal precedents violated due process, it was concluded that the state holding was that knowledge is not a factor under the Oklahoma statute.

Since membership alone is set up as a conclusive presumption of disloyalty, the statute is unconstitutional, because "membership may be innocent. A state servant may have joined a proscribed organization unaware of its activities and purposes. In recent years, many completely loyal persons have severed organizational ties after learning for the first time of the character of groups to which they had belonged." On this point Justice Clark quoted the weighty testimony of Mr. J. Edgar Hoover. Furthermore, "at the time of affiliation, a group itself may be innocent, only later coming under the influence of those who would turn it toward illegitimate ends." The opposite may also occur. It follows that since under the Oklahoma statute association alone determines disloyalty, whether or not it existed innocently or knowingly, individual freedom of movement is inhibited and "the flow of democratic expression and controversy" is stifled at one of its chief sources. Therefore, "indiscriminate classification of innocent with knowing activity must fall as an assertion of arbitrary power. The oath offends due process."

Existence of Civil Rights at Common Law," South Carolina Law Quarterly, Vol. 5, pp. 449-57 (March, 1953); Note, "The Proper Scope of the Civil Rights Acts," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 66, pp. 1285-1300 (May, 1953).

⁸⁸ 344 U.S. 183 (1952). See The States and Subversion, ed. Walter Gellhorn (Ithaca, 1952); Note, "Effectiveness of State Anti-Subversive Legislation," Indiana Law Journal, Vol. 28, pp. 492-520 (Summer, 1953); Note, "State Control of Subversion: A Problem in Federalism," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 66, pp. 327-34 (Dec., 1952); Clark Byse, "A Report on the Pennsylvania Loyalty Act," University of Pennsylvania Law Review, Vol. 101, pp. 1-29 (Jan., 1953); Eleanor Bontecou, The Federal Loyalty-Security Program (Ithaca, 1953); George K. Gardner, "Bailey v. Richardson and the Constitution of the United States," Boston University Law Review, Vol. 33, pp. 177-203 (April, 1953); Ralph S. Brown, Jr. and John D. Fassett, "Security Tests for Maritime Workers: Due Process under the Port Security Program," Yale Law Journal, Vol. 62, pp. 1163-1208 (July, 1953); Comment, "Loyalty and Private Employment," Yale Law Journal, Vol. 62, pp. 954-84 (May, 1953); National Industrial Conference Board, Industrial Security: Combating Subversion and Sabotage (1952).

⁸⁹ Garner v. Board of Public Works, 341 U.S. 716 (1951); Adler v. Board of Education, 342 U.S. 485 (1952); Gerende v. Board of Supervisors, 341 U.S. 56 (1951).

Finally, said Justice Clark, it is not necessary to consider whether an abstract right to public employment exists. "It is sufficient to say that constitutional protection does extend to the public servant whose exclusion pursuant to a statute is patently arbitrary or discriminatory." In a separate opinion Justice Black deplored the "suppressive laws and practices" which are now the fashion, denounced test oaths as "notorious tools of tyranny," and as "unspeakably odious to a free people," and advanced a strong argument for complete free speech for all. He also asserted, as before, that the statute was a bill of attainder. Justice Frankfurter emphasized, in a noble statement, that exercising the right of association was peculiarly characteristic of our people, that joining is an exercise of free speech and free inquiry, and that freedom of speech and thought are especially important for teachers, particularly in a system which rests upon public opinion.

Freedom of Speech. An interesting free speech issue was decided in Poulos v. New Hampshire.⁹⁰ The City Council of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, refused a Jehovah's Witness a license to conduct a religious service in a public park, although Poulos offered to pay all proper fees and complied with all procedural requirements of the applicable city ordinance. Poulos went ahead and held his service anyhow, until arrested. On appeal from a motion to dismiss the complaint, the state Supreme Court ruled that the city may require licenses, that the ordinance is valid on its face, but that it must be administered fairly and without discrimination. A trial followed, and the trial court held that the refusal of the license by the city was arbitrary and unreasonable, but that Poulos should have raised this question by proper civil proceedings instead of deliberately violating the ordinance. The New Hampshire Supreme Court agreed, ruling that the ordinance was valid on its face, on the authority of Cox v. New Hampshire,⁹¹ and that Poulos' proper remedy was to seek a review by certiorari of the unlawful refusal of the Council to grant the license, not to hold public religious services in the park without a license, and then defend because the refusal of the license was arbitrary. In the United State Supreme Court Poulos argued that no license for conducting religious services in a public park may be required, and that the delay which would follow from seeking judicial review of an arbitrary denial of a license results in an unconstitutional abridgment of freedom of speech and religion.

⁹⁰ 345 U.S. 395 (1953). On free speech issues see: Harold L. Cross, The People's Right to Know (New York, 1953); Alexander Meiklejohn, "What Does the First Amendment Mean?," University of Chicago Law Review, Vol. 20, pp. 461-79 (Spring, 1953); Morris L. Ernst and Arthur J. Katz, "Speech: Public and Private," Columbia Law Review, Vol. 53, pp. 620-31 (May, 1953); Henry M. Kittleson and J. Allen Smith, "Free Speech (1949-1952): Slogans v. States' Rights," University of Florida Law Review, Vol. 5, pp. 227-60 (Fall, 1952); Glenn Abernathy, "Assemblies in the Public Streets," South Carolina Law Quarterly, Vol. 5, pp. 384-416 (March, 1953); Note, "Obscenity—Construction and Constitutionality of Statutes Regulating Obscene Literature," New York University Law Review, Vol. 28, pp. 877-90 (April, 1953).

The state court was affirmed. Since the ordinance had to be administered fairly, Justice Reed declared for the majority, it was a routine police measure, not a previous restraint on liberty, under which the licensing officials had no discretionary power, no authority to discriminate, no control over speech. He admitted that "judicial correction of arbitrary refusal by administrators to perform official duties under valid laws is exulcerating and costly." Nevertheless, he said that to allow people to proceed to hold public meetings without prior arrangement is apt to cause breaches of the peace or create public dangers. "Delay is unfortunate," he stated, "but the expense and annoyance of litigation is a price citizens must pay for life in an orderly society." It was held that due process does not prevent a state from requiring that in the public interest the reasonable method of correcting the error be by certiorari.

Justice Black described this as one of a series of recent decisions "which fail to protect the right of Americans to speak freely." The Cox case, he argued, dealt only with street parades and had nothing to do with a free speech question. He thought the procedure would be appropriate for business matters, but inappropriate here because the First Amendment gives free speech a special protection. So also Justice Douglas maintained that when a legislature proscribes free speech it acts unlawfully and the citizen can take matters in his own hands. The reason is the preferred position of the freedoms of the First Amendment, which says that there shall be no law which abridges them. He argued that the licensing of speech is a prior restraint, that "there is no free speech in the sense of the Constitution when permission must be obtained from an official before a speech can be made."

Reaffirming a long list of recent decisions on the subject, the Court ruled that Virginia may enjoin peaceful picketing carried on for purposes in conflict with the state Right to Work Act, which outlaws both the closed shop and the yellow-dog contract.⁹² Justice Douglas protested that when peaceful picketing is used as an instrument of publicity, it is a form of speech protected by the Constitution, but this is a lost cause. Only Justice Black joined him in dissent.

*Freedom of Religion. Fowler v. Rhode Island*⁹³ posed a variation of the issue at stake in the Poulos case. Pawtucket, Rhode Island, has an ordinance which prohibits the making of political or religious speeches in any public park, though it permits religious or political gatherings if public addresses are not made. In what the state conceded to be a religious meeting, a Jehovah Witness minister delivered a sermon to an orderly meeting in a park. The state admitted in oral argument that the ordinance did not prohibit church services in the park. The Court held unanimously that it was plain that a religious service of Jehovah's Witnesses was treated differently than religious services of other sects. This, said Justice Douglas, "amounts to the state preferring some religious groups over this one." He noted that the religious service of this sect is different, less ritualistic and formal than some, but "it is no business of courts to say that what is a religious practice or activity for one group is not religion under the protection of the First Amendment. Nor is it in the competence of courts under our constitutional scheme to approve, disapprove, classify, regulate, or in any manner control sermons delivered at religious meetings. Sermons are as much a part of a religious service as prayers. . . . To call the words which one minister speaks to his congregation a sermon, immune from regulation, and the words of another minister an address, subject to regulation, is merely an indirect way of preferring one religion over another."⁹⁴

⁹¹ 312 U.S. 569 (1941).

⁹² Local Union No. 10, A. F. of L. v. Graham, 345 U.S. 192 (1953).

⁹³ 345 U.S. 67 (1953). See Leo Pfeffer, Church, State and Freedom (Boston, 1953); Wilber G. Katz, "Freedom of Religion and State Neutrality," University of Chicago Law

The Kedroff case⁹⁵ involved a more subtle question with pluralistic overtones. At issue was the right to occupy and use the St. Nicholas Cathedral in New York. One of the contesting parties claimed appointment from the Russian Orthodox Church of North America, a corporation created by the legislature of New York in 1925, whose archbishop was elected by a sobor (convention) of the American churches in 1924, when they broke away from the mother church in Moscow. The other party was appointed by the supreme authority of the Russian Orthodox Church in Moscow. The New York Court of Appeals held, in a 4-3 decision, that the prelate appointed by the ecclesiastical officials in Moscow was not entitled to the cathedral on the basis of a 1945 state statute which in effect brought all of the New York churches formerly subject to the administrative jurisdiction of the Moscow authorities into an autonomous Review, Vol. 20, pp. 426-40 (Spring, 1953); Leo Pfeffer and James M. O'Neill, debating "The Meaning of the Establishment Clause," Buffalo Law Review, Vol. 2, pp. 225-79 (Spring, 1953); George E. Reed, "Church-State and the Zorach Case," Notre Dame Lawyer, Vol. 27, pp. 529-51 (Summer, 1952); James E. Harpster, "Religion, Education and the Law," Marquette Law Review, Vol. 36, pp. 24-66 (Summer, 1952); William W. Boyer, Jr., "Religious Education of Public School Pupils in Wisconsin," Wisconsin Law Review, Vol. 1953, pp. 181-255 (March, 1953), "Property Rights of Religious Institutions in Wisconsin," Marquette Law Review, Vol. 36, pp. 329-70 (Spring, 1953), "Religion and the Police Power in Wisconsin," Marquette Law Review, Vol. 37, pp. 1-34 (Summer, 1953).

⁹⁴ Justice Frankfurter concurred except insofar as the opinion was based on the First Amendment. He thought the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment was controlling.

⁹⁵ Kedroff v. St. Nicholas Cathedral of Russian Orthodox Church, 344 U.S. 94 (1952). See the astute remarks of Mark De Wolfe Howe, "Political Theory and the Nature of Liberty," Harvard Law Review, Vol. 67, pp. 91-95 (Nov., 1953).

North American metropolitan district. The statute directed that all the churches formerly subject to the Moscow synod and patriarchate should in the future be under the hierarchy of the American church. The Russian patriarch was elected in 1945 in Moscow by a sobor recognized by all parties to this litigation as a true sobor held in accordance with church canons.

With Justice Jackson dissenting alone, the Court held that the New York statute, which undertook to transfer control of the New York Churches of the Russian Orthodox religion from the patriarch and synod of Moscow to the governing authorities of the American church, was unconstitutional. Said Justice Reed: "Such a law violates the Fourteenth Amendment. It prohibits the free exercise of religion."⁹⁶ He also pointed out that the state required the New York churches to conform with the faith, doctrine, and canon law of the Orthodox Church, an obviously improper thing for a legislature to do. In reply to the argument of the New York Court of Appeals that the statute was designed to protect the American churches from the subversive influences of the Russian state, Justice Reed stated: "Legislative power to punish subversive action cannot be doubted. If such action should be actually attempted by a cleric, neither his robe nor his pulpit would be a defense. But in this case no problem of punishment for the violation of law arises. There is no charge of subversive or hostile action by any ecclesiastic. Here there is a transfer by statute of control over churches. This violates our rule of separation between church and state."

The Court leaned heavily on the post-Civil War case of Watson v. Jones,⁹⁷ which came up on diversity long before the Fourteenth Amendment amounted to anything, and was decided, in pre-Tompkins days, on the basis of general law. This case defended the right of the officials of a hierarchical church to control all property of the church, as against the claims of schismatical elements. The opinion of this case, said Justice Reed, radiates "a spirit of freedom for religious organizations, an independence from secular control or manipulation, in short, power to decide for themselves, free from state interference, matters of church government as well as those of faith and doctrine." Contrary to the holding of the New York court, Justice Reed said that the statute goes far beyond merely providing that the trustees of the Cathedral should use it consistently with the desires of the members of the Russian Church in America. "By fiat it displaces one church administrator with another. It passes the control of matters directly ecclesiastical from one church authority to another. It thus intrudes for the benefit of one segment of a church the power of the state into the forbidden area of religious freedom contrary to the principles of the First Amendment."⁹⁸

⁹⁶ Just whose freedom was prohibited was not made clear. The Fourteenth Amendment speaks only of the rights of "persons."

⁹⁷ 13 Wall. 679 (1871).

⁹⁸ Justice Reed also held that New York's legislative application of cy-pres doctrine to this trust did not avoid the constitutional objection. It was explained that Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. United States, 136 U.S. 1 (1890), upon which reliance was had, dealt with a seizure of property based on the general rule that where a charitable Justice Jackson, in dissent, took the position that this was merely a dispute over real estate which the Fourteenth Amendment leaves to the state courts to decide without federal interference. He thought that since the New York courts could have made the same decision without the statute, it is for each state to say which branch of government should establish a rule for this sort of controversy. He argued that when this church incorporated under New York law, it submitted all of its temporal affairs to New York law. Finally, he did not think that New York law "must yield to the authority of a foreign and unfriendly state masquerading as a spiritual institution," nor could he agree that the principle of separation of church and state means that a state must submit property rights to settlement by canon law.

Confessions. In the so-called Reader's Digest murder case, Stein v. New York,⁹⁹ three men, Stein, Cooper, and Wissner, were convicted of murder after jury trial and sentenced to death. The evidence included written confessions by Cooper and Stein, each implicating all three. All objected to the introduction of the confessions on the ground that they had been coerced. The issue of coercion was heard by the trial court in the presence of the jury, and the judge left the issue to the jury. A great deal of evidence was submitted to the jury in addition to the confessions. Both confessions were made at a time when the prisoners were illegally held incommunicado.

Cooper was questioned from 8 P.M. to about 1 A.M. and the following day from 10 A.M. to 6 P.M. Stein was questioned an hour in the morning, from two to three hours in the afternoon, and then from 7 P.M. to 2 A.M. There was no direct testimony of physical violence or threats, and police testimony that violence and threats were not used was unshaken. No defendant took the stand. The jury was instructed to consider the confessions only if it found them to have been voluntary. Since the jury rendered a general verdict, the jury could have concluded that the confessions had been coerced and still convict.

corporation is dissolved as unlawful, the sovereign distributes the property, according to the cy-pres doctrine, to objects of charity and usefulness. In Kedroff there was no such dissolution or seizure.

⁹⁹ 346 U.S. 156 (1953). See Francis A. Allen, "Due Process and State Criminal Procedures: Another Look," Northwestern University Law Review, Vol. 48, pp. 16-35 (March-April, 1953); Marne S. Matherne, "Pretrial Confessions—A New Rule," Tennessee Law Review, Vol. 22, pp. 1011-24 (June, 1953); Jerome Hall, "Police and Law in a Democratic Society," Indiana Law Journal, Vol. 28, pp. 133-77 (Winter, 1953); Emily Marx, "Psychosomatics and Coerced Confessions," Dickinson Law Review, Vol. 57, pp. 1-23 (Oct., 1952). On various aspects of the self-incrimination problem see: Osmond K. Fraenkel, "The Fourth Amendment and the Federal Courts," Lawyers Guild Review, Vol. 12, pp. 73-77 (Spring, 1952); Louis B. Boudin, "The Constitutional Privilege in Operation," Lawyers Guild Review, Vol. 12, pp. 128-49 (Summer, 1952); John M. Murray, "The Privilege against Self-Incrimination versus Immunity: Proposed Statutes," Georgetown Law Journal, Vol. 41, pp. 511-24 (May, 1953); James B. Smith, "The Privilege of Silence and the Legislative Process," Georgetown Law Journal, Vol. 41, pp. 330-62 (March, 1953); Alan F. Westin, "Do Silent Witnesses Defend Civil Liberties?," Commentary, Vol. 15, pp. 537-46 (June, 1953); Laurent B. Frantz and Norman Redlich, "Does Silence Mean Guilt?," The Nation, Vol. 176, pp. 471-77 (June 6, 1953).

Speaking for a majority of six, Justice Jackson ruled that the procedure involved in this case was constitutional. For one thing, it leans heavily on the jury; under New York practice the judge can rule a confession inadmissible, but cannot make a final determination that it is admissible. But not everything is left to the jury, since the judge can set the verdict aside if he thinks the evidence does not warrant it. It was argued, however, that the defendants could not have taken the stand to support the charge of coercion without subjecting themselves to general cross-examination, through which the prosecution could have impeached their credibility, since each had an impressive criminal record. The answer in part was that under New York law trial courts have an exceptional discretion to prevent abuse and injustice, and that the defendants had not asked for a ruling as to the scope of cross-examination. But mainly the Court held that as in trial of every other issue, in the trial of the coercion issue the accused must choose between the disadvantage of silence and that of testifying. Said Justice Jackson: "The Constitution safeguards the right of a defendant to remain silent; it does not assure him that he may remain silent and still enjoy the advantages that might have resulted from testifying." Finally, it was held that the Fourteenth Amendment does not forbid jury trial of the issue of coercion. "The states are free to allocate functions as between judge and jury as they see fit."

On the merits, the Court ruled that it was not unconstitutional if these confessions were used as the basis of conviction. While the Supreme Court is not completely bound by state court determinations of any issue essential to the assessment of a claim of federal right, it gives weight to the decision below and does not approach the record de novo, or with the latitude which some state appellate courts possess. The Fourteenth Amendment does not assure immunity from all judicial error. Justice Jackson declared: "It is only miscarriages of such gravity and magnitude that they cannot be expected to happen in an enlightened system of justice, or be tolerated by it if they do, that cause us to intervene to review, in the name of the Federal Constitution, the weight of conflicting evidence to support a decision by a state court." In most cases the primary and final responsibility must rest with the state courts, who are closest to the scene of events.

Nevertheless, Justice Jackson considered the various issues of fact in the case. As for physical violence, he noted that positive police testimony, not inherently improbable, was unshaken on cross-examination. With regard to psychological coercion inherent in the questioning, the Justice asserted: "Interrogation is not inherently coercive, as is physical violence. Interrogation does have social value in solving crime, as physical force does not." The limits of interrogation depend upon all the circumstances in each case, and it was noted that these defendants were neither young, soft, ignorant, nor timid. Extensive questioning by relays of police was approved as a means of solving crimes. "Of course," said Justice Jackson, "these confessions were not voluntary in the sense that petitioners wanted to make them, or that they were completely spontaneous, like a confession to a priest, a lawyer, or a psychiatrist. But in this sense no criminal confession is voluntary." Finally, on the question of delay and illegal detention, it was held that while this was relevant to the issue of coercion, it had been presented to the jury. The Court ruled that the more rigid rule of exclusion which it has promulgated for federal courts in the exercise of its supervisory power should not be confused with the more limited requirements of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Court also ruled that if the jury rejected the confessions, it could constitutionally base a conviction on other sufficient evidence. The trial court had refused an instruction that if the jury found the confessions were coerced it must acquit. The Supreme Court held that this was proper; the confessions were put to the jury only tentatively, subject to its judgment and with instructions to ignore them if coerced. The Fourteenth Amendment does not enact a rigid exclusionary rule of evidence.

There was a special problem in regard to Wissner, who had not confessed, but was implicated by the two who did. He complained of his inability to cross-examine the accusing witnesses, that is to say, the confessors, but the Court held that the Fourteenth Amendment does not include a right of confrontation. Basically, his objection was that as to him the introduction of these confessions was hearsay, but Justice Jackson declared flatly that "the hearsay-evidence rule, with all its subtleties, anomalies and ramifications, will not be read into the Fourteenth Amendment." He said that the procedure for Wissner was not unconstitutional merely because the Justices might be able to think of a better one. He would not discredit constitutional doctrine to enable the guilty to escape through "mere technical loopholes." These men had had fair trial and fair review. "The people of the State are also entitled to due process of law."

Justices Black, Frankfurter, and Douglas filed vigorous dissenting opinions. Justice Black declared that the Court was giving up several constitutional safeguards: freedom from "arbitrary seizure, secret confinement and police bludgeoning to make him [i.e., the accused] testify against himself in absence of relative, friend or counsel"; "the right of an accused to confront and cross-examine witnesses who swear he is guilty of crime"; freedom from being held incommunicado by the police. Justice Frankfurter pointed out that while he respected the substantial autonomy of the states, he did not construe this deference to require abdication by the Court of its obligation to decide in a particular case whether a confession was voluntary. Whether the confession was coerced does not depend, he maintained, upon the strength of the other evidence. He believed that these confessions were the product of coercive police pressure. He thought the Court went too far in holding that even if a constitutional right had been denied, the defendant must also prove that the rest of the evidence would not have been sufficient to authorize the jury to find guilt. This, he declared, is "a retrogressive step in the administration of criminal justice," for it "affords new inducement to police and prosecutors to employ the third degree." Justice Douglas declared that we are now entering nothing less than "a new regime of constitutional law."

Among the various issues considered by the Court in the several cases disposed of in Brown v. Allen,¹⁰⁰ a similar question about confessions was raised by defendant Brown, a Negro who had been convicted of rape and sentenced to death. In his case, timely objection had been made to the introduction of a confession, the jury was excused, and after a preliminary examination in which Brown and two policemen testified, the trial judge concluded that the confession was voluntary. While Brown did not take the stand at the trial, on cross-examination of the policemen the jury learned that Brown, an illiterate, was held for five days after arrest before being charged with a crime, that he was not given a preliminary hearing until eighteen days after arrest, that he had no counsel during the period of detention, and that the confession was taken before the preliminary hearing and appointment of counsel. There was no record of physical coercion or prolonged questioning. The Court held that the rule prevailing in the federal courts which forbids the admission of confessions obtained before prompt arraignment, even if voluntary, is not a constitutional requirement, but only a rule of evidence for the federal courts. Said Justice Reed: "Mere detention and police examination in private of one in official state custody do not render involuntary the statements or confessions made by the person so detained."

Fair Procedure. Smith pleaded "not guilty" to a murder charge on the advice of a lawyer who knew nothing about his case but who happened to be in the courtroom and was asked by the judge to help out in the arraignment. Under Pennsylvania law, by failing to plead "not guilty by reason of insanity," Smith lost his only chance of requiring that the question of insanity be tried by a jury at the outset. Some months later, state-appointed counsel changed the plea to "guilty" so that he would have more time to get out-of-state evidence at state expense to support a contention that Smith was insane. Smith had been committed previously to mental institutions. The Court held, by a 6-3 vote, that there was no denial of due process because the plea of guilty was allowed without a previous adjudication of the issue of insanity, since under the state law if evidence offered at the trial raises substantial doubts about the defendant's sanity, counsel is free to change the plea to "not guilty by reason of insanity."¹⁰¹ Thus, there was ample opportunity to rectify any error the first lawyer may have made. Furthermore, the Court held that the Constitution does not impose upon the state the duty of appointing a psychiatrist to make a pre-trial examination of sanity. It is sufficient if the issue of sanity was heard by the trial court.

In Brown v. Allen,¹⁰² the case of Daniels involved two Negro defendants who, after conviction, were granted sixty days by the trial judge in which to prepare and serve a statement of the case for appeal. Their counsel failed to serve this statement until sixty-one days had passed, whereupon the trial judge struck the appeal as out of time. This precluded an appeal as of right to the state's highest court. The Supreme Court held that the failure to make a timely appeal was like the failure to raise an objection to unconstitutional action before conviction. "We cannot say," Justice Reed declared, "that North Carolina's action in refusing review after failure to perfect the case on appeal violates the Federal Constitution. A period of limitation accords with our conception of proper procedure."

¹⁰⁰ 344 U.S. 443 (1953).

¹⁰¹ U.S. ex rel. Smith v. Baldi, 344 U.S. 561 (1953).

¹⁰² 344 U.S. 443 (1953).

Double Jeopardy. It was established in the Palko case¹⁰³ that the Fifth Amendment prohibition of double jeopardy does not apply to the states. In *Brock v. North Carolina*¹⁰⁴ the question came up again. Brock and two accomplices were accused of assault with a deadly weapon. The accomplices were tried first and found guilty. Before judgments were entered, Brock was placed on trial. After three other witnesses had been offered by the prosecution, the state then put the accomplices on the stand. They refused to testify on the ground of self-incrimination, their counsel telling the court that if judgment on their convictions should be adverse, they would appeal to the state supreme court. The trial judge upheld their refusal to testify, whereupon the state told the court that the testimony of these two men was necessary for the case and moved for a mistrial. The court granted the motion on the ground that the ends of justice required their testimony. The state supreme court then affirmed the convictions of the accomplices, a second jury was impanelled for Brock, and over due process objections the accomplices testified and Brock was convicted. The state supreme court held that there was no double jeopardy because the trial court had the power to declare a mistrial in the interests of justice, in accordance with an old state common-law rule.

Six Justices held that the North Carolina procedure did not violate due process, leaning heavily on the Palko precedent. "This Court," said Justice Minton, "has long favored the rule of discretion in the trial judge to declare a mistrial and to require another panel to try the defendant if the ends of justice will be best served."¹⁰⁵ Depending upon the facts, justice for either party or both may indicate to a trial judge the wisdom of using his discretionary power of declaring a mistrial and ordering a new trial. No hard and fast due process rule is possible.

Chief Justice Vinson wrote a spirited dissenting opinion. "For the first time in the history of this Court," he asserted, "it is urged that a state could grant a mistrial in order that it might present a stronger case at some later trial and, in so doing, avoid a plea of former jeopardy in the second trial." What the Court's ruling means, he said, is that if the prosecutor thinks he cannot win a conviction from the jury on the testimony at the trial, he is free to stop the trial and insist that it be tried again when he has stronger testimony to offer. He asserted that, considering the needs of orderly justice, a defendant could not ask for a mistrial because the state had done well and the defense poorly. The same rule ought to apply to the prosecution. While he agreed that the technical aspects of the doctrine of double jeopardy do not fall within the scope of due process, the basic idea does, and he noted that all but five state constitutions as well as the federal Constitution have clauses forbidding double jeopardy. In the five states without such constitutional clauses there are common law rules against it. Thus North Carolina is out of step with the nation. He insisted that the general rule is that a second trial will be allowed "only for extreme circumstances, often contributed to by the defendant and beyond the control of the prosecutor, which prevented the testimony from being available at the first trial."

¹⁰³ Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937).

¹⁰⁴ 344 U.S. 424 (1953).

¹⁰⁵ Justice Minton cited Wade v. Hunter, 336 U.S. 684 (1949) and Thompson v. United States, 155 U.S. 271 (1894).

Wiretapping. Finally, in *Schwartz v. State of Texas*¹⁰⁶ the Court ruled that Section 605 of the Federal Communications Act, which forbids wiretapping,¹⁰⁷ does not exclude evidence secured through wiretapping from a state criminal proceeding. It has been held that this statute renders inadmissible in a federal court communications intercepted in this fashion,¹⁰⁸ even though they were intrastate telephone calls.¹⁰⁹ But it does not follow, Justice Minton ruled, that such evidence is inadmissible in a state court. This accords with the holding in *Wolf v. Colorado*¹¹⁰ that evidence obtained by a state officer by means which would constitute an unlawful search and seizure under the Fourth Amendment is nonetheless admissible in a state court, even though the same evidence, if obtained by a federal officer, would be clearly inadmissible in a federal court.¹¹¹ This is also the uniform holding of state courts, and conforms with the pertinent Texas statute. The Court will not extend a federal statute by implication so as to invalidate the specific language of a state statute. "The exercise of federal supremacy is not lightly to be presumed." Nevertheless, Justice Minton pointed out that the fact that Texas legislated in this field is given due consideration, but is not controlling, and that the Court's decision would be the same if the Texas courts had pronounced this rule of evidence. Finally, since the holding was that Congress did not intend to impose a rule of evidence on the state courts, it was unnecessary to decide whether it has the power to do so. Justice Douglas dissented alone on the theory that wiretapping is a violation of the Fourth Amendment, and hence within the scope of the Texas statute which excludes evidence secured in violation of the federal Constitution. He argued that prior federal decisions which take a contrary view ought to be overruled.

2. EQUAL PROTECTION OF THE LAWS

Restrictive Covenants. In 1948 the Court held in the Shelley case¹¹² that racial restrictive covenants may not be enforced in equity by state courts against ¹⁰⁶ 344 U.S. 199 (1952). See Comment, "Admissibility in a State Court of Evidence Obtained by Wire-Tapping," Missouri Law Review, Vol. 18, pp. 185-91 (April, 1953).

¹⁰⁷ " . . . No person not being authorized by the sender shall intercept any communication and divulge or publish the existence, contents, substance, purport, effect, or meaning of such intercepted communication to any person. . . . "

¹⁰⁸ Nardone v. United States, 302 U.S. 379 (1937).

¹⁰⁹ Weiss v. United States, 308 U.S. 321 (1939).

¹¹⁰ 338 U.S. 25 (1949).

¹¹¹ Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914).

¹¹² Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948).

Negro purchasers, because that would be state action in violation of the equal protection guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment. In *Barrows v. Jackson*¹¹³ the Court went a step further to rule, by a 6-1 vote, that a state court may not, for the same reason, entertain a suit at law for damages for breach of a restrictive covenant brought by one "Caucasian" against another. Otherwise, said Justice Minton, the state would be encouraging the use of restrictive covenants. If a property owner may be sued for failure to carry out such a covenant, he is in effect coerced to continue to use his property in a discriminatory manner. Thus it becomes the state's choice that he observe the covenant or suffer damages. The result is that non-Caucasians are unable to buy, own, and enjoy property on the same terms as white people.

The technical question which Chief Justice Vinson stressed in his dissent related to the standing of the defendant, who was not a Negro, to raise the equal protection issue. The general rule is that a party cannot challenge the constitutionality of a statute unless he can show that he is within the class whose rights are being infringed.¹¹⁴ But here, said Justice Minton, is "a unique situation in which it is the action of the state court which might result in a denial of constitutional rights and in which it would be difficult if not impossible for the persons whose rights are asserted to present their grievance before any court." Thus, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, and because of the close relationship between the restrictive covenant and the sanction of the state court, the usual rule on standing, which is only a rule of practice, must give way to the need to protect fundamental rights which would otherwise be denied. And the defendant asserts not the rights of non-Caucasians as a group, but those particular non-Caucasians who are would-be users of restricted land. The Chief Justice insisted that no Negro would be injured if the defendant were required to pay damages for breaching a promise voluntarily made, and that the decisive fact even on the merits was that no identifiable non-Caucasian was before the Court who had been denied any right. In his opinion the defendant was acting as the self-appointed agent of an "anonymous, amorphous class," and not in defense of his own rights.

School Segregation. After full argument of five cases in which the Court was asked to rule on the constitutionality of segregation in the public schools of four states and the District of Columbia, the Court on June 8, 1953, restored them to the docket and assigned them for reargument in the following term.¹¹⁵ The ¹¹³ 346 U.S. 249 (1953). The case came up from California, which had ruled that the suit was forbidden by the Shelley case. The Supreme Court of Michigan and the District Court of the District of Columbia had taken the same position. The Supreme Courts of Missouri and Oklahoma had ruled the other way.

¹¹⁴ See Note, "'Standing' to Attack the Constitutionality of a Statute," New York University Law Review, Vol. 27, pp. 656-70 (Oct., 1952).

¹¹⁵ Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, 345 U.S. 972 (1953). See: John P. Frank, "Can Courts Erase the Color Line?," Buffalo Law Review, Vol. 2, pp. 28-44 (Winter, 1952); Will Maslow and Joseph B. Robison, "Civil Rights Legislation and the Fight for Equality, 1862-1952," University of Chicago Law Review, Vol. 20, pp. 363-413 (Spring, 1953); Wilfred C. Leland, Jr., "We Believe in Employment on Merit, But . . .," Minnesota Law Review, Vol. 37, pp. 246-67 (March, 1953).

cases, which aroused enormous public interest, were reargued December 7-9, 1953. The Court asked counsel to discuss the understanding of the framers and ratifiers of the Fourteenth Amendment in regard to public school segregation, and raised a number of questions about the sort of decree it should or could write.

Jury Discrimination. In *Avery v. Georgia*¹¹⁶ the Court unanimously held unconstitutional a jury selection system used in Fulton County, Georgia, in which the names of white persons selected for jury panels were printed on white tickets and the names of Negroes on yellow tickets. The Chief Justice said that obviously the use of white and yellow tickets makes it easier for those to discriminate who wish to do so. Justice Frankfurter remarked in a concurring opinion that these slips could serve no other purpose but discrimination. The practice in question was not authorized by Georgia statutes, and even the state supreme court declared that the use of separately colored tickets was "prima facie evidence of discrimination." Since no Negro was drawn to serve in a panel of sixty names in this case, a prima facie case of discrimination was established. It is not necessary, as the state court had ruled, for the appellant to prove some particular act of discrimination by a specific official. On the contrary, the state must dispel the prima facie case of discrimination with sufficient evidence. This Georgia failed to do.

In Brown v. Allen,¹¹⁷ defendants Brown and Speller, who had been convicted in North Carolina courts, both raised questions of discrimination in the selection of juries. Brown's principal argument was that, in the proportional sense, fewer Negroes than whites served on the juries of Forsyth County. Jury names are taken from taxpayers' lists, and Negroes number about 16 per cent of the listed taxpayers. The local officials swore that the names of all taxpayers are put in the box, and that the selection is made in public by lot, with the drawings by a small child. Of the 37 persons summoned for the petit jury in Brown's case, eight were Negroes, and there were three Negroes in a special venire of twenty. Peremptory challenges or challenges for cause eliminated all the Negroes. Uncontradicted state evidence showed that in 1949 and 1950 from seven to ten per cent of the persons drawn for grand jury panels were Negroes, and that in 1950 from nine to seventeen per cent of those drawn for petit juries were Negroes. The Court held that to make a showing of violation of equal protection, there must be proof of discrimination on racial grounds. Variations in proportions of Negroes and whites on jury lists from the racial proportions of the population are not necessarily such proof. The taxpayer lists included all men who paid property or poll taxes, and all men between 21 and 50 are required to list both. While the Court recognized that taxpayer lists have a higher proportion of whites, due to inequality of educational and economic opportunities, it refused to invalidate this procedure. Justice Reed stated that it was not the Court's duty to impose on the state its conception of the proper source of jury lists, "so long as the source reasonably reflects a cross-section of the population suitable in character and intelligence" for this civic duty. "Short of an annual census or required population registration, these tax lists offer the most comprehensive source of available names." Justice Black, dissenting, argued that in view of the fact that about one-third of the population of Forsyth County was Negro, the number of Negro jurors was glaringly disproportionate, and must have been due to design.

¹¹⁶ 345 U.S. 559 (1953).

¹¹⁷ 344 U.S. 443 (1953).

As for Speller, the evidence established that no Negro had ever served on a jury in Vance County before his case. But North Carolina revised its jury law in 1947, and in the special venire there were 145 Negroes out of a total of 2,126 names. The Court ruled that the long history of discrimination against Negroes in the county was not decisive of discrimination in Speller's case, since "former errors cannot invalidate future trials." An additional point was that the clerk of the jury commissioners chose for the panel those on the tax lists who had "the most property," although he testified that racial discrimination did not enter into his selection. The Court held that this issue, not having been raised before, was not open for consideration. Finally it was noted that while 38 per cent of the people on the Vance County tax lists were Negroes, only 7 per cent in the jury box were Negroes. The Court ruled that this could be explained by the economic factor, that the lower courts had all agreed on the absence of racial discrimination, and that the small number of Negro names in the jury box was not in itself evidence of racial discrimination. Justice Black argued that with Negroes constituting 45 per cent of the county's population and 38 per cent of its taxpayers, the small number of Negroes in the jury box could be explained only on the ground of discrimination.

3. THE RIGHT TO VOTE

In 1944, in the last of a series of white primary cases, the Court held that even where Negroes were excluded by the rules of the Democratic party of Texas from voting in the party primaries, the right to vote guaranteed by the Fifteenth Amendment was denied, because the party activities were subject to so much state control that the party was in effect an agency of the state.¹¹⁸ Since then, several variations on this theme have appeared in the federal courts. South Carolina's attempt to circumvent this rule by the expedient of repealing all statutes on the subject of political parties, thus hoping to convert them into mere private clubs, and as such outside the scope of the Amendment, was rebuffed.¹¹⁹ Alabama tried its luck with its "Boswell Amendment," which denied registration to all who could not "understand and explain" any article of the Constitution, and this was nullified as conferring an arbitrary power on the board of registrars, since the standard was vague, uncertain, and indefinite.¹²⁰

¹¹⁸ Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649 (1944).

¹¹⁹ Rice v. Elmore, 165 F. 2d 387 (4th Cir. 1947), certiorari denied, 333 U.S. 875 (1948); Baskin v. Brown, 174 F. 2d 391 (4th Cir. 1949).

¹²⁰ Davis v. Schnell, 81 F. Supp. 872 (S. D. Ala. 1949), affirmed, per curiam, without opinion and without argument, 336 U.S. 933 (1949).

Another wrinkle appeared in Terry v. Adams.¹²¹ Here a Texas county sought to disenfranchise Negroes through the expedient of a preprimary primary from which Negroes were barred. All white people on the official list of county voters were automatically members of the Jaybird Democratic Association. Claiming to be a self-governing voluntary club, it ran preprimary primaries, meeting expenses by assessing the candidates. Since 1889, every county-wide official elected to office had first won endorsement in the Jaybird primary. Usually the winners of the Jaybird primary are the only candidates in the Democratic primaries and general elections that follow.

With only Justice Minton dissenting, on the ground that no state action was involved, the Court held that the Jaybird contrivance violated the Constitution, but no single theory was agreed upon. In an opinion joined by Justices Douglas and Burton, Justice Black declared that the Fifteenth Amendment clearly extends to "any election in which public issues are decided or public officials selected," although he conceded that it does not apply to social or business clubs. He noted that the very same standards or qualifications prescribed by Texas for voters were adopted as the only qualifications for Jaybird primaries, except for the racial ban. "The Jaybird Party thus brings into being and holds precisely the kind of election that the Fifteenth Amendment seeks to prevent." Here the state violates the Amendment by permitting this circumvention that produces the equivalent of the prohibited election, the only election that matters in this county. The Jaybird primary has become, he declared, an integral part of the elective process, indeed, its only effective part.

In a separate concurring opinion Justice Frankfurter recognized that the difficulty in this case was whether there had been state action. He advanced the theory that assuming Jaybird not to be a party (a matter for Texas to decide) there was state action because the electoral officials of the county shared in the subversion of the Texas primaries law by participating in the scheme. Therefore, he argued, the remedy was not to require Negro participation but to bar the whole business directly. The weakness of this theory was the lack of any direct evidence that local election officials did have a hand in Jaybird's affairs. Furthermore, not everything done by a person who is an official is done officially.

Justice Clark filed an opinion in which the Chief Justice and Justices Reed and Jackson joined. He maintained that Jaybird was a political party falling within the ban of the Fifteenth Amendment because it operated "as part and parcel of the Democratic Party." Both have the same qualifications for membership; the preprimary in May of each election year is linked with the official Democratic primary in July; the Jaybird winner always wins in the Democratic primary. Since Jaybird is "the decisive power in the county's recognized electoral process," it nullifies the Negro's vote at the only stage in the local political process where it might matter. The political organization which controls the choice of public officials is an agency of government within the meaning of the constitution.

¹²¹ 345 U.S. 461 (1953). See Cortez A. M. Ewing, Primary Elections in the South (Norman, Oklahoma, 1953).

While this decision protects the Negro's right to vote and continues a series of decisions bearing upon this point, its chief impact upon the pattern of constitutional law may well be the expanded definition of state action. No single theory was agreed upon, but the holding that the Jaybird preprimary primary was state action does seem to enlarge the area in which federal review of local activity may be expected.

4. STATE POWER AND THE COMMERCE CLAUSE

Regulation. The question of the scope of state authority over interstate commerce still evokes sharp divisions of opinion. A state regulatory scheme was approved by the Court in Lloyd A. Fry Roofing Company v. Wood,¹²² but only by a 5-4 vote. The Company manufactures asphalt roofing products in Memphis, Tennessee, and sends them in trucks to customers in nearby states. Some of these trucks, the Company alleges, are merely leased to it, and are driven by their owners. Five of these driver-owners, while carrying the Company's interstate shipments on Arkansas highways, were arrested for having failed to obtain permits as required of all contract-carriers by the Arkansas Motor Act. The State Supreme Court found that the truck drivers were not the Company's employees, that the lease arrangements were shams, and that the Company was therefore a shipper and not a carrier of any kind. It held that the driver-owners were in reality transporting the Company's goods as "contract carriers," for which a state permit was necessary.

Speaking for the majority, Justice Black made it clear that under the rule of Buck v. Kuykendall,¹²³ it would be a violation of the Commerce Clause for a state to deny interstate contract carriers permits because of the adequacy of other transportation services. But here Arkansas asks these driver-owners to do nothing except apply for permits as contract carriers. The state commission expressly disclaims any discretionary right to refuse to grant a permit. The state merely requires registration in the belief that identification is essential for the proper enforcement of the state's valid police, welfare, and safety regulations. There is no showing that the commission has attempted or will attempt to attach any burdensome conditions to the grant of a permit, in any manner conflicting with the federal Motor Carrier Act or any ICC regulation thereunder. Justice Black concluded that the mere requirement of such a permit does not impose an "undue burden" on interstate commerce. "At present we hold only that Arkansas is not powerless to require interstate motor carriers to identify themselves as users of that state's highways."

For the minority, Justice Douglas argued that it was immaterial whether these driver-owners were contract or private carriers, and that, in the light of the conditions that had to be met, what Arkansas in effect demanded was that they should secure state certificates of public convenience and necessity, and not mere permits. He agreed that states may regulate interstate commerce in the interest of safety, exact fees for highway maintenance, or require permits for intrastate business, but argued that the right to engage in interstate commerce cannot be made to depend upon state permission. Furthermore, he maintained that Congress had preempted the whole field.

¹²² 344 U.S. 157 (1952).

¹²³ 267 U.S. 307 (1925).

Taxation. There were two cases during the Term dealing with the impact of state taxation upon interstate commerce. In *Bode v. Barrett*¹²⁴ the question was whether interstate carriers also doing an intrastate business could be required to pay an Illinois tax for the use of the public highways measured entirely by the gross weight of the vehicle. Noting that each of the interstate carriers carried on an intrastate business as well, and that it is clearly within the police power of Illinois to exact a tax for the privilege of using state highways, the Court concluded that the protesting carriers failed to carry the burden of proving that the tax bore no reasonable relation to the use they made of the highways in their local operations. Due process issues, such as the objection that private carriers were taxed at the same rate as carriers for hire, were dismissed as "without substance" or "frivolous." Justice Frankfurter, who filed a dissenting opinion in which Justice Jackson concurred, construed the majority decision to be that where the two types of commerce are commingled, the plaintiff has no standing to sue. He protested that the Court had given consideration to about 100 state taxation or regulation cases in which interstate and intrastate commerce were commingled. "Can it be," he asked, "that all our predecessors bothered their heads needlessly?"

The other decision, Chicago v. Willett Company,¹²⁵ upheld a Chicago ordinance which levied a tax on trucks graduated according to size, as applied to an Illinois corporation with its place of business in Chicago which operated trucks transporting goods within the city, between the city and other points in Illinois, and between Chicago and points in neighboring states. It was stipulated that every day of the year the Company's trucks carry along with property which never leaves the city property destined for some point outside the state. The Supreme Court held that the case was within the "home port" theory of the Northwest Airlines decision.¹²⁶ The state supreme court had ruled that the ordinance did not impose a tax on trucks which do not carry goods within the city. Justice Frankfurter declared that the Company had made no attempt to show that the tax in fact burdened interstate commerce, though this is for the taxpayer to show affirmatively. The "home port" theory, he said, "fits a fleet of trucks at least as well as it does a fleet of airliners." The "central and decisive fact" is that the Company's business has a home in Chicago, and that its business revolves around the city, from which it continuously receives protection and the benefit of public services. Therefore a tax "of reasonable proportions" not shown in fact to be a burden on interstate commerce is valid. The novelty of this analysis is that the "home port" doctrine, heretofore applied only in connection with property taxes, is now extended to franchise taxes.

¹²⁴ 344 U.S. 583 (1953). See Note, "State Taxation of Vehicles Moving Interstate," Indiana Law Journal, Vol. 28, pp. 212-30 (Winter, 1953).

¹²⁵ 344 U.S. 574 (1953).

¹²⁶ Northwest Airlines, Inc. v. Minnesota, 322 U.S. 292 (1944). Also relied upon was People ex rel. N.Y. Central & H.R.R. Co. v. Miller, 202 U.S. 584 (1906).

Justices Reed and Vinson, concurring separately, argued that the tax in question was strictly an occupational tax for carrying goods within the city. They disagreed with the majority's holding that the tax is valid merely because the taxpayer is an Illinois corporation with its business home in Chicago. "The corporation is taxable," they said, "because it does intrastate business on the streets of Chicago." For obviously, they insisted, the charge is for the use of the highways of Chicago. Dissenting alone, Justice Douglas maintained that since this was an occupation tax, it cannot be exacted for the privilege of engaging in interstate commerce. Since there was a flat fee per truck, and the Company cannot segregate its interstate business, he reasoned that by increasing the number of trucks in operation the interstate business increased the amount of the tax.

5. INTERGOVERNMENTAL RELATIONS

Intergovernmental Taxation. There were three cases during the Term testing the validity of state taxes which impinged in some fashion upon federal instrumentalities. During World War II, there being a shortage of storage facilities, the government contracted with Esso Standard Oil for the storage of government-owned fuel, the company receiving a service charge, and the United States agreeing to assume liability of all state taxes. The Court held that under these circumstances Tennessee could collect from Esso a six-cent tax on the privilege of storing gasoline.¹²⁷ Justice Reed ruled that this tax was imposed because Esso exercised the privilege of storing gasoline, and was not "on" the government property.¹²⁸ The fact that a financial burden upon the United States may result has not been regarded as a fatal flaw since the Dravo case.¹²⁹ Corporations and individuals contracting with the United States do not share in the sovereign's exemption from state taxation merely because their activities are useful to the government. Three members of the Court dissented without opinion.

Another claim of immunity from local taxation was rejected in Howard v. Commissioners of Louisville.¹³⁰ In 1940 the United States acquired by condemnation, with the consent of the Kentucky legislature, the land on which a naval ordnance plant was located. By ordinances adopted in 1947 and 1950 the City of Louisville annexed the plant tract, and this was not challenged by the United States. The Court held that it was permissible for the City to collect from the employees of the plant a license tax for the privilege of working in the city, ¹²⁷ Esso Standard Oil v. Evans, 345 U.S. 495 (1953).

¹²⁸ United States v. Allegheny County, 322 U.S. 174 (1944) was distinguished on the ground that there the state applied an ad valorem property tax to government-owned machinery leased to a private company; thus the value of the federal property was in part the measure of the tax.

¹²⁹ James v. Dravo Contracting Co., 302 U.S. 134 (1937).

¹³⁰ 344 U.S. 624 (1953).

measured by one per cent of all salaries or wages earned therein. Justice Minton reasoned that the land in question did not cease to be a part of Kentucky, and that "a change of municipal boundaries did not interfere in the least with the jurisdiction of the United States within the area or with its use or disposition of the property." The Court also ruled that the Buck Act granted the right to tax income paid to employees of the government working in the plant. This statute defined an "income tax" as "any tax levied on, with respect to, or measured by, net income, gross income, or gross receipts." It is true that the Kentucky Court of Appeals had previously ruled that the sort of license tax at issue here was not under Kentucky law an income tax. But the right to tax in this area, it was pointed out, was not given in accordance with the view of Kentucky law as to what is an income tax, but rather within the definition of the federal statute. Justices Douglas and Black, who dissented, thought this was not an income tax within the meaning of the Buck Act, but was by its terms a "license fee" levied on the "privilege" of engaging in certain activities. They asserted that "the Congress has not yet granted local authorities the right to tax the privilege of working for or doing business with the United States."

The taxpayer did win, however, in Dameron v. Brodhead.¹³¹ Dameron, an officer in the U.S. Air Force, and a citizen and resident of Louisiana, was assigned to Lowry Field in 1948, and resided throughout the year in a rented apartment in Denver. The Court ruled that the application of a local personal property tax to his household goods was barred by Section 514 of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Relief Act of 1942. This section provides that so far as local taxation is concerned "such person shall not be deemed to have lost a residence or domicile in any State . . . solely by reason of being absent therefrom in compliance with military or naval orders. . . ." A 1944 amendment provides that "personal property shall not be deemed to be located or present in or to have a situs for taxation in such State . . ." In the light of the grant to Congress of the war power and the power to maintain armies, the Court had no doubt about the constitutionality of a statute exempting servicemen from substantial burdens of local taxation. It was regarded as immaterial that Dameron was not a business contractor, for he was none the less engaged in a function of the federal government. Justices Douglas and Black disagreed, arguing from the premise that "the power to tax is basic to the sovereignty of the states." Justice Douglas seems to have some special fondness for the term "state sovereignty." He maintained that while the power of Congress to withhold tax immunity is clear, its power to create tax immunities has been narrowly confined, and he declared: "Up to the present the Court has never held that the private affairs of a federal employee can be made public affairs by Congress and immune from state taxation." He thought that in his private capacity a federal employee is no different from any other citizen. He enjoys the benefits of local government and ought to be required to pay his share. He could not see how Denver's tax burdens the performance of any federal function.

¹³¹ 345 U.S. 322 (1953).

Priority of Tax Liens. Both the federal government and the Town of Walpole, New Hampshire, had claims, arising from tax liens, to a fund in the hands of a state court receiver of the assets of a corporation that was declared insolvent in 1949. The Town's lien grew out of an assessment of an ad valorem tax on machinery for 1947 and 1948. The federal lien was for employment, withholding, and income taxes that became due between 1943 and 1948. Under Section 3672 of the Internal Revenue Code, a federal lien is not valid as against a "judgment creditor" until notice thereof has been filed by the collector in the office of the federal district court. The New Hampshire court ruled that under state law an ad valorem tax assessment is in the nature of a judgment, and that therefore the Town was a judgment creditor within the meaning of the federal law. Since the federal notice of lien was not filed until after the Town's taxes were assessed, the state court held that the federal lien was not valid as against the Town's. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that while the state is free to interpret the nature of its own tax proceedings as it wishes, the meaning of a federal statute is for it to decide.¹³² Justice Minton reasoned that a cardinal purpose of Congress in its tax legislation is uniformity, and therefore the term "judgment creditor" should have the same meaning in all the states. He thought Congress intended to use the term "in the usual, conventional sense of a judgment of a court of record, since all states have such courts." He did not believe Congress had in mind the action of taxing authorities who may act judicially, as in New Hampshire and some other states. Justices Frankfurter and Reed dissented, contending that the statute does not require that the same procedure be followed in every state, and that it refers to state law.

Full Faith and Credit. The Justices were sharply divided over the full faith and credit problem presented in May v. Anderson.¹³³ The issue was whether in a habeas corpus proceeding attacking the right of a mother to retain possession of her minor children, an Ohio court must give full faith and credit to a Wisconsin decree awarding custody of the children to their father, when that decree was obtained by the father in an ex parte divorce action in a Wisconsin court which had no personal jurisdiction over the mother. Five Justices gave a negative answer to this question. The facts were as follows: The parties were married in Wisconsin and lived there until marital troubles developed in 1947. It was agreed that the mother, Leona May, should take the children to Lisbon, Ohio, to think things over. She then decided not to return to Wisconsin and so informed her husband Anderson, who then filed suit in Wisconsin, asking for an absolute divorce and custody of the children. The only service of process on May was delivery to her personally in Ohio of a copy of the Wisconsin summons and petition, in conformity with the Wisconsin statutes. May entered no appearance and took no part in the Wisconsin proceeding. This proceeding produced not only a divorce decree, but also an award of custody of the children to the father. Armed with a copy of this decree, Anderson demanded and obtained the children from the mother in Ohio and brought them back to Wisconsin. In July, 1951, Anderson took the children to Lisbon to visit their mother, and this time she refused to surrender them. Anderson thereupon filed a petition for habeas corpus in an Ohio court, which took the position that it was obliged by the Full Faith and Credit Clause to accept the Wisconsin decree as binding upon the mother.

¹³² United States v. Gilbert Associates, 345 U.S. 361 (1953).

¹³³ 345 U.S. 528 (1953).

Justice Burton ruled that it was well settled that the Full Faith and Credit Clause and the act of Congress on the subject do not entitle a judgment in personam to extraterritorial effect if it is made to appear that it was rendered without jurisdiction over the person sought to be bound. He said that it was unnecessary to determine the legal domicile of the children at the time of the custody decree, because even if it was with the father, that did not give Wisconsin, as against Ohio, the personal jurisdiction that it must have in order to deprive the mother of her personal right to their immediate possession. In other words, where the defendant in a divorce action is a nonresident and does not appear, and process is had only by substituted service, the court determines only the status of the parties, and not other questions. A mother's right to custody of her children is a personal right entitled to at least as much protection as her right to alimony.

Justice Frankfurter filed a concurring opinion to explain that all the Court is deciding is that the Full Faith and Credit Clause does not require Ohio, in disposing of the custody of the children in Ohio, to accept, under these circumstances, the disposition made by Wisconsin. But it is not decided that Ohio would be precluded from recognizing, as a matter of local law, the disposition made by the Wisconsin court. Nor would it offend due process for Ohio to do so. He said that the decision in this case is based on the fact that the child's welfare in a custody case has such a claim upon the state that its responsibility is obviously not to be foreclosed by a prior adjudication reflecting another state's discharge of its responsibility at another time.

Justice Minton dissented briefly to make the point that since the Wisconsin decree had been unappealed, and was valid on its face, and the mother had failed to challenge it by any pleading, the decree is entitled to full faith and credit in Ohio. Justice Jackson dissented at great length in an opinion in which Justice Reed joined. He insisted that if Wisconsin has rendered a valid judgment the Constitution requires every state to give it full faith and credit. He lamented that in recent years the Court has been "chipping away" at the concept of domicile. He agreed that we are a mobile people, "but if our federal system is to maintain separate legal communities, as the Full Faith and Credit Clause evidently contemplates, there must be some test for determining to which of these a person belongs," and no better test is available than that of domicile. He asserted that the decision of the Court comes to this, that the Wisconsin courts cannot bind the mother, and the Ohio courts cannot bind the father. Under these circumstances, possession becomes the whole of the law, and self-help the ultimate authority. He agreed that the Wisconsin courts never obtained jurisdiction over the person of the wife, who decamped, but there was jurisdiction based on the domicile of the husband and the children.

He believed the jurisdictional requirements for both divorce and custody were similar. He thought the Court was equating the jurisdictional requirements for a custody decree with those for an in personam money judgment, without assigning reasons, except for the remark that the wife's rights here were far more precious than property. "The force of this cardiac consideration is self-evident," he remarked, "but it seems to me to reflect a misapprehension as to the nature of a custody proceeding. . . ."

The Court was also divided 5-3 in Wells v. Simonds Abrasive Company,¹³⁴ in which an action for a wrongful death which had occurred in Alabama was brought in a federal district court in Pennsylvania more than one year but less than two years after the accident happened. The suit was based on a section of the Alabama code which provided that a suit for wrongful death must be brought within two years after the death. The trial court ordered summary judgment for the defendant, taking the position that the Pennsylvania statute, with a one-year limitation, was controlling, because the Pennsylvania conflict of laws rule called for the application of its own statute of limitations rather than that of the place of the accident. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the Pennsylvania conflicts rule did not violate the Full Faith and Credit Clause. This Clause, said the Chief Justice, does not compel the forum state to adopt any particular set of rules on the subject of conflict of laws. The rule that the limitations of the forum state apply is the usual conflicts rule of the states. It is true that some states have taken the position that where a foreign statutory right unknown to the common law has a period of limitation in the section creating the right, the limitation is regarded as so intimately connected with the right that it must be enforced in the forum state along with the substantive right. But this is not required of the states by the Full Faith and Credit Clause. Justice Jackson wrote the dissenting opinion, arguing that the remedy is inseparable from the right. He feared that the Court's decision would open the door to shopping for a favorable forum, since under it a party who may get a change of venue may also get a change of law as a bonus. In his view, the plaintiff should take her Alabama rights with her wherever she elects to sue.

¹³⁴ 345 U.S. 514 (1953).

THE PRESIDENT'S ECONOMIC STAFF DURING THE TRUMAN ADMINISTRATION

BERTRAM M. GROSS*

Economic Advisory Staff, Jerusalem, Israel

AND

JOHN P. LEWIS*

Indiana University

When the Council of Economic Advisers opened its doors in late 1946, many regarded the fledgling agency as a contingent of depression doctors armed with a "watered down" version of the Full Employment Bill. Instead, during the Truman era, the Council became, in the words of its second chairman, "an overall general economic advisory staff"¹ generally concerned with major problems affecting the growth and stability of the American economy, including its adaptability to the special demands of international stress. Actually the "transition" of the agency to this broader role was more apparent than real, since the Employment Act itself clearly contained a charter for a general economic staff function if the new staff and its principal chose development in that direction. In the wartime deliberations which led up to the Act, the Congress was concerned not only to prevent a postwar depression but also to improve the integration of the whole economic policy formation process.² And, in the final version of the Act, after making a very general policy declaration,³ the Congress decided, instead of drafting specific substantive solutions which would prejudice

* Mr. Gross was in charge of congressional staff work on the Full Employment Bill, and Executive Secretary of the Council of Economic Advisers through 1951. Mr. Lewis served as Council staff member and assistant to the Council chairman.

¹ Testimony of Leon H. Keyserling in the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee Hearings on the Independent Offices Appropriation Bill for 1952, 82nd Cong., 1st sess., p. 90.

² The immediate legislative ancestors of the Employment Act included a number of statutes (the most important of which was the one setting up the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion) dealing with the problem of coordinating the diverse economic activities of the federal government. This concern persisted during the consideration of the Employment Act and helps to account for the use of the term "coordinate" in the Act's declaration of policy. In earlier versions of the Bill, moreover, specific mention was made of the objective of preventing inflation as well as depressions. While in the final version specific mention of the anti-inflation objective was eliminated, the language of the statute still assigns to the Council the responsibility of recommending policies "to avoid economic fluctuations or to diminish the effects thereof. . . ."

³ Public Law 304, 79th Cong., Sec. 2: "The Congress hereby declares that it is the continuing policy and responsibility of the Federal Government to use all practicable means consistent with its needs and obligations and other essential considerations of national policy, with the assistance and cooperation of industry, agriculture, labor, and State and local governments, to coordinate and utilize all its plans, functions, and resources for the purpose of creating and maintaining, in a manner calculated to foster and promote free competitive enterprise and the general welfare, conditions under which there will be afforded useful employment opportunities, including self-employment for those able, willing, and seeking to work, and to promote maximum employment, production, and purchasing power."

the source and nature of future economic problems, to establish procedural machinery to facilitate the intelligent diagnosis and solution of such problems when they did subsequently arise.⁴

The Council of Economic Advisers was part of that machinery. In assisting and advising the President in the preparation of his Economic Reports to Congress, and in otherwise advising him, the Council was not only to gather "timely and authoritative information" on current economic trends and analyze "foreseeable" developments; it was also to project target levels of national employment, production, and purchasing power. It was to review the current programs of the federal government and to make specific policy recommendations for administrative and legislative action.⁵ Thus the new staff's general mission was spelled out. But, except for the very broad stipulation that it relate to the economy's general levels of production, employment, and purchasing power, its subject-matter scope was left flexible.

In the later years of the Truman Administration the extent of that flexibility was increasingly evident. In the first months after the Korean outbreak, the Council performed an expanding role in the defense program, participating in an advisory capacity in the work of the National Security Council,⁶ taking a considerable hand in the initial formulation of mobilization—and particularly stabilization—policies, and maintaining a close working contact with the Defense Production Act agencies⁷ during the earlier stages of their work. It is noteworthy that this considerable subject-matter shift was accomplished without

⁴ For emphasis on the policy-coordinating purpose of the Employment Act machinery and on the primarily procedural character of the Act's prescriptions, see President Truman's final Economic Report (Jan., 1953).

⁵ Secs. 3(a) and 4(c) of the Act.

⁶ This work had been started, at the President's direction, in April, 1950 shortly before the start of the Korean action.

⁷ In its extensive work with the defense agencies, both at Council and staff levels, the Council followed the directive of Sec. 803 of Executive Order 10161 (Sept. 9, 1950) implementing the Defense Production Act of 1950: "The Council of Economic Advisers shall adapt its continuing studies of employment, production and purchasing power needs and objectives so as to furnish guides to the agencies under this Executive Order in promoting balance between defense and civilian needs and in avoiding inflation in a stable and growing economy. In the performance of this function, the Council shall obtain necessary information from the agencies concerned and engage in regular consultation with them."

In the Senate Appropriation hearings for the fiscal year 1952, Mr. Keyserling illustrated the Council's relations with the defense agencies this way:

"First, take Mr. Wilson's organization. Very shortly after he came down I had a talk with him. It was manifest that, with the wide range of responsibilities that he has got, he would need economic servicing. I said to him, 'What is the need of you having an economic staff when you work for the President and the Council is a general economic staff servicing the President? Can't we help you?'"

"And he said 'Yes.' Two things followed from that. I was put on his executive committee where he meets with his top executive mobilization officials, and time and again he has turned to us for the performance of general economic functions in connection with his work." Hearings (cited in note 1), pp. 90-91. The reference is to Mr. C. E. Wilson, Defense Mobilizer from December, 1950 to April, 1951.

any sudden dislocation of the agency's work programs or any "defense expansion" of its staff. By the end, roughly, of the first year after Korea the partial mobilization program was thoroughly institutionalized, and the Council's participation in and influence upon it had declined. By the end of another year it was devoting the bulk of its energies to looking beyond the build-up phase of the program toward the period of economic readjustment which would follow. In its July, 1952 and January, 1953 Economic Reviews it was, as it should have been, the first government agency to give sustained public attention to these "transition" problems.

The end of the Truman phase of the Council's life is a good time for a fresh look at the Council in political-administrative terms. While the present pages suffer from the nearsightedness of an inside vantage point, it is hoped that they may at least contribute raw material for the reappraisal which is needed.

I. THE SCOPE AND CHARACTER OF THE ECONOMIC STAFF FUNCTION

The President, the Council, and the Profession. The Council of Economic Advisers was explicitly constituted as a staff arm to the President. There is no basis for confusion about its reporting responsibility or for the lingering impression that it was supposed somehow to stand "half way between" the President and the Congress.⁸ The persistence of the idea that the Council should be an "economic Supreme Court" for the most part reflects concern over possible conflict between the Council's reporting or staff responsibilities and its responsibilities to its own professional standards of economic analysis. In a sense there is nothing new about this problem of professional integrity. Any professional person in any kind of salaried employment faces it to some degree. However, there are factors which have legitimately highlighted the issue in the case of the Council. The Employment Act marked the first instance where a particular species of knowledge and ability had been given separate agency status within the President's staff.⁹ And more important, economics is a profession in which the boundaries of expertise are not, and probably never will be, clearly drawn. The argument that the Council is likely to soil "economic science" with "politics" often is simply a rationalization for those who dislike the policies of the Administration of which the Council is a part. But the professional integrity question has been seriously raised also by members of the economics profession, and it obviously was in the minds of some members of Congress when a three-man Council was established rather than a single-headed agency. There must, therefore, be a relatively congenial marriage between the Council's professional responsibilities and its reporting—or, as the idea sometimes gets translated, its political—responsibilities to the President, if the agency is to perform a coherent staff function.

⁸ The legislative committees which framed the Act specifically rejected proposals for a joint legislative-executive commission and for something on the model of the independent regulatory commission, reasoning that the new Act should make the constitutional division of powers work more smoothly, not blur it. It should be noted, however, that, as discussed below, there are important questions concerning the relations of the Council as a staff arm of the President with Congress.

⁹ Contrary to the impressions of some, the statute itself does not require that members of the Council be professional economists in the strict sense of the term. The qualifications are that "as a result of . . . training, experience, and attainments," they be "exceptionally qualified to analyze and interpret economic developments, to appraise programs and activities of the government . . . and to formulate and recommend national economic policy. . . ."

The Council can never afford to lose sight of its responsibility—not only to professional standards but also to the President—for competence and integrity in its collection, organization, and interpretation of factual data. There is little use in a staff assistant who tries to make the facts tell the story that he thinks the boss wants to hear. The Council's legislatively prescribed duties, however, carry it beyond the limits of "economic science." Besides doing factual analysis, it must also appraise the desirability of current public programs and recommend new ones, and here "science" must be coupled with normative judgments. If the policy advice which the Council turns out is to constitute useful presidential staff work, the weights which it places on various values obviously must be in general accord with those assigned by the Administration of which it is a part.

Furthermore, even within a given framework of values and objectives, scientific analysis seldom narrows alternative policy courses down to as specific a content as that which the Council often must give to its advice. From a professional viewpoint, then, there is almost always plenty of room for small differences over policy decisions. In the case of wide and important differences stemming from fundamental disagreements over values, or from what the Council sees as outright presidential refusal to accept its basic economic analysis, it seems to us that the course for a staff officer is perfectly clear. His services are no longer useful and his position is untenable. He should resign.

The antiseptic view of the Council which would have it stand wholly aloof from "political" questions overlooks the Council's legal responsibility for policy recommendations, which are inevitably tied up with social values and current strategies. It also ignores the basic duty of any presidential adviser not to let himself get completely confined to the half-world of his specialty. The latter point is amplified in the discussion below.

The Council's Specialization within the Executive Office. Under President Truman's executive organization, the Council had to be careful, as a small agency,¹⁰ to avoid spreading itself too thin. Its size and the level of its position within the executive hierarchy required an effort to sort out the more general or strategic problems from the array into which it might dip. Moreover, limits to its scope of attention were needed to avoid excessive overlap with the other presidential advisers. But such limits could not be allowed to interfere with the Council's readiness as a professional staff to service the President in any respect he felt appropriate. And they could not interfere with the basic responsibility of any policy-concerned segment of the President's office for bringing to all of its work some measure of presidential thinking. In the following paragraphs is set forth our understanding of the Council's scope of attention as it became more or less established within the agency before the end of the Truman regime. It should be emphasized that this is a highly interpretative statement, that in attempting precision it risks becoming too exact, and that it is no more than a personal evaluation.

¹⁰ The Employment Act provides a $345,000 annual appropriations ceiling for Council personnel, including the three Council members. Appropriations, moreover, never have reached this ceiling and on several occasions have fallen substantially short of it.

It is useful to distinguish between the work the agency did on assignment and what it undertook on its own initiative. On the assignment side, the rule was simple. The Council of Economic Advisers served as the President's personal economic consultant. In this capacity, the scope of the Council's interest was whatever projects the President might assign to it because he felt pending decisions would be benefited by professional economic analysis or opinion.¹¹ Similarly, the Council accepted work which, at the President's request or with his consent, other officials of the government referred to his economic staff.¹²

The rule on the scope of the Council's initiative cannot be meaningfully stated simply in terms of the label "economic," but it can be cast in terms of specific policy objectives. In participating in the policy formation process at the presidential level, the Council took the initiative in advancing, and recognized its responsibility for helping to specify and reformulate, two objectives—those of overall economic stability and of overall economic growth.¹³ In the case of other objectives, it accepted the formulations made by those in the Administration primarily concerned with them.

The agency was, of course, vitally concerned with these other objectives and with the programs undertaken in their support insofar as they affected the even expansion of the economy. Among other objectives commonly called "economic," for example, those having to do with income distribution and with the maintenance of our institutional framework have an intimate bearing on growth and stability prospects. This is equally true of many "non-economic" objectives. Under the post-Korean defense program, for instance, a rapid expansion of industrial capacity has supported the need for, and eased the burden of, defense production. On the other hand, our needs for rearming had to be reconciled with the necessity of maintaining reasonable economic stability.

Thus the Council felt that it could not, without some inspection, disregard ¹¹ Under this heading, for example, would fall the technical work for the National Security Council noted above.

¹² For instance, at the request of the State Department or ECA, it frequently assisted in the preparation of U.S. presentations to the UN, NATO, and OEEC and, during the post-Korean period, it undertook various assignments for ODM and ESA. Cf. note 8, above.

¹³ The concern of the Council with optimum economic growth as well as with stability appeared first in the discussion of "long-range program" in the President's first Annual Economic Report (pp. 34 ff.) and in the Council's December, 1947 Annual Report, which focused on the Employment Act's "maximum production" objective. The need for rapid and sustained growth became a dominant theme in the December and January reports bracketing the beginning of 1949, and was consistently emphasized thereafter.

any of the panorama of policy programs spread out at the presidential level. But insofar as it itself acted as a party-in-interest in the policy formation process, it did so in behalf of the growth and stability objectives.

In application, this ground rule with respect to initiative was subject to three significant qualifications, all of which derived from the Council's organizational position within the executive branch. In the first place, the agency of necessity usually had to confine itself to the higher-level and more general decisions, whether these involved pending and possible legislative determinations, or, as was the case to a great extent under the Defense Production Act, major policy problems which arose within the administrative authority of the President.

In the second place, the Council was quicker to concern itself actively with problems bearing upon the stability and growth objectives when they cut across the lines of established executive branch organization.

In the third place, in practicing its policy on initiative, the Council tried more or less consciously to avoid the danger of overly narrow professional specialization within the Executive Office. Some—particularly certain political scientists—have felt that the Council brings undiluted professional economics altogether too close to the President. There is no assurance, they say, that the preoccupations of his economic advisers will adequately reflect the political, diplomatic, and social objectives of the Administration. One answer to this anxiety is that the "narrowness" of economics varies with the economist. Another is that this objection to the Council scarcely gives due recognition to the present intricacy of the economy or to the pervasiveness of the government's economic role. A third answer is that the argument implies too simple and limited a concept of the presidency; it does not give sufficient weight to the variety of specialists and specialized agencies which compose the remainder of the Executive Office.

None of these answers, however, turns aside the substance of the point, which is the basic responsibility of any presidential staff unit—whatever its principle of specialization—for doing what we have called "presidential thinking." Its recommendations to the President must take more account of objectives and values outside its immediate focus of specialized interest than would be appropriate in recommendations originating in the regular operating agencies. All of the work of synthesizing competing and conflicting objectives cannot be loaded onto the White House itself. Subject to White House review, the other Executive Office agencies, including the Council, must share some of this responsibility. In particular, each of the latter needs to strive for the greatest possible teamwork within the Executive Office itself.

In general during the Truman years there was a substantial "interpenetration" among the institutionalized Executive Office agencies—the Budget Bureau, NSC, NSRB, the Council, and, after Korea, ODM. At both agency-head and staff levels there was extensive formal and informal interchange. The arrangement was not ideal; the need for enriching interagency relationships sometimes was obvious; and the desirability of structural reorganization was a subject of recurring speculation. Without intending to dispute the possibility of structural improvement, we would, first, suggest that coordinating the Executive Office coordinators will continue to be a problem more of esprit de corps and intangibles than of mechanical reforms, and, second, venture to say a kind word for the much-maligned "overlap" of the Executive Office agencies during the Truman period. The overlap among the Council, economic staffs in the Bureau of the Budget, and NSRB was much less extensive than is often supposed, and, in the degree to which it existed, often made for a more balanced net appraisal of a problem than if it had been analyzed exclusively within a budgetary, national security, or economic perspective.

II. THE COUNCIL'S OPERATIONS

Advising the President. The Economic Reports of the President, for which, under the Truman Administration, the Council of Economic Advisers supplied the working drafts, and the Council's own accompanying "Economic Reviews"¹⁴ have constituted, semi-annually,¹⁵ the evidence of the agency's work with which the public is most familiar. Also, the Council each month prepared "Economic Indicators,"¹⁶ a convenient summary, in graphic and tabular form, of the more pertinent statistical series on the behavior of the economy as a whole; made quarterly reports to the President containing both factual and policy sections; and (after Korea) submitted a brief factual "Weekly Summary of Economic Developments."

In addition, the agency prepared a number of special memoranda for the President, both at his request and on its own initiative; frequently participated in the drafting of the President's legislative proposals; often prepared supplementary and supporting economic material for the information of Congress as it considered such proposals; and regularly, through the medium of the Legislative Reference Division of the Budget Bureau, reviewed enrolled bills awaiting action by the President, agency reports on bills pending before Congress, and proposed executive orders.

Theoretically a staff involved in its principal's decision-making may, as it were, occupy an anteroom to his office which provides the only means of access to him for business of a particular kind. Such a staff not only communicates with the principal, but for, and often in lieu of, him. Conversely, a policy-advising staff can be sequestered in a cul-de-sac, having direct communication only with the principal, and never, in his behalf, with outsiders. Like most staffs, the Council stood between these two conceptual extremes. At the outset, however, its role as a thinking center was the one which was more glamorized. Under the Employment Act, it was not to administer any legislative programs, and it never has. Rather, a few people were to be relieved from program operations so that, from the vantage of a central perspective, they might consider how all parts of the government's economic program fitted together.

¹⁴ The decision to shorten the President's report and to support it with an extensive analysis and interpretation presented under the Council's own label was made at midyear, 1948.

¹⁵ Midyear Reports similar in form and content to the Annual Reports required by law were issued on the President's initiative from 1947 through 1952.

¹⁶ Published by the Joint Committee on the Economic Report.

But during the Truman years the Council did not become an ivory-tower operation, nor was it ever intended by the Employment Act that it should be withdrawn from the arena of current issues. The Council was required to gather data and ideas from other government agencies instead of undertaking extensive statistical fact-gathering or primary research of its own.¹⁷ Moreover, Congress in effect strongly advised that the agency make itself a channel through which important private economic groups could express their views on national economic policy questions.¹⁸ Quite as important as the notion of the Council as a thinking center, therefore, has been its role as a presidential communications center both within the government and between the government and the private economy.

Interchange with Other Federal Agencies. In its contact with other federal agencies, the Council always has been concerned initially with getting a systematic picture and an integrated interpretation of current economic facts. In this effort it helped during the Truman Administration to develop considerable agreement throughout the executive branch as to what the current situation in fact was, thus reducing the differences over policy which subsequently arose. The practice of preparing the Annual and Midyear Economic Reviews through a process of interagency cross-clearance in advance of presidential decisions on policy recommendations proved particularly useful in this regard.

In seeking agreement about what the facts were, the Council shared the related responsibility of evaluating the government's fact-gathering and -processing resources. If federal programs are to grow out of meaningful factual research and analysis, it is essential that statistical agencies select and process data which policy-makers need and which can be joined together. In its first years the Council, working closely with the Budget Bureau's Statistical Standards Division,¹⁹ contributed to, or helped to stimulate, several significant improvements in federal statistics.²⁰

¹⁷ Sec. 4(d)(2).

¹⁸ See Sec. 4(d)(1) of the Employment Act, dealing with advisory committees.

¹⁹ Now the Office of Statistical Standards.

²⁰ The Council was partly instrumental in the development of data showing total physical production and the publication of a "deflated gross national product" series by the Department of Commerce; early release of quarterly national income estimates; development of the "cash balance" form of federal budget presentation; presentation of more meaningful data on changes in income distribution than was previously easily available; use of "input-output" analysis for testing the feasibility and implications of various programs; and the continuing improvement of the "Nation's Economic Budget." The last provides a consolidated national account summarizing receipts and expenditures of "Consumers," "Business," "Government," and of U. S. nationals in international transactions. For a full discussion of this approach see Gerhard Colm, "Experiences in the Use of Social Accounting in the United States," Income and Wealth, Series I, Appendix by Mary Smelker (Cambridge, 1951), pp. 75-111. Moreover, the appendixes of the semi-annual Reviews have presented a relatively concise, yet detailed, overall statistical picture.

The core of the Council's operation under President Truman was its participation in executive policy coordination. The agency's role in this connection, effectuated by its closeness to the President, was partly informal and catalytic. Through daily, often unofficial, and usually oral contact with other agencies, members and staff were kept alerted not only to policy views firmly adopted by the heads of the operating agencies but also to many nascent in their lower echelons. Thus the Council frequently could anticipate interagency disagreements and either suggest compromises or be prepared to take sides.

No formal procedure for policy integration would accomplish much if it were not quickened by such a continuing flow of informal communications. But conversely, this informal interchange would have had little impetus or sense of direction if the Council had not been an integral part of the policy coordination machinery set up by the Employment Act. There is no more erroneous interpretation of the functioning of that machinery during the Truman Administration than the assumption that its principal moving part, the President's Economic Report, started in the Council, where the first draft was prepared, and, after some editing and revision in the White House, was dispatched forthwith to Congress. It would be as unrealistic to assume that a professional stage production starts with the dress rehearsal. Actually the published Reports, and the Council's Reviews which backed them up, were, in large measure, the end-products of an elaborate and laborious synthesizing process which embraced policy thinking throughout the executive branch.

The theory—and, increasingly, the practice—during the Truman Administration was that the procedure of presidential economic policy formulation carried on through the medium of the Council should parallel the process of budget preparation which is conducted through the medium of the Budget Bureau. The first drafts of the Economic Reports' policy sections, while done within the Council, were written out of close familiarity with the views of other agencies. The latter were made explicit in the replies of agency heads to calls from the President for recommendations concerning his forthcoming Economic Reports and the State of the Union Messages.²¹ Each full round of report drafts was circulated for the comments of other agencies, and the yields usually were heavy. Disagreements emerged. Some of these were threshed out in staff committee meetings with representatives of the agencies. Others were taken up by the Council members in direct negotiation with agency heads; some were carried into the Cabinet meeting devoted to each Report shortly before it was "locked up"; and a few ultimately had to be decided unilaterally by the President. It was only in cases of exceptional conflict that the Council, even in its own Reviews, included policy recommendations which did not in large measure grow out of interagency discussion.

It was precisely the Council's developing status as a key part of the formal machinery for formulating current programs that most clearly distinguished it, as a planning instrument, from the National Resources Planning Board.²² The extent of the agency's future usefulness depends heavily on further development and acceptance in this regard.²³

²¹ In addition to these calls in connection with the Annual Reports, first suggested by the Council, in 1951 and 1952 more restricted calls were issued in connection with the Mid-year Economic Reports.

Interchange with Groups outside the Federal Government. The Truman Council members, along with those staff members more directly concerned, regularly met at least semi-annually with each of six advisory committees—those for Industry, Agriculture, and Consumers, and one each for the AF of L, the CIO, and the Railroad Brotherhoods—and in the last year of the Administration an advisory committee representing organizations of state and local government officials was inaugurated. These meetings—informal, off-the-record affairs centering around, but not constrained by, jointly prepared agenda—provided the Council with reactions to previous reports and information and with opinion on current and prospective problems. Between meetings both members and staff actively sought, as far as time allowed, to maintain an open-door policy on consultation with private group representatives.

In its contacts with private groups the Council not only listened but did some talking of its own, serving in some measure as an interpreter of the government's economic program. Its attention to this aspect of its operation was underscored by its substantive analysis, which emphasized the need for consistency between public and private economic policies if the goals of maximum stability and optimum growth were to be readily attained. The President encouraged efforts to make better general economic information available to private economic decision-makers and to urge upon them a more alert concern for the needs of the whole economy and for their own longer-range interests.

Starting in 1949, the Council experimented considerably with a program of regional economic studies. This got under way with the sponsorship of a study of "The Impact of Federal Policies on the Economy of the South," prepared by arrangement with the National Planning Association.²⁴ It was followed by similar studies of the New England²⁵ and Southwest²⁶ regions, both organized

²² For an analysis of the consequences of the latter's aloofness, see John D. Millett, The Process and Organization of Government Planning (New York, 1947).

²³ It might be remarked that the kind of group-thinking process just sketched—which process, of course, has been the essence of the Council's operation, internally as well as externally, and out of "report seasons" as well as during them—is displeasing to some scholars who have a nose for the unadulterated atmosphere of "pure" independent research. They find it unhappily cumbersome in its methods, insufficiently thorough in its analysis, and murky in its results. For remarks in this vein directly related to the Council, see M. Bronfenbrenner, "Postwar Political Economy; the President's Reports," Journal of Political Economy, Vol. 56, pp. 373-91 (Oct., 1948). Certainly the institutional mind is costly in time and effort and usually, as it turns out, involves some lost motion. And certainly it should strive for maximum clarity in its utterances. But its functioning does not bear close analogy to academic research; rather, in the context discussed here, it is one of the essential processes for organizing authoritative agreement in a polity where no one is generally credited with omniscience.

²⁴ Published through the cooperation of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report as Economy of the South (Washington, D. C.: Government Printing Office, 1949).

²⁵ See The New England Economy (Washington, D. C.: Government Printing Office, 1951).

²⁶ The Southwest Economy (Washington, D. C.: Government Printing Office, 1952).

directly by the Council. The New England and the Southwest committees—in each case composed of economists drawn from academic staffs and the Federal Reserve Bank of the region—were given a maximum scope and independence. Both undertook extensive research programs, sounding out the views of all major economic interest groups and the government agencies in the region.

The Council was anxious not only to sponsor similar studies in other parts of the country, but also to find a means of sustaining the contacts with regional economists and other groups which the original projects had produced. Without in any sense intending the development of an elaborate field operation, it recognized the value, to an agency preoccupied so much of the time with aggregate and global economic problems, of the eyes and ears and local perspectives which this arrangement would afford.

Relations with Congress. Probably no question involving the Council has raised as general an interest among students of government as that of its relations to Congress. This matter was a point of dissension within the original Council and was an issue in the resignation of Chairman Nourse late in 1949.

Disagreement over the Council's proper relations with the Congress has stemmed partly from the false but, as we have already noted, persisting idea that it was to behave as some kind of economic Supreme Court equidistant between the legislative and executive branches. It has stemmed partly from uneasiness about the Council's professional integrity when cast in the role, before congressional committees, of oral advocates of the President's economic policy. Essentially, however, the problem of oral advocacy is no different from that of written advocacy, already considered.

In part, objections to the Council's appearing before the congressional committees and otherwise maintaining close relations with the Congress reflect the rather more substantial argument that staff advisers close to the President should seek anonymity. There would be much to be said for this view if the Council's only intended function were in fact that of advising the President privately. Certainly this mode of operation would have its compensations for the Council members. The trouble with it is that in writing the Employment Act, Congress clearly did not intend the Council to remain anonymous. This is borne out not only by the testimony of legislators who were most active in framing the Act but also by the views of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report.²⁷ Congress' reasons for this course were substantial.

²⁷ The first airing of this issue appeared in an article by Edwin G. Nourse and Bertram M. Gross, "The Role of the Council of Economic Advisers," this REVIEW, Vol. 42, pp. 283-95 (April, 1948). The case against Council participation in congressional hearings was developed at greater length by Edwin G. Nourse in "Why Dr. Nourse Broke with the President," Collier's, February 18, 1950, and The 1950's Come First (New York, 1951). The case for Council participation in congressional hearings has been stated by members of Congress who contributed to the enactment of the legislation under which the Council was established and by others serving on the Joint Committee on the Economic Report. For example, see the views of Senator Ralph Flanders, "Administering the Employment Act," Public Administration Review, Vol. 7, pp. 223-24 (Autumn, 1947), and of Senator

The first was the controversial status of economics as a discipline. In this situation, it was and is healthy, and educationally desirable, for the research methods and analysis of the President's economic advisers to be open to congressional cross-questioning. Contrary to the frequent impression, the practice proved to be more of a help than a hindrance to the work of the Truman Council. One of the most exacting tests to which executive officials can be subjected is careful probing by seasoned legislators of the factual basis underlying their recommendations.²⁸

In the second place and more important: just as a close working relationship with Congress—and more particularly, with the Joint Committee—can assist the Council, so also it helps the Congress in framing its legislative program. Like the President, Congress wants, in the way of analysis of current facts and of the probable economic effects of policies recommended by the President, an interpretation which goes beyond the printed page. It receives this service from administrative officials concerned with particular parts of the President's program; it would seem to be entitled even more to the assistance of an agency which, of all the executive agencies, is supposed to have the best chance of maintaining a balanced and comprehensive view of the program as a whole. With the exception of the first chairman, all Truman appointees to the Council seem to have felt that it would be incongruous for the Council, after, it might be said, having talked with everyone else, to refuse to talk directly with those who were making the final policy decisions which so much concerned it.

The Council's relations with the Joint Committee through 1952 included appearances at both executive and public sessions, some informal cooperation on research between Committee and Council staffs, and, as already noted, collaboration in supplying "Economic Indicators" to legislators and to key personnel in the executive branch. Mainly because of the press of other business, however, the Committee-Council relationship was never strengthened, even after Mr. Nourse's departure, as much as the other Council members thought desirable.

III. INTERNAL ORGANIZATION

The theory of the general economic staff function embodied in the Employment Act cannot come to much unless it is supported by effective organization

James E. Murray, Washington Post, November 5, 1949. The Joint Committee, in the majority report of June, 1950, dealing with the President's January, 1950 Economic Report, also expressed itself on the subject: "Full and free discussion of economic problems with those who have the statutory responsibility to advise the President on economic policy is essential to a complete understanding of the President's Economic Report by the committee and; therefore, to the committee's fulfillment of its responsibilities under the Employment Act." (81st Cong., 2d sess., Report No. 1843, p. 21.) For a more general discussion see Bertram M. Gross, The Legislative Struggle (New York, 1953), pp. 295-96.

²⁸ If the committees' investigative purposes and methods are constructive. The Council's salutary experience in this respect was due in large measure to the excellent manner in which the Joint Committee on the Economic Report conducted its hearings.

and procedure within the Council. There is space only for some selected comments on the experience of the Truman years in this regard.

The Three-Man Council. We shall not undertake here to discuss the current ill-repute of the multi-headed organizational form among American students of administration. But we do question the wisdom of automatically condemning it, as applied to the Council, on doctrinaire grounds. Viewed in the light of the agency's particular circumstances, the issue is a close one.

In economics it still is true that "in a multitude of counsellors, there is safety . . .," and it was this view which led the House conferees on the Employment Act to insist upon the three-man form. Certainly it is likely that, leaving personalities and other random factors aside, the confidence of the public, the Congress, and possibly the President is greater in the joint economic advice of three reputable advisers than it would be in that of any one of them. Thus, other things being equal, the Council form has a clear public relations advantage. Moreover, it is certainly true that during the Truman years debate and compromise among the members often resulted in a better balanced and more reliable product.

It is a rather superficial error, however, to assume that the issue between a single head and a Council of three actually involves a choice between one "counsellor" and several. The official utterances of any agency head, no matter how many human craniums are embraced in that term, are ordinarily, if the agency is functioning with a modicum of efficiency, the work of many minds. "Singleheadedness" obviously does not limit an agency's mental resources nor, in the case of an economic advisory agency, confine it to lone-wolf analysis instead of collective analysis. The real issue between the one-headed and three-headed form, then, is simply between alternative ways of organizing the collective thinking so that it can result in decisions, conclusions, or "positions."

Viewed in this light, a committee of peers cannot on the basis of the Truman Council's experience be judged an exceptionally efficient device for producing decisions in the field of economic diagnosis and policy analysis. Following what seems to be the only feasible course for presidential advisers endowed by law with a considerable public role of their own, the Council during the Truman Administration habitually refrained from speaking publicly and officially with a divided voice.²⁹ Consequently, the development of agreement within the Council frequently was a tortuous process. Deadlines could not be met with the same ease with which a single executive can always, if the calendar requires, decide a dispute within his staff. Usually they were met, but often only at the expense of extra working hours and distracting tactical maneuvering within the Council. Occasionally, when an agreement could not be reached in time, the result was public silence on a significant policy question. More frequently the result was a greater degree of net cautiousness in appraising the economic outlook and, in particular, in pursuing analysis into the long-run future than probably would have characterized the work of all or most of the Council members individually.

²⁹ A partial exception to this policy was made for the first time in the January, 1952 Annual Economic Review with the inclusion of a short separate statement by Mr. John D. Clark on monetary and credit policy. In their final Review (January, 1953) the Truman Council members soloed rather more freely, with separate statements by both Messrs. Clark and Keyserling, Clark's being in outright disagreement with a considerable portion of the Review, Keyserling's only amplifying or paralleling one aspect of it. In no case, it should be noted, did the policy of public unanimity conflict with the freedom of members to vary the emphasis of their own speeches, articles, or other individual public statements.

This is a substantial indictment. But before it is taken as conclusive, an additional consideration is in order. It can be argued that most of these difficulties, while unfortunate in themselves, simply reflected the basic complexity of the policy integration problem which had to be threshed out one place or another, and as much as possible among peers—i.e., agency heads—short of the President. Much of the threshing-out process which the committee form of organization forced the Council to do within its own confines, particularly during the preparation of the Economic Reports and Reviews, may have saved the White House staff, and ultimately the President, from having to engage more extensively than they did in the far more ponderous arbitration of differences among Cabinet members and other agency heads. This is a sound argument, of course, only to the extent that the differing views of the three Council members approximated important differences of opinion elsewhere within the executive branch. Frequently, but not always, this was the case.

The deliberate pace which the three-member form forced upon official Council decision-making needs also to be seen in the perspective of the other staff services at the President's command. Since he was already equipped, in the White House and the Budget Bureau, with specialists in the enormous volume of day-to-day tactical decision-making the presidency involves, the justification may be all the stronger for staff work dedicated to the second look and the broader and more reflective view.³⁰

The effects of the multi-headed form on topside-staff relationships within the agency were also mixed. The council form permitted a useful division of labor among the members, with each assuming primary responsibility for working with the staff in the fields of his greatest professional interest and competence—as far as the respective backgrounds of the members allowed. This facilitated extensive participation by Council members in the early phases of work on any project, and, by intermingling Council and staff work, increased the extensiveness of staff members' topside contacts. But also, by inviting the doctrine that "each Council member is his own economist," it probably made for less final reliance on the staff than would have been necessary in the case of a single adviser.

³⁰ This last point gains cogency from the fact that Council members (and staff members as well) did spend a considerable part of their time mixing as individuals in the rough and tumble of daily presidential business. By means of this quasi-explicit distinction between their individual and collective roles, the members of the Council sought a detour around Millett's 1947 judgment that two members of the Council would have to subordinate themselves to the third if the new board were not to become excessively remote from the President and his other advisers. See Millett's The Process and Organization of Government Planning (cited in note 22), pp. 167-68.

The basic condition which, when coupled with a reasonably clear yet flexible delineation of staff assignments, has kept the multi-headed form workable within the Council is simply the agency's small size. In an organization involving less than 20 professionals, where these share close working interests and readily talk each other's language, the chain of command can be relatively looser, shorter, and less formal than would be necessary in a larger, more heterogeneous organization.

Staff Organization. In terms of administrative architecture, the Council staff throughout the Truman Administration was a "short, wide" organization with a minimum emphasis on hierarchy. The bulk of the professional staff was made up of economists of relatively high civil service grade who were individually responsible directly to the Council for such specialized subject-matter areas as monetary and credit problems and policy, wage and manpower problems, and international economic problems, and who at the same time were thought to have a general competence in economics and something of a "feel" for public policy problems. In a few instances these senior staff members had assistants drawn from the middle range of the professional economist civil service brackets. Professional staff members, besides analyzing developments and prospects in their individual areas, served on a set of substantive staff committees (for example, one having to do with price and wage relationships and policy, and another concerned with making projections of national income and product components) which cut across the individual subject-matter areas and sometimes included participants from other departments and agencies.

These substantive staff committees, particularly because staff members were likely to serve on more than one of them, facilitated the integration of work within the agency as a whole. This was further implemented by periodic meetings of the full Council and staff. In addition, the integration of the agency's product was facilitated by a reports or editorial committee, which was responsible for the editorial coordination of the agency's regular reports at the staff level and, in the case of the last two semi-annual reviews, for first-drafting most of the manuscript on the basis of staff memoranda concerning developments and problems in the various subject-matter fields; a statistical unit, which helped to service the needs of Council and staff for statistical compilations and analysis, and, in particular, supplied extensive statistical data for the reports; an administrative officer (or, at an earlier stage, executive secretary); and staff members who served as personal assistants to individual Council members.

This somewhat rambling and highly flexible administrative pattern seemed to serve the needs of the Council with considerable success; here again the small size of the staff had an important qualitative bearing. By facilitating continuing and highly informal communications within the staff and by forcing a multiplicity of roles on staff members, it permitted an organization conducive to the extensive and highly interrelated coverage of economic problems which the agency's mission demanded, and at the same time avoided cumbersomeness.

CONCLUSION

It perhaps goes without saying that we think the agency should be continued, and be strengthened, not weakened. As for what we think should not happen, it should not retreat into the half-world of professional isolation. It should not be dissociated from its intricate network of relations with the President, with other executive officials, and with the leaders of key private organizations. There should be no muddying of its clear reporting responsibility to the President, and no diminution of the Council's emphasis upon detailed analysis of current economic facts or of its attention to the adequacy of available statistics. The agency should not mushroom into a considerably larger organization.

There are a number of things we do hope to see. The Council's communications-center and thinking-center sides should grow in balance. There is need for greater precision in the policy formulation procedures which channel through the agency. In particular, the Council's process for formulating long-range goals for the American economy should achieve fuller participation by business, agricultural, labor, consumer, and professional economic groups and by other government agencies, and the process should become more specific in its results. The Council's attention to the inseparable interrelationships between foreign policy and the course of the domestic economy should be reinforced, and its emphasis on the role of state and local governments in domestic policy increased. The regional study program might well be extended to cover a few more areas and should focus attention on the institutional framework of regional planning. Efforts should be made to develop concepts bridging the present gap between "economic planning" and "physical planning." Resources permitting, we favor more orientation toward theoretical analysis in the twilight zones between economics and the other social disciplines, seeking to improve the former's usefulness as a policy tool. We should like to think that at least annually the Council could bring forth an intensive treatment along monographic lines of a key economic problem or program. To do all of these things the agency would need a slightly larger budget and a few more people.

So far as organization matters go, we are not, in our own minds, wedded to any of the internal patterns and procedures of the Council during its first six years. Experimentation should continue, but cautiously and with an understanding that the economic staff function could easily be weighed down with too much formal administrative structure. Whether strengthening of the chairman's status and administrative authority will enable the Council to operate as satisfactorily as a single adviser is, in our minds, an open question.

As for what will actually happen, we confine ourselves to the prophecy that the economic staff function will, in some form, survive. Those who, near the Council's outset, guessed that it would go the way of the National Resources Planning Board³¹ probably will be proven wrong.

³¹ Cf. R. G. Tugwell's highly stimulating discussion of central planning, "The Utility of the Future in the Present," Public Administration Review, Vol. 8, pp. 57-59 (Winter, 1948). On the ground that "any planning tied exclusively to the Chief Executive will never become central planning in any defensible definition of the term," he concludes that the Council does not "possess very great survival value," that it is "vulnerable to its natural enemies and possesses no strength of its own," and that "when this experiment is finally liquidated, we . . . are not likely to be much further advanced in the development of central planning." Committed to the thoroughly monistic policy-forming and -executing process he finds in Britain, his argument is not with the Council as such but with the whole separation of powers concept. Despite its brilliance, we do not find in his exposition any adequate refutation of the Employment Act's underlying thesis—namely, that by fortifying what he happily calls "agencies of conjuncture" in both the executive and the legislature, and by strengthening the connecting rods between them, it is possible to develop workable programming machinery within our present constitutional framework. Nor in all Tugwell's castigation of things as they are here and idealization of things as he sees them in Britain do we find any hints of a practicable program of constitutional reform for this country.

THE FEDERAL BUREAUCRACY AND THE CHANGE OF ADMINISTRATION*

HERMAN MILES SOMERS

Haverford College

The period starting November 5, 1952 has been called "The Time of the Jitters" for the middle and upper levels of the federal bureaucracy. Political change is usually disruptive and always accompanied by uncertainty and insecurity. Intellectual acceptance of this truism does not insulate one from the effects any more than death and taxes, for all their recognized inevitability, cease to be sources of distress.

There were many reasons to anticipate that the 1952 election might result in a greater than usual degree of change, or at least of uncertainty. In many ways there were no real American precedents for the situation. The period of executive control by the outgoing party had been characterized by the unusual duration of 20 years, by highly controversial political policy, and by profound social change. This was the first change of administration under conditions of modern Big Government—the first since the American government found itself with accepted broad welfare and economic responsibility on the domestic scene and with major power responsibilities in a divided and warring world. Since the last full change, the size of the federal civil service had increased over 400 per cent, governmental expenditures over 16 fold. This was also to be the first full change of administration to show the effects of the 20th Amendment.

The new Administration not only had a mandate for extensive policy changes but was also clearly committed to do "something" about the number and kind of federal employees although—as with election issues generally—what and how much were necessarily vague. Certainly "corruption" and "throw the rascals out" were major campaign themes. Housecleaning was a dominant note and reorganization and reduction of agencies and personnel were to be the big brooms.

It would be cavalier to attribute all of this to cynical compliance with the old campaign principle, "nothing succeeds like excess." There is ample evidence that Candidate and President-elect Eisenhower and many of his leading supporters genuinely believed that the executive branch had become contaminated with grafters, incompetents, political hacks, "socialistic thinkers," and even a not inconsiderable number of disloyal persons, and that a wholesale substitution of honest men with administrative ability would solve most of our problems. The administrative talent would have to be found in men with a different social orientation than that which presumably had dominated the executive branch during the previous two decades. If the polls are to be believed, a large portion of the general public shared this view.

* This paper was delivered at the forty-ninth annual meeting of the American Political Science Association, September 11, 1953. Minor revisions have been made to reflect the situation at the beginning of the Administration's second year.

Unlike the typical European bureaucrat, nine out of ten U. S. civil servants, it is safe to say, had never before experienced a complete change of administration. For them this was clearly a time of bafflement and restiveness.

In view of this background, it is surprising that the actual effects of the change of administration on the bureaucracy did not turn out to be more drastic than they were. The returns are not all in and it is perhaps too early for firm conclusions. Although specific findings must be tentative, it is useful to appraise the general trends on the basis of such evidence as is available. My necessarily undocumented sources are primarily extensive interviews with present and former bureaucrats, political officers new and old, members of Congress, and newspapermen. From a mass of contradictory evidence and opinion—much of it highly flavored with feeling at this juncture—I have attempted to distil what appears most reliable and significant. I have restricted myself to four aspects of the problem: (1) organizational changes, (2) presidential leadership, (3) personnel actions, and (4) the political and moral climate.

I

It seems clear that Mr. Eisenhower was convinced, as he reiterated throughout the campaign, that his was a mission to bring moral regeneration and administrative efficiency to the government. In the days before Inauguration and immediately thereafter, his interest and energies appear to have been directed largely to these phases of his task. Policy issues played a subordinate role; in fact, there is evidence that he regarded policy as the responsibility of the legislative branch of the government, and as only an ancillary function of the presidency.

Not many persons in or out of the government seemed aware of the potential significance of the first full trial of the 20th Amendment, commonly regarded as solely a device to end the practice of lame duck congressional sessions. Inasmuch as it became part of the Constitution after the 1933 Inauguration, it had never been tested under conditions of complete party change. In previous changeovers the new President had four months between election and taking office; and he and his new administrators had about nine months to organize themselves, get acquainted with their jobs and their staffs, and consider budget and policy recommendations before the Congress assembled in Washington (except when the President himself decided to call a special session).

On this occasion, however, the President would take office only eleven weeks after election. He and his department heads would face immediately a fully organized Congress, already in session and prepared to ask for executive testimony at hearings the next morning if in the mood. The budget message, the economic report, and perhaps one State of the Union message would already be before Congress, and the new administrators would be expected to come forward in a short time with alternative proposals. It has been contended that the "double budget" process (familiar in both state and local governments) is helpful not merely because it removes the necessity of having a new administration operate for 16 months under an opposition budget but also because budget preparation is the most rapid, efficient, and compelling way for a new agency head to become acquainted with both the personnel and the problems of his agency. There is considerable evidence that this time, at least, it did not work out that way. There is little doubt that the paramount demands of members of Congress and congressional committees impeded the attempts of the new top executives to become acquainted with their responsibilities and personnel in reasonable time and under favorable conditions.

It may have been awareness of these new time pressures that led the new Administration to take quick action to expedite its task. In fact, as early as June, 1952, despite the humiliation of similar activities in 1948, Mr. Brownell asked McKinsey & Co. to make a survey of the responsibilities and requirements of the policy positions in the executive branch. It is also likely that a substantial portion of the top executive level may have been decided upon even before the elections; less than two weeks thereafter the President-elect announced the names of six Cabinet choices and had apparently selected his Director of the Budget. Before the month was concluded he had announced all Cabinet and several other key appointments.

One week after the election, at the invitation of President Truman, the representative of the President-elect, Joseph Dodge, later to be named Director of the Budget, was in the Executive Office in Washington closely observing every step in the preparation of the forthcoming budget. Mr. Lodge, later to be named head of the U. S. delegation to the United Nations, was present with a similar but less tangible assignment in connection with foreign policy and military affairs. Less than two weeks after the election the President and the President-elect held conferences in the White House, joined by key Cabinet officers, at which time there was turned over to Mr. Eisenhower three volumes of briefing papers from the National Security Council.

At the departmental level advance collaboration between the outgoing organization and the prospective newcomers was most conspicuous in the Treasury Department, where the new top team was hard at work from November on. In general, where such collaboration took place it appears to have been reflected in later happier relations between the new agency heads and the old bureaucracy, especially in Budget and in Treasury, but it is of course impossible to know how much to attribute to this and how much to other favorable factors.

At the end of November, the President-elect announced the formation of a three-man committee, which was given official status immediately after he assumed office as The President's Advisory Committee on Government Organization. This committee, composed of Milton Eisenhower, Arthur Flemming, and Nelson Rockefeller, worked quietly with a small staff and within a few months presented 21 studies. Many of its recommendations have been reflected in subsequent reorganizations. The fact that these studies were unpublicized personal submissions to the President seems to have improved both their quality and their usefulness.

Most close observers are agreed that some organizational improvement has taken place at the White House level. It appears in general to be a tidier affair, with considerable advantage having been taken of the large number of studies which have been made of the Executive Office in recent years. The White House staff was a reasonably well integrated group before it arrived in Washington, for it had been meeting regularly at the Commodore Hotel in New York. An earnest attempt has been made to assign staff members clearly delineated functions. The Administration is experimenting with a plan widely discussed among political scientists for several years—establishment of a relatively informal chief of staff for the White House office, a post now designated Assistant to the President and occupied by Sherman Adams. While Governor Adams has been subjected to much criticism from members of Congress and others who have felt unnecessarily blocked off from the President or have been disappointed by what they considered a slow response to their demands, he appears to be popular and appreciated within the staff and by the President. The contrasting views are simply opposite faces of the same coin. Adams has assumed a role not unfamiliar to intimate presidential aides, that of whipping boy for the President, somewhat reminiscent of the William Loeb role in Theodore Roosevelt's Administration with the then familiar newspaper headline, "Loeb Takes the Blame."

Other reforms have been made at the highest administrative echelon which have long had strong support in scholarly literature, although it is not clear that they will survive. The oft-repeated recommendation that the Council of Economic Advisers be replaced by a single economic adviser to the President has been substantially acted upon through Reorganization Plan No. 9, which, while retaining the three-member arrangement, vests all administrative functions of the Council in its chairman. However, the previous confusion may recur since other economic advisers have sprung up on the White House staff—Dr. Gabriel Hauge, one of the administrative assistants, and Mr. Williams, Undersecretary of Commerce, who was transferred to the White House to act as a vehicle for "grass roots" reporting of economic conditions throughout the country. A new Advisory Board on Economic Growth and Stability has been established as a coordinating device. This may reflect the sensitivity of the President regarding the cause of the downfall of his last Republican predecessor. He has told small groups that there may be need of an equivalent of the National Security Council to contend with the internal threat of depression.

A long felt need to clarify the respective roles of the National Security Resources Board and the Office of Defense Mobilization was resolved last April when the President sent Reorganization Plan No. 3 to Congress and established ODM as the permanent defense mobilization agency and abolished NSRB. The specious distinction between long-range and short-range planning was eliminated, and an attempt was made to bring planning and operations into somewhat more intimate contact by giving ODM some direct economic responsibilities, such as control of the stockpile of critical materials. Whether, however, there are any essential distinctions which will shield the present ODM from the causes of the demise of NSRB remains an open question.

An important step in general conformity with recommendations of the Hoover Commission and other study groups was the expansion of the responsibilities of the chairman of the Civil Service Commission who, by executive order, has been designated the President's adviser and assistant for all personnel actions except presidential appointments. At the same time, the Liaison Office for Personnel Management, in the White House Office since 1939 and not conspicuously successful, was abolished. The President underscored the importance he attached to personnel actions by asking Commissioner Young to attend all Cabinet meetings and he, like the Director of the Budget, has become a de facto member of the Cabinet.

Some who have observed this phenomenon from close quarters have questioned whether those in a staff and advisory relationship to the President, like his budget and personnel officers, are not really handicapped for the most effective exercise of their functions by participating in Cabinet meetings at which decisions are now frequently made. The question is whether they are not thereby disarmed from rendering to the President the kind of candid advice which can be given to him personally but not in front of Cabinet officials.

Interestingly, some of the most articulate spokesmen for the principle of giving the President more direct control over the personnel machinery of the government seem to have had their convictions shaken by a change in administration. Some are now complaining that if the civil service administrator becomes a part of the President's political team it tends to take away from the civil service the kind of job protection which they feel is one of the Civil Service Commission's primary responsibilities. The role and behavior of the Commission has, of course, become the bone of contention one might expect in a changeover period. But there is virtually no disagreement that the recent organizational shakeup of the Commission's staff was long overdue and salutary.

Another organizational anomaly was removed when the office of Director for Mutual Security was removed from the Executive Office of the President, an arrangement which had previously made one man a presidential staff coordinating officer as well as director of one of the operating agencies he was to coordinate—the Mutual Security Agency. This might have been expected to please those who felt that if this type of dual role was to be permitted at all, it should be vested in the Secretary of State. Since, however, reactions to organizational arrangements are always colored by attitudes towards the immediate incumbents, some of those persons now find themselves unenthusiastic about the organizational improvement because they are unenthusiastic about the Secretary of State.

Especially interesting is the President's attempt to make use of the Cabinet as a collegial body. He has experimented with collective decision-making, and has made active use of Cabinet committees. Cabinet level committees, for example the Defense Mobilization Board, are now often attended by Cabinet members themselves rather than by fourth and fifth level subordinates. The revitalization of the Cabinet as a body is, of course, standard practice for the first few months of a new President—President Truman's brief encounter with this practice will be remembered—and there is a widespread feeling, particularly among those who disapprove of the technique, that it will go into discard when, as they put it, the President understands that the country needs a President rather than a chairman of a board of directors.

Some of the reasons given for the added role of the collective Cabinet are of special interest. It is explained that when the agency heads first arrived they brought with them a profound distrust of the inherited bureaucracy. A frequent complaint was "I don't know whom I can trust." This severance of the top executives from the more experienced personnel in government threw the former into greater mutual dependence and caused a degree of discussion of departmental problems within the Cabinet which was quite unusual. In addition to the centripetal force of what one official called the feeling of living among "unfriendly natives," there was the previously mentioned role of the 20th Amendment which caused the new officials to learn rather abruptly and under difficult circumstances that Congress was like no board of directors or stockholders they had ever known in industry; the consternation and surprises of that experience also threw them closer together. But perhaps most important is the fact that, under President Eisenhower's methods, basic decisions are actually taken at Cabinet sessions and are likely to be made by the group. In some quarters this is regarded merely as an early experimental stage which will not endure for the same institutional reasons that have forced other presidents to drop such practices. Others feel confident that it will continue since the President, given his personality and working habits of many years, knows no other way to operate. However that may be, there is little doubt that the repetitious newspaper talk about the spirit of the "team" has thus far contained considerable reality.

The Cabinet committee embodied in the National Security Council has at last come to life and is an effective central war cabinet, proving a vitalizing and coordinating force. This is attributed primarily to the active role of the President himself. Great credit is given also to the energy and skill of Robert Cutler, the President's liaison man on NSC matters. Some of the success of the Council is no doubt due to the negotiating talents of the Vice-President, who has been given an administrative role in this as well as other fields not paralleled by any previous Vice-President. Mr. Nixon presides over NSC meetings in the absence of the President (in the previous Administration it had been the Secretary of State), just as he presides over the Cabinet in similar circumstances. He is also informally the head of the President's liaison staff with Congress. It should be especially instructive for political scientists to observe closely in the ensuing months the development of this experiment with a new role for the Vice-President.

I will not attempt to review administrative developments in the individual departments, except to say that no accurate generalization can be made. The experience, and the reaction to that experience, has varied from very good to very bad. By and large, with highly articulate exceptions, civil servants seem to have accepted the reality that President Eisenhower could not have appointed the kind of Cabinet which a successful Democratic candidate might have, that inexperience was an inescapable characteristic of the Cabinet of a party which had been out of power for 20 years (though there seemed to be no escaping the contemptuous view of the oldtimer for the neophyte, even if the newcomer was his boss), and that it would be required to have heavy business representation. The emergence of a Cabinet (as well as sub-cabinet) largely characterized by lack of direct acquaintance with the federal government reflects some special aspects of our government structure for which the price is often heavy. Nevertheless, the past generalizations common a few months ago are beginning to disappear in the face of the emerging facts. One of the businessmen inexperienced in government, Mr. Humphrey, has proved the most apt learner and has generated real respect internally and externally, even among those who do not share his policy views. On the other hand, one of the ex-governors, Mr. McKay, has had more than his share of difficulty. Thus, department heads are now being evaluated individually on their merits, rather than stereotyped. The overall verdict appears to be that, making allowance for the probably inescapable predominance of the novice, it is a group no worse than most of the Cabinets of the previous two decades and perhaps better than some.

A brief word is in order on the three largest reorganization moves at the department level. The first was the creation of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, a change previously urged by the Truman Administration. It is too early to say whether this reorganization will make any fundamental difference. For a time, the conspicuous fact was the great difficulty Secretary Hobby was having in staffing some of the top posts in her department, a difficulty some other agencies appeared to share in lesser degree. The reorganization (Plan No. 7) which took from the State Department its so-called "operating" functions was generally unpopular among professional students of public administration. It was, however, a move which the Secretary of State desired and it followed the recommendations made by The President's Advisory Committee on Government Organization (the Rockefeller Committee). The important reorganization in the Department of Defense (Plan No. 6) will be argued about for some time, but clearly it was an enterprising attempt to move in the direction of increasing civilian authority within the department, an achievement which eluded Mr. Wilson's very able predecessors. It remains to be seen whether he can succeed, but it is clear that he is prepared to put up a hard fight for control.

II

On the whole, it would appear that the broad lines of administrative action have been thoughtful and sound. Nevertheless, there has been a dramatic net decline in the role and leadership of the executive which has had a stunning effect on the bureaucracy. Civil servants of the past generation were bred in the prideful environment of executive leadership. Theirs was a tradition of proposing and initiating new ideas, programs, reforms. Theirs was the task of "educating" the Congress and even doing battle for policy advances. They were the servants of the head of the government, who was held accountable for the successes and failures of an administration, and who acted accordingly. There was exhilaration in this, a sense of purposefulness and challenge to imagination and resourcefulness, with a premium placed upon the courageous mind, even in periods when executive proposals were not faring well. This temper reached surprisingly far down into professional and even clerical levels.

While this temper had gradually subsided during the Truman years, the first months of the new Administration represented an almost full reversal. It had not been supposed that the President took literally the textbook maxims he proclaimed during the campaign about the three separate branches of government, including the notion that the President only proposes while the Congress disposes. It now appears that he did. Some close to him have said that he entered the presidency under the impression that an unconstitutional aggrandizement of executive power had taken place in the preceding 20 years and that he would have to bend backwards to redress the balance. In any event, during the past year we witnessed a rebirth of the Whig theory of the presidency—held by most Republican presidents of the past century, but which hardly seemed credible in 1953—that the President is the servant of the Congress.

This abdication to Congress, or the permitted usurpation by Congress of executive authority, has been the source of basic difficulties for the executive branch. It has given executive employees a sense of declining significance. They feel unlooked-to for development of policy, and attached to an instrument without sense of direction or central purpose. Also, it has created a degree of accountability to Congress for day-to-day administrative activities which violates every principle of executive efficiency and integrity. A word of criticism from a congressional subcommittee sets in motion reactions which indicate that some department heads are not yet attuned to the fact that the executive branch has a basis for authority of its own.

The enlarged role of Congress as well as its own apparent ambivalence are blamed for the Administration's failure to accept as a rule of administration that national policy cannot be successfully administered by men who do not believe in it (although the most enthusiastic devotees of civil service sometimes make the same error), and has resulted in a long series of appointments of officials whose careers and utterances indicate firm opposition to the programs they are to administer. The list is impressive: the new head of the Rural Electrification Administration is regarded in his home state of Minnesota as an opponent of REA projects; the new head of the Housing and Home Finance Administration fought hard and consistently in Congress against the program he is now to administer;¹ an arch protectionist who voted against the Reciprocal Trade Program when he was in the House has been appointed to the Tariff Commission; an Assistant Secretary of Interior appears to oppose conservation and has testified that the public lands should ultimately be turned over to private citizens; the new general counsel of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare is a former congressman who voted to restrict social security coverage; the new chairman of the Federal Trade Commission previously made his living representing interests who did battle with the Commission; and the President's original appointee to head the Bureau of Mines was so articulate in his opposition to the Mine Safety Law he was to administer that the congressional committee forced the White House to withdraw his name.

¹ Sharp criticism accompanied this appointment. Whether because of it or not, Mr. Cole has exhibited balance and open-mindedness regarding his responsibilities in office.

What then is to be the conscientious official's reaction to a situation in which he finds that the head of his agency not merely disagrees with previous methods or policy particulars, but appears to be opposed to the entire enterprise, at least as the employees have been taught to view it?

What we may be witnessing, as Walter Lippmann has remarked, is an attempt to apply the principles of a constitutional monarchy to the American system, but without the advantages of a prime minister or party leader; more likely, it is the early stage of an educational process on the nature of American government. According to a British evaluation "President Eisenhower is not a politician and, as a professional soldier, has been living outside the United States for a great part of the past forty years. To him, as to many other Americans who have never had the opportunity nor the curiosity to study the workings of their own political system at first hand, the duels and conflicts between Congress and the Presidency over the past twenty years have seemed largely unnecessary, the work of factious and fractious men which could be avoided with a little common courtesy and common sense."

There are those who are optimistic as to a future reassertion of the executive role in government, placing reliance on the President's reputation as a "slow starter" who has demonstrated capacity for firm leadership when finally at home in his environment. They also feel that the death of Senator Taft has forced upon the President a realization that the White House must be its own leader. Others regard the President's uncomplicated conception of the executive role in American government as being too profoundly part of the man to be revised by new experience at this stage of life.

III

The civil service personnel actions of the new Administration provide the most lively current conversation piece among government employees. The heat which has been generated on this issue is so intense as to make reasonably objective appraisal at this juncture extremely difficult. This is understandable; a large number of people are fearful for the security of their jobs and livelihood, and some are already unemployed.

The central issue is as old as it is complex: What is the proper balance between change and continuity in the context of our system? This would be a difficult enough problem standing alone, but it is complicated by many other interwoven problems. The answer is not at all clear, and there are no basic traditions to guide us. This problem in American government administration is in a very elementary stage of development.

We have already noted that with a few exceptions the top departmental executives took office with a considerable degree of distrust for their inherited bureaucracies. So strongly did one or two Secretaries feel on this issue that they continued, after taking office, to make public addresses in which both the ability and the integrity of civil servants were impugned. It is common in Washington to explain this fact, which is having enduringly harmful effects, by saying that the new executives were taken in by the extravagance of their own campaign speeches. But this is only a half truth. Its uncritical or partisan acceptance will only shield from view the various factors which caused a new administration to be suspicious of the desire or capacity of the civil service to serve it faithfully and effectively. There has been a tendency in Washington in recent months to talk about our civil service as if it contained a long tradition of occupancy by pure technicians and career personnel, selected and promoted through a competitive merit system, and bred in the customs of administrative neutrality. This simply is not the case, however much one may believe that it ought to be. And it is important that we be aware of the many factors during the last 20 years which have operated against the acceptance of such a tradition.

The civil service was in low esteem in 1933. The Roosevelt Administration initially was rather harsh with employees who appeared to be identified with the outgoing Administration (note the experience of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, known as a Hoover favorite) and it undertook a rapid expansion of government employment largely through new and emergency agencies whose personnel were exempt from the competitive system. It is useful to recall that cries soon arose that Roosevelt was destroying civil service and this became a campaign issue in 1936. Personnel recruited in those days remained in government and to a considerable extent were later blanketed into an expanded classified system. There is nothing unusual or improper about blanketing through executive order. Most civil service expansions have taken place in this way, and one of the largest blanketing actions was accomplished through legislation—the Ramspeck Act. Nevertheless, each such action arouses the suspicion of the opposition. There is little doubt, for example, that President Truman's executive orders of 1947 and 1948 were regarded as partisan actions by the opposition, and as being in the nature of "midnight appointments." Bureaucracies are most likely to achieve stable acceptance under circumstances in which the bulk of personnel are known to have served different administrations. A circumstance in which nine out of ten civil servants entered the government under a particular administration—and a more than ordinarily controversial one—does not help to obtain ready acceptance of the inviolate status of civil service rights and privileges.

Moreover, the circumstances of the past 20 years were not such as to encourage in the bureaucracy a temper of neutral government service. Men were attracted to the New Deal by a contagious and buoyant enthusiasm for a popular social revolution. "We are reshaping society and we are the better civil servants to the degree of our enthusiasm for our task." This was the common view of high level bureaucrats in the thirties. Many of them became well-known advocates of a program and a philosophy. Increasingly, they appeared before Congress to testify for Administration proposals, not just as disinterested technicians but as Administration spokesmen. Anonymity was certainly not considered essential for the civil service. Whether or not one happens to favor this type of civil service activity is beside the point. The facts are worth noting as being sufficient to permit reasonable men to look somewhat askance at latter-day protestations that all positions under civil service must be considered utterly non-political and beyond the appropriate reach of new political officials. We talk about a career service, but is it persuasive to the outsider? Are the elements necessary for a career system present?

Under these circumstances it is easy to understand why, shortly after they took office, many of the new department heads began to exhibit the restiveness of men who were given to understand that their job was to overhaul their departments but who did not have adequate authority to select personnel. There is little question as to the sincerity of the distress felt by Mrs. Hobby, for example, when she told the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of her frustration in finding even her own immediate office, including the No. 2 job in the agency, under civil service. Hers was an extreme example of a widespread conviction that there was an absence of necessary freedom of action for removal and recruitment of personnel, commensurate with the responsibilities of a department head.

The argument is often made that the new officials could find within the civil service of their own departments persons to replace those they wished to remove from key positions. Like the Supreme Court, the bureaucracy follows the election returns, and many bureaucrats, if not a majority, were enthusiastic for the change dictated by the November election. But this begs the question, since the difficulty arose from a profound distrust of the federal bureaucracy and the circumstances were not such as to make plausible the finding of a solution within that bureaucracy. The distrust was unfortunate and in most cases unjustified, but it was the existing circumstance, and it was important that such distrust was felt even more keenly and expressed more articulately in Congress than among the new executives.

It was this felt necessity for additional freedom of action to control key policy jobs which led to the most broadly publicized of the new Administration's actions in the personnel field: the President's order creating Schedule C for exempted jobs and his direction to the Civil Service Commission to reexamine all classified jobs, particularly those which had been transferred from the old exempt Schedule A by President Truman. He ordered removed from the merit system, as improperly placed there, positions "of a confidential or policy-determining character" (E.O. 10440). The language of the order left wide latitude for the Commission—in conjunction with the departments—to be controlled by its own judgment.²

² A special irritation was also removed with this order. Many positions acknowledged to be policy-level, and therefore in the excepted Schedule A, had been given the protection afforded classified employees as a result of President Truman's order of 1947 which provided that if an employee with civil service status moved into an excepted position, his civil service protection rights continued. The Eisenhower order terminated such special rights.

Regarding the principle of Schedule C there can be no quarrel: policy-determining jobs ought to be subject to change by a new administration. But where is the line to be drawn? With the intermingling zones between policy and administration growing ever larger, what should be considered as policy determining for classification purposes? I have found the variation in views on this question quite extreme. Among those who take a general position that virtually no jobs below the ministerial level ought to be exempt, one of the basic arguments is that the differences between our two major parties are never "fundamental" enough to inhibit the ability of civil servants to carry out the policies of either party with energy and integrity—that the policy leeway allowed to any new administration is basically not very broad. But what is "fundamental"?

The new President seems to believe that the difference between his and the preceding Administration is quite profound. In late July he told a press conference, in which he was asked to appraise his first six months in office: "You could see that there was a very, very great, almost revolutionary activity necessary to pick up where others had left off and to begin again because there were opposing policies and ideas coming in after twenty years of another type of philosophy."³

While the President appears to speak too broadly, it is just as easy to under-rate the differences between the parties—or at least between Presidents—on particular issues. Since employees administer particular programs, it is particulars which count. The degree of difference varies widely among departments and among smaller units. Differences on public power, land management, health insurance, public housing, and similar unresolved issues are real and great enough to appear quite fundamental to those directly engaged. They are fundamental enough to raise reasonable doubts whether a person whose emotional and intellectual resources have been absorbed in advancing a particular policy can suddenly reverse his course effectively. Even with the utmost good will, unintentional resistance could overwhelm the drive for change in such areas.

This problem would be relatively small in the Department of Defense, for example, where general agreement on objectives is accepted, however bitter the debate on the appropriate size of the Air Force or Mr. Wilson's wisdom in curtailing some of the research and development work. The problem is probably negligible in purely technical units like the Weather Bureau, although one is continually finding that there are more political issues even in such units than one had imagined.

Such differences indicate that no sweeping generalizations can safely be made. They explain in large measure varying types of personnel actions which have been taken among different agencies. They explain why no convenient formula for "how high shall civil service go?" can be equally valid in all cases and why personnel policy must be viewed in its political context. The question, for example, whether the position of bureau chief belongs in the classified service is too abstract; the real question is what bureau? I have found few who do not agree that at the present time the head of the Bureau of Land Management is a policy-determining position in an extremely controversial area and that it does not now belong in the classified service. However, few would contend that the head of the Bureau of Standards should not be in the merit system. Similarly, it is noteworthy that three out of the four Administrative Assistant Secretaries, posts which were widely regarded as too high for civil service at the time they were blanketed in, have not been touched while lower jobs have been changed. The important consideration is the character and environment of the particular position, not how high it is.

³ New York Times, July 23, 1953.

Quantitatively the significance of the new Schedule C appears to have been greatly exaggerated. One heard estimates running into the thousands regarding the number of jobs which would be transferred from the competitive service. The final returns are not yet in, but it now seems clear that the figure will be much lower. At the end of January, 1954, the Civil Service Commission had approved a total of 236 jobs for transfer from the competitive service. A considerable proportion of these were of the confidential variety, private secretaries and chauffeurs. The total number of Schedule C positions approved at that date was 879, but of these 197 were newly created positions and the remainder, 446, had been in the non-competitive Schedules A and B. The Commission had turned down 929 agency requests for Schedule C positions; of these, 102 were rejected twice.⁴

It is my impression also, as it is that of the director of the National Civil Service League, that most agencies have been scrupulous as to the number of Schedule C requests made to the Commission, but in this, as in other personnel actions, the variation is great. As suggested earlier, the greatest push towards change has come from the agencies most actively involved in controversial domestic policy issues. Interior, for example, asked for almost 400 Schedule C jobs (the great majority of which the Commission rejected), while Defense, with over half the classified jobs in the federal service, asked for only 52. The latter request may be considered somewhat more representative.⁵

⁴ In its December, 1953 report the National Civil Service League commented on Schedule C as follows: "If this category is honestly used to unblanket from civil service protection those jobs which are truly policy-making, rather than removing them for patronage purposes only, the career system will have been strengthened. To date the CSC has exercised proper discretion in placing positions in this Schedule. It is also making progress toward setting up basic workable standards for distinguishing between these two types of positions." Some Republican members of Congress have voiced criticism of the Commission's record. On November 10, Congressman A. L. Miller of Nebraska called for Chairman Young's resignation on the grounds that by rejecting more than half the requests for Schedule C positions by federal agencies he was not supporting "the Administration in helping to remove those who would sabotage the very Administration who gave you a job." New York Times, Nov. 11, 1953.

⁵ The Department of Labor was attacked by Senator Butler (R., Md.) because he thought it had failed to comply with the spirit of the President's order in supplying a list of only 28 jobs for Schedule C.

Secretary Wilson has bent over backwards to protect the integrity of the civil service; furthermore, he has not held people suspect because of association with the previous regime, even at the political level. He has retained two Assistant Secretaries of Defense and the Under-Secretary of the Army from the previous Administration. Some people have offered the explanation that since the Secretary appears to have taken on a wide-flanked struggle with the military, every effort is being made to maintain full loyalty from the civilian side. Another consideration may have been that the preceding administrators in the department were Republicans.

In Interior, departures and changes have been relatively most numerous. Several incumbent bureau chiefs were not wanted. In almost every case they were offered other jobs in the department. Mr. Day, who was removed as chief of the Fish and Wildlife Service, gracefully accepted a lower post. Mr. Marion Clawson, however, then director of the Bureau of Land Management, refused to change jobs and challenged the Secretary to state specific charges, contending that rules and regulations of the civil service law required such procedure.⁶ Secretary McKay found it sufficient to say: "It is evident that we would not be able to work together in any harmony under these circumstances and therefore your removal will serve to promote the efficiency of the Federal service." Here is a basic issue: Should Mr. McKay have been obliged to retain a man he did not want in the position of director of Land Management, unless and until he could show "cause," that is, incompetence or insubordination?

The actions of the Secretary of Interior in moving firmly to replace bureau chiefs have been explained as follows: First, Mr. McKay was really bent on making what he and the new Administration regard as important policy changes concerning public lands, power, and other functions of the department, which made his position different from that of many other agency heads. Many of the bureau chiefs in these highly controversial areas had voluntarily become public symbols of policy positions wholly contrary to those of the new Secretary. Second, he must have learned that Interior had traditional difficulty in controlling its bureau chiefs, who have had a well-known tendency to operate quite independently, developing horizontal lines to the Congress. Here was a department which graphically portrayed Paul Appleby's allegation that department heads are frequently only fronts for bureau chiefs. This, of course, does not explain why a good many positions below the bureau chiefs have also been placed in Schedule C, in some cases—for example in the Bureau of Mines—with considerable doubt as to the justification. Various parts of the record make it clear that Interior is an extreme example of lack of confidence in the existing organization.

The situations in Commerce and Agriculture are in many respects similar to ⁶ The Clawson case has a special history. He was originally a symbol of the attempt to take land management out of the political battle. He came from the arch-enemy agency, Agriculture, and cut his ties there to take this job which he was given to understand would be in the protected civil service. Hindsight, at least, throws considerable doubt on the wisdom of trying to protect such a job with civil service tenure.

that in the Department of Interior. On the other hand, the upper civil service has remained intact in the Bureau of the Budget, in the General Services Administration, in the Civil Service Commission, and in the Labor Department. The Post Office Department has taken steps to extend its merit system. Substantial personnel difficulties are reported from the Department of Justice, but highly specialized issues enter there in connection with the complicated and legally unclear civil service status of lawyers in the federal government.⁷

The personnel policies of the new Administration have been vastly confused by the sizeable economy measures in operation. In my view, the reductions-in-force, real and anticipated, represent a far more disturbing influence on the civil service than the "unclassifying" of jobs or replacements. The new Administration has been giving federal employees an unremitting psychological pummeling through a constant stream of press releases regarding future budget cuts and releases of personnel. Actually, according to Commissioner Young, the number of job reductions between January, 1953 and June, 1954 will be about 180,000.⁸ A considerable number of these will go by attrition and will not require dismissal of incumbents. This is not a high proportion of federal employment, but somehow the Administration, in its poor employee relations, has managed to make almost all employees feel that their jobs are insecure. Mishandling, and perhaps some deliberate exaggeration for the consumption of the party organization, appear to have caused a large number of ordinary lay-offs to be confused with political job replacement.

The Administration is encountering inevitable criticism for methods of handling reductions-in-force. There have been some improprieties, particularly in the Department of Commerce, but it is my impression that most of the difficulty is caused by problems which long antedate this Administration, reflecting the fact that we do not really have any government-wide career service—each agency's determinations are made independently of what is happening in other agencies—and the fact that Civil Service Commission rules have never laid primary emphasis on merit in determining the order of lay-offs.

The lack of rapport, the distrust, and the breakdown in communication between the political level and the bureaucracy below has not been reflected basically in violent personnel changes. The new Administration is finding it difficult to fill higher posts even when they are vacant. The big change lies more in the new relationship. In general—and nothing is altogether general in this highly varied picture—suspicion is directed primarily at the type of personnel so prominent in the past 20 years, the “planners,” the “idea men,” the people who translated vague policy objectives into substantive proposals, the intellectuals who kept contriving new ventures and new paths to explore. These people—“egg heads” is now the accepted term—are not in good standing;⁹ they will depart or be quiescent. Insofar as substitutions are being made, the tendency is to seek the efficiency engineer or the management expert—by and large men whose interests or talents differ from those of their predecessors. This means a sharp reduction in the flow of new ideas up from below and an attempt to use the topmost level as the idea center. Or, it has been suggested, it may be consistent with the desire of substantial portions of the new group to see some atrophy in the sources of new plans, programs, and action in government. So far the Administration’s objectives have been mainly negative, and a different type of personnel may be more suitable to that type of outlook. It seems predictable, however, that when the retrenchment stage runs its course and the realities of responsibility force positive governmental action, the Administration may find its own brand of “egg head” indispensable.

⁷ In December, 1953, in the Roth case, a Federal Judge sustained the Justice Department and overruled the Civil Service Commission in deciding that lawyers have no protection in civil service, despite President Truman's declaration, in the order transferring attorney jobs out of civil service to Schedule A, that it would apply only to future lawyer appointees and that it would not disturb the status and job rights of lawyers so long as they remained in the jobs they then held. The ruling of the District Court (District of Columbia) is being appealed to the Supreme Court.

⁸ The process of contraction started under the previous Administration. About 51,000 jobs were eliminated during Truman's last seven months, as compared to 105,000 in the first seven months of the Eisenhower regime. The latter figure was in part related to the termination in 1953 of the temporary economic control agencies, such as the Wage Stabilization Board and the Office of Price Stabilization.

The new Administration early encountered the difficulties presented by the veterans preference laws in civil service. It has given evidence that it may seriously grapple with this problem. This is far more important than seems generally realized. Veterans preference is one of the weightiest drags upon the whole administrative structure. Its inflexibilities, its inequities, and its disregard for governmental effectiveness are primary causes of impatience with the entire civil service system and in part account for some of the early attitudes of this Administration as it found that reductions-in-force do not mean that the least efficient can be dismissed. Any honest attempt to deal with the federal personnel issue must grasp this nettle. The President has indicated that he has this intention. It was his personal intervention with the veterans organizations which achieved their assent to the change of law which now requires that veterans must first pass the competitive examinations before their preference points can take effect. If the President can make further progress with the veterans it will be a remarkable achievement.

On the basis of the facts now available, it can be said that the Administration has been surprisingly temperate in its personnel activities, considering the circumstances under which it came to power. There is no substantial evidence, as has been alleged, that there is a movement underway to undermine the merit system. Even as to questionable actions, there is little evidence to support the view that desire for patronage, in the raw sense, has motivated department heads, despite intense pressure from sections of Congress which has not yet abated and which may yet have unhappy consequences. The Eisenhower Administration shows signs of following a conventional cycle. In the early days of a new administration its primary concerns are to gain control of the administrative machinery, and to assure loyalty and confidence. In working for these ends, it finds itself obliged to break through some institutional barriers. As time goes on and a sense of being master in one's own house is achieved, the emphasis may again change to increasing the attractiveness and security of government employment, which means a probable expansion of the merit system. But new administrations even in their earlier days of adjustment rarely revert all the way. The net effect of the advances and retreats is that civil service progress is made, and the merit system appeared to be a sturdier and more accepted institution in the closing months of 1953 than it appeared to be in the analogous period of 1933.

⁹ The Undersecretary of the Interior publicly boasted that he had booted out “a group of Ph.D.’s from Harvard and Columbia” whom he found on his staff. Washington Post, Sept. 29, 1953.

IV

Perhaps the most important factor explaining the present attitudes, morale, and effectiveness of government employees is the general environment of repression, suspicion, and contempt for the civil servant which has been building up rapidly and is now prominently pervasive wherever our government is represented, here and abroad. This development, of course, antedates the new Administration. Originally, however, the Administration was in a remarkably good position to take vigorous and effective steps to stop it. It was not to be expected that it would lend comfort to these tendencies and even go so far as to extend the movement within the executive departments themselves. Yet it is hard to recall a time when the prestige of federal employment was at a lower ebb, or to remember when employees were so deliberately cowed through a relentless accumulation of indignities.

The contagious suspicion was symbolized in a memorandum issued in March, 1953 by the Director of the Budget urging all employees to report any behavior of fellow workers that they considered "illegal, improper or detrimental to the interest of the organization." It guaranteed that "in no case will the individual giving the information be embarrassed by disclosure of the source." This brought protests even from the Congress.

The department in which the personnel situation has been most serious is, of course, State. Internal demoralization is evident in both the departmental staff and the Foreign Service. The Secretary has shown considerable distrust of the permanent staff. Widespread concern and resentment developed in the department concerning the extent of authority (now curtailed) conferred on the new security officer. This situation is blamed for the stream of publicity given to the fact that about five persons a week have been fired as security risks, over two-thirds—or one every two days—on grounds of homosexuality. Staff members feel that most of the firings come with insufficient evidence and in any event the publicity is unnecessary and is clearly damaging and offensive to all employees. The morale of the Foreign Service has suffered severely, with varying estimates being made of the extent of damage done to the reporting system from abroad.¹⁰ Certainly continuous "field investigation" of personnel depreciates their standing and effectiveness.

¹⁰ Five distinguished former American diplomats jointly wrote that "a Foreign Service officer who reports on persons and events to the very best of his ability and who makes While the situation in State is admittedly extreme, the basic factors are in some degree apparent throughout the government. The Administration has seemed to take the view that its status and prestige would be enhanced in accordance with the number of "security risks" it could find and dismiss from their jobs.¹¹ It boasted of and exaggerated the number dismissed for such reasons. Partially as a consequence of this mood, what has come to be known as the "daisy-chain" form of "guilt by association" requires sparser and sparser substantiation. The atmosphere is an inordinate pressure for dull conformity, the emergence of "don't stick your neck out" as a basic guiding principle. The result is that even the more conscientious and able administrators who might welcome them are finding it difficult to obtain courageous or inventive suggestions from staff. The latter concentrates on "second guessing" the administrator, so that any new notions will have to come from him. But, in general, the situation prevents him from rising above the level of information and ideas that come from his staff. At a time when the utmost energy, audacity, and ingenuity are required of Americans abroad, it is commonly reported that federal employees at the edge of the Iron Curtain are at low levels of static ineffectiveness due to all-but-complete breakdown in morale.

The demoralization depreciates even the political appointees. While the professional civil servant may be able to retreat into conformity and riskless routine, the higher executives cannot escape the unnecessary and merciless harassment. This condition has discouraged many able executives from accepting government positions, even for relatively short periods.

The threat to the quality and character of the bureaucracy is grave. Milton Mandell has indicated that the JMA program was still bringing into government its fair share of the ablest college graduates, at least through 1952.¹² This runs counter to the more recent experience of almost all college professors with whom I have spoken. Over two years ago, as devoted a friend of government employees as Thurman Arnold asserted: "The day dream of every government employee is that some day he may get an equivalent job in the industry in the affairs of which he becomes a specialist. This specialized training, leading as it recommendations which at the time he conscientiously believes to be in the interest of the United States may subsequently find his loyalty and integrity challenged and may even be forced out of the service and discredited forever as a private citizen after many years of distinguished service. A premium therefore has been put upon reporting and upon recommendation which are ambiguously stated or so cautiously set forth as to be deceiving." Letter to the Editor, New York Times, Jan. 17, 1954.

¹¹ In the State of the Union Message it was stated that "Under the standards established for the new employee-security program more than 2,200 employees have been separated from the Federal Government." Neither in this statement nor in an earlier White House announcement of October 22, 1953, when the number was given as 1,456, was any distinction made between loyalty and security cases; thus people who drink too much or talk too freely were lumped with those suspected of disloyalty. No distinction was made between those in sensitive posts and those in routine positions. No mention was made of the fact that many of these employees were temporary and were employed pending completion of their investigations.

¹² "The JMA Program," Public Administration Review, Vol. 13, pp. 106-12 (Spring, 1953).

does to industry contacts, is the only reason I can think of why a brilliant college graduate with an opportunity elsewhere should enter civil service."¹³ I prefer to think this is a lawyer's hyperbole, but which of the traditional non-material incentives for a civil service career do indeed remain?

V

How should one balance the net effects of the four categories of developments I have discussed? Granting that they are not entirely separable, I regard the formal factors of a protected civil service and tidiness of administrative organization as far less important than the larger political environment and the character of leadership in the executive branch in determining the quality and behavior of the bureaucracy. A career service running up to even the highest administrative levels guarantees nothing but experience. Alone, it cannot assure quality no matter what is done about early recruitment, security, and other material conditions of employment. In a high employment economy, the government must stress non-material rewards to compete successfully for the best people. If these disappear, it is entirely possible that a closed system of early recruitment, planned promotions, and tenure may actually have a retrogressive influence. Formal educational or intelligence quotient requirements will not prove a protection against stagnation. In fact, such provisions may actually promote deterioration by preventing the periodic refurbishing at all levels when political or economic conditions would otherwise make that feasible.

In short, the problem of obtaining and maintaining a vital federal civil service involves far more than the establishment of appropriate procedures and material employment conditions. It is a continuous political problem in the larger sense of the term. The important considerations of civil service rules and regulations must be balanced against the essential conditions of political responsiveness and political purposes. I believe that the President has a professional soldier's respect for an established career service and that this Administration may eventually establish a clean record of strengthening the civil service in accord with purely formalistic criteria. Yet, I would venture that the quality, the role, and the status of federal employment were moving rapidly upward during the days when President Roosevelt was apparently disregarding or even doing violence to civil service criteria, and that they are moving downward today while President Eisenhower is showing a relative respect for them.

In part, this tendency is caused by factors not within the control of the Administration. The federal government undoubtedly acquired an unusually high proportion of the best young talent during the depression years, because business and professional opportunities were scarce and because government was the expanding, exciting, and challenging field at that time. The pendulum now appears to be swinging in the opposite direction towards a lower than normal average talent in new recruits for the federal service due in part to the relative attractiveness of employment opportunities in a full employment economy. But the developments we have discussed will greatly aggravate this tendency and the result is likely to be a severe decline in the quality of personnel in the higher civil service.

¹³ "Bullying the Civil Service," Atlantic Monthly, Vol. 188, p. 46 (Sept., 1951).

In addition to these general conclusions, one may raise a few issues, in the form of hypotheses, which in part relate to factors not directly discussed in this paper but which suggest some broader ramifications of this problem:

1. If new administrations are to be expected to accept a broader area of permanent civil service, reaching to the highest levels of administration, it will be necessary for the President's controls and the control of department heads over their bureaucracies to be far stronger and more direct than they are today. So long as this control is lacking it is probably inescapable that Secretaries will seek to substitute for the machinery of effective control by placing trusted and familiar associates in key posts.

2. The need for strong and undiluted executive control over the bureaucracy has been vigorously emphasized in recent years by students of public administration and was, of course, the central theme of the Hoover Commission reports. However, the kinds of recommendations contained in such reports for improvement of the mechanics offer only morsels of help in this problem. In the absence of a responsible party system, the President will not have the means to control his bureaucracy, and subordinate officials will find that operational effectiveness requires their developing direct lines to congressional committees and nurturing pressure group constituencies. This places a premium on personal identification with the administration and is thus incompatible with the concept of high level permanent civil service.

3. A part of this situation is the absence of a clear acceptance of the bureaucracy as an instrument of executive responsibility. Congress cannot govern. To the extent that it is permitted to assume the power to manipulate executive personnel it can only disorganize the executive. This too reduces the administration's capacity to accept higher levels of career bureaucracy.

4. In general, texts on civil service principles have talked as if size of government and the number of departments, as well as the nature of the party system, make no difference to the validity of these principles. It should be considered whether or not the level to which the career service can reach effectively may not be related to these factors. May not the sheer size of the American government mean either a proliferation of departments or the assumption by lower key officials within departments of a political role similar to that of department heads, if democratic political control is to be maintained? It does appear that the larger a bureaucracy becomes, the more restricted its head becomes in giving orders. The means built up restrict the ends which can be achieved.

5. A civil service system running to top level posts is not obtained or sustained by law or executive order alone; it must evolve out of tradition based on confidence. Therefore, ingredients for its success must include a period of relative stability in size and function of government admixed with intervening turnover in administration. It must also include an understanding of, and a readiness to accept, the obligations which permanent tenure implies for civil servants. Government officials must be aware that competitive entry into the government is not enough to constitute a "career system."

6. In this era, the desire of executives to replace key personnel is not, and need not be, primarily motivated by patronage considerations or belief in the spoils system. By and large, public administration literature has tended to underrate the importance and value of the appointive and removal function at the Cabinet level. The appointive and removal function is an important political as well as administrative process if accountability is to be clear. Some foreign experience has indicated that over-contraction of this function can be as dangerous as its excessive use. Similarly, no conception of the civil service ought to oblige a political party to keep a civil servant indefinitely in any particular post. Reasonable protection of the man should not include any presumptive rights to a particular job.

A positive government requires a constant flow of policy invention as well as experience from its administrators. Both can be obtained if policy formulation and action can be kept under the official control of the political officers. In the absence of control, even an administration which appreciates the value of experience may feel driven to foresake this asset to strengthen its sense of control.

7. One of the older clichés about bureaucracies is that in a modern complex society they tend to develop a monopoly of technical competence which gives them a dangerous power of indispensability. This is certainly not true of the American experience. On the other hand, there appears to be inadequate appreciation of some of the advantages of the high turnover rates in American bureaucracy. Relevant and direct experience in the general and particular processes of governmental operations are widely shared by persons outside of the government. Protection of the open door toward lateral entry into the civil service at relatively high levels has values which might be considered parallel to the value of career service in the development of a balanced merit system. The frequent interchange between public and private life has contributed to democratization of the nation through wider citizen understanding of, and participation in, governmental activities. We are fortunate that no social, professional, or traditional barriers exist between the civil service and the private citizen; that so many of the latter have seen it from the inside. In a dynamic economy and in an open society there are other choices than a general "spoils system" or a permanent and "closed group" of civil servants.

8. Given the present repressive environment in government, in which the permanent civil servant is quite understandably inhibited from assuming any avoidable responsibility, decision-making, or initiative, might not the effectiveness of the bureaucracy be enhanced by the addition of more relatively footloose citizens who can afford some effrontery and impudence? This, of course, is tackling the problem from the wrong end; it is the atmosphere of repression which should be done away with. But so long as it remains, is not an administrator justified in considering the need for ballast in the other type of personnel?

REPRESENTATION OF THE REGION IN MISSOURI BASIN ORGANIZATION

FREDERICK L. ZIMMERMANN

Hunter College

AND

MITCHELL WENDELL

American International College

Recently two new and important proposals have been made concerning the character of the needed basin organization for the development and proper utilization of the resources of the Missouri Valley. A Missouri Basin Survey Commission was appointed by President Truman in 1952 to make a "thorough re-evaluation of the whole problem." In its 1953 report this survey group recommended the establishment of a federal Missouri Basin Commission with authority to "direct and coordinate the activities of all federal agencies relating to resource development."¹ In December, 1952 the Missouri River States Committee, composed of the governors of the ten basin states, accepted a Council of State Governments' draft of a federal-interstate compact as the desirable framework for basin organization.² Each of these proposals would create a new commission to integrate basin planning and secure coordination among all governmental agencies in the operation of water facilities.

I. THE MISSOURI PROBLEM

At one point in its report the Missouri Basin Survey Commission describes the course of the Missouri as "a crude but large question mark across the surface of one-sixth of the nation" and uses the description to symbolize "the great array of problems which await satisfactory solution in the Basin." Certainly the physical, planning, and policy problems of Missouri Basin conservation and development are difficult enough. What should be the relative priorities in water use and water control in a river basin where there is not enough water to meet all needs but where at times the flow reaches destructive proportions? What is the optimum balance among water uses in a multi-purpose program for the Missouri? What should be the relative role of land management and of large reservoirs and main stem dams? These are only a few in the long list of problems. In some cases a degree of decision has been reached through the construction of facilities³ or the adoption of a guiding principle.⁴ In many instances, however, the issue is clouded with controversy and doubt.⁵

¹ Missouri Basin Survey Commission, Missouri: Land and Water (1953), p. 265. (The Commission's report will be cited hereafter as MBSC Report.) Cf. The Report of the President's Water Resources Commission, 3 vols. (1950), Vol. 1, pp. 10-11.

² Council of State Governments, Revised Draft, Missouri River Basin Compact (1953). (Hereafter cited as Draft Compact.) See MBSC Report, p. 249: "The draft compact was discussed by the [Missouri River States] Committee in its meeting at Omaha, Nebr., on December 1, and was approved unanimously with a few relatively minor changes." The authors acted as consultants to the drafting committee which prepared the compact.

The complexity of these matters and the size and character of the Missouri Basin pose a major problem of formulating effective decision-making machinery in planning and also in integrating operation of facilities. It is widely agreed that the various programs for the valley should be integrated into a single multi-purpose pattern. Land and water management projects in the basin were developed principally by two federal agencies—the Bureau of Reclamation and the Army Engineers. State agencies and political subdivisions also did some work in various phases of conservation and resource management. The difference in the major purposes of the two federal agencies led ultimately to the famous controversy between them. At this point Congress compelled the first step towards integration through the compromise, composite Pick-Sloan plan, which has been the basic framework for present development of the Missouri Basin.⁶ In essence, the Pick-Sloan plan represents an effort to secure integration while utilizing existing agencies to administer operations in their respective spheres of responsibility. But the integration is neither comprehensive nor tightly geared. It does not include the Department of Agriculture's program for land management, of which only segments have been authorized by Congress.⁷ Nor has the Pick-Sloan plan produced complete cooperation between Reclamation and the Engineers.⁸ The state governments of the basin are not included in any organic fashion in the present pattern, and state influence has been exerted only occasionally and indirectly in these intra-federal quarrels. The most striking example of state influence is perhaps the role generally credited to the Missouri River States Committee in the consummation of the Pick-Sloan plan.⁹ There has been wide recognition of the need for state cooperation in a comprehensive basin program and much stress has been laid upon consultation with the states.¹⁰ However, the principal federal statu-

³ "We recognize one significant difference between the Missouri Basin now and the Tennessee Valley when the Authority was created. Many large projects in the Missouri Basin are constructed or in the process of construction." MBSC Report, p. 9. See also Draft Compact, p. 1.

⁴ The O'Mahoney-Milliken amendment to the Flood Control Act of 1944 gave irrigation priority over navigation, 58 Stat. 887. See also the 1945 Rivers and Harbors Act, 59 Stat. 10.

⁵ "Many unanswered questions concern water use, flood control and conservation. Witnesses before the Commission disputed the effectiveness of watershed treatment in flood control. The data that would enable people to agree on this and to give united support to a comprehensive program do not yet exist." MBSC Report, p. 223.

⁶ Report of the President's Water Resources Policy Commission (1950), Vol. 2, p. 250.

⁷ Missouri River Basin Agricultural Program, H. Doc. 373, 81st Cong., 1st sess. (1949).

⁸ Richard G. Baumhoff, The Dammed Missouri Valley (New York, 1951), Chs. 10–12, 14. See also Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government, Reorganization of the Department of the Interior (1949).

⁹ "The Committee was instrumental in bringing about the compromise that resulted in the Congressional authorization of the Pick-Sloan plan." MBSC Report, p. 249.

¹⁰ MBSC Report, Part VIII, Ch. 2.

tory requirement for such consultation on a major phase of basin development is the provision for state review of water control projects and the transmission of state opinions on these projects in reports to Congress.¹¹

In recognition of the incomplete nature of the present integration a forum was established to implement coordination around the basic entente of the Pick-Sloan plan. The Missouri Basin Inter-Agency Committee is composed of the Federal Inter-Agency River Basin Committee and the Missouri States Committee.¹² Within the limitations of the present situation, it has played an important role. Lacking in any legal authority and in any direct institutionalized channel to Congress, the Inter-Agency Committee has been concerned more with assembling recommendations of the various federal operating agencies than with integrating these recommendations into a basic pattern.¹³

Until recently the leading remedy proposed for the present difficulties in basin organization has been the establishment of a federal valley authority along the lines of T.V.A. Under this proposal a single basin agency would displace existing federal operating agencies in the operation of a unified multipurpose plan, thereby putting an end to present intra-federal conflicts and rivalries. It is also argued that such an agency would be more regional in character than the present departmental organization. (The agency would be regional in jurisdiction, but national in character, since it would be an agency solely of the national government.) The authority approach has encountered serious opposition in the basin. As the Survey Commission indicates, a valley authority does not seem politically feasible, whatever its intrinsic advantages or disadvantages.¹⁴

The new proposals of the Missouri Basin Survey Commission and the Council of State Governments both take a middle course and seek integration through planning and coordination, rather than unification, of project operations. The stated objectives of the President's Commission in shaping a coordinating mechanism for the basin represent a definite shift from the authority approach. Two basic objectives are avowed by both new proposals. First, they would coordinate planning and development through a single agency without displacing existing operational agencies.¹⁵ In this connection they also stress ¹¹ Sec. 1 (a), 58 Stat. 887, 888 (1944). See also MBSC Report, pp. 250-51: "Upon completion of all investigations, and prior to submission of survey reports to Congress, the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of the Interior must submit a copy of their proposed reports to each affected State. The Department of Agriculture by administrative decision follows the same practice. Within 90 days after receipt of the proposed report, the written reviews and recommendations of each State are submitted to the Chief of Engineers or Secretary of the Interior. These comments are attached to the project report which is submitted to Congress." See also Report of President's Water Resources Policy Commission, Vol. 3, p. 520. A similar provision requires consultation with the heads of state agencies concerned with wildlife resources. 60 Stat. 1080 (1946).

¹² Baumhoff, pp. 169-71.

¹³ MBSC Report, Part IV, Ch. 8.

¹⁴ MBSC Report, p. 9.

¹⁵ While this appears to be the Survey Commission's view, some of the group's suggestions move in a divergent or even a contrary direction. At one point the Commission the impending need for integration in the operation of water control facilities as the construction stages of many major projects approach completion. Second, they urge the necessity of giving a voice to the region as well as to the nation in basic policy determination. Since the Survey Commission does not translate its general recommendations into specific statutory language, the extent to which the proposed agency might impinge on the functions of existing agencies in the Missouri Basin is difficult to determine with accuracy. However, if we may assume that these uncertainties are to be resolved in a manner consistent with the Commission's stated objectives, the major controversy is not over the powers of the coordinating agency. The real issue is whether an exclusively federal agency created solely by act of Congress or an intergovernmental body established by federal-interstate compact is most likely to accomplish the agreed objectives.

II. THE TWO PLANS

The Missouri Basin Survey Commission proposed a federal coordinating agency composed of presidentially selected commissioners, who would have to meet the qualification of residence in the basin "for not less than five years prior to appointment." Under statutory provision, the Missouri Basin governors and interested private groups could recommend the names of prospective commissioners and there would be an advisory committee of the governors. The Commission's offices would be located at some point within the Missouri Basin.¹⁶

By and large, the powers of the proposed agency would be of a planning and coordinative nature. Other agencies of the federal government would be required to submit their plans for Missouri Basin projects to the Commission for review.¹⁷ The Commission also would do its own comprehensive planning for the basin, would determine whether the plans of other agencies harmonized with its own proposals, and would make reports to the President and Congress containing its recommendations for basin development and management. As an element of local consent, the proposal would provide that "within a 2 year period of Congressional enactment of legislation creating the Commission each state may decline, by legislative action, to consent to the operation of the Com-proposes that the new agency operate power transmission lines. MBSC Report, p. 232. The new agency would also impinge on the jurisdiction of the Federal Power Commission in at least two important respects: it would have authority to veto FPC grants of licenses for hydroelectric power development projects in the Basin, and it would also be able to review and alter power rates at its own discretion (pp. 265-66).

¹⁶ There would be the usual provisions empowering the Commission to retain a suitable staff and it also would be authorized to borrow or contract for the services of other federal or private personnel.

¹⁷ MBSC Report, p. 265. This power of review and recommendation does not extend to any but federal projects. The federal-interstate compact proposed by the Council of State Governments would give the basin agency power to review and make recommendations concerning projects of all governmental agencies and private developments as well. Draft Compact, Art. VII, par. 1.

mission in that state."¹⁸ If one or more of the main-stem states of Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, and Missouri withholds such consent "Congress should determine whether to go ahead with those states that have consented to the Commission."¹⁹

The proposal put forward by the Council of State Governments is contained in a specific draft of a federal-interstate compact.²⁰ This agreement would require assent by the seven principal basin states of Montana, Wyoming, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, and Missouri, and by the United States to go into effect. It would also be open to participation on an equal basis by Colorado, Iowa, and Minnesota—states embracing smaller areas of the basin. It would establish a Missouri Basin Commission by means of a compact to which the United States and the Missouri Basin states would be party. This Commission and the one proposed by the survey group would, with some possible exceptions, have similar powers.²¹ These powers are summarized by the Council of State Governments as follows:

"The Commission is charged with (1) formulating over-all plans for the development of the Basin's waters and land resources; (2) reviewing proposed construction and operational plans to determine whether such proposals are consistent with the over-all plans for the Basin's development which the Commission has approved; and (3) reviewing actual operations to determine whether approved plans are being carried out properly."²²

As regards membership, however, the two agencies would differ markedly. According to the plan advanced by the Council of State Governments, the Missouri Basin Commission would be a joint agency of the federal government and of each of the participating states. Each state would appoint one member of the Commission and the federal government would appoint not less than three nor more than five commissioners.²³ Each of the state commissioners would have one vote on the Commission and the federal commissioners collectively would

¹⁸ MBSC Report, p. 8; see also Part VIII, Ch. 3.

¹⁹ MBSC Report, p. 9.

²⁰ Draft Compact, pp. 4-11.

²¹ See note 15. The meaning of the word "direct" as used by the Survey Commission is also open to varying interpretations because no definition is given. Usually the Survey Commission uses the term in the context of "directing" studies and planning activities. But at one point the term appears in conjunction with the following: "The Commission shall be responsible for carrying out Congressional policies regarding land and water use . . ." and "It shall exercise central control of river operations. . . ." MBSC Report, p. 266.

²² Draft Compact, p. 3. All review procedures under the compact are limited to cases of "substantial effect on interstate relations in the use of water." The proposed Commission would have power to "Issue rules and regulations governing the submission of project plans and operations to it and in such rules and regulations may establish principles for determining what constitutes 'substantial effect' . . ." (Art. VII, par. 7).

²³ Draft Compact, Art V, par. 1, reads in part: "The Commission shall be composed of one Commissioner from each party state designated or appointed in accordance with the law of the state which he represents and serving and subject to removal in accordance with such law, and not less than three nor more than five Commissioners of the United States designated or appointed by the President in accordance with the applicable laws of the United States and serving and subject to removal in accordance with such laws."

have a number of votes equal to the total possessed by all the state commissioners present at any meeting of the body. These federal votes would be cast as a unit unless Congress should specifically provide that they be cast in some other manner. In any event, the result would be to give one-half of the voting strength to the states in the basin and the remaining one-half to the federal government. No action of the Commission would be effective or binding unless it received at least three-quarters of the total vote cast.²⁴

III. REPRESENTATION OF THE REGION

Adoption of the Survey Commission plan probably would make a unified and comprehensive plan of federal action in the Missouri Basin possible. The new all-federal agency would have the power to produce such a plan and to keep it current. It would also be able to exclude non-conforming projects and programs of other federal agencies from its own recommendations. Congress could view the federal Missouri Basin program as a whole instead of as a segmented bundle of power dams, flood control reservoirs, gully elimination projects, and irrigation ditches. It would then be in a position to shape legislation in the direction of a coordinated development program.

But the proposed administrative pattern has a serious weakness. It deals with only a part of the problem. As the Survey Commission itself points out, the states are also doing natural resource work. Moreover, the Commission recommends that the states in the future spend considerable money²⁵ for resource development and management in the basin and that they make important changes in their laws.²⁶

Even if the proposed all-federal agency were to succeed in integrating the activities of the Army Engineers, Bureau of Reclamation, Department of Agriculture, and other federal agencies now in the field, it would have no power to secure integration of the ten state programs or of such programs with the federal efforts. An act of Congress would naturally bind federal agencies. It could not bind the states or their agencies.²⁷ Under the Survey Commission

²⁴ At least five of the seven principal states and one commissioner representing the United States must be present to constitute a quorum.

²⁵ During the fiscal year 1953, the ten states in the basin spent $36,666,000 on Missouri Basin development. The Survey Commission indicates that in the coming six years the states will be required to spend an additional $234,445,000. MBSC Report, p. 84.

²⁶ For example, the Survey Commission recommends that the states enact comprehensive land use laws and that they review and alter their water laws. It is further recommended that the new basin agency make proposals from time to time to the states for changes in their laws designed to remove "impediments which the laws of the states present to particular projects or to optimum development in general." MBSC Report, pp. 17-18.

²⁷ Of course the supremacy clause of the Federal Constitution (Art. VI, sec. 2) provides that national laws shall prevail over conflicting state laws. But this is of significance principally where there is conflict of substantive requirements in areas where the national government is exercising one of its delegated powers. The supremacy clause does not apply to the internal organization and administration of state agencies or to the evolution of positive state policies.

proposal, it seems unlikely that complete integration would take place. For why should state agencies accept and conform to major policy decisions affecting their vital interests if the state governments of which they are part have no responsibility for or voice in the setting of such policies? Why should it be assumed that state legislatures would acquiesce in the recommendations of an outside agency?²⁸ At most the all-federal agency could be expected to bring about only a partial solution of the problem. On the other hand, a compact is not only state law, but superior state law²⁹ and the draft proposed by the Council of State Governments would establish a single legal pattern and a single coordinating agency for all the party states and the federal government.

Even more serious than its administrative shortcoming³⁰ is the failure of the Survey Commission's plan to insure the representation of both national and regional interests in the policy-making process. Its agency would be an all-federal body. Consequently there can be no fear that it would lack diligence in protecting and promoting the national interests. But how are the interests of the region to be represented?

Four devices apparently are intended to produce such representation: (1) the states are to decide whether they want the new agency to function within their individual territories; (2) the agency's offices are to be located in the basin; (3) each of the commissioners would have to be a legal resident of the basin for five years preceding his appointment; (4) the Missouri states' governors would form an advisory committee and might, along with any other public or private organizations or individuals, suggest names of prospective commissioners for the consideration of the President. None of these arrangements permits the region to be more than a vocal spectator to its fate.

The proposal to permit state rejection cannot have any real influence on the policy-making activities of the proposed agency. If the Survey Commission's plan is really the answer for the Missouri Basin, all of the states should accept it. Indeed, if a number of them did not, the new agency would be severely handicapped in its work. But once a state had agreed to accept the federal agency, it could not withdraw. This would mean that subsequent to the Missouri Basin agency's birth, the state would have no power of choice and no possibility of using such power to influence the agency's decisions.

From the administrative point of view, there can be little doubt of the wisdom of locating the agency's offices in the valley. Administrative decentralization, however, is no substitute for grass-roots voting power. Osmosis is not the same thing as representation.³⁰ The reason why state officials reflect regional points of view is that they are responsible to the region's electorate.³¹

²⁸ It has been pointed out that the Tennessee Valley Authority has encountered difficulties of this sort. See Philip Selznick, TVA and the Grass Roots (Berkeley, 1949), pp. 169-79. Difficulties are much more likely to arise in the Missouri Basin than in the Tennessee Valley, since the former is larger and more diverse. Furthermore, as the Survey Commission itself notes, there is strong sentiment in the Missouri Basin for regional representation in policy formulation.

²⁹ A state statute which conflicts with a compact is invalid and unenforceable. Green v. Biddle, 8 Wheat. 1 (1823); State v. Hoofman, 9 Md. 28 (1856); President, Managers C. v. Trenton City Bridge Company, 13 N.J. Eq. 46 (1860); State v. Faudre, 54 W. Va. 122 (1903).

The only Survey Commission recommendations which bear substantial relevance to the problem of regional representation in policy making are those relating to a governors' advisory committee and to the method for choosing the new agency's members. At the present time, the ten state governors in the region participate in the deliberations of the Missouri Basin Inter-Agency Committee. There is no reason to believe that they have less influence here than they would have as members of the proposed advisory committee. In fact, the Inter-Agency Committee is an advisory body. Yet the Survey Commission itself rightly says that Inter-Agency is inadequate because it is a debating society without power to formulate its own policies and secure their acceptance.³² It is hard to believe that the governors will have any more influence over basic policy as members of the proposed advisory committee than they now have as participants in Inter-Agency. As representatives of their region, the governors at least have the assurance that Inter-Agency provides a platform from which their views can become widely known. Whether an advisory committee would fare as well is a matter of some doubt. It would be only an appendage of a more authoritative agency and not the principal integrating forum. By very definition, such a committee could be only as active as the all-federal agency wanted it to be. This is not representation. At best it is a hearing at the discretion of the federal agency.

The only other mechanism for regional representation suggested by the Survey Commission lies in the manner of selecting the commissioners who would head the proposed federal agency. All of them would have to be residents of the Missouri Basin. This type of requirement has become a familiar one. That it has political appeal is hardly open to question. But how direct the relationship between local residence and faithful representation may be is a moot point.

Finally, the Survey Commission would specifically recognize the right of the Missouri Basin state governors to suggest the names of prospective commissioners to the President for his consideration. The same right would also be expressly extended to any other public or private organizations or to any individuals interested in the basin. This proposal may have some value but at best it is an attempt to give the color of local representation without the substance.

³⁰ See TVA and the Grass Roots (cited in note 28), Ch.7, pp. 262-66; see also James W. Fesler, Area and Administration (University, Alabama, 1949), p. 99: "The Valley Authority as presently conceived and as exemplified in TVA is a wholly federal agency that is hierarchically responsible to a nationally elected President and a national Congress. It is not a joint creature of federal, state and local governments of the area, nor is it responsible, in the literal sense of democratic government, to the people of the valley in which it operates. In legal status, it is as much a part of the federal bureaucracy as the Department of the Interior or the Treasury Department . . . accurate analysis of the Valley Authority therefore cannot be based on a glowing conviction that here is the epitome of grass roots democracy." This statement would apply with equal force to the agency proposed by the Survey Commission.

³¹ It is true, of course, that the region's representatives in Congress are also responsible to the region's electorate, but, as the Survey Commission indicates, the objective is a voice for the region at the planning level as exemplified by the proposed agency. See Fesler, p. 143.

³² MBSC Report, p. 85.

IV. THE SURVEY COMMISSION ON COMPACTS

Obviously the compact would give more effective representation to the states of the region than would be possible under the Survey Commission's plan. It would introduce responsible state representatives directly into the policy-making agency instead of permitting them to function from the outside. Nevertheless, the Survey Commission rejected the compact approach by an eight to three vote. It offered seven reasons for its action.³³

The first objection is a legal one. "We are of the opinion," the report sets forth, "that a compact among a selected group of states and the federal government embarks upon a field largely unexplored in the courts. Certainly an attempt to establish a state-federal compact would raise constitutional questions which would require prolonged litigation for determination." Although the Survey Commission gives this contention first place among its reasons for disapproving the compact approach, the report does not indicate what the constitutional problems may be.

As a matter of fact, the constitutional principles involved are simple and all of them have been passed upon repeatedly by the courts. In 1951 the United States Supreme Court reiterated a settled position when it held a compact to be a contract.³⁴ It is hardly a novel proposition that the United States government can make contracts with the states. Moreover, there are a number of presently operative intergovernmental agencies created by compact in whose work the federal government participates.³⁵ Nor is the participation informal in character. It is expressly provided for in the compacts themselves.

Of course, it is also well settled that the contract clause of the United States Constitution does not bind the federal government, but only the states.³⁶ Depending on one's point of view, this may be urged as a weakness in the compact approach. But if it is, the Survey Commission's plan suffers from an equal infirmity. An all-federal agency would necessarily be created by act of Congress. Accordingly, any alteration in the arrangement or even the abandonment of ³³ The views of the Commission majority on the compact approach are stated at pp. 9-11 of the MBSC Report.

³⁴ West Virginia ex rel. Dyer v. Sims, 341 U.S. 22 (1951). Previous cases on this point are Green v. Biddle, 8 Wheat. 1 (1823); Delaware River Joint Toll Bridge Commission v. Colburn, 310 U.S. 419, 427 (1940); Cotton v. Walton-Verona Independent Graded School Dist., 295 Ky. 478, 484; 174 S.W. 2d 712, 715 (1943); Gulf Refining Co. v. Stanford, 202 Miss. 602, 606; 30 S. 2d 516, 518 (1947).

³⁵ The federal government is represented on the commissions established by the Rio Grande Compact, 53 Stat. 785 (1939); Potomac River Compact, 54 Stat. 748 (1940); Ohio Valley Water Sanitation Compact, 54 Stat. 752 (1940); and the Upper Colorado Basin Compact, 63 Stat. 31 (1949).

³⁶ Westel W. Willoughby, The Constitutional Law of the United States, 3 vols. (New York, 1929), Vol. 2, pp. 1253.

the entire Missouri Basin program would require no more than another act of Congress amending or repealing the original legislation.

In the light of well settled law and practice, there does not seem to be any special reason to fear litigation. But even if some phases of Missouri Basin development do give rise to suits, there is hardly a chance that the litigation could involve the agency. As we have pointed out, the proposed agency, whether established by statute or compact, will be a planning agency. Since the preparation of plans, however vital to resource development and management, does not create or infringe any legal right, who would be able to bring a suit? No person may maintain a legal proceeding unless he has an identifiable legal interest. This is not to suggest that a comprehensive resource program for the Missouri Basin can be carried out without litigation, perhaps a good deal of it. However, such litigation will be occasioned by specific measures of Congress or state legislatures enacting one phase or another of specific conservation and development programs. Litigation of this type will concern the substance of enacted law and will in no degree depend on whether the planning behind the statutes was done by an all-federal agency or by a federal-interstate agency.

The Survey Commission's second argument is that a joint federal-state agency would produce situations wherein personnel responsible to the United States government would be under the direction of state officials. As already indicated, half the voting strength on the Missouri Basin Commission would be in the hands of the federal members. Even if all the states in the region were to present a solid phalanx in opposition to federal wishes, they still could not adopt a policy that lacked the approval of the federal commissioners. Moreover, the compact leaves operational activities in the hands of those agencies now engaged in them. Consequently, it is difficult to conceive of any order that the joint agency could give to any federal officer, other than an order to supply the agency with information in his possession.

The Survey Commission's third and fifth arguments emphasize this fear of state control. It is difficult to deal with them directly because the basic difficulty with the Survey Commission's position is that it mistakenly assumes such state control to be inherent in the compact approach. At one point, however, the Commission's report makes an argument that might have substance under other circumstances: "Prosecution of the national interest has always been the primary responsibility of the National Government. It is doubtful if any other governmental level or unit could successfully adjust diverse and oftentimes conflicting state and sectional interests and articulate those interests with national needs." If the proposed Missouri Basin Commission were to be a builder of projects, this might be a weakness. In a planning agency it is reasonable to expect occasional controversies to remain unsolved for periods of time. In view of the importance of the national interest, it may be fitting that national representation should be able to block any action not in accord with the views of the United States government. Similarly, in view of the importance of the region's interest, it would seem appropriate that the opposition of a considerable number of basin states should be able to compel further consideration of any proposal.

The fourth point made by the Survey Commission is the fact that the federal government will probably spend about seventy per cent of the money ultimately needed for Missouri Basin development projects. This may indeed be a good reason why the United States should have a strong voice in the proposed agency, and it is one of the reasons for the strong voting position proposed for the federal government in the compact. However, it is also fair to point out that the thirty per cent of total expenditures which the Survey Commission expects the region to shoulder should entitle it to something more substantial than an advisory committee. The people of the region have the same interest in the Missouri development as residents of Maine, Florida, or California. But they have also the additional interest that comes from being personally affected. Whatever is done in the Missouri Basin will alter the physical characteristics and economic value of their homes, their farms, their mines, and their factories.

While the Survey Commission constantly reiterates that the national interest can be appropriately represented only by the federal government, it seems to believe that state interests do not have to be represented by the state governments. Its sixth objection to the compact method is set forth as follows:

The proponents of the compact device have made much of the popular demand for local participation in the development of the basin. They contend that this demand would be satisfied by a Governor's representative on the basin agency. We believe that resource development involves issues outside the normal scope of State activity and in some areas, deals with problems which the States have never been able to solve. We believe that the people, through their local districts, associations and organizations, wish to speak for themselves. They have a better understanding of those issues and problems and should have the opportunity to take a more active part in the development program.

The Survey Commission apparently contends that private pressure groups ("associations and organizations") and special districts are more representative of regional interests than the state governments in the basin. In the absence of specific proof, this assertion is difficult to accept. Moreover, the quoted passage makes the rather arbitrary assumption that we can have either state participation or the expression of private views, but that we cannot have both. The proposed compact insures both by giving the states representation in the agency and by requiring the agency to hold public hearings.

Still another point made in the quoted passage is that many of the problems of resource development on the Missouri lie outside the scope of normal state activity and have not been successfully handled by state governments in the past. This is quite true. It is also true that the same charge can be leveled against the federal government with equal justice. Indeed, the inability of the federal government to formulate and execute a satisfactory plan for the Missouri Basin is the very circumstance that prompted the Survey Commission to propose a new agency. Since, as the survey group repeatedly points out, both federal and state governments will have major responsibilities for the region's development, it would seem only logical that their efforts should be joint in character and that any new administrative organization should reflect this fact.

Finally, the Survey Commission is afraid that the compact will not be able to produce a satisfactory system of voting on the Missouri Basin agency. The report says:

The determination of this matter is subject to negotiation between the States and the Federal Government, but it involves the all-important question of determining the weight to be given to the Federal as contrasted with the States' interest in the development of the basin. This determination, in terms of voting power, would not be simple, and the process of negotiation could easily be snagged on this issue.

The process of negotiating a voting formula is much further along than this statement indicates. The proposed compact contains the specific voting arrangement already described in this article. The principal question raised in the Missouri States Committee was whether the federal representatives should vote as a unit and it was decided that this was a federal matter to be determined by Congress. Accordingly, it would seem overly pessimistic to discount the possibility of agreement.

In urging their plan in preference to a federal-interstate compact, the majority of the Commission argues that the compact involves such difficult questions that it will take many years to secure adoption by the state legislatures and Congress. In view of the need for reconciling the many divergent interests in the basin, it is likely that any proposal for solution of the difficult problem of basin organization will require considerable time to achieve acceptance. This is clearly evidenced by the long history of the Missouri controversy. It is difficult to see how the Commission's plan will gain any great time over the compact. First, the plan has yet to be put into specific statutory language. The formulation of such legislation will itself involve an extended process of negotiation, drafting, and debate. Second, the provision for state rejection contained in the Commission's proposal means that five state legislatures must be persuaded not to vitiate the plan by denying the new agency permission to function in their respective jurisdictions. True, the survey body's proposal only requires acquiescence by five main stem states in order to activate the basin agency, and it provides that if one or more of these states rejects the proposal Congress can determine whether to go ahead with the states that are willing. Are five states enough, let alone a smaller number?³⁷ The Commission minority favors the compact with its requirement for participation by seven states. They point out that the partial coverage of the Commission's plan would violate one of the guiding principles adopted by the survey body: "The program should be comprehensive for the basin as a whole and for all its land and water resources." The minority regard this possibility of a fragmented pattern of state acquiescence as unworkable. They point out that "In some States the Bureau of Reclamation, the Corps of Engineers, and other agencies would be operating through the majority's proposed commission. In other States the agencies would operate independently and without coordination."³⁸

³⁷ As has been noted, the compact requires assent by seven states. A table contained in the report of the Survey Commission shows 50% of Kansas and 76% of Wyoming as lying within the Missouri Basin. Participation by these states is required in the compact plan, but not in the Commission proposal. MBSC Report, p. 84, Table 1.

One of the most surprising contentions advanced by the Commission majority is that "If a compact is negotiated the Missouri Basin states may well find themselves involved in a very real 'superstate' that they can neither alter nor control." After all, the states will be directly represented in the proposed compact commission. Elsewhere the majority alleges that the compact proposal "places maximum control of resource development in the hands of the 10 basin States." The authors regard this contention as equally exaggerated, but in any event the two statements are difficult to reconcile. Once the states have acquiesced in the proposal of the survey group they have no representation, much less control, in the proposed basin agency.

The Survey Commission's observation that the compact lacks flexibility is not supported by the draft of the proposed instrument. The compact contains a clause permitting supplementary agreements on a wide variety of subjects among some or all of the party governments, including the United States.³⁹ Although such agreements cannot violate the basic principles of the original compact, they can be utilized to meet additional needs in all or any part of the basin as these may develop. It is certainly true that a compact among states is binding. But the states are no less bound by the Commission's proposal once they have acquiesced in its operation within their territory, and they are then bound without voice. Moreover, it should be remembered that the party governments can always withdraw from a compact by mutual consent.

All through its report, the Missouri Basin Survey Commission stresses the need for greater state participation in regional development in the Missouri Basin. For example, it says:

It is possible that the States may be isolated from the initial planning phase wherein the pattern of the region's development is set, and yet may participate in the project or detail planning of the means whereby the plan is to become reality. In a political or institu-

³⁸ MBSC Report, pp. 13, 14.

³⁹ "Any two or more of the participating states who by legislative action enter into supplementary agreements for the regulation and abatement of pollution may designate the Commission to act as a joint agency for this purpose. Any two or more of the member governments who by legislative action or constitutional authority enter into supplementary agreements for the development, management and maintenance of joint forests, preserves, parks or recreational areas or facilities, or for the development, use and management of water and related natural resources in addition to that provided by this compact may designate the Commission to act as a joint agency for any of these purposes. Except in those cases where all member governments join in such designation, the representatives in the Commission of any group of such designating governments shall constitute a separate section of the Commission for the performance of the function or functions so designated and with such voting rights for these purposes as may be stipulated in such agreement; provided that, if any additional expense is involved, the member governments so acting shall appropriate the necessary funds for this purpose." Draft Compact, Art. XI.

tional sense, the 10 basin States constitute, in combination, the Missouri River Basin, and as such they should by all means participate in the planning and determination of the goals of basin development.⁴⁰

Yet the majority report rejects the most essential element in encouraging state action by its failure to grant a degree of state responsibility in the consideration and formulation of policy and program in the valley. This failure to provide for regional representation, through the natural media for such regional representation—the state governments—is the most fundamental difference between the Survey Commission proposal and that of the Council of State Governments. The vital elements of the proposed compact are that it provides for representation of both the nation and the region and that it establishes the basic framework for regional organization in a single document accepted by both the national government and the governments of the basin states and open to further development in the region or any area thereof as need arises. This instrument would meet the need recognized by the Survey Commission when it remarks: "In a regional development program, the States and their political subdivisions must assume an active and responsible role, for they are integral units in the broad institutional framework of regional resource development." In fact, the compact method with its provision for regional representation could be used as the legal framework for any of the several mechanisms that have been proposed for the organization of the Missouri Valley.

As the Survey Commission indicates, rapid action may prove undesirable in the Missouri Basin with its difficult and controversial problems and conflicting interests. A democratic procedure with representation of both the national and regional interests is essential, although at times it is both slow and laborious. The coordinating machinery which would be established by the proposed compact furnishes such a procedure, whatever functions are assigned to that machinery. The Survey Commission's plan does not, however much it may make obeisance at the shrine.

⁴⁰ MBSC Report, p. 248.

LEGISLATIVE POLITICS IN CONNECTICUT

W. DUANE LOCKARD

Connecticut College

Although there is a voluminous literature on the organization and procedure of state legislatures, material on their politics is relatively sparse. The classic work of A. Lawrence Lowell, now more than a half-century old, still appears to be the chief reliance of scholars in the field.¹ Lowell's thesis was that parties were relatively insignificant in state legislatures; virtually the whole of the subsequent literature agrees with this.² In the case of the Connecticut legislature, it would seem that parties, far from being relatively insignificant, play a dominating role.³

I. THE EXTENT OF PARTY POWER IN THE CONNECTICUT GENERAL ASSEMBLY

The study of party influence in a legislature necessitates a two-level approach: analysis of the role of the party leadership and of the voting behavior of the party membership. Several questions must be answered with regard to the party leadership. Are the party leaders an identifiable and cohesive group? Do they develop a definite program for legislative consideration? Is their authority shared with factional leaders capable of frequent disruption of the party program? Are committee chairmen or party leaders in the stronger position for actually forming legislative policy? Do pressure group leaders work through the formal party leaders or do they attempt to build ad hoc legislative majorities for their bills through independent action? Can the majority party leaders put desired legislation through the legislature with reasonable certainty?

Objective answers to each of these questions indicate great strength in the ¹ "The Influence of Party Upon Legislation in England and America," Annual Report of the American Historical Association, 1901, Vol. 1, pp. 321-543.

² In a recent survey of legislative politics, Professor O. Douglas Weeks reported that his findings "in general substantiate the statement of Luce that 'everywhere except in New York there is much less partisanship than is commonly supposed' and that 'leadership is rarely now and in our time rarely has been a matter of party control'." See his "Politics in the Legislatures," National Municipal Review, Vol. 41, pp. 80-86, at p. 80 (Feb., 1952). William J. Keefe corroborates Weeks' views with regard to Illinois in his "Party Government and Lawmaking in the Illinois General Assembly," Northwestern University Law Review, Vol. 47, pp. 55-71 (March-April, 1952). Reports on New York and New Jersey, however, suggest that party has considerable influence in the legislatures of those states. See Warren Moscow, Politics in the Empire State (New York, 1948) and Dayton D. McKean, "A State Legislature and Group Pressures," Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, Vol. 179, pp. 124-30 (May, 1935). The latter, speaking of New Jersey, comments (at p. 127): "If a group is wise, it goes to the party leaders and not to the members of the committee in charge of the bill. The committee will almost always follow the advice of the leaders. . . . Party control of legislation is therefore much more stringent than in Congress."

³ After looking over materials suggesting the absence of party control in other states a former Connecticut legislator expressed surprise and commented: "I had always supposed they did things the way we do."

Connecticut General Assembly party leadership. Leadership on both sides of the aisle in both houses tends to be highly unified and cohesive. Normally this leadership consists of the state chairman of the party, the governor, a few chosen but powerful outside party leaders (e.g., heads of large city machines and heads of county organizations), and intra-legislative leaders such as the speaker of the House, the president pro tempore of the Senate, the majority and minority leaders, and the chairmen of the most important committees. Choices of these intra-legislative leaders, while formally made through election by the representatives and senators of the party in question, are in reality made by the state chairman and the governor. Assuming equal ability and backing, the chairman of the party not holding the governorship is relatively more powerful than his opposite number in the other party (by reason, of course, of the absence of gubernatorial competition), although his real power is obviously less, since he does not have the patronage and authority of the governorship to back him up. Ordinarily, however, his "suggestions" are enough to assure the selection of approved intra-legislative leaders.

During sessions of the General Assembly the "outside" party leaders are in daily attendance at the capitol and can be seen in corridor conferences with the great and small alike. Each party chairman sits in on his respective party policy conferences and not infrequently he is the real leader of the conference. With few exceptions the men who reach the party pinnacle of the state chairmanship can expect (and they certainly receive) proper deference from their fellows in the legislature, and, significantly, most party chairmen in recent years have been men of considerable experience in the General Assembly. Since about half the legislators of any given session are serving their first terms—with all the confusion that this usually implies—the experience and prestige of the party chairmen are important factors.

The leaders of both parties develop definite party legislative programs covering almost every important issue of state-wide significance, although this does not cover the whole area of potential policy enactments by any means. There is some competition in the formulation and carrying out of this program, of course, as factional leaders in both parties do not always share the relatively uniform views of the leadership on all matters, but these factional leaders are definitely of secondary importance to the party leaders. On occasion factional leaders can effect compromises on certain issues, but instances of outright rebellion are rare and cases of successful rebellion rarer still. Committee chairmen, carefully chosen by the leaders (and not on the basis of a seniority rule), are in a subordinate position; they are contributors to the party program, not successful competitors of the leaders in policy formation. Virtually without exception, pressure group leaders endeavor to win over the party leaders rather than the membership at large.⁴ There is some pressure group effort to "educate" General Assembly members through letters and circulars and conversation, but

⁴ One pressure group representative told the writer that it was useless to ask even committee chairmen to take specific actions, for the inevitable question from the legislator was "What does the boss say about this?"

TABLE I. AVERAGE INDICES OF COHESION* ON ROLL CALLS IN THE CONNECTICUT GENERAL ASSEMBLY: 1931-1951

Year	No. of Votes		Senate Indices		House Indices
	Senate	House	Dem.	Repub.	Dem.	Repub.
1931	21	18	95.0	98.6	80.8	90.8
1933	88	17	75.1	96.9	91.5	76.1
1935	53	22	81.7	89.8	89.4	81.5
1937	18	13	83.0	81.0	88.0	80.2
1939	49	11	78.6	64.3	91.8	84.3
1941	14	10	66.0	78.2	80.9	76.6
1943	30	17	88.4	88.6	86.8	80.0
1945	10	14	89.9	79.2	87.3	84.0
1947	22	8	90.3	86.2	83.9	77.3
1949	35	14	88.4	79.2	99.7	99.0
1951	8	4	100.0	96.0	52.1	74.5

* The index of cohesion is a measure of the degree of party unity devised by Stuart Rice. See his Quantitative Methods in Politics (New York, 1928), p. 209. Rice's formula indicates not only that a certain proportion of the party voted together but also the exact degree to which the party was effectively unified. By first determining the percentage of the party which voted either way on a roll call it is possible to calculate the deviation between absolute cohesion (or unanimity) for an index of 100, and complete disunity (with a 50-50 split) for an index of 0. In other words, a group of 100 persons who voted 75-25 on an issue would have an index of 50, not 75, since their deviation from complete unity is not one-quarter but one-half. The figures used in the table are averages of the several indices of the votes of the session, and therefore provide a fair test of the overall degree of party effectiveness during the session. All record votes for the eleven sessions were used with the exception of 116 marathon votes in the Senate at the opening of the 1935 session, when the major parties were seeking the support of the Socialists who held the balance of power. To have included these would have needlessly inflated the overall percentages for regularity. Unanimous votes are included, though they are infrequent. Special sessions are excluded.

usually this is an effort more to get to the party leaders by indirect means than to build up a majority from the membership contrary to the wishes of the leadership.

Does the voting on roll calls in the General Assembly reflect the attitudes and activities of the leadership? Do the party members vote as a unit when the chips are down and important issues come up for a vote? Or do they freely cross party lines and form factional groups voting with the leadership today and against it tomorrow? As the data in Table I indicate, each party sticks together with a high degree of consistency.

Unlike several other states (e.g., New York and Illinois), Connecticut has no constitutional requirement that every bill be passed by roll-call vote. As a result, there are fewer roll calls than is the case under the mandatory system, but roll calls when used are less likely to be perfunctory gestures and more apt to be tests of strength either within or between the parties. Consequently the high indices of cohesion of Table I are all the more striking. Note that at the very lowest point for the Senate the average index of cohesion was 64.3 and for the House 52.1—in other words over 75 per cent of the party voted together during their “worst” sessions. The rule, however, is very different from these exceptions, as these averages of all annual indices show:

	Senate	House
Republicans	86.2	82.9
Democrats	82.5	86.7

During one session (1951) no Democratic senator cast a single vote in opposition to his party colleagues.

Unanimous roll calls yield an index of cohesion of 100 for each party. If the average indices included a large number of unanimous roll calls, the high indices would merely indicate concurrence among all legislators rather than the existence of highly disciplined party groups. In fact, only 7.3 per cent of the Senate votes and only 3.3 per cent of the House votes were unanimous. In the Senate, majorities of the two parties were on opposite sides of the question 83.5 per cent of the time and in the House 80.7 per cent. The data in Table II, showing the frequency distribution of the indices of cohesion, further illustrate the consistency of party solidarity.

Unfortunately there are few similar studies with which the Connecticut data can be compared, but where data are available the contrast is striking. A recent analysis of the Illinois General Assembly, for example, which used a different method for computing party cohesion, presents a sharply contrasting pic-

TABLE II. DISTRIBUTION OF ROLL CALLS, CONNECTICUT GENERAL ASSEMBLY, 1931-1951, ACCORDING TO INDEX OF COHESION OF PARTY GROUPS IN SENATE AND HOUSE

Index of Cohesion	House				Senate
	Democratic		Republican		Democratic		Republican
	No.	%	No.	%	No.	%	No.	%
90-100	112	75.6	83	56.0	190	54.5	234	67.2
80-89.9	12	8.1	25	16.9	25	7.2	39	11.1
70-79.9	4	2.7	11	7.4	22	6.3	22	6.3
60-69.9	8	5.4	8	5.4	54	15.5	9	2.6
50-59.9	4	2.7	5	3.4	15	4.3	9	2.6
40-49.9	4	2.7	2	1.3	11	3.2	7	2.1
30-39.9	0	.0	3	2.1	6	1.8	14	4.0
20-29.9	1	.7	10	6.8	15	4.3	5	1.4
10-19.9	3	2.1	0	.0	3	.9	7	2.1
0-9.9	0	.0	1	.7	7	2.1	2	.6
	148	100.0	148	100.0	348	100.0	348	100.0

ture of the role of party.⁵ In his Illinois study, William Keefe employs a variation of the "party vote" formula used by Lowell; that is, he calculates the number of roll-call votes "in which 80 per cent or more of one party voted on one side of the question while 80 per cent or more of the other party voted the opposite position."⁶ By this means he found that during the two sessions the percentage of party voting never exceeded 4.4 per cent, whereas similar calculations for Connecticut show that party voting percentages often went as high as 90 per cent and rarely below 50 per cent.⁷

A caveat must be entered, however, about these data. The index of cohesion is a more reliable indicator of party unity than the "party vote" method, and yet either can be misleading. Such statistics conceal the issue behind the roll call; in one sense lumping all votes together is like discussing units of variable volume. One does not speak of a thousand units of wheat where a mixture of grains, bushels, and carloads is involved. In the case of roll-call voting, some votes will be on matters of no consequence to the party; on these the party leaders make no effort to line up their forces. On other votes, highly important matters of policy may be involved, and the leaders may be pushing every member to conform. A party split in the latter type of vote is by no means equivalent to a split in the former type.

Still, corroborating evidence indicates strongly that these average indices for Connecticut do not greatly exaggerate the level of party consistency in matters of general significance to the state. Indeed, for some years the average understates the case, since the leadership during these years never lost control on any significant roll call, although some members may have voted contrary to the party position, either because they were given permission to do so (for local constituency reasons) or because (in a very few cases) they were independent enough not to care about the attitudes of their leaders. The effectiveness of the House majority leadership (which except for three sessions in the 1870's has been Republican since the Civil War) demonstrates the point. In the period

⁵ Keefe, "Party Government and Lawmaking in the Illinois General Assembly" (cited in note 2).

⁶ Ibid., p. 58.

⁷ Congress presents another striking contrast. V. O. Key, Jr. in his Southern Politics in State and Nation (New York, 1949) studied congressional roll calls in both houses and found (p. 370) that for the sessions studied during the 1930's and 1940's the Senate and House had the following "proportion of roll calls on which each [party] registered an index of cohesion of 70 or more (an equivalent of an affirmative or negative vote of 85 per cent or more of the group)":

	Senate	House
Republicans	32.4%	53.8%
Democrats	21.6	43.6

Compare this with data similarly calculated for the Connecticut General Assembly for the period 1931-1951:

	Senate	House
Republicans	85.4%	79.7%
Democrats	68.7	85.1

1931–1951 there were four sessions (1931, 1939, 1945, 1949) when the Republican leadership never once failed to push through any bill put to a record-vote test; yet the average indices of cohesion in these four sessions show something less than perfect consistency. During these years the will of the leadership prevailed on every single vote of significance to the party, and this does not mean party and patronage matters alone, but matters of general social and economic policy as well.

The effectiveness of the Republican leadership in the House is also shown by examination of the bills which they could not get through the House. Between 1931 and 1951 there were 148 roll-call votes in the House, and of all these (if we exclude for the moment bills on which the party did not exert pressure—women jury service, birth control, gambling and horse racing) there were only seven bills on which the Republican leaders either needed Democratic help (one bill) or failed to carry enough Republican votes to win. One of these losses was erased after a day's effort by the leaders to bring their people into line. There was then a net total of 6 losses out of 148 possibilities. Equally indicative is this fact: of these 148 roll calls there were but 26 on which there was a divergence of more than 10 per cent of the Republican membership from the position taken by their leaders.

We are often assured that in the state legislatures the party's influence in matters of purely party concern—e.g., patronage—may be high, but that the party only infrequently musters its strength on matters of broad governmental policy. During the two decades under study, however, the greatest dissension was caused not by broad policy issues but by matters of concern to the party organization qua organization. At least 9 of the 26 issues noted above (on which there was significant party cleavage among House Republicans) were concerned with general patronage matters, specific appointments, or other intra-party squabbles. The remaining bills were labor and agriculture bills and two proposals to change the state legislature—all issues which caused friction between the component segments of the party.

The evidence leads inescapably to the conclusion that the membership of the General Assembly has relinquished to the leadership the power to formulate substantive policy decisions. Yet the formulation of these policies is inevitably a compromise reflecting the different components of the parties. At times, when contentious issues threaten to pull the party apart, the leaders will refrain from pressing the matter to a vote. Groups within the party are thus not powerless when matters of importance to them or their constituencies arise, and yet with all the compromising within and between the parties, the final and almost invariably binding decisions are made by the party leaders themselves, not by isolated leaders of blocs, whether regional, social, or economic.

II. THE BASES OF PARTY CONTROL

Why does party leadership dominate the scene in Connecticut? How have the leaders arrogated to themselves this measure of authority over policy enactments? These are questions not easily answered; however, the following are all contributing factors even though they may fall short of complete explanation.

Party Strength. Organizationally speaking, Connecticut parties are strong. As the only state which has not yet adopted the party primary election, Connecticut finds that the convention method of nomination of state and local officers has helped maintain leadership control of the party organization. While it is true that a primary does not give the voters "control" over a political organization, still the primary introduces an "outside" influence so far as the inner organization is concerned—it establishes a permanent modus operandi for factional rebellion, something not readily available under the convention system. As a consequence Connecticut parties tend to be strong at the apex, and, needless to say, the top management of the party concentrates upon the activities of the General Assembly.

Party Competition. In social group behavior it is common for sharp competition between groups to stimulate high levels of cohesion within the groups. The very struggle for power tends to emphasize the need for internal unity. In part, however, this depends upon whether there is a real opportunity for gaining power, and in Connecticut the battle between the two parties is remarkably even. Nearly all state elections over the last two decades have been decided by very small margins. (Of the last 11 gubernatorial elections, 9 have been won by margins no greater than 2 per cent of the total vote cast.) Winning these elections—especially those for the governorship—is important to the party since it means patronage, prestige, and political initiative. General Assembly members—who are, after all, politicians—are anxious for victory at the polls and thus during legislative sessions much corridor talk is concerned with the possible public impact of the party program. In regular caucus meetings (toward the end of the session caucuses meet almost daily), appeals to the members in terms of the next election are not uncommon. Other things being equal, this can have a considerable effect.

Ideological Similarities. There are broad areas of ideological agreement within each of the major parties in Connecticut. This is an important consideration, since obviously the degree to which any group can be held together in their actions will depend upon the area of agreement prevailing within the group. Sharp differences of opinion—such as the existence of conservative Democrats in the congressional Democratic party—naturally make it difficult to present a united front. But in Connecticut there is no group to compare with the Dixiecrats in the Democratic party and no La Follette, Norris, or Morse among the Republicans. The general division of the two parties along urban-rural and -suburban lines (Democrats, urban; Republicans, rural and suburban) has tended to produce a cleavage along liberal-conservative lines, which, of course, facilitates the task of the party leaders in getting party unity.⁸

⁸ It is also worth noting that there is little sectional cleavage in the state, since Connecticut is small and does not have any large city dominating the rest of the state as in the case of Massachusetts, Illinois, and New York. Thus, again, the divisions tend to follow party lines, not extraneous factors.

Party Discipline. As a final resort, party leaders in Connecticut will at times discipline legislators either because of factional shifts which cut the ground from under the individual or because of disloyalty to the party program. Discipline can extend to a denial of renomination for the General Assembly and, of course, denial of higher offices on the state level, but in more subtle ways it can make the individual very ill at ease while in the legislature, both through social pressures and through refusal to grant legislative time for pet projects which the legislator wants to enact for his home town. Disciplinary action is not brought against every legislator who happens to step out of line (for some, refusal of renomination would be impossible, since they control the local nominating caucus), but for a good many legislators, and especially the ambitious ones, it remains a fearsome weapon and its ominous existence in the party armory is not easily forgotten.

In view of the widely held notion that parties are of minor influence in the state legislatures, what is the significance of the Connecticut situation? Is it only the exception which proves the rule? Perhaps this is the case, but the writer is not convinced. Even assuming the accuracy of Lowell's description of the legislature circa 1900, half a century's political change must be accounted for. The extraordinary degree of party influence in Connecticut suggests the need for further empirical analysis, since what little evidence we have on the contemporary situation is conflicting.

"REFLECTIONS OF A LAW PROFESSOR ON INSTRUCTION AND RESEARCH IN PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION": AN EXCHANGE

Published below is a discussion by Professor Joseph P. Harris of Kenneth Culp Davis' article, "Reflections of a Law Professor on Instruction and Research in Public Administration," which appeared on pages 728-52 of the September, 1953 issue of the REVIEW. Professor Harris' comments are followed by Professor Davis' reply. (Ed.)

Teachers of public administration will welcome the challenging and provocative article of Professor Kenneth Culp Davis, "Reflections of a Law Professor on Instruction and Research in Public Administration," which appeared in the September issue of the REVIEW. It is my purpose to reply to some of his criticisms, to agree with him in some regards, and to discuss some of the issues which he raises. I am in entire agreement with him about the merits of the case method in teaching public administration, and I imagine that there would be little disagreement by other teachers of the subject, though as yet the collection and publication of cases suitable for undergraduate instruction has not reached the point where the use of texts of the conventional type may be discontinued. One of the first efforts to prepare and publish cases on public administration was undertaken fifteen years ago by the Committee on Public Administration of the Social Science Research Council when I was a member of its staff, and resulted in three volumes which were published in 1940 and the following years. The Stein collection is a vast improvement over the earlier case studies, and is being widely used, particularly in graduate courses. The cases were produced by the cooperative efforts of teachers of public administration at a number of leading universities.

In most undergraduate courses on public administration, however, I assume that one of the standard texts or books of readings continues to be used, and the Stein collection is used, if at all, only as supplemental readings. Despite Professor Davis' strictures to the contrary, there are a number of excellent texts on the subject, which would compare favorably with texts in other fields, and especial mention should be made of the three outstanding books of readings and materials on public administration—by Lepawsky, Nigro, and Waldo—which have recently appeared.

The method of instruction in public administration is attacked by Professor Davis on the ground that it is "plain exposition in summary form, mostly abstract and general. Problems are almost entirely absent. Even the occasional illustrations tend to be abstract or general" (p. 729). To support this sweeping generalization, he quotes three sentences on the subject of judicial control of administration taken from the text by Professor White, and refers briefly to President Conant's criticisms of the Harvard School of Public Administration in his last report. And yet throughout his article Professor Davis takes writers in the field of public administration to task for making generalizations not based on intensive study of the subject!

The conventional method of instruction in public administration is only partially reflected by the standard texts which are used. As a teacher of the subject over a period of thirty years I would hesitate to venture generalizations about the methods used by others, for unquestionably they vary considerably from one institution to another. I assume that instructors usually assign as supplementary readings materials drawn from an extensive literature on the subject—official reports, studies and surveys of government operations, and many monographs and articles dealing with individual agencies or particular aspects of administration. The Hoover Commission reports, for example, are only one of a series of such reports dealing with the national government; there are many similar studies dealing with state and local government, and many official and unofficial studies of particular agencies or operations. Perhaps if Professor Davis had selected for analysis some of the notable monographic studies of particular aspects of administration published recently by such scholars as Appleby, Buck, Carpenter, Dimock, Emmerich, Fesler, Gaus, Gulick, Graham, Hardin, Huzar, Key, Kingsley, Latham, Lepawsky, Lipson, Maass, Macmahon, Mansfield, McKinley, McConnell, McCamy, Millett, Pritchett, Reining, Simon, Stone, Tead, Waldo, White, and Wilmerding—to mention some of the leading authors in the field—he would have gained quite a different impression of the research and writing on public administration. The generalizations contained in the texts are not pulled out of thin air, but for the most part are based upon an extensive body of careful, detailed, scholarly studies. This is not to say, of course, that we do not need much more intensive research. We are barely on the threshold of a scientific study of public administration.

To illustrate the type of abstract and inaccurate generalizations found in public administration texts, Professor Davis cites the following passage from the work of Professor White: "The foundation of judicial control over administrative acts rests in the Anglo-American doctrine of the rule of law," which is followed by a quotation from Dicey that every official from the Prime Minister down is responsible before the courts. This rule of law, states White, "has been universally accepted." Such a generalization, Professor Davis contends, has little meaning to the student and moreover is quite inaccurate. He then shows how the subject of the responsibility of public officials for their acts could be much better taught by the case method, using as an example a case brought by the owner of a herd of livestock which was killed on the order of an inspector who found them infected with anthrax. Professor Davis makes a cogent argument for the use of the case method, illustrating how the pertinent problems and effects of a rule of law can be raised for discussion, and cites leading American court decisions which have held that public officers are not liable for judicial decisions, whether made by a judge or an administrator. He concludes that Dicey's famous rule, instead of being "universally accepted," has been generally rejected.

In fairness to Professor White, however, several things need to be said. First, the quotation from Dicey is to the effect that public officials of all ranks are subject to the law, and that their acts are reviewable by the courts. The reference to the Prime Minister is, of course, inaccurate with respect to tort actions, but this is so well understood that Professor White can hardly be criticized for failing so to state. (Curiously, the Prime Minister of the Province of Quebec in a recent case was held liable in a tort action.¹) Second, Professor White was discussing not merely the tort liability of public officers, but the wider topic of judicial review of administrative actions. Third, he discusses at some length the qualifications which have been made of the general principle, as well as the varying practice, concluding with the following words: "As a result, it is practically impossible to state any general conclusion as to the actual extent or limits of court review of official decisions" (p. 577). Moreover, he also discusses the effects of tort liability on administrative actions, and uses the same illustration of the destruction of diseased cattle on the order of a health inspector. This single quotation hardly supports Professor Davis' sweeping condemnation of public administration texts.

Professor Davis is not accurate in his unqualified statement (p. 731) that Dicey's rule of law has been rejected in England and generally rejected in this country. The principle that the acts of public officials are reviewable in courts of law is still good law in both countries, but with important qualifications which Professor White is careful to point out. In England the idea that municipal corporations are not liable for the torts of their officers never took root. Except in the exercise of discretionary powers, the acts of officers of the Crown have also been generally subject to tort actions, and in 1947 an act was passed by Parliament in which the government assumed liability in such cases. The test in British law is whether in the act complained of the officer was acting within his discretionary powers; unless it can be shown that his act was within the discretion delegated to him, it is reviewable in court. It would appear to the writer that Professor White's discussion of the reviewability of administrative acts by the courts, instead of being "misinformation" and seriously in error, is, indeed, a fair statement of the general principle.

Although Professor Davis does not cite evidence to support his sweeping criticism of public administration texts, and the illustration which he gives is not a happy one, there is nevertheless considerable truth in his accusation. That teachers of public administration are also critical of the available teaching materials is indicated by the cooperative effort which has resulted in the Stein collection of cases. Abstract generalizations, which are a common feature of textbooks generally, fail to provide the student with a clear grasp of administrative processes and behavior, and often fail to raise problems and issues with which he must grapple to understand the subject. To some extent this deficiency is met by the instructor, who introduces actual cases and illustrations in order to make generalizations meaningful. Able administrators, however, have complained to the writer that graduates who have taken public administration courses often have quite inaccurate ideas about how actual administration is conducted.

¹ Roncarelli v. Duplessis, 1.D.L.R. 680 (1952) (Quebec Superior Ct., 1951).

Many teachers of public administration have been dissatisfied with the emphasis placed in texts on the staff functions of government—personnel, finance, planning, public relations—and with the inadequate treatment of policy preparation and determination and of the impact of politics on administration. The student preparing for an administrative career needs the kind of education which will enable him to assist in the preparation of public policies. This is more important than training in classification or budgeting techniques. It is not easy, however, to prescribe the kinds of instruction which will be of greatest value to the student in preparing him for future assignments dealing with program and policy development. He needs, among other things, an understanding of the legislative process, the role and techniques of pressure groups, and the factors which influence public opinion, and at least some acquaintance with economics, statistics, sociology, and American history. Since almost every act of the public administrator is affected by legislation and by judicial decisions, he needs instruction in constitutional and administrative law. Perhaps most of all he needs to develop skills in analysis and effective writing.

All of this may be summarized by saying that the future administrator needs above all else a broad, liberal education rather than an excess of instruction in administrative techniques and methods. He needs not only to develop an inquiring mind, but also to have his interest in public affairs aroused. The rewards of the public administrator are to be found in human satisfactions derived from participating in significant public programs, rather than in monetary compensation. In this regard public administration texts deserve praise, for they treat the public service as a worthy profession, and not, as often represented, as corrupt and contented. To a considerable extent they indicate standards of desirable practice—"what-to-do"—which Professor Davis significantly suggests should be taught to future lawyers.

Professor Davis criticizes the literature of public administration for relying unduly "upon abstraction and perspective, and not enough upon close investigation"; for studying the forest as "patches of green on the hillsides" instead of concentrating on the trees. As evidence in support of this general criticism, he cites and discusses in some detail the part of the Report of the President's Committee on Administrative Management in 1937 which relates to independent regulatory commissions. This part of the Report of the President's Committee, it may be noted, occupies three printed pages—hardly an adequate sample of writings on public administration. Furthermore, the Report was in no sense a research study, and no one ever asserted that it was. The terms of reference of the President's Committee on Administrative Management in 1936 were quite different from those of the Hoover Commission eleven years later. It did not undertake an intensive study of the numerous departments, commissions, and other agencies of the federal government, nor did it offer specific recommendations concerning needed changes in their organization and administration—a task which it considered beyond its facilities and allotted time. The Committee believed that it would be impracticable to attempt at one time the detailed and intensive studies of the vast federal government which should precede specific changes in organization and procedures. It regarded this job as a continuing one which should be recognized as a function of management, and accordingly recommended that the President and other executive officers of the government be equipped with the necessary staff and with legislative authority to make such studies from year to year, and to put into effect needed improvements under suitable safeguards.

One may disagree with this position of the Committee, which was basic to all of its recommendations, but criticism of it for failure to make intensive research studies, which it never claimed to make, is hardly justified, particularly since it specifically recommended that such studies be made before reorganizations or other changes were put into effect. The Committee had a research staff of about twenty persons for a period of approximately two months. They were specifically instructed not to conduct research studies, but rather to prepare exploratory studies and memoranda concerning areas in which improvement in organization and administration were thought to be needed. In almost all instances they were persons who had already carried on research in the subjects to which they were assigned. Many of the memoranda were subsequently published, though this was not originally intended. A number were excellent studies, but this was possible only because the authors were already familiar with the subject. The total expenditures of the Committee were less than $60,000, which may be compared with an expenditure of several million dollars by the Hoover Commission.

Professor Davis attacks the findings and recommendations of the Committee with regard to independent regulatory commissions as ill-conceived, theoretical, impractical, "naive," and not based on careful study of the actual operations of the commissions. The major recommendation of the Committee concerning independent regulatory commissions was that Congress should stop creating them, for if the recent trend continued it would not be long until there would be fifty or more such commissions, insulated to some extent from executive direction and coordination. In this recommendation the Committee was following a well-beaten path, for many surveys of state government contained similar findings and recommendations. It criticized the delegation of executive functions to such commissions—"duties of administration and policy determination with respect to which they ought to be clearly and effectively responsible to the President"—but recognized that with respect to their judicial functions "they ought to be wholly independent of the Executive" (Report, p. 36). Although the Committee made no specific recommendation for the reorganization of individual commissions, it put forward as a "possible solution" a proposal that their administrative functions be separated from their judicial functions, with the former being placed under executive control and the latter remaining independent.

Much of Professor Davis' criticism of the President's Committee Report was directed not at the Report itself, but rather at certain statements found in the staff study of Professor Robert E. Cushman, which was published later. The staff studies should not be confused with the Report of the Committee. It should be noted that Professor Cushman continued his research on the subject, at the suggestion and with the aid of the members of the President's Committee, and in 1941 published a volume, The Independent Regulatory Commission, which deals with the experience both in this country and in Great Britain.

Professor Davis asserts that this plan "crumbled" under the scrutiny of congressional committees as soon as the "rudimentary facts about adjudication were brought out," and that Dr. Gulick, testifying for the Committee, could not answer "even the simplest questions about specific application of the broad proposal" (p. 736). This is harsh condemnation of the Committee and its Report. Dr. Gulick testified before the Select Committee of the Senate that a careful study of the work of each commission would be necessary before making any attempt to reorganize its activities along the lines suggested by the Committee, and that no single plan could be applied to all commissions—a position entirely consistent with the recommendations of the Committee. Congress was unwilling to grant to the President the authority to reorganize the independent regulatory commissions, but the Report of the Committee has evidently had considerable effect in halting the trend to create additional commissions, and when Congress established a new regulatory agency in the field of civilian aviation, it followed, in the main, the recommendation of the Committee. It may be noted that when Congress enacted legislation providing for the regulation of civilian aviation in 1938 (52 Stat. 973), it followed, in the main, the plan recommended by the President's Committee. Executive functions were segregated from judicial functions and were placed under an Administrator who was made directly responsible to the President and largely independent of the regulatory body, though placed within the Authority. By the Reorganization Plans of 1940 the Authority, including the Administrator and the members of the regulatory body (now designated as the Civil Aeronautics Board), were placed in the Commerce Department. The principal effect of this change was to place the Administrator under the Secretary of Commerce. The Board retained its independence, which is in conformity with the broad recommendations of the President's Committee.

It is significant that the Hoover Commission, whose studies and Report Professor Davis commends, made a similar, though less sweeping recommendation, that executive functions be taken out of the independent commissions and be transferred to the appropriate executive department. The Task Force Report on Regulatory Commissions stated: "The very qualities which make these agencies valuable for regulation, especially group deliberation and discussion, make them unsuited for executive and operating activities Ordinarily, we believe, such operating functions should be placed in the regular departments where they may be carried out under executive supervision and responsibility" (p. 30). And the Commission itself stated in its report on Regulatory Commissions: "Purely executive functions too frequently have been entrusted to these independent regulatory commissions. The consequences have not been too happy, for a plural executive is not the best device for the performance of operations duties. Moreover, these duties commonly call for close integration with the broad programs of the executive program" (p. 11).

Throughout his article Professor Davis accuses writers in public administration of using abstract theory and sweeping generalizations without thorough and intensive factual studies. He is particularly critical of the President's Committee on Administrative Management for its statement that the creation of regulatory commissions outside of the executive branch does "violence to the theory of the American Constitution that there should be three major branches of the Government and only three." Where, inquires Professor Davis, is the proof that there should be only three? This statement by the Committee lies outside of the field of public administration; it is rather an interpretation of the spirit of the Constitution. The Committee is entitled to its opinion, and Professor Davis to his, but it is suggested that if he were to pursue his inquiry further he might find more support for the interpretation of the Committee than for his own.

I am entirely in agreement with Professor Davis that intensive research is sorely needed on the actual operations of regulatory commissions and on the broader subject of the regulatory process. It is not always possible, however, to delay recommendations until exhaustive research has been conducted. The recommendations of the Committee concerning independent regulatory commissions and their insistence that further studies should be made before any steps were taken to carry out their proposed plan hardly supports the general statement of Professor Davis that political scientists are prone to accept theory without factual investigation.

I do not care to enter into any controversy with Professor Davis about his charges that public administration texts contain a high degree of misinformation about administrative law, and that the textwriters do not have a basic understanding of the subject. This is not within my special field of competence. My comments relate to the other parts of his article. One constructive result which may come from Professor Davis' article is greater attention to administrative law by teachers of public administration. His excellent suggestions of research topics on the regulatory process indicate his understandable emphasis on this subject, which is closely related to administrative law, but it may be pointed out that this is only one aspect of public administration.

I am in hearty agreement with Professor Davis concerning the importance of instruction in administrative law as a part of the education of future public administrators, but I do not share his views concerning the lack of understanding of the subject by political scientists who offer such courses. I also agree that in this course, as well as in others, the major objective is to impart understanding rather than information. I doubt that there would be any substantial difference of opinion on that score.

It is regrettable that the suggestive and challenging article of Professor Davis, with many major points of which I find myself entirely in accord, is marred by an unduly critical attitude indicated by his attack on certain passages as well as writers in public administration. I wish to dissent also to his thesis that generalization, theory, and abstractions should be postponed until adequate factual foundation has been laid through extensive and intensive studies of policy making. Factual studies unaccompanied by theory, generalizations, hypotheses, will usually be barren of results.

JOSEPH P. HARRIS.

University of California (Berkeley).

Professor Harris seems to be either entirely or mostly in agreement with four of the six major propositions asserted in the six sections of my article, and he neither agrees nor disagrees with one of the remaining two sections.

Although his criticism often has the flavor of disagreement, his apparent disagreement often evaporates upon close examination. For instance, in his final paragraph he asserts "dissent" from my view that generalization and theory should be postponed until adequate factual foundation has been laid. He says that "factual studies unaccompanied by theory, generalization, hypothesis, will usually be barren of results." Although he calls his view a "dissent," we both recognize that theory and investigation must interact upon each other. The position taken in my article is this: "Nor do I deny the utility of perspective or of theory, or of hypothesis based upon perspective. But perspective and theory should not be used as a substitute for detailed facts which a little investigation will make available."¹

Professor Harris expresses "heartly agreement" with my view that greater emphasis should be given to the regulatory process in public administration instruction: "One constructive result which may come from Professor Davis' article is greater attention to administrative law by teachers of public administration." He regards as "excellent" my effort to make constructive suggestions for research on specific political science aspects of the regulatory process. He expresses "entire agreement" with my emphasis upon advantages of the case method of instruction, and he also agrees that that method should not be exclusive. While partly disagreeing, he grants that "there is considerable truth" in my observations concerning undue generalization and abstraction in the texts.

Despite our substantial agreement on such a large portion of the area under discussion, further comment on three questions may be profitable: (1) the incidental point about Dicey's rule of law, (2) the major proposition concerning the President's Committee and independent regulatory agencies, and (3) my section on "Misinformation about Administrative Law," with which Professor Harris expresses neither agreement nor disagreement.

1. Professor Leonard White quotes Dicey for the proposition that "every official, from the Prime Minister down to a constable or a collector of taxes, is under the same responsibility for every act done without legal justification as any other citizen." Then White says: "This rule was brought to the United States as a part of the common law heritage and has been universally accepted."²

¹ P. 733.

I have asserted that Dicey and White are in error to the extent that "any other citizen" is liable in tort for acts done without justification, but that officials both in England and in the United States are generally immune from tort liability for discretionary acts.³

Professor Harris obfuscates the point by demonstrating, as if in opposition to my view, that courts often review administrative action and that the "rule of law" is not wholly rejected.⁴ His demonstration is not in opposition to my view; I am hardly unaware of judicial review, as nearly half my book on Administrative Law is devoted to that subject, and I agree that, just as we believe in the vague idea of "justice," we believe in the equally vague idea of "rule of law." But what I have called "Dicey's rule of law," that is, the manner in which Dicey makes the "rule of law" specific, is not and never has been "universally accepted." As Mr. C. E. S. Wade said in the introduction to the ninth edition of Dicey's book, Dicey "seems . . . not sufficiently to have regarded the immunities . . . [of] Crown servants."

Professor Harris concedes my principal point when he acknowledges: "The reference to the Prime Minister is, of course, inaccurate with respect to tort actions, but this is so well understood that Professor White can hardly be criticized for failing so to state." I think few readers, if any, will agree that in a student text a statement that is admittedly "inaccurate" is beyond criticism because the truth may be understood in some quarters.⁵

After acknowledging that the statements of Dicey and White were "inaccurate with respect to tort actions," Professor Harris goes on to insist that Dicey and White provided "a fair statement of the general principle." This is the equivalent of saying that even though officers are not liable in tort, it is a fair statement of the general principle to say that they are liable in tort.

2. Perhaps I am at fault in my criticism of the President's Committee on Administrative Management, for I have not succeeded in getting Professor ² White, Introduction to the Study of Public Administration, 3d ed. (New York, 1948), p. 575.

³ For a collection of authorities, see Davis, Administrative Law (St. Paul, 1951), pp. 801-7.

⁴ Professor Harris is wrong in assuming "that public officials of all ranks are subject to the law, and that their acts are reviewable by the courts." For a collection of judicial decisions, mostly of the Supreme Court of the United States, concerning administrative action which is not judicially reviewable, see Davis, Administrative Law, pp. 812-67.

Professor Harris lumps together tort liability of government and tort liability of officers, as if there were no difference.

⁵ Furthermore, Professor Harris misses the crucial fact that Dicey and White were not discussing merely the Prime Minister but "every official, from the Prime Minister down. . . ."

Harris to understand my principal idea. A restatement of my position may therefore be desirable.

The President's Committee proposed to split each regulatory agency into two sections. The Committee (which I have not confused with the staff) said in its Report: "The administrative section . . . would be directly responsible to the Secretary The judicial section . . . would be wholly independent of the department This proposed plan meets squarely the problems presented by the independent commissions. It creates effective responsibility for the administrative and policy-determining aspects of the regulatory job and, at the same time, guarantees the complete independence and neutrality for that part of the work which must be performed after the manner of a court."⁶

What the Committee called its "proposed plan" was based upon the erroneous assumption that "policy-determining aspects" could be separated from "that part of the work which must be performed after the manner of a court." The error can be more clearly seen in the language of the staff report on which the Committee's report was based: "The Administrative Section must not do judicial work The Judicial Section must not do policy-determining work."⁷ The objective was to subordinate policy-determining work to the Cabinet Officer and the President, and to maintain independence for judicial work.

Now, the idea that the staff, the Committee, and Professor Harris have apparently failed to grasp is that such a separation is intrinsically impossible because of the simple fact that the issues in the cases to be decided by the judicial section are often policy issues. If the Committee or its staff had made a little investigation, it would have discovered that fact. The Senate Committee quickly discovered the error, by calling in some people who understood adjudication.

Quite significant is the fact that at no point in his long discussion of the President's Committee does Professor Harris even attempt to defend the "proposed plan" on its merits.⁸

Professor Harris says that "the major recommendation of the Committee concerning the independent regulatory commissions was that Congress should stop creating them." Yet a page or so later he says that Congress in creating the Civil Aeronautics Authority in 1938 "followed, in the main, the plan recommended by the President's Committee." The 1938 Act, of course, made the CAA independent, and at all times during and after the five executive reorganizations, the regulatory functions of the CAA and CAB have been exercised by an independent agency.⁹

⁶ Report, p. 41.

⁷ Report, p. 230.

⁸ Professor Harris says that criticism of the Committee "for failure to make intensive research studies, which it never claimed to make," is unjustified, because the Committee's research staff "were specifically instructed not to conduct research studies." The Committee considered that the Report was based upon what the Committee itself at page viii of the printed Report called "research studies."

⁹ Professor Harris' statements about the 1938 Act creating the CAA are not in accord

Referring to the recommendation of the President's Committee, Professor Harris says that the Hoover Commission "made a similar, though less sweeping recommendation." The Hoover Commission's carefully-considered plan to transfer certain executive functions to the chairman of each agency has nothing in common with the ill-considered plan of the President's Committee to have adjudication conducted by officers who "must not do policy-determining work." And as for what Professor Harris calls "the major recommendation" of the President's Committee—to stop creating independent regulatory commissions—the Hoover Commission said very simply and without qualification: "This Commission believes that the independent regulatory commissions have a proper place in the machinery of our Government . . ."¹⁰

Professor Harris tries to defend the view of the President's Committee that "there should be three major branches of the Government and only three." He says that pursuing the inquiry further might lead to more support for the Committee's view than for my view.¹¹ It might. But Professor Harris ignores the fact that the inquiry has already been pursued much further than the Committee pursued it and that the findings are overwhelmingly adverse to the Committee. The detailed experience concerning coordination of independent agencies with other units of the government is fully set out in the mimeographed monographs prepared for the Hoover Commission's task force on the independent regulatory commissions. The task force, having the detailed experience before it, concluded that the idea of the President's Committee that independence of regulatory agencies impairs coordination is "based mainly on theoretical or doctrinal grounds and not on actual failures of coordination among agencies."¹² If the President's Committee had followed the method of these monographs—that of systematic and detailed factual investigation—many of its basic conclusions would have been radically different.

3. Professor Harris neither approves nor disapproves the section of my with the Act, which is printed at pages 973-1030 of volume 52 of the United States Statutes at Large. For instance, he says that the Administrator was "made directly responsible to the President and largely independent of the regulatory body, though placed within the Authority." His statement is inconsistent with many provisions, including §§201(b), 204(a), 206, 302(c), 305, and 308. For instance, §206: "The Authority shall make an annual report to the Congress. . . ." The only requirement for a report by the Administrator is §308, which provides: "The Administrator shall exercise . . . such powers and duties . . . as may, from time to time, be assigned to him by the Authority. . . . The Authority may request the Administrator to make reports to it of his work under this Act."

¹⁰ The Hoover Commission Report (New York, 1949), p. 429.

¹¹ If, as Professor Harris says, the question is one of "interpretation of the spirit of the Constitution," his position has no support in any Supreme Court opinion, and scores of Supreme Court decisions are against him.

¹² Task Force Report on Regulatory Commissions, pp. 25-26 (1949). It is regrettable that the monographs of the task force have not been printed and that only a limited number were mimeographed, for the literature of political science suffers for want of the information contained in them.

article entitled "Misinformation about Administrative Law." That section may be the most important. I fear that the extreme severity of my criticism may lead casual readers wrongly to assume that my assertions are largely hyperbole. Furthermore, some of the misinformation has been so much repeated in political science literature, one writer citing another, that many readers may be reluctant to believe that it is misinformation.

I hope that political scientists who write about administrative law will carefully examine each of my thirty or forty specific illustrations of misinformation, together with the explanation and documentation, and will reflect upon the reasons that may explain the extent of the misinformation.

KENNETH CULP DAVIS.

University of Minnesota.

Editor's note: Within the limits of space available, the REVIEW will be glad to publish a limited number of letters or comments relating to the section of Professor Davis' article to which he invites attention in the last two paragraphs of his reply to Professor Harris' discussion.

BOOK REVIEWS, NOTES, AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL ARTICLES.....	187
Survey of Background Material for the Study of the Government of East Africa. ROLAND YOUNG AND J. GUS LIEBENOW, JR.....	187
Materials for Undergraduate Study of the United Nations. WALDO CHAMBERLIN AND HARTLEY CLARK.....	204
REVIEWS OF BOOKS.....	212
Rossiter , Seedtime of the Republic: The Origin of the American Tradition of Political Liberty. CECELIA M. KENYON.....	212
Butler , The Electoral System in Britain, 1918-1951; Bulmer-Thomas , The Party System in Great Britain. WILLIAM S. LIVINGSTON.....	214
Feis , The China Tangle: The American Effort in China from Pearl Harbor to the Marshall Mission. KENNETH SCOTT LATOURETTE....	216
Holland (ed.) , Asian Nationalism and the West: A Symposium Based on Documents and Reports of the Eleventh Conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations. JOHN E. TURNER.....	218
Litchfield et al. , Governing Postwar Germany. HAROLD ZINK.....	220
Craig and Gilbert (eds.) , The Diplomats: 1919-1939. H. FIELD HAVILAND JR.....	222
Monnerot , Sociology and Psychology of Communism; Borkenau , European Communism. OSSIP K. FLÉCHTHEIM.....	223
Bontecou , The Federal Loyalty-Security Program. EGBERT S. WEN- GERT.....	225
Patterson , The Constitutional Principles of Thomas Jefferson. WILFRED E. BINKLEY.....	227
Galbraith , American Capitalism: The Concept of Countervailing Power; Lilienthal , Big Business: A New Era; Quinn , Giant Business: Threat to Democracy. GEORGE W. STOCKING.....	228
Nourse , Economics in the Public Service: Administrative Aspects of the Employment Act. CHARLES B. HAGAN.....	234
Hunter , Community Power Structure: A Study of Decision Makers. DONALD S. STRONG.....	235
BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY.....	238
AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS.....	238
FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT.....	247
INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS.....	257
POLITICAL THEORY, RESEARCH AND METHODOLOGY.....	268

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL ARTICLES

SURVEY OF BACKGROUND MATERIAL FOR THE STUDY OF THE GOVERNMENT OF EAST AFRICA

In the political experiment now taking place in East Africa, an attempt is being made to construct a multiracial political community from vastly different and heterogeneous peoples. The experiment, still in its early and formative stages, provides an opportunity to observe at first hand the creation of institutions and the development of attitudes and ideas for establishing a political community—or political communities, as is now the case. In the process, new institutions have been created, sometimes at a rapid pace, while at the same time some of the old tribal institutions have shown a remarkable ability to resist change and to project themselves into modern times with little or no modification. Political ideas imported from Europe and America in the West and from India in the East have influenced the political behavior of Africans, and of Europeans and Indians also; some reactions have been sympathetic while others have been hostile, as in the nativistic uprising of the Mau Mau. With all of the reality of the Mau Mau terror and of the nostrums of political agitators, there is, nevertheless, a vast amount of good will in East Africa, with people there who are willing to teach as well as to learn, to exercise restraint in the awkward manifestations of cultural conflict, and to develop a common pride in a common country.

This bibliography has been prepared to assist students in political science, and other social sciences as well, in securing an understanding of government in East Africa. The bibliographic sources in the United States are considerable, especially in official documentation, but there is a certain unbalance resulting from the paucity of Indian and Arab material and from the relatively meager sources on African social and political institutions. The compilers of the bibliography have been forced to be most eclectic in their selection of sources, for there are few systematic analyses of the area, and little uniformity in the use of concepts. We have drawn on memoirs of travelers and of residents, the monographs of anthropologists, the official records of governmental authorities, and special studies of particular topics in the area.

I. SURVEYS

For a reader interested in a general background of Africa, Lord Hailey's An African Survey (Oxford University Press, London, 1938) is unsurpassed. This useful volume is now being revised, and a new edition should be ready shortly. The Survey was prepared as an aid in determining the extent to which modern knowledge was being applied in meeting the problems of African development, and as such it is a well-written compendium of information on geography, ethnology, languages, population, political and social objectives, law and justice, native administration, non-European communities, problems of taxation, conditions of labor, agriculture, health, education, and economic development.

The geography of Africa plays such a large part in shaping the social institutions that a general knowledge of it is requisite for all research on Africa.

Walter Fitzgerald's Africa, A Social, Economic, and Political Geography of Its Major Regions (Dutton, New York, 7th ed., 1949), is a widely used, non-inspiring introduction to the area, containing a general description of the mineral resources, soils, transportation, and agricultural and economic development. The book is marred by the injection of Fitzgerald's numerous opinions and untested theories on sundry topics, but one may as well take the warning here that much of the writing on Africa has a bias. A revised edition is being prepared by Robert Steel of the School of Geography, Oxford. A more recent geographic treatise by L. Dudley Stamp, Africa, A Study in Tropical Development (John Wiley and Sons, New York, 1953), considers the geographical environment for human activity and the responses of various segments of the African population to that environment. It is lucidly written and gives a vast amount of essential background information. The recent volume prepared by a study group of the South African Institute of International Affairs, Africa South of the Sahara, edited by Anne Welsh (Oxford University Press, London, 1952), is less detailed. It is concerned with such topics as the physical background of Africa, the population and political framework, agricultural production, economic development, and communications, but it is uneven and incomplete, with a South African orientation. An excellent general introduction to the problems of tropical African resources may be found in the recent work of Pierre Gourou, Tropical World (Longmans, Green and Co., London, 1953).

Pictures of African life and of the African landscape are of considerable value in giving a clue to the nature of the land and the people. Although many books have their illustrations, Focus on Africa, by Richard U. and Mary Light (American Geographical Society, New York, 1941), has perhaps the most vivid ones. This records the flight in a private plane from Cape Town to Egypt, and there are many aerial photographs of East African scenes. These photographs illustrate in a dramatic fashion the physical layout of African settlement, the effects of soil erosion, and other features of the mainland territories, and there are some inspiring pictures of Kilimanjaro and Ruwenzori. The commentary is entertaining, if not penetrating, and there are factual accounts culled from standard sources.

A general knowledge of the various tribal groupings of East Africa is not easy to come by, for the groups and subgroups are numbered in the hundreds, and there is no good, general ethnographic source for the area. Diedrich Westermann's volume, The African Today and Tomorrow (Oxford University Press, London, 3d ed., 1949), is, however, an excellent introduction to the peoples of Africa. East African Background, by G. W. B. Huntingford and C. R. V. Bell (Longmans, Green and Co., London, 1950), was written initially for members of the armed forces in East Africa and has since been revised. It is a rewarding volume, giving an outline of the main features of African tribal life and a brief description of the East African tribes. Studies of individual tribal groups are continually being made; some of these are mentioned subsequently in the section on political and legal systems.

The surveys of East Africa proper have been made primarily by the journalist-traveler, and some of these writings are of a high standard. Mrs. Elspeth Huxley, Kenya-born, has written widely of East Africa, and her book, The Sorcerer's Apprentice; A Journey through East Africa (Chatto and Windus, London, 1948), is an arresting account of development and change in East Africa. Mrs. Huxley makes some salty comments, which are not everywhere appreciated, but she has a sharp eye, a broad background of knowledge, and a lively pen which give force to her writing. The most recent commentary has been written by Mona Macmillan, Introducing East Africa (Faber and Faber, Ltd., London, 1952); her observations on people, politics, and geography are an excellent introduction for a person unfamiliar with the area. Karen Blixen (Isak Dinesen) has told the story of her life on a Kenya coffee farm in Out of Africa (Random House, New York, 1938; Modern Library, 1952). This delightful volume, told with warmth and charm, is recommended as one of the finest pieces of literary writing on the East African scene.

The best single source on Uganda is the work by H. B. Thomas and Robert Scott, Uganda (Oxford University Press, London, 1935, 1949), which is both historical and descriptive and contains an excellent annotated bibliography of value for historical research. There is no comparable volume published for Kenya, Tanganyika, or Zanzibar. However, the small brochure published by the Colonial Office, The British Territories in East and Central Africa, 1945-1950 (Cmd. 7987/1950), is a useful compendium of the developments in the two areas since the war, and one can find an assortment of facts, both useful and extraneous, in Year Book and Guide to East Africa, 1953, published by the Union Castle Line (Robert Hale, Ltd., London, 1952).

II. HISTORICAL

A knowledge of East African history is of considerable value in understanding the present, and there are a number of excellent works on European and Arab contact with Africa which supply this need in part. The internal history of Africa has been indifferently developed, but plans are being considered for historians and archaeologists to combine their talents in common research on the topic. As for pre-history, the writings of L. S. B. Leakey are outstanding. The Arabs were in contact with Zanzibar and the coastal areas of what is now Kenya and Tanganyika for several centuries before the Europeans arrived in the fifteenth century. Sir Reginald Coupland, the British historian, has written the authoritative account of this early period in East Africa and Its Invaders, from the Earliest Times to the Death of Seyyid Said in 1856 (The Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1938). The subsequent period is covered in his volume, The Exploitation of East Africa, 1856-1890; the Slave Trade and the Scramble (Faber and Faber, Ltd., London, 1939). A first rate historical work, by Raymond Leslie Buell, is The Native Problem in Africa (The Macmillan Co., New York, 1928, 2 vols.). Although outmoded in some parts, this is still a fruitful source of information and contains some 400 pages on East Africa.

European interest in the interior of East Africa paralleled the exploits of the great explorers of the nineteenth century—missionaries, traders and administrators, and individuals in search of adventure. Ludwig Krapf, a German Lutheran working under the aegis of the British Church Missionary Society, has left us an interesting journal of his life as one of the first missionaries in East Africa: Travels, Researches, and Missionary Labours, during an Eighteen Years' Residence in East Africa (Trubner and Co., London, 1860). The volume gives one of the earliest accounts of the social and political organization of East African tribes, and is additionally interesting because of the adventures of Krapf and his colleagues, Rebmann and Erhardt, in discovering Mount Kilimanjaro and Mount Kenya. The diary of John Speke, Journal of the Discovery of the Source of the Nile (Harper and Bros., New York, 1864), is a revealing account of Speke's map-less travels through Tanganyika and Uganda in search of the headwaters of the Nile. Speke's description of the social and political organization of the Baganda and other major tribes in Uganda is among the earliest European writings on the people of this area.

The exploits of Henry M. Stanley were outstanding by any standard, and this sturdy explorer was instrumental in shaping the future political development of East Africa. Stanley's first volume, How I Found Livingstone; Travels, Adventures and Discovery in Central Africa (Harper and Bros., New York, 1872), manages to give an impression of the character of these two remarkable men whose lives became so strangely linked. Stanley's second African exploration is told in the volume, Through the Dark Continent, or The Sources of the Nile, Around the Great Lakes of Equatorial Africa, and Down the Livingstone River to the Atlantic Ocean (Harper and Bros., New York, 1878, 2 vols.). This is more than an amazing adventure story of a brave, autocratic, and resourceful explorer. Stanley's visit to Uganda and his successful appeal for missionaries to come to this area influenced the subsequent development of the region. A third adventure, described in the volume, In Darkest Africa; or The Quest, Rescue and Retreat of Emin, Governor of Equatoria (Harper and Bros., New York, 1890, 2 vols.), is an incredible story of politics, jungles, high adventure, and unbelievable personal fortitude. This episode also had political ramifications, and the British shortly thereafter declared a protectorate over Uganda. The story of the German Emin Pasha relief expedition is told by its commander, Dr. Carl Peters, in the volume bearing the preposterous title, New Light on Dark Africa, translated by H. W. Dulcken (Ward, Lock and Co., London, 1891). Stanley's journals have been edited by his wife, Dorothy Stanley, in the volume, The Autobiography of Sir Henry Morton Stanley (Houghton Mifflin Co., Boston, 1909). The discoveries of Livingstone are less significant for East Africa than for the areas to the south, although parts of Tanganyika were included in his orbit of discovery. See especially The Last Journals of David Livingstone in Central Africa (John Murray, London, 1874, 2 vols.).

A convenient anthology of African exploration has been compiled by Margery Perham and J. Simmons from the letters and diaries of eleven British explorers of tropical Africa in African Discovery: An Anthology of Exploration (Faber and Faber, Ltd., London, 1942). The anthology includes accounts of the journeys of Speke, Stanley, Livingstone, and Sir Samuel Baker, who discovered Lake Albert and was instrumental in breaking up the slave trade in northern Uganda. An unusual account of one of the most fabulous of the Arab explorers and slave-traders has been recorded by Heinrich Brode, Tippoo Tib, the Story of His Career in Central Africa, translated by H. Havelock (Edward Arnold, London, 1907). The rapacious Tippoo Tib tells of his search for ivory and slaves in what is now Tanganyika and of his associations with Livingstone and Stanley.

The missionaries arrived early in East Africa, and they have played a significant part in its development. One of the best general studies of the role played by the missions is the recent work of Roland Oliver, The Missionary Factor in East Africa (Longmans, Green and Co., London, 1952). Many missionaries have left vivid records of their African experiences, but their writings on various tribal groups have frequently been outmoded by time and by later, more rigorous, methodological studies.

Of the early European administrators, one of the most gifted was Sir Harry H. Johnston, who had remarkably developed talents in several fields, an inquiring and disciplined mind, and a facility in recording his materials. Johnston wrote widely, and an indication of the scope of his competence and interest may be seen in the following title of one of his works, The Uganda Protectorate: an Attempt to Give Some Description of the Physical Geography, Botany, Zoology, Anthropology, Languages and History of the Territories under British Protection in East Central Africa . . . (Hutchinson and Co., London, 1902, 2 vols.). There are many excellent and rewarding works on this early period which will not be cited here, including those by Lugard, Jackson, Thomson, and Tucker.

III. AFRICAN POLITICAL AND LEGAL SYSTEMS

Detailed studies of pre-European African political systems have been undertaken largely by anthropologists or administrators and less systematic studies by missionaries, traders, travelers, and other persons in the field. For the most part, analyses of political institutions have been subordinated to other interests, and there has been little uniformity in vocabulary, concepts, or methods. An attempt to arrive at some significant generalizations on African political organization has been made by eight anthropologists, whose case studies appear in African Political Systems, edited by Meyer Fortes and E. E. Evans-Pritchard (Oxford University Press, London, 1940). The introduction stands as one of the best political essays on comparative politics in the literature.

The cases fall into broad groups. The first group, which includes K. Oberg's study of the Banyankole of Uganda, exhibits well-defined political structures with administrative machinery, judicial institutions, and centralized authority having a monopoly over the use of force. In these tribes there are cleavages of wealth, privilege, and status which correspond to the distribution of power and authority. The second group, which includes the Bantu Kavirondo of Kenya as described by Gunther Wagner, reveals the lack of well-defined political structures and sharp social cleavages. In these societies the lineage and clan system and the age-set system perform political as well as social functions. In the absence of chiefs, the use of force is diffused among the various units of the tribe.

East Africa possesses fewer examples than West Africa of well-integrated kingdoms and empires, and of those which have been studied practically all are in Uganda. In addition to Oberg's account of the Kingdom of Ankole, included in the above-mentioned case study, there is an earlier ethnography by John Roscoe, The Banyankole (The University Press, Cambridge, Eng., 1923). Roscoe spent over twenty-five years in Africa as a missionary, and although his study of the Banyankole is considered by some anthropologists to be incomplete and inexact, his description of the two ethnically distinct classes, the ruling Bahima and the serf Bairu, is more detailed than the Oberg study. Roscoe's The Bakilara or Banyoro (The University Press, Cambridge, Eng., 1923) provides a description of another group in Uganda which possesses a well-defined political system with a hierarchy operating under a king.

The Baganda have received greater attention than either of the groups mentioned above. Roscoe's study, The Baganda: An Account of Their Native Customs and Beliefs (Macmillan and Co., London, 1911), is mainly concerned with the social and religious life of this people in the pre-European period. A subsequent study by Sir Apolo Kagwa, The Customs of the Baganda, translated by Ernest B. Kalibala and edited by M. M. Edel in Columbia University Contributions to Anthropology, Vol. 22 (Columbia University Press, New York, 1934), represents an attempt on the part of Roscoe's chief informant to extend and correct the earlier work of Roscoe. Sir Apolo, as former prime minister and regent of Buganda, was uniquely qualified to discuss the elaborate political hierarchy, the land system, and the social structure of his people.

As for the category of tribes which lack well-defined political institutions, reference has already been made to the writings of Gunther Wagner. His longer work, The Bantu of North Kavirondo (Oxford University Press, London, 1949), considers such elements as kinship structure, magico-religious beliefs and practices, and the rites which carry out important political functions for tribes lacking chiefs, tribunals, and tribal councils. Another ethnography which includes significant political data is that of Monica Hunter Wilson, Good Company: a Study of Nyakyusa Age-Villages (Oxford University Press, London 1951). This describes a field study of a tribe in southwest Tanganyika in which political functions are performed by a combination of the age-sets and the kinship system. Although certain methods for maintaining order are regularized among the Nyakyusa age-villages, well-defined centralized authority is absent.

Among the Kikuyu and the Kamba, two of the largest tribes of Kenya, the system of institutionalized age-set of elders was formerly the core of the political system, with the elders, organized into councils, arbitrating disputes and exercising religious functions. Chiefs, as such, did not exist. This system, based on territorial districts, was supplemented by the kinship structure which cut across the territorial units. Many conflicts were resolved by the clan or, when more than one clan was involved, by a system of blood feuds and compensations.

John Middleton's The Kikuyu and the Kamba of Kenya, Ethnographic Survey of Africa, Vol. 2, Part 5 (International African Institute, London, 1953), surveys the various studies which have been made of the Kikuyu and the Kamba, notes the areas of agreement among the scholars, and gives a precise account of the political and economic structures of the groups. Jomo Kenyatta has written of his own people in the volume, Facing Mount Kenya: The Tribal Life of Gikuyu [Kikuyu] (Secker and Warburg, London, 1938). The volume has the trappings of Western scholarship, including an introduction by Professor Malinowski, but it is highly subjective. The novel on the Kikuyu by Mrs. Elspeth Huxley, Red Strangers (Harper and Bros., London, 1939), draws on authoritative sources and authentic incidents to present what is in effect a social description of the Kikuyu at the time of the coming of the white man.

Comparatively little has been written about the Masai, a cattle-herding people who have resisted European acculturation and, with their domains protected, have retained a great deal of their traditional social structure. An early work by A. C. Hollis, The Masai: Their Language and Folklore (The Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1905), is still useful. Among the Masai, the age-set system also performs many political functions, a description of which is contained in the article by Henry Fosbrooke, "An Administrative Survey of the Masai Social System," Tanganyika Notes and Records (No. 26, Dec., 1948). The Turkana in northwest Kenya also have a social structure based on the kinship and age-set system, an account of which has been written by P. H. Gulliver, A Preliminary Survey of the Turkana (University of Cape Town, Cape Town, Communications from the School of African Studies, New Series No. 26, 1951). This study describes the character of political leadership, the nature of Turkana law and justice, and the manner in which the judicial system has been altered by the British administration. Another type of political order is found among the Lango, which has been studied by Jack H. Driberg, The Lango, A Nilotic Tribe of Uganda (T. F. Unwin, Ltd., London, 1923). Prior to European rule, the Lango lived an almost anarchic existence. They lacked a settled tribal authority and were divided into a number of factions, unrelated to the clan system, which rarely cooperated with one another. The social organization was directed primarily toward military exploits. Other studies of the social structure of East African tribal groups include A. C. Hollis, The Nandi, Their Language and Folklore (The Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1909); G. W. B. Huntingford, The Nandi of Kenya, Tribal Control in a Pastoral Society (Routledge and Kegan Paul, London, 1953); Thomas T. S. Hayley, The Anatomy of Lango Religion and Groups (The University Press, Cambridge, Eng., 1947); and Jean G. Peristiany, The Social Institutions of the Kipsigis (G. Routledge and Sons, Ltd., London, 1939).

It may be necessary to supplement the two major classifications of African political systems suggested by Fortes and Evans-Pritchard. In introducing indirect rule, British administrators have run into special problems where there is no cohesion among or centralized control over various subtribal groups but where they, in turn, possess chiefs, councils, and other well-defined political institutions. These groups are largely found in Tanganyika. The Chagga, who formerly were an aggregate of small units living on the slopes of Mt. Kilimanjaro, have recently been transformed into a unified tribe under an elected Paramount Chief, T. L. M. Marealle. In the article, "The Wachagga of Kilimanjaro," Tanganyika Notes and Records (No. 32, Jan., 1952), Chief Marealle discusses the wars and other changes which have helped unite the 400 clans into sixteen chiefdoms. Another source is Kilimanjaro and Its People (H. F. and G. Witherby, London, 1924), by Charles C. F. Dundas.

The Sukuma, who number over a million, were formerly composed of small autonomous village units or federations of village chiefs, and they too have been federated recently. Hans Cory, who might be called the founding father of the Sukumaland Federation, has written The Ntemi, the Traditional Rites in Connection with the Burial, Election, Enthronement and Magic Powers of a Sukuma Chief (Macmillan and Co., London, 1951), an incisive study which reveals the manner in which the political authority of the chief is supported by his control over agriculture, warfare, and the religious system.

The systematic study of native legal systems has not proceeded very far, and the pertinent material is to be found largely in oral tradition and institutional practice rather than in written works. The Journal of African Administration has frequent articles on native law, and the magazine is acutely aware of the importance of the subject. One of the best accounts of African courts is the volume by Arthur Phillips, Report on Native Tribunals (Government Printer, Nairobi, 1945), which, in describing the various practices, reveals the great diversity which exists. The study by Hans Cory and M. M. Hartnoll, Customary Law of the Haya Tribe (P. Lund, Humphries and Co., Ltd., London, 1945), is a codification of customary law undertaken to assist local government tribunals in attaining greater uniformity in their decisions. Another study by Hans Cory, Sukuma Law and Custom (Oxford University Press, London, 1953), was prepared to assist the judicial integration of the new Sukumaland Federation. D. J. Penwill has a less inclusive study in Kamba Customary Law; Notes Taken in the Machakos District of Kenya Colony (Macmillan and Co., London, 1951).

IV. ADMINISTRATION

The administrative structure of East Africa is a complicated mosaic of power relations. Each of the three mainland territories has its own governor, civil service, legislative council, commissioners for the provinces and districts (with some variations in function and title), and aggregates of local authorities varying from indigenous kingships to modern urban communities. The East Africa High Commission provides some services in common for the three territories. Zanzibar is different, having a Sultan and a Resident. Internally, the pattern of government is not consistent; in parts of Uganda, for instance, various tribal authorities have varying degrees of protection and autonomy granted by treaty.

All of these varying structures have been described by that wise and energetic Africanist, Lord Hailey, in his authoritative survey, Native Administration in the British African Territories (London: H.M.S.O., 1950-53, 5 vols.). Kenya, Uganda, and Tanganyika are described in Part I, East Africa; Zanzibar in Part II, Central Africa; and there is a general survey of the system of native administration in Part IV. The study is more concerned with the structure of the institutions than with the dynamics of the political process, but it is nevertheless a remarkable contribution to our knowledge of African government. The supplements to the Journal of African Administration for April and July, 1952, entitled "A Survey of Local Government in the African Territories since 1947," provide additional information not covered in the Hailey volumes.

All responsible administrative officials are faced with the policy question of whether to protect, utilize, and develop existing political institutions, or to create new institutions more suitable for passing an annual budget than for carrying on cattle raids. The issue, generally posed as that of direct rule as opposed to indirect rule, has an important bearing on the future development, and the rate of development, of Africa; and the preservation of native authority is variously frowned on and supported by emerging, educated Africans. Lord Lugard is given credit for creating the system of indirect rule when he worked among the Fulani Emirates of Northern Nigeria, and his experience is recorded in the noted work, The Dual Mandate in British Tropical Africa (William Blackwood and Sons, Edinburgh, 1922). In addition to describing the operation of indirect rule, Lugard gives one of the first comprehensive surveys of some of the problems facing colonial administrators in Africa, such as education, labor, taxation, slavery, land tenure, and economic development.

Sir Donald Cameron, the former Governor of Tanganyika, was keen on developing native political institutions, and his administration gave an impetus to a search for and revival of these. But in Tanganyika, as in other parts of East Africa, the tribal structure is different from that of Northern Nigeria, and there are numerous small, truncated groups without a well-developed political structure. Cameron's position, as outlined in an informal address, "Native Administration in Nigeria and Tanganyika," has been reprinted as a supplement to Vol. 36, Journal of the Royal African Society (Nov. 30, 1937). This address is an analysis of the purposes and results of indirect rule and of the limitations of its applicability to a territory which has many diverse tribes and political systems. The article by R. E. Robinson in the July, 1950 issue of the Journal of African Administration, "Why 'Indirect Rule' Has Been Replaced by 'Local Government' in the Nomenclature of British Native Administration," is an informative account of the development of local authority and of the changing attitudes regarding it. Miss Lucy P. Mair has also written of indirect rule, and in her Native Policies in Africa (G. Routledge and Sons, Ltd., London, 1936) she compares British policies with those of France, Belgium, and Portugal. Another comparative study has been made by H. A. Wieschoff, Colonial Policies in Africa, African Handbooks No. 5 (University of Pennsylvania Press, Philadelphia, 1944.)

The development of local government in East Africa has proceeded rapidly in recent years, but neither the rate of growth nor the patterns of response have been uniform. Indeed, if one is interested in political development in East Africa at the present time, there is no more dynamic area than in the broad field of local government. The most recent work on the current status of local government in Uganda is by C. A. G. Wallis, Report of an Inquiry into African Local Government in the Protectorate of Uganda (Government Printer, Entebbe, 1953). Many plans are in the wind for developing local government authorities in Tanganyika. An account of these plans has been prepared by Professor W. J. M. Mackenzie of Manchester University under the title Report of the Special Commissioner Appointed to Examine Matters Arising out of the Report of the Committee on Constitutional Development (Government Printer, Dar Es Salaam, 1953). For background, a useful reference is a memorandum written by the Member for Local Government setting out in abbreviated form the main patterns of development in the various districts of Tanganyika. The report, Development of African Local Government in Tanganyika (Col. No. 277/1951), surveys the establishment of rural and urban councils, the development of local fiscal policies, the tendency to separate judicial and executive functions in local government, the problem of the integration of small tribal units, and the association of the popular elements of tribal life with the traditional rulers in the tasks of local government.

The Journal of African Administration has published a number of reports on experiments in developing local government authorities, and this excellent magazine is well worth following for anyone interested in the subject. As an example of the type of material it includes, the article by F. A. Montague and F. H. Page-Jones, "Some Difficulties in the Democratization of Native Authorities in Tanganyika" (Vol. 3, Jan., 1951), reviews the extent to which democratic procedures have evolved in African societies without the aid of European administrators. It also cites cases where it has been necessary for British administrators to encourage popular participation in local government affairs, a situation resulting from lethargy on the part of the nontraditional elements or from autocratic tendencies of various Native Authorities. An interesting story of the use of anthropological material in framing a better system of indirect rule is contained in the volume by G. Gordon Brown and A. McD. Bruce Hutt, Anthropology in Action: An Experiment in the Iringa District of the Iringa Province, Tanganyika Territory (Oxford University Press, London, 1935). See also H. E. Lambert, The Use of Indigenous Authorities in Tribal Administration (Meru of Kenya) (University of Cape Town, Cape Town, Communications from the School of African Studies, New Series No. 16, 1947.)

There are relatively few published studies of urban areas in East Africa, but additional field studies are either under way or completed, and the results will no doubt be published in due time. Edwin S. Munger, a geographer, has written Relational Patterns of Kampala, Uganda (University of Chicago Press, Chicago, 1951), which examines the impact of the physical environment, the cultural patterns, and the economic position of Kampala. A few years ago the Nairobi Municipal Council employed a three-man team to prepare a twenty-five year development plan of the physical, economic, and social resources of the city. The report by L. W. T. White, Leo Silberman, and P. R. Anderson, Nairobi, Master Plan for a Colonial Capital (H.M.S.O., London, 1948), contains an excellent survey of the existing conditions in Nairobi, although it is inadequate as a plan for a multiracial city. Reference to the Maragua Development Plan for a multiracial community, proposed by Richard Hughes, is made in East Africa and Rhodesia, Aug. 27, 1953.

V. RACE, POLITICS, AND CULTURAL CHANGE

The arrival in Africa of Europeans and Indians has created new political situations, and the Europeans, in particular, have introduced their own political traditions, including the organization of political parties. When Sir Winston Churchill visited East Africa in 1908, there were fewer than a thousand Europeans living in Nairobi, but Churchill recorded that "every white man in Nairobi is a politician; and most of them are leaders of parties." (My African Journey, Hodder and Stoughton, London, 1908, p. 21.)

The political issues surrounding white settlement have been discussed for half a century, and they were the subject of an interesting exchange of letters between Elspeth Huxley and Margery Perham in the volume, Race and Politics in Kenya (Faber and Faber, Ltd., London, 1944). Mrs. Huxley asks what policies the critics of European settlement would recommend, and Miss Perham attempts to present some solutions. The introduction by Lord Lugard contains a compact summary of the official documentation on the land problem, East African federation, and other Kenya controversies.

Mrs. Huxley has also written two informative volumes on the history of the white settlers. White Man's Country: Lord Delamere and the Making of Kenya (Macmillan and Co., London, 1935, 2 vols.) is a first-rate biography of the pioneer, Lord Delamere, who was primarily responsible for making Kenya an attractive area of European settlement. Delamere's experimentation with crops and animals suitable for the East African terrain is a fascinating story. Settlers of Kenya (Longmans, Green and Co., London, 1948) is a short, readable account of the history of white settlement in Kenya. An informative and well-documented study of British policy in Kenya is the work of Marjorie R. Dilley, British Policy in Kenya Colony (T. Nelson and Sons, New York, 1937).

A number of commissions have from time to time studied land usage in East Africa, and the Lugard introduction in the Huxley-Perham volume is a convenient guide to this rather extensive literature. The document, Land and Population in East Africa (Col. No. 290/1952), contains an exchange of correspondence between Oliver Lyttleton, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and Sir Philip E. Mitchell, the recent Governor of Kenya, on the background of the current disturbances in Kenya; an appendix includes the frame of reference for the recently appointed Royal Commission. Another useful reference is H. E. Lambert, The Systems of Land Tenure in the Kikuyu Land Unit (University of Cape Town, Cape Town, Communications from the School of African Studies, New Series No. 22, 1950).

A number of works on East Africa are critical, emotional, and heavily biased. Some of these have been influential in shaping the stereotypes of East Africa, and of Kenya in particular, held by many people in the world outside. Among the works in this category are the writings of Norman Leys and W. Macgregor Ross and various publications of the Colonial Bureau of the Fabian Society.

The position of the Indians is always a factor in East African politics, but no systematic study has been made of this important group. The historic statement of British policy was made in the command paper, Indians in Kenya (Cmd. 1922/1923), which rejected the proposal for barring Indian immigration and announced the policy of the paramountcy of African interests. Since the partition of India and Pakistan, the sedulous interest of these two countries in East Africa seems to have increased. The first volume of W. K. Hancock's Survey of British Commonwealth Affairs (Oxford University Press, London, 1937-1942, 2 vols.) contains a chapter on the position of Indians in Kenya and South Africa in the interwar years.

Constitutional change has flourished in East Africa since the war, and on the territorial level the persistent issues are the relative number of Africans, Europeans, and Asians in the central legislature, the ratio of elected and of appointed members, and the relative number of official and unofficial members. Martin Wight has compiled the British colonial constitutions and written a long introductory essay in the volume, British Colonial Constitutions, 1947 (The Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1952). Wight's earlier work, The Development of the Legislative Council (Faber and Faber, Ltd., London 1946), gives some essential background for the understanding of the political structure of the territories.

African political activity generally follows the structure of the local government concerned, and there are few territory-wide organizations. Even the Kenya African Union, now proscribed, was primarily confined to the Kikuyu tribe. Political controversy in local government units can be followed in the vernacular press, but it is pointless to list such publications here. The Report of the Commission of Inquiry into the Disturbances in Uganda during April 1949 (Government Printer, Entebbe, 1950) summarizes the attitudes of the various political factions—they can hardly be called parties—extant in the Kingdom of Buganda and the unresolved political issues between Buganda Africans and Indians.

Parts of Africa are changing, and this creates new and different political problems. A general theory of cultural contact and social change is contained in the classic work of Bronislaw Malinowski, The Dynamics of Culture Change; An Inquiry into Race Relations in Africa, edited by Phyllis Kaberry (Yale University Press, New Haven, 1945). Malinowski suggests that change be studied under the following categories: the interests, influences, and institutions of the impinging culture; the surviving forms of the African traditions; and the processes of contact and change. The volume by Jack H. Driberg, The East African Problem (Williams and Norgate, Ltd., London, 1930), describes the Hamitic invasions of Uganda, Ruanda, and Tanganyika, and contrasts the varying reactions in the Ankole, Buganda, and Bunyoro areas.

A study by Godfrey Wilson and Monica Hunter Wilson, The Analysis of Social Change, Based on Observations in Central Africa (The University Press, Cambridge, Eng., 1945), analyzes the changes taking place in the native groups of East and Central African societies as a result of European contact. The groups studied exhibit a variety of reactions in shifting from the parochial village, with its well-defined status positions, to the wider circle of Western culture. The Wilsons feel that the greatest threat to social equilibrium has come from the lag resulting from advances in the material culture and the retention of the indigenous religious beliefs. In An African People in the Twentieth Century (G. Routledge and Sons, Ltd., London, 1934), Lucy P. Mair describes the effect of European contact upon the village life of the Baganda. Colonial policy is analyzed in terms of its impact upon the indigenous social and political institutions and of the implications of the policy of indirect rule.

L. S. B. Leakey, the archeologist and curator of the Coryndon Museum in Nairobi, has written a small, succinct, and enlightening volume, Mau Mau and the Kikuyu (Methuen, London, 1953), which is required reading for anyone interested in the current unrest in Kenya. The volume is a brief summary of a larger, as yet unpublished, study of the social and religious customs of the Kikuyu. Leakey describes the breakdown of the Kikuyu social system under European impact and analyzes the growth of political activity among the detribalized Kikuyu, leading to the current Mau Mau activity. Leakey, the son of missionary parents, was brought up among the Kikuyu, speaks the language, and is an initiated member of his age-set. The Mau Mau are after him.

VI. TOPICAL ISSUES

There is considerable literature, much of it technical, on various topical issues, and of course the territorial governments are organized functionally to handle technical problems. J. K. Matheson and E. W. Bovill have edited a general agricultural survey, East African Agriculture (Oxford University Press, London, 1950), which will give the novice some necessary background on agrarian problems. Alan Wood has written The Groundnut Affair (The Bodley Head, London, 1950), an amusing and popular account of the diabolic misfortunes which befell this scheme. This is a slight volume, written by one who has his own blinders, but it contains references to official documentation for the benefit of the more serious reader.

The development of agriculture is closely related to the widely varying laws on land tenure, which in some places allow land holdings to be uneconomically splintered among many owners. One of the best surveys of this topic is by Charles K. Meek, Land Law and Custom in the Colonies (Oxford University Press, London, 1946), which gives generous treatment to the particular problems of East Africa. Articles on land laws appear frequently in the Journal of African Administration, and a number of excellent studies of land utilization have been made by geographers.

On economic problems, the writings of S. Herbert Frankel, of Nuffield College, Oxford, are outstanding, and they include especially The Economic Impact on Under-Developed Societies (Basil Blackwell, Oxford, 1953) and Capital Investment in Africa: Its Course and Effects (Oxford University Press, London, 1938). Another worthwhile work is Thomas R. Batten's Problems of African Development, Part I, Land and Labour; Part II, Government and People (Oxford University Press, London, 1947-48). The second volume of Hancock's Survey, mentioned above, has a chapter, "Evolution of the Settlers' Frontier." W. M. Macmillan has written Africa Emergent; A Survey of Social, Political, and Economic Trends in British Africa (Penguin Books, Middlesex, reprint, 1949), a highly readable account of the origins of European contact with Africa and of the problems and advantages which that contact has produced for the Africans and Europeans alike. Further information on economic problems may be found in the plans prepared by the individual colonies for utilizing the Colonial Development and Welfare funds, in the reports of the Colonial Development Corporation, the Overseas Food Corporation, and the United Kingdom Trade Commissioner in East Africa, and in various documents of the United Nations.

There is no end of publications on African labor, but only two will be mentioned here. Major G. St. John Orde-Browne has written The African Labourer (Oxford University Press, London, 1933) and Labour Conditions in East Africa (H.M.S.O., London, 1946). The former is a continent-wide analysis of factors affecting African laborers, the latter a field survey of African labor in the post-war period.

On transportation, an excellent and fascinating work has been written by M. F. Hill, Permanent Way, the Story of the Kenya and Uganda Railway; Being the Official History of the Development of the Transport System of Kenya and Uganda (East African Railways and Harbors, Nairobi, 1949). This volume tells in subdued phrases the story of the construction of the Uganda railway from the Indian Ocean to Lake Victoria. As a footnote, it can be recorded that the man-eating lions of Tsavo, which brought the railroad construction to a complete standstill for three weeks, are now in the Chicago Natural History Museum!

There is no dearth of excellent studies on education, the latest being African Education, a Study of Educational Policy and Practice in British Tropical Africa, produced on behalf of the Nuffield Foundation and the Colonial Office (Oxford University Press, London, 1953). The East African Institute of Social Research at Kampala, Uganda, will shortly begin publishing a series of studies made by its staff. A volume by E. B. Worthington, Science in Africa: a Review of Scientific Research Relating to Tropical and Southern Africa (Oxford University Press, London, 1938), is a useful review of the progress of scientific investigation having a bearing on Africa.

The East African Statistical Department has prepared studies of the African populations of the three mainland territories from its basic source, East African Population Census, 1948 (East African Statistical Department, Nairobi, 1950), and it issues special studies from time to time. The second volume of the study of Robert R. Kuczynski, Demographic Survey of the British Colonial Empire (Oxford University Press, London, 1949), is on East Africa. The work is a laborious study of official and unofficial figures on population, with Kuczynski concluding that figures dealing with African populations are of little value for scientific research. In The Population of Tanganyika (United Nations doc. ST/SOA/Service A; Population Studies No. 2, Lake Success, Sept. 1, 1949), Irene Taeuber summarizes the existing knowledge of the major characteristics of the population.

VII. INTERNATIONAL CONTROL

The East African territories have been subjected to varying degrees of international control through multilateral treaties, the League of Nations Mandates System (applicable to Tanganyika), and various types of supervision now exercised by different (and differing) United Nations agencies. The agreements contained in the multilateral treaties may be found in the documents of the Berlin Conference of February, 1885, the Brussels Antislavery Conference of July, 1890, and the Saint Germain-en-Laye Conference of September, 1919. Several volumes are concerned with the general effectiveness of these arrangements, including Quincy Wright, Mandates under the League of Nations (University of Chicago, Chicago Press, 1930); Benjamin Gerig, The Open Door and the Mandates System (G. Allen and Unwin, Ltd., London, 1930); and Arthur B. Keith, The Belgian Congo and the Berlin Act (The Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1919).

Information on the mandates under the League of Nations is found in the Minutes of the Permanent Mandates Commission as well as in the Minutes of the Council and the Records of the Assembly. The Commission acted in an advisory capacity to the Council and received and examined annual reports from the Mandatory Powers and written petitions from the inhabitants of the territories. It held thirty-seven sessions between 1920 and 1939. The annual reports on Tanganyika are found in the Colonial Series (although those for 1920 and 1921 bear command numbers 1428 and 1732). Rayford W. Logan has written The African Mandates in World Politics (Public Affairs Press, Washington, D.C., 1949), which somewhat exaggerates the role played by the African territories in the diplomatic controversies between the two world wars. The work of Charlotte Leubuscher, Tanganyika Territory, A Study of Economic Policy under Mandate (Oxford University Press, London, 1944), is a critique of the financial and economic policies in the administration of Tanganyika under the League.

The research student considering the supervision of African administration by the United Nations will have to examine several types of documents, and a visit to the whispering galleries of the various United Nations delegations would also be valuable in understanding how decisions affecting the African territories are made. For documentary sources, one should consult the Official Records of the Plenary Meetings of the General Assembly, the Official Records of the Fourth (Trusteeship) Committee, and the Official Records of the Trusteeship Council. The petitions regarding Tanganyika are ordinarily found in the Annexes to the Official Records of the Council, although the Meru petitioner before the Eleventh Session of the Council presented his statement orally; some are included with the reports of the visiting missions. Thus far, two visiting missions have been to Tanganyika, their reports being entitled Reports of the United Nations Visiting Mission to Trust Territories in East Africa, on Tanganyika (U.N. doc. T/218, 13 Nov., 1948; and U.N. doc. T/946, 1951). Additional material on East Africa is contained in the reports of the Standing Committee on Administrative Unions of the Trusteeship Council, which has so far submitted two reports. A summary of the work of the Trusteeship Council and the visiting missions may be found in the Annual Report of the Trusteeship Council to the General Assembly.

Under Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter, member nations may submit information on non-self-governing territories, but they are not required to submit information on political developments. The information submitted is found in the document entitled: Non-Self-Governing Territories: Summaries and Analyses of Information Transmitted to the Secretary-General (1946-1952). The material in these reports is considered by the Fourth Committee of the General Assembly and by a special committee operating under its aegis, now known as the Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories, which also submits an annual report.

VIII. SERIAL DOCUMENTATION, PERIODICALS, AND BIBLIOGRAPHIES

Many government documents are published regularly in serial form, including especially the Annual Report on the Colony and Protectorate of Kenya, the Annual Report on Uganda, the Annual Report on Zanzibar, the Report to the General Assembly on the Administration of Tanganyika, and the Annual Report, East Africa High Commission. These reports contain general surveys of the economic, political, and social developments of the year and are convenient references for items not easily available elsewhere. The reports of the provincial commissioners are of considerable value in providing material on local government, and they frequently include extracts from the reports of district officers. In theory, all colonial publications not printed by H. M. Stationery Office should be available from the Crown Agents for the Colonies, 4 Milbank, London, but apparently a number of useful publications, such as the budgets of local authorities, do not reach London for wider distribution.

For the debates of legislative assemblies, see Kenya, Legislative Council Debates; Uganda, Proceedings of the Legislative Council; Tanganyika, Proceedings of the Legislative Council; and East Africa High Commission, Proceedings of the East Africa Central Legislative Assembly. In this connection, the Hansard Society has a useful publication, Problems of Parliamentary Government in the Colonies (Hansard Society, London, 1953). Parliamentary debates are, of course, a fruitful source of information on East Africa, and items come up frequently during the question period and during debates on colonial policy. (See Hansard, Lords and Commons Debates.) Each territory also has its series on laws, statutes, ordinances, court decisions, budget estimates, gazettes, and the like.

Several useful abstracts and bibliographies have been published. African Abstracts, A Quarterly Review of Ethnological, Social, and Linguistic Studies Appearing in Current Periodicals, published by the International African Institute, contains convenient summaries in French or English of the significant contemporary scholarly publications on Africa. The European Affairs Division of the Library of Congress has prepared Introduction to Africa: A Selective Guide to Background Reading (The University Press of Washington, Washington, D.C., 1952), which contains a brief description, by territories, of some of the significant books on Africa. The volume is a valuable source for the lay reader unfamiliar with African sources, but it has limited use for the research scholar.

Some five bibliographies have been published in the Nuffield College Series. The first, edited by Margery Perham, Colonial Government, Nuffield College Colonial Reading List No. 1 (Oxford University Press, London 1950), is a working list prepared for the training of civil servants and is not an intensive bibliography of any single problem or territory. A bibliography on economic activities in colonial areas is contained in the volume edited by P. Bower, Colonial Economics, Nuffield College Colonial Reading List No. 2 (Institute of Colonial Studies, Oxford, duplicated copies, 1946). A new edition of this work will be published shortly by the Oxford Press. The volume edited by C. Comhaire, Urban Conditions in Africa, Nuffield College Colonial Reading List No. 3 (Institute of Colonial Studies, Oxford, duplicated copies, 2nd ed., 1952), has topical references on urban subjects, with many references to East Africa. The reading list prepared by Phillip Mayer, Rural Conditions and Betterment in the British Colonies, Nuffield College Reading List No. 4 (Oxford University Press, London, 1947), contains general references to agriculture, animal husbandry, fishing, education, nutrition, and welfare; it is not intended for the specialist. The most comprehensive and specialized of the series is the volume Colonial Law, Nuffield College Colonial Reading List No. 5, edited by C. F. Meek (Oxford University Press, London, 1948). This is of special value for the study of indigenous law and custom in East Africa.

Periodicals include the following three standard journals of general scholarly interest: Africa, published by the Journal of the International African Institute, with emphasis upon ethnological studies; African Affairs, published by the Royal African Society, with a variety of interests, historical as well as contemporary; and African Studies, published by the Department of Bantu Studies of the University of Witwatersrand, primarily anthropological. African World deals with contemporary topics, and presents objective reports on economic and political affairs. One of the most valuable publications is Journal of African Administration, which has articles on local government, training of civil servants, problems of land tenure, the structure and operation of native tribunals, and other topics relating to the governing of Africa. Although edited by the African Studies Branch of the Colonial Office, it does not necessarily represent official views or policies. Corona, a journal of the Colonial Service, has frequent articles on the administration of African territories.

Journals of a more technical nature include the Quarterly Economic and Statistical Bulletin, published by the East Africa High Commission; East African Agricultural Journal of Kenya, Tanganyika, Uganda and Zanzibar; and Colonial Development, the quarterly magazine published by the Colonial Development Corporation.

Magazines of general territorial interest include East Africa and Rhodesia, which frequently reprints contemporary documents and contains lively and thoughtful editorial comment; and Tanganyika Notes and Record and Uganda Journal, which print a variety of articles of general interest on the territories with which they deal.

ROLAND YOUNG AND J. GUS LIEBENOW, JR.

Northwestern University.

MATERIALS FOR UNDERGRADUATE STUDY OF THE UNITED NATIONS

This article contains a discussion of selected English language materials on the United Nations available to and suitable for use by undergraduate college students and, we hope, their instructors. It omits discussion of materials on the "specialized agencies" and other items which some will think should have been included. It is not intended as a guide for advanced research.¹

The best material thus far published about the United Nations is that prepared by the Organization itself, principally by the Secretariat. The second best body of material is found in periodicals and in various series which appear irregularly—some published by governments and others by private organizations or individuals. The books that deal with the United Nations comprise a weak third category, whether measured by quantity, coverage, or quality. There are however, good books on the origins of the United Nations, on its peace and security functions, on the Charter, on the Organization in general, and on three of its six main organs—the General Assembly, the Security Council, and the International Court of Justice. There are books on the Secretariat which are barely adequate, but few or none have been written on the Economic and Social Council or the Trusteeship Council. Nor are there books that give adequate treatment of the primary functions of the U.N., such as those related to economic, social, administrative, and financial matters, dependent areas, and the control and regulation of armaments.

Origins of the United Nations. There are nearly a score of significant books that deal with the origins of the United Nations, but most of them treat only the United States preparation. There are no accounts in English of the British, Soviet, Chinese, or any other nation's preparation for Dumbarton Oaks or the San Francisco Conference.² The U.S. Department of State has published Harley Notter's valuable and illuminating Postwar Foreign Policy Preparation, 1939-1945,³ which is a rich source book but highly technical, emphasizing procedure more than substantive issues in its account of the six years of study by the United States that preceded the San Francisco Conference. An important companion study being prepared by the Brookings Institution will contain some of the late Leo Pasvolsky's notes and writings on the unique part he played in the preparation for the drafting of the Charter and in the drafting itself.⁴

¹ For a guide for advanced research, see Carol Carter Moor and Waldo Chamberlin, How to Use United Nations Documents (New York University Libraries Occasional Papers No. 1, New York University Press, 1953, 26 p.).

² As far as is known one book in Russian is the only one in any language that contains any account of such preparations. S. B. Krylov, Materials for the History of the United Nations (Academy of Science of the U.S.S.R., Moscow, 1949, 338 p., translated title.)

³ Department of State Pub. No. 3580, Government Printing Office, Washington, 1950, 726 p.

⁴ The Brookings Institution study may be published during 1954 and, if so, will probably cover the period from 1941 through the ratification of the Charter in August, 1945. Other possible studies in the same series are mentioned later in this article.

There is considerable information about the United States preparation in the memoirs of participants, notably those of Hull, Welles, Sherwood, Vandenberg, Stimson, and Forrestal—the last two being particularly concerned with the trusteeship problem.⁵ The decisions made at Yalta concerning the United Nations are well covered in the volumes by Stettinius, Byrnes, Churchill, and Leahy.⁶

The San Francisco Conference of 1945 is the only major international conference to have authorized publication of its records in full (sixteen volumes). The most important of these documents have been brought together in a book published by the Department of State.⁷ From participants in the Conference we have accounts such as those by Krylov, Vandenberg, Dulles, Wellington Koo Jr., and the Department of State's report written under the supervision of the late Leo Pasvolsky.⁸ The daily column in the New York Times by James Reston deserves mention among the important writings about the San Francisco Conference. Its completeness and accuracy were such that delegates at the Conference did not care to begin a day's negotiations without reading it to see what had really happened the day before and what was likely to happen in coming meetings. The special conference edition of the Times was placed under the door of the room of each delegate and received an amount of attention seldom given to any newspaper, largely because of the accuracy of the reporting resulting from Reston's remarkable "pipeline." Finally, there is the volume of Senate Hearings on the Charter in which Mr. Pasvolsky explained the assumptions and intentions of those who drafted and signed the Charter.⁹ It was upon these explanations that the Senate based its advice and consent.

⁵ Cordell Hull, The Memoirs of Cordell Hull, 2 vols. (Macmillan, New York, 1948, 1804 p.); Sumner Welles, The Time for Decision (Harper, New York, 1944, 431 p.), Where Are We Heading (Harper, New York, 1946, 397 p.), and Seven Decisions That Shaped History (Harper, New York, 1950, 236 p.); Robert E. Sherwood, Roosevelt and Hopkins (Harper, New York, 1948, 1002 p.); Arthur H. Vandenberg, The Private Papers of Senator Vandenberg, ed. Arthur H. Vandenberg, Jr. (Houghton Mifflin, Boston, 1952, 599 p.); Henry L. Stimson and McGeorge Bundy, On Active Service in Peace and War (Harper, New York, 1948, 698 p.); James Forrestal, The Forrestal Diaries, ed. Walter Millis (Viking Press, New York, 1951, 581 p.).

⁶ Edward R. Stettinius, Roosevelt and the Russians: The Yalta Conference, ed. Walter Johnson (Doubleday, Garden City, N. Y., 1949, 367 p.); James F. Byrnes, Speaking Frankly (Harper, New York, 1947, 342 p.); Winston S. Churchill, The Second World War: Triumph and Tragedy (Houghton Mifflin, Boston, 1948); William D. Leahy, I Was There (Whittlesey House, New York, 1950, 527 p.).

⁷ The United States Conference on International Organization. . . Selected Documents (Dept. of State Pub. No. 2490, Government Printing Office, Washington, 1946, 992 p.).

⁸ John Foster Dulles, War or Peace (Macmillan, New York, 1950, 274 p.); Wellington Koo, Jr., Voting Procedures in International Organizations (Columbia University Press, New York, 1947)—this volume contains a brief but the only published account of the discussions in the "Penthouse" at San Francisco. For Krylov's account, see note 2, above, and for Vandenberg's, note 5; for the State Department's report, see Charter of the United Nations: Report to the President on the Results of the San Francisco Conference . . . (Dept. of State Pub. No. 2349, Government Printing Office, Washington, 1945, 266 p.).

⁹ "The Charter of the United Nations," Hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, 79th Cong., 1st sess. (1945), 723 p.

Memoirs on the Period 1946-1952. There are at least nine books of memoirs by persons who participated in the United Nations during its early years. Those by Arcé,¹⁰ Evatt,¹¹ Byrnes, and Vandenberg are general in approach, as is the little volume by Abraham Feller.¹² Feller's, however, differs from those of the others in that it pleads for a particular cause and reflects the sense of devoted purpose common to many members of the Secretariat of the United Nations. Mrs. Roosevelt's volumes are both interesting and useful but tend to be anecdotal rather than analytical.¹³ Count Bernadotte's posthumously published account of his work in Palestine is useful.¹⁴ In many ways, the most interesting and valuable of all the works by those who took part in the early development of the United Nations is Paul Hasluck's account of the first two years of the Security Council.¹⁵

Secretariat Publications. One can not overemphasize the value and usefulness of materials on every aspect of the United Nations which are published by the Organization itself. Of this vast tonnage of documentation, the most appropriate and timely for the use of undergraduate students are the annual reports to the General Assembly by the Secretary-General and the three councils¹⁶ and the annual Budget Estimates.¹⁷ These documents are prepared each summer for the autumn session of the General Assembly, which coincides with the opening of the autumn college terms, and are followed within a few months by the encyclopedic Yearbook of the United Nations,¹⁸ which synthesizes virtually all of the material in the above items and enlarges upon it as well. Unfortunately, because of their official nature all of these publications, with the exception of the "Introduction" to the Secretary-General's report, lack interpretive and evaluative comments. The student must turn elsewhere for such analysis. A

¹⁰ Jose Arcé, Right Now (Blass, S. A. Tipografica, Madrid, 1951, 180 p.) and United Nations: Admission of New Members (Blass, S. A. Tipografica, Madrid, 1952, 253 p.).

¹¹ Herbert V. Evatt, The Task of Nations (Duell, Sloan and Pearce, New York, 1949, 279 p.) and The United Nations (Harvard University Press, Cambridge, 1948, 154 p.).

¹² A. H. Feller, United Nations and World Community (Little, Brown, Boston, 1952, 153 p.).

¹³ Eleanor Roosevelt and H. J. Ferris, Partners: The United Nations and Youth (Doubleday, Garden City, N. Y., 1950, 206 p.); Eleanor Roosevelt and William A. de Witt, United Nations: Today and Tomorrow (Harper, New York, 1943).

¹⁴ Folke Bernadotte, To Jerusalem (Hodder and Sloughton, London, 1951, 280 p.).

¹⁵ Workshop of Security (Cheshire, Melbourn, 1948, 181 p.).

¹⁶ United Nations: Annual Report of the Secretary-General on the Work of the Organization; Report of the Security Council; Report of the Economic and Social Council; Report of the Trusteeship Council. These four are published yearly as Supplement Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4, respectively, of the Official Records of the General Assembly. The first report contains a concise summary of the activities of the Organization; the last three summarize in greater detail the activities of the three councils.

¹⁷ Published yearly as Supplement No. 5 to the Official Records of the General Assembly. This budget document contains a well-organized record of the Organization's administration and expenditures during the past year and the Secretary-General's proposed program of activities for the coming year.

¹⁸ United Nations, Yearbook of the United Nations (Columbia University Press, New York, yearly 1947 to date, approximately 1100 pages each).

more or less popular handbook, Everyman's United Nations,¹⁹ is prepared by the Secretariat each year and serves as a valuable guide to the structure and major activities of the Organization. Other significant reference books are the United Nations' Non-Self-Governing Territories,²⁰ Statistical Yearbook,²¹ Yearbook of Human Rights,²² and the International Court of Justice Yearbook.²³

Delegation Reports. A limited amount of evaluation appears in the reports of delegations to their respective parliaments or heads of state. Of the reports prepared by English-speaking governments, only those of the United States deal at all comprehensively with the activities of the Organization.²⁴ Reports have been issued by Canada, New Zealand, and the United Kingdom on each session of the General Assembly and by Australia on the first part of the first and the second part of the third sessions.²⁵ The greatest amount of evaluative comment is in the New Zealand and Canadian reports on the General Assembly and the United Kingdom report on the Preparatory Commission. The United States has published special reports on such topics as the control of atomic energy, the Economic and Social Council, and the Greek problem.²⁶

Periodicals. Periodicals form an important source of information about the ¹⁹ United Nations, Everyman's United Nations, 4th ed. (New York, 1953, 433 p.). In its first edition (1948) Everyman's United Nations was a small handbook designed for use along with the Handbook of the U.N. The latter was discontinued in 1950, and Everyman's has more than doubled in size through its editions subsequent to that date.

²⁰ United Nations, Non-Self-Governing Territories . . . (New York, yearly or biennially 1947 to date, approx. 700 pages each). These summarize information on conditions in non-self-governing territories, transmitted to the Secretary-General under article 73e of the Charter.

²¹ United Nations, Statistical Yearbook (New York, yearly [irreg.] 1948 to date, approx. 500 pages each). These contain yearly world statistics on such subjects as population, agriculture, industry, economics, finance, and education.

²² United Nations, Yearbook of Human Rights (New York, yearly 1947-1950, approx. 500 pages each). These contain documents on both national and international legislation, action, statements, and studies on human rights.

²³ International Court of Justice, Yearbook (The Hague or Leyden [irreg.], yearly 1947 to date, approx. 250 pages each).

²⁴ U. S. Department of State, United States Participation in the United Nations, Report of the President . . . ([title irreg., U.S. and the U.N., 1946-48] Dept. of State Pub. Nos. 2735, 3024, 3437, 3765, 4178, 4583, 5034, Government Printing Office, Washington, yearly 1947 to date).

²⁵ Parliament of Australia, First Part of the First Session of the General Assembly, Report of the Australian Delegation (Government Printer, Canberra, 1946). Also for The Second Part of the Third Session. Canada, Dept. of External Affairs, Canada and the United Nations ([title irreg.] Edmond Coutier, Ottawa, Conf. Series, 1946 to date, approx. 200 pages each). New Zealand Dept. of External Affairs, The United Nations, Report of the New Zealand Delegation . . . (Wellington, for each session 1946 to date). United Kingdom Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Report on the Proceedings of the Second Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations (H.M. Stationery Office, London, for each session 1948 to date).

²⁶ U. S. Department of State, The International Control of Atomic Energy: Growth of a Policy (Dept. of State Pub. No. 2702, 1946, 281 p.); The International Control of Atomic Energy: Policy at the Crossroads (Dept. of State Pub. No. 3161, 1948, 251 p.); The Economic and Social Council of the United Nations (Dept. of State Pub. No. 2600, 1946, 74 p.); The United Nations and the Problem of Greece (Dept. of State Pub. No. 2909, 1947, 97 p.).

United Nations. The Secretariat produces the most voluminous periodic description of itself in the fortnightly United Nations Bulletin.²⁷ The two most useful private periodicals are International Conciliation and International Organization.²⁸ Since June 1945, 33% of the eighty issues of International Conciliation and 44% of the leading articles in International Organization have been devoted entirely to United Nations affairs. Of special interest in International Organization is the section in each issue, usually about fifty pages, which reviews current activities of the Organization. International Conciliation has presented carefully documented and interpretive previews of each session of the General Assembly since 1947, the most recent being "Issues before the Eighth General Assembly" (No. 439). Other issues have been devoted to important U.N. problems, such as the control of atomic energy (Nos. 423, 430), the Palestine question (Nos. 454, 464), and technical assistance (Nos. 457, 468).

As for the "learned journals" in the field, the American Journal of International Law publishes an average of six articles on the U.N. each year. The American Academy of Political and Social Science has devoted to the U.N. two entire volumes of the Annals,²⁹ constituting about 4% of its total pagination since June, 1945. Occasionally articles on the U.N. appear in the American Political Science Review, the Political Science Quarterly, and World Politics. The Foreign Policy Association, since 1945, has made the U.N. the subject of four out of forty-eight numbers of the Headline Series. The Brookings Institution reviews U.N. activities in a section of the monthly issues of its Current Developments in United States Foreign Policy. Other periodicals devoted entirely to the U.N. which may be useful to students are the Rotary International's Report on U.N. (issued monthly), United Nations World (also issued monthly), and publications of the American Association for the United Nations³⁰ and the United Nations Association of the United Kingdom.³¹

Nonofficial Books. An inspection of the collections in the United Nations Library, which systematically attempts to acquire all materials published on the Organization, indicates that there are, in the English language, fifty-four books (defined arbitrarily here as published works of not less than one hundred pages) for adults devoted almost exclusively to the United Nations and about one hundred eighty pamphlets (of less than one hundred pages). Although books now represent a significant source of information on the United Nations, whether they will continue to do so is a matter of speculation, the answer depending largely on public interest in the U.N. For the slim significance of the statistical inference which might be drawn, it is interesting to observe that

²⁷ United Nations Bulletin (New York, weekly 1946-1947, fortnightly since Jan., 1948).

²⁸ Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, International Conciliation (New York, currently six issues yearly); World Peace Foundation, International Organization (Boston, quarterly 1947 to date).

²⁹ Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, Vol. 246 (July, 1946) and Vol. 252 (July, 1947).

³⁰ American Association for the United Nations, U. N. Reporter, Speaker's Notes, Peoples Section Bulletin (New York).

³¹ United Nations Association of the United Kingdom, United Nations News (London, monthly April, 1946 to date).

seven of these fifty-four books were published during 1946, when the newness of the U.N. created considerable interest. Only five were published in 1947, three in 1948, and five in 1949. Perhaps the concerted action in Korea in 1950 was partially responsible for the publication of eleven books during that year and thirteen during 1951. Decline in publication since that time has been rapid; seven books were published in 1952 and only two up to the end of November, 1953.

It is impossible to be certain of the future trend in the publication of books about the U.N., but if research in progress on doctoral dissertations is any indication, the totals may well increase in the next few years. Figures from the annual lists in this REVIEW show that the number of dissertations being prepared on the U.N. each year is increasing steadily: from three each in 1947 and 1948 to 12 in 1949, 24 in 1950, 22 in 1951, and 33 each in 1952 and 1953. The yearly percentage of dissertations in the general field of political science written on the U.N. has increased from 0.8% of the total in 1947 to 3.5% in 1953.

Of the fifty-four books in the Organization's library, seven have already been mentioned among the writings of those who participated in its development from 1946 to 1952.³² Eight others were published during 1945 to 1947 and are sufficiently dated not to warrant a strong recommendation for use by students.³³ Eight others are not particularly appropriate for college students. The remaining thirty-one fall readily into three categories: general, organic, and functional.

The sixteen books in the general category treat the United Nations from different points of view. The text by Goodrich and Hambro³⁴ is probably the best single book about the Organization from all points of view; and even though the present edition was published in 1949, there is no one book on the United Nations that we would recommend with as little reservation. While the approach of this book is strongly legalistic, it also traces the political, economic, social, and administrative activities of the U.N. Instructors seeking a textbook on the U.N. will probably find that Vandenbosch and Hogan is the most adequate.³⁵ Leonard's satisfactory volume is devoted largely to the U.N. but focuses on the more general field of international organization.³⁶ The Annual Review of United ³² Arce (2 books), Bernadotte, Evatt (2 books), Feller, and Hasluck.

³³ Sigrid Arne, United Nations Primer (Farrar, New York, 1945, 156 p.); Andrew Boyd, The United Nations Organization Handbook (Pilot Press, New York, 1946, 210 p.); William G. Carr, One World in the Making (Ginn and Co., Boston, 1946, 100 p.); Stuart Chevalier, The World Charter and the Road to Peace (Ward Ritchie Press, Los Angeles, 1946, 179 p.); Louis Dolivet, The United Nations (Farrar, Straus, New York, 1946, 152 p.); Stephen Fenichel and Phillip Andrews, The United Nations: Blueprint for Peace (Winston Co., Philadelphia, 1951, 151 p.); World Peace Foundation, United Nations in the Making (Boston, 1945, 130 p.) and United Nations at Work (Boston, 1947, 147 p.).

³⁴ Leland M. Goodrich and Edvard Hambro, Charter of the United Nations, Commentary and Documents, 2d ed. (World Peace Foundation, Boston, 1949, 170 p.).

³⁵ Amry Vandenbosch and Willard M. Hogan, The United Nations: Background, Organization, Functions, Activities (McGraw-Hill, New York, 1952, 456 p.).

³⁶ L. L. Leonard, International Organization (McGraw-Hill, New York, 1951, 630 p.). Other good texts on international organization which give lengthy treatments of the U. N. are Clyde Eagleton, International Government (Ronald Press, New York, 1948, 554 p.); Norman Hill, International Organization (Harper, New York, 1952, 627 p.);

Nations Affairs,³⁷ covering each year since 1949, provides a useful companion to the U.N. Yearbook, in that it gives some evaluation of each year's activities. It is our opinion that the most interesting book about the United Nations, for its sheer readability, is that by Maclaurin,³⁸ but because the author's presentation is admittedly one-sided (see his Preface), it must be used with care. Kelsen's controversial and very valuable tome, with supplement, is invaluable for those with a legal bent.³⁹ Other useful general volumes are those by Bentwick and Martin, Carpenter, Fakher, McClellan, Ross, and Telder;⁴⁰ Peace on Earth,⁴¹ and the United Nations Association of the United Kingdom's Yearbook.⁴² There are two good collections of pertinent United Nations documents, one by Harley⁴³ and one by Sohn,⁴⁴ both published in 1950.

Before discussing the books that fall under the organic and functional categories, mention should be made of the Brookings Institution's contemplated series on the United Nations. In addition to its study on the background of the U.N. from 1941 through ratification of the Charter in 1945, other studies are in progress on the development of the Organization from 1946 through 1953 which will treat both organic and functional problems.

Books on individual organs of the United Nations are not numerous: one on Werner Levi, World Organization (University of Minnesota Press, Minneapolis, 1950, 233 p.); Linden Mander, Foundations of Modern World Society, 2nd ed. (Stanford University Press, Stanford, 1948, 928 p.).

³⁷ Annual Review of United Nations Affairs, eds. Clyde Eagleton and Richard Swift (New York University Press, New York, yearly 1950 [covering year 1949] to date [1952]).

³⁸ John Maclaurin, The United Nations and Power Politics (Harper, New York, 1951, 468 p.). There are some well-informed authorities who believe that Maclaurin is the pen name for K. Z. Zilliacus, and these same authorities believe that the books of C. Howard-Ellis and Roth Williams on the League of Nations were also written by Mr. Zilliacus. See E. F. Ranshofen-Wertheimer, The International Secretariat (Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Washington, 1945, p. 409 n).

³⁹ Hans Kelsen, The Law of the United Nations (Praeger, New York, 1950, 903 p.) and Recent Trends in the Law of the United Nations (Stevens and Sons, London, 1951, pp. 909-94).

⁴⁰ Norman Bentwick and Andrew Martin, A Commentary on the Charter of the United Nations (Routledge & Kegan Paul, London, 1951, 244 p.); Francis W. Carpenter, Men in Glass Houses (McBride, New York, 1951, 300 p.); Hossein Fakher, The Relations among the Principal Organs of the United Nations (Staples Press, London, 1951, 200 p.); Bruce McClellan, No Phoenix, No Ashes (Maple Press, York, Pa., 1951, 142 p.); Alf Ross, Constitution of the United Nations: Analysis of Structure and Functions (Rinehart, New York, 1950, 236 p.); "Professor Telders" Study Group, compilers, United Nations Textbook (Universitaire Pers Leiden, Leyden, 1950, 355 p.).

⁴¹ Essays by Trygve Lie and others, Peace on Earth (Hermitage House, New York, 1949, 251 p.).

⁴² United Nations Association of the United Kingdom, Yearbook 1948 and 1949-50 (Huchinson, London, 351 p. and 448 p., respectively).

⁴³ J. Eugene Harley, Documentary Textbook on the United Nations (Center for International Understanding, Los Angeles, 2nd ed., 1950, 1470 p.).

⁴⁴ Louis B. Sohn, Cases and Other Materials on World Law (Foundation Press, Brooklyn, 1950, 1363 p.).

the General Assembly, Haviland;⁴⁵ two on the International Court of Justice, Lissitzyn, and Hambro;⁴⁶ two on the Secretariat, Schwebel, and the Carnegie Endowment;⁴⁷ and two on the Security Council, Jiménez de Aréchaga, and Clark and Sohn.⁴⁸ The last-named also deals with the General Assembly. There is no book on the Economic and Social Council, except Finer's 1946 volume,⁴⁹ and none on the Trusteeship Council.

A number of books deal with U.N. functions. There are four on peaceful settlement of disputes: Robinson, Rivlin, Van Wagenen, and Wehl;⁵⁰ one on the budget;⁵¹ one on economic and social activities;⁵² one on the United Nations and nongovernmental organizations;⁵³ one on enabling instruments of U. N. members;⁵⁴ and two on the international control of atomic energy: the Royal Institute, and Brodie.⁵⁵ This list is complete enough to indicate the paucity of nonofficial books of functions on the United Nations.

WALDO CHAMBERLIN AND HARTLEY CLARK.

New York University.

⁴⁵ H. Field Haviland, The Political Role of the General Assembly (Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, New York, 1951, 190 p.).

⁴⁶ Oliver J. Lissitzyn, The International Court of Justice (Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, New York, 1951, 118 p.); Edvard Hambro, The Case Law of the International Court (A. W. Lijthoff's Publishing Co., Leyden, 1952, 699 p.).

⁴⁷ Stephen M. Schwebel, The Secretary-General of the United Nations (Harvard University Press, Cambridge, 1952, 299 p.); Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, The United Nations Secretariat (New York, 1952, 96 p.). The Endowment has announced that it will devote its January, 1954 issue of International Conciliation to "The International Civil Service."

⁴⁸ Eduardo Jiménez de Aréchaga, Voting and Handling of Disputes in the Security Council (Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, New York, 1950, 189 p.); Grenville Clark and Louis B. Sohn, Peace through Disarmament and Charter Revision (preliminary print 1953, 149 p.).

⁴⁹ Herman Finer, The United Nations Economic and Social Council (World Peace Foundation, Boston, 1946, 121 p.).

⁵⁰ Jacob Robinson, Palestine and the United Nations (Public Affairs Press, Washington, 1947, 269 p.); Benjamin Rivlin, The Italian Colonies (United Nations Action Series No. 1, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1950, 114 p.); Richard W. Van Wagenen, The Iranian Case (United Nations in Action Series No. 2, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1952, 119 p.); David Wehl, The Birth of Indonesia (Allen and Unwin, London, 1949, 216 p.).

⁵¹ Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, The Budget of the United Nations (New York, 1947, 63 p.).

⁵² Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Coordination of Economic and Social Activities (New York, 1949, 109 p.).

⁵³ Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Consultation between the United Nations and Non-Governmental Organizations (New York, 1949, 71 p.).

⁵⁴ Walter H. Zeydel and Waldo Chamberlin, Enabling Instruments of Members of the United Nations (Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, New York, 1951, 126 p.).

⁵⁵ Chatham House Study Group, Atomic Energy, Its International Implications (Royal Institute of International Affairs, London, 1948, 128 p.); The Absolute Weapon: Atomic Power and World Order, ed. Bernard Brodie (Harcourt, Brace, New York, 1946, 214 p.).

BOOK REVIEWS

Seedtime of the Republic: The Origin of the American Tradition of Political Liberty. BY CLINTON ROSSITER. (New York: Harcourt, Brace and Co. 1953. Pp. xiv, 558. $7.50.)

Professor Rossiter has written an outstanding book on American political thought in the colonial and Revolutionary periods. It is based on a very thorough canvass of both primary and secondary literature in the field and is presented in a style as graceful as it is forceful and clear.

The book is divided into three parts of approximately equal length. Part One is a brief history of the political, religious, economic, social, and intellectual factors which worked during the colonial period toward the emergence of liberty. Part Two consists of essays on six men of the same period whose ideas anticipated or contributed to the American tradition. Thomas Hooker and Roger Williams are chosen to represent the first generation, John Wise the middle period, Jonathan Mayhew, Richard Bland, and Benjamin Franklin the decades just prior to the Revolution. All are excellent choices, though this reviewer, sharing the author's belief that our tradition of liberty owes something to its conservative forebears as well as to its democratic heroes, regrets the omission of a stout colonial conservative of the early period. Five of the subjects are familiar figures, but in recreating the career of Bland, Professor Rossiter has made a most valuable move toward unearthing Southern political thought of the late colonial era. With one exception, these chapters are distinguished by extensive research, excellent organization, felicitous writing, and balanced judgment. Oddly enough, the treatment of Roger Williams is disappointingly sketchy and superficial. Williams left a very full record of his political ideas and, to this reviewer at least, they add up to much more than a bundle of "various elements of seventeenth-century republicanism" brought over from England. He combined an almost Hobbesian conception of human nature with a radical belief in liberty, and an expansive belief in political equality with the Puritan conviction that God had chosen and endowed certain men with special talents for governmental leadership. Such ideas are not without relevance for modern democracy, and they might have been analyzed with fruitful results.

To present the heritage of Revolutionary thought in the concluding section of the book, Professor Rossiter has chosen a very different method from that used in Part Two. Instead of singling out a few leading spokesmen he has recorded the voice of the Revolution as the great chorus that it was. Pamphlets, essays, letters, sermons, speeches, resolutions, laws, constitutions—these are the raw materials from which is condensed an extraordinarily concise and yet comprehensive statement of the beliefs that led to independence and to the establishment of republican governments. The author emphasizes the conservative nature of the Revolution; the idealism expressed in the Declaration of Independence balanced by a toughly realistic appreciation of man's political behavior; and perhaps most important of all, the remarkable consensus that existed despite sectional and class divisions. I believe that Jefferson, the Adamses, and all their compatriots would see in this composite intellectual portrait a very good likeness indeed.

As a survey of the growth of liberty during the colonial period, of the careers and ideas of outstanding colonial leaders of libertarian persuasion, and of the political thought of the Revolution, this book is superb. In spite of many excellent qualities, however, it remains, in the end, unsatisfying. In the first place, the book does not really hang together. Most of the men described at length in the heart of the study do not appear to have had direct influence on Revolutionary thought, and Professor Rossiter is quick to admit this. The men of '76 simply did not turn to them for either ammunition or inspiration, though they could have done so with profit. Thus in effect Part Two explores a fine ideological road to the Revolution which the patriots might have taken, but in fact did not.

A second reason for disappointment is the failure of the author, after an industrious tour of research, to come up with new perspectives or fresh insights. One does not want novelty for its own sake, but there is still much about the formative period of our tradition that we do not know or fully understand. For example, in spite of all that has been written about the direction and extent of Puritanism's influence, some questions remain unanswered. How did it happen that at the time of the Revolution, New England Puritans and Southern Anglicans shared so large a body of common political ideas and attitudes? In the essay on Hooker, Professor Rossiter suggests that "the magnificent theories of the social compact, the sovereignty of the people, and the authority of the electors to set limits upon the elected," were "seeds of liberty hidden away in the brittle pod of Puritanism." These ideas were not peculiar to Puritanism. Were the Puritans nevertheless responsible for making them operative in America, or were they part of a common English heritage which asserted itself regardless of the religious context?

Doubtless we shall never be entirely successful in tracing the ideas that accompanied the long colonial experience in self-government, and at the time of the Revolution helped shape so definitively our basic political structure of separation of powers with checks and balances. Recognition of self-interest as a dominant political motive and fear of party and faction were characteristic beliefs of the men who wrote our first state constitutions. These attitudes were deeply rooted in the past. In the New England election sermons of the middle period, for example, one can see reflected very clearly the colonists' concern with the problem of discovering the true public interest and making it prevail over the conflicting claims of individual and factional interests. It would be useful to have this and other vitally important parts of our political heritage thoroughly explored.

Perhaps it is unjust to criticize Professor Rossiter for failing to push further beyond the frontier of our knowledge in this area. What he has done, he has done exceedingly well, and his book cannot but be rewarding to all who share his desire to make the tradition of American liberty a continuing one.

CECELIA M. KENYON.

Smith College.

The Electoral System in Britain, 1918-1951. BY D. E. BUTLER. (London: Oxford University Press. 1953. Pp. xiv, 222. $4.25.)

The Party System in Great Britain. BY IVOR BULMER-THOMAS. (London: Phoenix House Ltd. Distributed by the Macmillan Co. 1953. Pp. vii, 328. $5.00.)

Americans have long been familiar with empirical—even statistical—techniques of examining political parties and elections. Political scientists in Britain, however, have only recently undertaken such studies, having long preferred to devote attention to such other matters as the working of Parliament, the nature of executive institutions, and the legal theory of the constitution. Indeed it would seem that only foreign scholars—notably Lowell, Ostrogorski, and Seymour—have subjected the British system of parties and elections to the diligent scrutiny that such matters have long received in this country. Under review are two valuable books by British students that break with this tradition. Mr. Bulmer-Thomas's book is the first work on the British party system since Ostrogorski; and Mr. Butler's book is, I believe, the first serious analytical study of the operation of the whole of the British electoral system.

Of the two, the Butler book is doubtless the more important. It is a work of unquestionably sound scholarship, based on careful research, and representing the product of several years of study. The author has been associated since the war with the team of scholars at Nuffield College, Oxford, who have undertaken the systematic investigation of the electoral process and who have now published formal studies of the last three general elections.¹ The present volume consists of two related parts, the first comprising a history of electoral reform since 1918 and the second (about one-third of the total) a series of analytical studies of various electoral problems. The chapters on the history of electoral reform serve as a sequel to the earlier works of Seymour and Morris² and, apart from their important contribution to this history, are chiefly remarkable for their demonstration that electoral reform has been much less important a subject of political debate in the twentieth century than it was in the nineteenth. This is somewhat surprising in view of the important reforms of 1918, 1928, and 1948; but apart from the struggle over university seats in 1948, there has been little significant controversy. The most vigorous arguments, as Mr. Butler says, "tended to be not so much about the merits of the proposal at issue as about the propriety of putting them forward." This does not mean, however, that the parties have always been in agreement on such proposals. Butler's study clearly shows this to be "the exception rather than the rule." Only in the wartime coalitions have changes been initiated as agreed party measures, and even one of these (1944) led to charges of broken faith.

¹ R. B. McCallum and A. Readman, The British General Election of 1945 (Oxford, 1947); H. G. Nicholas, The British General Election of 1950 (London, 1951); D. E. Butler, The British General Election of 1951 (London, 1952).

² C. S. Seymour, Electoral Reform in England and Wales (New Haven, 1915); H. L. Morris, Parliamentary Franchise Reform in England from 1885 to 1918 (New York, 1921).

The historical section is based primarily upon an exhaustive survey of Hansard, supplemented where possible by memoirs and periodical comment. The author has searched his sources thoroughly, as is illustrated by such observations as that on page 134 that a certain member, "for the third time in four years, told the House a story about an election for Belfast University." But whether the resources are yet available for the definitive history is open to question. The events of which Mr. Butler writes are both recent and controversial and many persons yet living have an interest in their interpretation; doubtless some of the evidence is not yet in. But the available materials have been skillfully employed and much has been added to our knowledge of this complex problem.

Even so, the second part of the book on the "working of the system" is of greater importance to political scientists. This is an extremely able study of several aspects of the electoral system based primarily on the election statistics themselves from 1918 onwards. From them the author has drawn conclusions about many important matters such as the significance of the business vote (it had little), the validity of prediction based on by-election results (risky), and the forfeiture of deposits (on the increase). Some of these analyses lay the groundwork at least for a new technique in the study of British elections. By his examination of electoral statistics, for example, Mr. Butler concludes that if P.R. had been adopted, as has at various times been urged by Labour or the Liberals, only two elections of the past eight would probably have returned a party with a clear working majority; furthermore, the alternative vote, which also has had its devoted advocates, would have produced little effect on either the control of the House or the size of majorities.

Perhaps the most interesting feature is the author's description of his own technique of analyzing the returns and his application of this technique to the problem of the relation between seats and votes. He makes clear that no redistricting can be either adequate or final and has at considerable pains shown just how much the present system is prejudiced in favor of the Conservatives. His book is a major scholarly contribution and one may reflect that if the sort of analysis it presents had been available earlier, the progress of and the debate over electoral reform that he here describes might have taken a different course.

It might also have been employed with profit by Mr. Bulmer-Thomas, whose book is of an entirely different sort. This author is a man with close personal experience of the party system of which he writes. He served as a Labour M.P. and minister until 1949 when he crossed the floor and joined the opposition, later standing unsuccessfully for election as a Conservative.

His book, like Mr. Butler's, starts with an historical introduction but its principal purpose is to afford a general description of the parties and the party system. It is pitched at a somewhat lower level of scholarship than is the Butler book and is intended for a much wider audience. This it should achieve, for the subject is of general interest and the discussion of it is able. One might expect from a writer with such intimate knowledge of both parties something less than complete impartiality, yet it is only rarely that the author's personal views are allowed to creep into his discussion. No doubt this is praiseworthy, but at the same time it is a little unfortunate that he so successfully excludes himself from his book. A man with so rich an experience might have shed much light on the party life of an M.P., on his ambitions and frustrations, on his relation to whips and leaders, and on the making of a parliamentary career. Moreover, by concentrating on party organization and structure, he slights the more important questions of the political process itself and the role of party in the determination of policy. Notwithstanding these missed opportunities, his chapters are sound and his discussion helpful.

There are a few sparkling high spots of special interest and value. One is a chapter on the decline of the independent member and another is a fascinating ten pages on the impact of non-party interest groups on the regular party organization. In several such chapters Mr. Bulmer-Thomas makes a real contribution to our understanding of British politics.

His book has been rather severely criticized in England as being too hastily written and, though interesting and useful, rather unsubstantial. There is some truth in the charge; several errors of fact, form, and even typography attest to hurried composition and imperfect editing. But the criticism is too severe. Mr. Bulmer-Thomas makes no claim on scholarship and his book is not meant to be a treatise. Yet it is the first coherent effort to explain the British party system in half a century; the author has done a workmanlike job and, if he has done little "original research" in its preparation, he has read widely in the secondary materials and has not confined himself to his own recollections. Indeed he has ignored them too much. It is unfair to criticize him for writing on so broad a subject without primary research when we can at the same time benefit from the researches of Mr. Butler on the much narrower one. The necessary spadework (such as is here represented by Butler's book) has not yet been done. We need both kinds of effort and should indeed welcome both these books.

WILLIAM S. LIVINGSTON.

The University of Texas.

The China Tangle: The American Effort in China from Pearl Harbor to the Marshall Mission. BY HERBERT FEIS. (Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1953. Pp. x, 445. $6.00.)

The general conclusion of this important book is stated in the final pages (pp. 429-430) and is both a summary and the recurring theme. The American effort in China after Pearl Harbor "was bent to four connected ends: to uphold the Chinese people in the war against the common enemy; to restore China as a whole and independent country; to secure for China a place of great authority among the nations; and to bring to an end the grave social struggle among the Chinese people. The China we strove to create—a free, strong, democratic and friendly nation—would be, we conceived, a needed partner in assuring peace and security for all in the Far East.” In attempting to fulfill these purposes, the author says, “we made great exertions. . . . Our friendship was firm, rejecting every chance to benefit by compromise those who wanted to reduce or rule China. . . . In retrospect, we may have done less in and for China while the war for Europe was being fought out than we might safely and wisely have done. We thought we were only deferring the greater aid until that part of the world-wide struggle against tyranny was won. And then the unexpected happened: the war in the Pacific ended abruptly before our effort in behalf of China reached its planned fullness.”

In preparing the narrative which illustrates and leads up to this conclusion, the author has gone through much of the mass of printed sources, including not only the substantial volume, United States Relations with China (the famous and much-discussed China White Paper), but also the mountainous accumulation from the Senate subcommittee hearings following the dismissal of MacArthur, the investigation of the Institute of Pacific Relations, and the investigation of the loyalty of the employees of the State Department, both also by Senate subcommittees. He has made use of much unpublished manuscript material left by some of the principal actors, pertinent files of the State Department, and papers in the Roosevelt Library at Hyde Park. He has interviewed numbers of those in prominent posts—most of them in the government of the United States, but also at least one in the Nationalist government—who were involved in the issues which are covered.

Dr. Feis has sought to be objective, notably so in handling the highly controversial topics which his subject demands that he treat. In this his success is striking. On some points he has not hesitated to express his opinions. On others he frankly disclaims the possession of enough data to venture on a conviction.

The result is a volume which is a “must” for all seriously concerned with the foreign relations of the United States. It is a book that will last. For years to come anyone dealing seriously with the subject which is its theme will find reference to it both helpful and necessary.

The author covers all the main aspects of his assignment. As is proper, he devotes much attention to military matters. He has a great deal to say on the contrasts in procedure advocated by the various generals—of Chiang Kai-Shek’s requests and their only partial fulfilment, of the differing proposals for the recapture of Burma, of the conflict between Stilwell and Chiang, of the opposing plans of campaign of Chennault and Stilwell, and of the fashion in which, taking over after Stilwell, Wedemeyer eased the tensions. He describes the relations between the Kuomintang and the Communists. He narrates the efforts of various Americans, including Hurley, to bring the two together in the common effort to defeat the Japanese and to resolve without exhausting civil war the reciprocal antagonisms. He notes the growing distrust of Chiang and the Kuomintang which was exhibited by many Americans, both those in official position and the representatives of the press, and the good press given the Communists with the impression that they were not true Communists—but rural reformers. He remarks how few if any Americans dealing with China, whether in the diplomatic service, in other branches of the government, or not in government employ, were familiar with Communist literature in general and in particular with the writings of Mao Tze-tung and those associated with him. He records the repeated assertions of Stalin and Molotov to highly placed American officials that they did not regard the Chinese Communists as true to that name and that in defeating the Japanese reliance must be placed on Chiang and not on the group in Yen-an. He does not venture an opinion as to whether these statements were honest or were attempts to mislead the United States. The author has much to say of the Yalta Agreement, of its outgrowth from preliminary efforts to draw Russia into the war against Japan, of the attempts, only in part successful, to tone down Stalin's demands in Manchuria, and of the wording which was capable of contrasting interpretation by the Russians and the Americans. He points out the lack of coordination between the several branches of the United States government in dealing with China and the fact that most and perhaps all of the time the State Department had only a minor voice in the major decisions.

The book is one to read and ponder. It is to be hoped that the author will go on with the story, carrying it through the Marshall mission and eventually through the Korean war.

KENNETH SCOTT LATOURETTE.

Yale University.

Asian Nationalism and the West: A Symposium Based on Documents and Reports of the Eleventh Conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations. EDITED BY WILLIAM L. HOLLAND; GEORGE MCT. KAHIN, PHILIPPE DEVILLERS, T. H. SILCOCK, AND UNGKU A. AZIZ, CONTRIBUTORS. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1953. Pp. viii, 449. $5.00.)

The "liberation" phase of Asian nationalism, William L. Holland asserts in his introduction, has largely ended, and as that nationalism enters new stages of development, a more accurate comparison of its distinctive properties may be possible. There have been few attempts, however, to characterize the various Asian nationalisms in the post-colonial stage. Native leaders, preoccupied with the attainment of independence and the problems that confront infant nations in a power world, have been unable to give specific form and content to their national aspirations, often continuing to utilize "anti-colonial" slogans that have lost their validity in recent years. This "political lag" and the ambiguity of national goals, Holland cautions, breed a situation that extremists might exploit.

This book presents a considerable body of material on the background of and recent developments in nationalist movements of South and East Asian nations, although it does not pretend to be a comprehensive treatment of the problem in each country. The symposium is divided into three parts. The first section is Holland's introduction, "New Trends in Asian Nationalism," devoted in part to comparisons and to outlining the problems that the post-colonial stage of nationalism poses to the area as a whole and to the West; and in part to treatments of aspects of nationalism in six nations, three of the discussions being extracted from papers read at the I.P.R. Conference at Lucknow in 1950. There is a short study of economic and cultural nationalism in the Philippines, an analysis of prewar nationalism in Japan, a discussion of the ethnic and religious components of nationalism in Burma and Ceylon, and an excellent comparison of Indian with Chinese nationalism. This section, of course, was not designed to develop more than specialized facets of nationalist movements; nevertheless one keeps expecting a discussion of the interplay between social and economic factors and fuller treatment of Communist machinations in the respective nations under consideration. It was no doubt impossible to analyze all of the important variables operating in the complexity of Chinese nationalism in the few pages devoted to this topic.

Some of what is lacking in the first section is taken up in the concluding section of the study. It might have been advantageous to combine a portion of the two to give a more comprehensive treatment, perhaps in summary, comparative form. This last part of the book is devoted to summaries of the round table discussions at the Conference. Here the conferees run the gamut of Asia's problems: poverty and population, industrialization and diversification, investment and technical assistance, Communist tactics, and the transplanting of Western institutions to Oriental soil. Nor are the problems of foreign policy overlooked: Kashmir, Formosa, Korea, Pacific Pact, New Guinea, and the role of India. Much of this section is helpful in pointing up attitudes of Asians toward their own problems, their anxieties over Western policy, and some of their misunderstandings of that policy. There are some minor inconsistencies in either the discussion or the reporting, as, for example, over the question of whether the Malayan Communists were receiving outside aid (pp. 368, 389). Some observers today would take issue with the consensus of one panel that the Communist government in China was "probably a vast improvement" over its predecessor. The book was unfortunately delayed in going to press, with the result that the discussion of the treaty with Japan is dated; moreover, the members of that panel tended in some respects to be a little too optimistic in their appraisal of the Japanese scene. The total study, already encompassing a wide area, does not include an analysis of Korean nationalism.

A central portion of the book is a reprint of three of the Conference documents. The first, "Indonesian Politics and Nationalism," by George McT. Kahin, is a documented analysis of the cultural and political forces that fashioned a nationalist movement capable of filling the power vacuum left by the surrender of the Japanese. The author recounts historically the development of the unitary state (he disagrees with those who consider the Hague Agreement a legal barrier to the abandonment of the federal system) and the evolution of the various Indonesian ministries and the difficulties they faced. There follows a rewarding examination of the problems confronting the new state, especially those of bureaucracy, personalized politics, and the relationship of ruler to ruled.

"Vietnamese Nationalism and French Policies," by Philippe Devillers, is a translation of the closing chapters of a larger work in French. This Conference document advances the thesis that at the end of the war the Vietminh regime in Indochina was an unpopular one. A clearly enunciated and quickly executed policy (looking toward independence) on the part of France, he contends, would have encouraged the emergence of nationalist forces to compete with the power of Ho Chi Minh. However, French procrastination, largely resulting from the internal bickering at home, enabled the Communists to strengthen their control over the nationalist movement. Although Bao Dai was able to exact important concessions from France, the delayed transference of sovereignty weakened his hand and made Communist propaganda more effective. There is a paucity of documentation in this work, and a discussion (which was included in the original treatise) of the relationship of the Ho forces to international communism and the French Communist party would have been revealing.

In their paper, "Nationalism in Malaya," T. H. Silcock and Ungku A. Aziz have clearly spelled out the peculiar characteristics of the nationalist movement in that area, with special emphasis upon racial discord and external influences. The authors deal with the effects of the Japanese occupation upon the several racial groups, following with an historical treatment of postwar developments and problems and the interrelation between communism and the components of nationalism. A few additional references and a more complete treatment of the impact of Britain's recent trade policies would have been helpful contributions to an up-to-date analysis of the Malayan situation.

The treatment of such a broad, evolving, and complicated phenomenon as Asian nationalism must in certain respects be cursory, and the minor criticisms implicit in this review in no way detract from the vast array of useful data and challenging comparisons that portray the complexity of Asia's problems.

JOHN E. TURNER.

University of Minnesota.

Governing Postwar Germany. BY EDWARD H. LITCHFIELD AND ASSOCIATES. (Ithaca: Cornell University Press. 1953. Pp. xvii, 661.).

Among the numerous books dealing with Germany published in the United States since World War II this book is likely to be regarded generally as one of the most important. Its authors have brought to their analysis more than ordinary professional background and have also had the opportunity to observe developments from official positions in most cases. The book has been in course of preparation for several years and its scope and contents have been reviewed again and again—indeed few works dealing with current problems have received as careful planning and preparation. While by no means avoiding conclusions, the authors have gone to considerable pains to present their material objectively and to explain various points of view. Though dealing with a rapidly changing situation the book should contribute to the work of serious students for some years.

The arrangement of using a group of collaborators has the advantage of bringing together the broad experiences of a number of persons. No one looking even casually at the records of this particular team can be oblivious to the remarkable coverage involved. The use of a group presents certain difficulties: the avoidance of duplication and overlapping, the agreement on level of treatment, the exact period to be covered, and so forth. In a group which includes the prima donnas to be noted in this particular collection such complications could prove beyond control and the editor deserves great credit for achieving the large measure of success to be observed. That is not to say that there is no overlapping—a reader notes a fair amount of repetition in the chapters dealing with political parties and governments in Soviet Germany and in the ones discussing the constitution of the Federal Republic and legislation, for example. Nor can it be stated that every topic is presented in the same detail—personnel management is dealt with far more thoroughly than organization and methods control. Moreover, the period covered is not the same in every case—Professor Brecht, for example, brings his discussion of public personnel up to the middle of 1953 while Dr. Glaser in his consideration of Eastern Germany closes with 1951.

Other problems frequently almost insurmountable in the use of a group of persons who have participated in spectacular programs such as the occupation of Germany are those of keeping personal reminiscing within reasonable limits, and of attaining proper objectiveness. The impossible has not been accomplished here, as one may note in reading Dr. Grace's chapter on education, which dismisses the three years of his predecessors as "more or less devoid of an educational and cultural relations effort" (p. 458); but the editor has managed to do more in this respect than one might expect, perhaps because he has himself set the tone in his two introductory chapters.

Aside from the divergencies noted above there is one weakness which appears of major import to this reviewer: the slight attention paid to "the executive," the "policy-determining organs of government," and the like. The chancellorship, the presidency, and the cabinet are mentioned in passing in the chapter entitled "The Constitution of the German Federal Republic," but no detailed treatment of this most vital aspect of government is attempted anywhere in the book. Of course, it is not a simple matter to penetrate into some of the "holies of holies" here represented, but some of the participants might have thrown a fair amount of light on what in the last analysis would seem the central point of government.

Space does not permit more than the barest additional comments, but some reference should be made to the admirably written and illuminating chapters of Dr. Litchfield dealing with the evolution of postwar governments, the excellent chapters of Roger Wells discussing state and local government, the outstanding analysis which Dr. Brecht makes of personnel management, and the two concluding chapters on parties and elections by R. M. Scammon. Contributions by Karl Loewenstein, Rodney Mott, John Hay, A. M. Hillhouse, Taylor Cole, and Howard P. Jones are all of a high level. A carefully selected group of documents, some of which are not readily accessible elsewhere, concludes the volume.

HAROLD ZINK.

Ohio State University.

The Diplomats: 1919-1939. EDITED BY GORDON A. CRAIG AND FELIX GILBERT.
(Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1953. Pp. xiv, 700. $9.00.)

In the roseate glow of the false dawn that followed the Paris Peace Conference, many Americans and some Europeans were only too glad to persuade themselves that the time had come to bury that sinister figure, the diplomat. Before the tombstone could be erected, however, the corpse was hustled back to life. Even fortunate America, protected from foreign sin by her oceanic moats, ultimately had to learn to coexist with all sorts of strange bedfellows through the old-fashioned bundling process of diplomatic accommodation. The Diplomats: 1919-1939 focuses a searching spotlight on the activities of a number of prominent practitioners of that ancient art who played significant roles in the world drama during the interwar period.

This volume should not be thought of nor judged as a traditional diplomatic history. In the words of the editors, "the basic problem with which this book is concerned is that of the significance which traditional diplomacy possessed in a period in which its institutions were assailed from the democratic, as well as from the totalitarian, side but during which . . . it continued to be employed by all Powers as an instrument for attaining national objectives." And, for Americans in the audience, the editors add that "a book which shows how dangerous suspicion of the conventions and practices of diplomacy can be, if it is not modified by an earnest desire to make use of those aspects of the diplomatic art which have been proven by time and experience, may serve a useful purpose." In spite of some regrettable omissions, due primarily to lack of adequate evidence, these essays throw light on most of the major figures. And the presentation is enhanced by exceptional clarity, discernment, polish, and economy of language.

One is reminded by this analysis that diplomacy did not flourish equally well in all climates during the period reviewed but tended to prosper only when a nation cast anxious or covetous eyes beyond its borders, usually related to some real or imagined threat to its survival, and when there was no overwhelming preponderance of power for or against it. One is also impressed with the fact that, as in most professions, here also experience and specialized skill can be of decisive importance. No amount of righteous fulmination on the part of William E. Dodd, United States ambassador in Germany from 1933 to 1937, could compensate for his deficiency in diplomatic background and hence lack of appreciation and capacity for objective, comprehensive, and intensive reporting. Contrary to the popular impression in some quarters that an envoy is little more than a glorified messenger boy, this study reveals that several of the more effective diplomats wielded significant influence in making policy as well as implementing it. In all countries, moreover, the growing complexity of international relations has widened the scope of the diplomat's participation and made the task of coordination more difficult. As the State Department had such competitors as the Board of Economic Warfare, so Wilhelmstrasse had its Büro Ribbentrop.

This analysis also provides fresh insights regarding the incessant balance of power process. Perhaps most significant is the evidence which reminds one that that process is never automatic or inevitable in its operation. Aside from the difficulty of weighing various national power potentials at any given moment, there are the ideological factors that lead men to resist making decisions on a sheer material power basis. The classic interwar example of this was the reluctance of England and France to counteract the rising tide of Nazi aggression by joining forces with the Soviet Union. Furthermore, it is clear that one must not underestimate the ethical considerations that lay behind much of the so-called appeasement movement, especially among British socialists and religionists. Above all, one is impressed with how eternally difficult and time-consuming it was, and continues to be, to harness two "sovereign" nations together with any degree of effective and continuing synchronization, even with considerable goodwill on both sides, as in the case of Britain and France.

All in all, few historical treatments of diplomacy have given us as rich and useful an account as this. This reviewer wishes only that the authors had made their criteria for evaluation more explicit and their judgments more intensive. What criticism there is deals primarily with the accuracy of the diplomats' reports and forecasts. It seems unfortunate that there is no deeper and more direct exploration of the failure of so many interwar envoys, including representatives of relatively democratic governments, to be bolder protagonists of democratic rather than antidemocratic objectives, especially since the authors recognize the policy-influencing role of the diplomat.

H. FIELD HAVILAND, JR.

Haverford College.

Sociology and Psychology of Communism. BY JULES MONNEROT. TRANSLATED BY JANE DEGRAS AND RICHARD REES. (Boston: The Beacon Press. 1953. Pp. 339. $6.00.)

European Communism. BY FRANZ BORKENAU. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1953. Pp. 564. $6.00.)

Monnerot's volume does not live up to its ambitious title. It contains some interesting observations in the Freudian and Jungian vein on the psychology, not so much of communism in particular, as of dictatorship and secular religion in general. It is based almost exclusively on secondary sources. Though it may be argued that in dealing interpretatively with so vast a topic one need not necessarily use primary sources, it does arouse suspicion if an author betrays ignorance of the standard works quoted by him. Thus, to mention one example only, Monnerot reproaches Michels for his alleged failure to "allow for the fact that German social democracy . . . succumbed unconsciously to the pervasive Prussian influence of the prestige of the German army . . ." (p. 33).

The author claims to present a sociology of communism, but the reader will search in vain for even the most rudimentary data on the social structure of the Communist parties or the institutions of the Communist regimes. Instead, he is given some rather commonplace socio-philosophical observations about communism as a totalitarian dictatorship and as a secular religion. Instead of investigating communism's novel and unique qualities, Monnerot interprets it as merely another form of Islam, Caesarism, or tyranny, without every clarifying these concepts.

While Monnerot's approach is by far too general and too vague to yield significant new insights, Borkenau almost overwhelms us with factual details. As a lifelong student of communism trying to present the history of European communism, he has no doubt the right and the duty to be specific; yet, in this work, he does not manage to combine historical and sociological methods as successfully as in his World Communism. Nowhere does the present volume reach the high level of those chapters of his previous book in which he so brilliantly explained the unique condition of Russian culture as a basis for Bolshevism and so acutely analyzed the social composition and fluctuation of the Communist parties. When Borkenau wrote his earlier work, he had indeed been close enough to communism to know it at first hand and far enough removed to evaluate it without excessive bitterness.

The present book is considerably more subjective. Though all of us will agree that communism constitutes a formidable threat to Western civilization, not everyone will identify it with fascism. Nor is it a mere extension of the apparatus of the secret police. In the underdeveloped parts of Asia or in countries shaken by crises, such as Italy or France, the Communist movement is, even today, a perverted expression of genuine yearnings of the masses of workers and peasants for a better life. Unfortunately, Borkenau underrates this aspect of communism as a manipulated mass movement. Hence his history of communism becomes a sequence of ideological, organizational, diplomatic, and military moves and maneuvers. Finally, as against his World Communism with its bibliographical notes, the scholarly apparatus of European Communism is quite inadequate. So controversial a subject treated so subjectively needs the most painstaking and thorough documentation.

Nevertheless, Borkenau's book is indispensable reading for the student of communism, who will appreciate the competence of the author in using rare and almost unknown material. The general reader will at least enjoy an immensely interesting story told in masterly fashion. The first chapters constitute the best summary ever written of the origins of the Third International and the developments from 1919 to 1934. Part II of the book deals in great detail with Popular Front policy, tracing its ups and downs in France and Spain. In Part III Borkenau tries to recapture the shifts and twists of the Communist strategy in the days of the Hitler-Stalin pact and the war alliance with the West. The concluding part contains much valuable material on the progress of communism in Western Europe and in the Popular Democracies all through the forties.

In contrast to Monnerot's ill-fated attempt, Borkenau's book is a valuable contribution to the understanding of communism. Perhaps it is permissible to express the hope that, one day, the author will use his profound knowledge of the subject to give us a real treatment of the sociology and psychology of communism.

OSSIP K. FLECHTHEIM.

Deutsche Hochschule für Politik (Berlin).

The Federal Loyalty-Security Program. By ELEANOR BONTECOU. (Ithaca: Cornell University Press. 1953. Pp. xi, 377. $5.00.)

Even the casual observer cannot in recent years have escaped some impressions that loyalty and security constitute important issues in the federal service. The findings of the Canadian Royal Commission investigating espionage in that government, the accounts of espionage methods given by Whittaker Chambers and Elizabeth Bentley, and the case of Judith Coplon, all point to the existence in the Communist party of "a hard core of disciplined and dedicated revolutionaries, who can be relied on to penetrate the ranks of labor, government, and intellectuals and in this way gain what Mr. Justice Jackson has called 'a leverage over society'" (p. 7). To our knowledge gained from the facts about disloyalty and espionage among public servants have also been added, ever since the days of Congressman Dies, widespread fears based on the well publicized fancies of a number of legislators.

In this context has grown up the "federal loyalty-security program." What began as shrill and spasmodic attacks on the loyalty of a few public employees has in little more than a decade become a rather respectable program of personnel administration. It partakes of the typical characteristics of the bureaucratic way of life. In seven appendices this book assembles almost a hundred pages of statutes, executive orders, rules and regulations, memoranda, and the other paraphernalia of the program. While this machinery often gives evidence of having been improvised, it grinds away as a costly part of our system of personnel administration. Had Miss Bontecou been able to include the recent changes in the program under the Eisenhower Administration, she would simply have confirmed how fully accepted is the logic of probing into the loyalty of federal employees.

In its carefully developed detail, this volume focuses sharply on the portentous development of the purpose of the program. Stated generally, the program of course is intended to prevent the employment of persons who are disloyal and who might endanger the security of the United States. But what kinds of acts mark a man as disloyal? What overt conduct permits a loyalty board to infer that his devotion to the United States is at a dangerously low level?

From the cases that have come before the loyalty boards Miss Bontecou has put together a disconcerting picture of the answer to these questions. She reports: "Among the eighty-five [cases] studied by the writer, not one was found which involved charges of treason, sedition, espionage, sabotage, or advocacy of the overthrow of the government by force or violence, and no such cases were reported by the agency officials interviewed" (p. 105). Rather, disloyalty means "communism." But communism is not judged simply by membership in the Communist party or in organizations closely identified with it. In the light of charges brought against federal employees, communism can be said to include sympathy for the party line, reading Communist literature, and, most commonly, association with individuals "who in turn are said to be subversive or connected with organizations named by the Attorney General" (p. 110). "Proof" of charges such as these permits the inference that the individual accused is disloyal.

Miss Bontecou's analysis of "derogatory information" and the "Attorney General's list" supplies the key for understanding "proof." The loyalty boards make their charges essentially on the basis of investigation reports containing derogatory information. The accused employee must then rebut the presumption of disloyalty created by the charges. Derogatory information may be highly irrelevant (the parking of one's car in the neighborhood of a Communist front meeting) and, even worse, may be entirely false. But the investigative process is not adapted to determining relevance or truth. The Attorney General's list is a similarly inept tool. As Miss Bontecou points out, "No one can be sure that at some future date the Communists may not attempt to capture the organization to which he belongs. . . . If the Communists succeed, one's present or future career may be jeopardized under the present practice" (p. 204). Yet the burden of answering charges based on the irrelevant and the false rests upon the accused employee. Moreover, the mechanics of adjudication do not ordinarily permit him an opportunity to confront or cross-examine his accusers. He has no way of meeting the implication that he is disloyal by virtue of membership in an organization on the Attorney General's list.

The present direction of the loyalty-security program seems to Miss Bontecou to find its closest parallel in the Holy Inquisition rather than in Anglo-American legal tradition. But the courts have not yet clearly determined the major questions about the rights and duties of public servants. Hopefully, the analysis of this volume suggests that perhaps the courts "will find that they are not really being asked to choose between the conflicting interests of individual freedom and national security, but are dealing with different aspects of the larger problem of national security. They may then decide that the maintenance of our traditional freedoms and our traditional respect for fairness is as necessary to our safety as a free nation as are the forging of secret weapons and the raising of armies" (p. 236).

As a study of civil liberties this book provides cause for real alarm. But have we perhaps gained security? It seems fair to infer that we have not. Indeed, it may be that the whole program has weakened the public service and thus damaged our national security. But even on its own terms the program has not quieted the hysterical legislators nor reassured those genuinely anxious about security.

How does it come, then, that we appear willing to hang so defective a program on our personnel system? Miss Bontecou recognizes that the answer to this fundamental question must be sought in the "predominantly illiberal" mood of the public at present. Perhaps what seem to be failures in the program merely are forecasts of success—success measured by new standards, where secret testimony of F.B.I. informers, proscription by fiat of the Attorney General, and thought-control by loyalty boards become genuinely efficient instruments to destroy heresy and insure loyalty.

EGBERT S. WENGERT.

University of Oregon.

The Constitutional Principles of Thomas Jefferson. BY CALEB PERRY PATTERSON. (Austin: University of Texas Press. 1953. Pp. x, 211. $4.00.)

Significant indeed is the persistence and universality of the influence of Jefferson. This son of the earliest frontier was the first thoroughly American national statesman in that he freed himself from the clutch of alien dogmas and adapted his ideology completely to the American scene. Let it never be forgotten that he was the patron saint of every major American political party except the Federalist. The Whigs insisted that, as champions of the legislature against King Andrew I, they were the only real Jeffersonians. The first Republican platform (1856) named but two founding fathers—Washington and Jefferson. Lincoln's letter of April 6, 1859 to H. L. Pierce and others reveals that Republicans were celebrating Jefferson's birthday. "The principles of Jefferson are the definitions and axioms of free society," appears repeatedly in Lincoln's letters. Jefferson can be monopolized by no single group of Americans.

Professor Patterson has read the writings of Jefferson diligently, intelligently, and with a definite purpose. That purpose, however, is not a scientific analysis of the incomparable statesman's constitutional principles, which are used instead in a passionate protest against current trends. The title might well have been "If Jefferson Were Living Today." This reviewer gets the impression he might have been a Bourbon Democrat if not a Liberty Leaguer or even a Dixiecrat. At any rate he would never have been a New Dealer. This pattern of interpretation is forecast in the preface. "For almost one hundred and fifty years, down to the fateful year of 1932, his [Jefferson's] party remained loyal to his conception of the Constitution" (p. ix). Franklin Roosevelt tricked the American people, especially those who elected him in 1932. "They did not foresee that his and his successor's administration would shamelessly abandon those principles" (p. ix).

Professor Patterson considers Jefferson as a lawyer, his "making" of our Constitution, his theory of constitutionalism, his maintaining the fundamental law, his opposition to the strong executive and to bureaucracy, and his views on the judiciary, the general welfare clause, and other constitutional issues.

It is the current abandonment of Jefferson's natural law and natural rights that Professor Patterson most vehemently laments. "The limited state, the agent of man, has been converted to the totalitarian state, the master of man. This boulder of conservatism has been appropriated by our authoritarian liberals and made the Rock of Gibraltar on which the Leviathan statism now rests. This is how the doctrine of Von Treitschke and Nietzsche—the foundations of Hitlerism—the organic state—have been substituted for the natural law as the basis of American government" (p. 65). Justice Holmes is the "father of this revolution" against natural law and along with his disciples on the Supreme Court has achieved what "amounts to the establishment of a unitary totalitarian state in the place of our constitutionally limited federal system of government" (p. 64).

Stern judgment is passed on the erratic electorate because "it chose leaders who have abandoned the very foundations of our democratic heritage and our constitutional system of government" (p. 63). That there may be no mistake about it the marplots are listed. "Thanks to social scientists, behaviorist psychologists, and modern pragmatists belief in the doctrines of natural law and natural rights is no longer thought to be intelligent or informed. But have we lived to see the day when to be a democrat, one must be a moron, when to have ideals is foolish"? (pp. 63-64).

Professor Patterson's assumption that the Democratic party was faithful to Jeffersonian principles until 1932 ought to be qualified by the fact that Democratic National Conventions refused to pledge the party to the Declaration of Independence from 1844 to 1896. One looks in vain in this treatise for a recognition of the relation of ideology to social forces. For example, condemning the bureaucrats for telling the farmer "what to sow and what to reap and how he can market his products and for what prices" is wasted ink as long as "God's chosen people" won't let even a Republican administration have it otherwise.

WILFRED E. BINKLEY.

Ohio Northern University.

American Capitalism: The Concept of Countervailing Power. BY JOHN KENNETH GALBRAITH. (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company. 1952. Pp. xi, 217. $3.00.)

Big Business: A New Era. BY DAVID E. LILIENTHAL. (New York: Harper & Brothers. 1952. Pp. xii, 209. $2.75.)

Giant Business: Threat to Democracy. BY T. K. QUINN. (New York: Exposition Press. 1952. Pp. 321. $3.75.)

Thorstein Veblen long ago argued that "the point of view of economists has always been in large part the point of view of the enlightened common sense of their time. The spiritual attitude of a given generation of economists is therefore in good part a special outgrowth of the ideals and preconceptions current in the world about them."¹ Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations is a classical illustration in point. Written as a philosophical protest against the web of restrictive controls which under a guild society and a mercantilistic state had been woven into the fabric of the contemporary economy but which under the influence of the new industrialism and rising entrepreneurial class had come to be honored more in the breach than in the observance, it immediately won wide popularity both at home and abroad. It did so because it was the "outgrowth of the ideals and preconceptions" of Smith's world. Throughout the nineteenth century it afforded the rationale and rationalization for a free competitive economy. But as it did so the structure of the contemporary economy was rapidly changing. By the end of the century the Great Combination Movement in this country had transformed an economy of numerous sellers into an economy of few. The first two decades of the twentieth century accentuated the trend. The change in structure called for a new economic theory. It has brought forth Chamberlin's Theory of Monopolistic Competition, Joan Robinson's Economics of Imperfect Competition, Clark's "concept of workable competition," Schumpeter's "perennial gale of creative destruction," and now Galbraith's The Concept of Countervailing Power. The latter has been heralded by its publishers as comparable in its theoretical significance to Smith's Wealth of Nations. Many economists will challenge such high praise, but they can scarcely deny that Galbraith's "countervailing power" illustrates that the problems economists think about and the way they think about them are products of the institutional arrangements out of which the problems have arisen. Galbraith has furnished a rationale and rationalization for big business and an economy of the few.

¹ "The Preconceptions of Economic Science," Quarterly Journal of Economics, Vol. 13, pp. 121-50, at p. 125 (Jan., 1899). This article is reprinted in The Place of Science in Modern Civilization (New York, 1919), pp. 82-113.

His concept of countervailing power is not difficult to recapitulate, but no recapitulation can do justice to his engaging style and his delightful imagination, or to his broad but sometimes unprecise grasp of the history of industry and of ideas. Galbraith believes that efficient exploitation of modern technology requires business units so large that if left to themselves they will inevitably have power over the market. But not only does technology beget monopoly; monopoly begets technology. Without the large industrial research laboratory, technological progress will inevitably slow down, if indeed it does not come to a halt. The dilemma thus created—that big business is essential to progress but tends to behave like monopoly—is solved by countervailing power. Power on one side of the market begets power on the other side and countervailing power, like atomistic competition in bygone days, checks the avarice of monopolists and turns to public benefaction their remarkable technological achievements.

"The operation of countervailing power is to be seen with the greatest clarity in the labor market, where it is also most fully developed" (p. 121). The United Steel Workers is a direct response to the power of the steel industry. Before its organization, men in the steel industry worked twelve hours a day, seventy-two hours a week, with an "incredible twenty-four-hour stint every fortnight when the shift changed" (ibid.). The countervailing power of labor, by putting an end to such intolerable conditions, has brought good to the whole economy. The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company by matching the power of big food manufacturers has brought cheap groceries to every housewife; Sears, Roebuck by "exploiting its role as a large and indispensable customer" (p. 125) has bought Goodyear tires at wholesale so cheaply that it could undersell Goodyear itself in the retail market.

Power blocs do for an economy of big units what competition does for an economy of small units. They are the invisible hand which guides economic activity towards good and gracious goals. But countervailing power cannot be unfailingly relied on. Its germination may not always be spontaneous, and once in operation it may not always be socially beneficial. Rising prices may check its beneficent propensities in periods of inflation. Hence the state must at times play the dual role of creator and regulator. It must bring countervailing power into being when natural forces are inadequate to give it birth and must regulate it in the upswing of the business cycle. Specifically, the state must at such times set up price controls to protect consumer interests.

Such is Galbraith's comforting doctrine. While it contains some truth, it has shortcomings. I believe that it conceals rather than reveals the real causes of the rise to power of our giant industrial corporations, that it inaccurately interprets their significance to market behavior, and that Galbraith falsely interprets the implication of countervailing power for a democracy.

Galbraith's concept of countervailing power involves a counterconcept, that of original power. This he conceives as the traditional monopoly power condemned by economists, but he does not explain its origin. Original power Galbraith loosely identifies with the power of sellers, countervailing power with the power of buyers: "The long trend toward concentration of industrial enterprise in the hands of a relatively few firms has brought into existence not only strong sellers, as economists have supposed, but also strong buyers as they have failed to see. The two develop together, not in precise step but in such manner that there can be no doubt that the one is in response to the other" (p. 118).

Either may come first, of course, but the response relationship is basic to his theory. Nowhere does he offer any real evidence of this interrelationship. Rather he assumes it. Economists generally recognize that powerful sellers quite often find themselves confronted by powerful buyers, and that when they do their power may be compromised. But to assume that coexistence indicates a causal relationship is false and misleading. The American Can Company and the United States Steel Corporation illustrate this. Both arose out of the complex set of socio-economic forces that gave birth to the Great Combination Movement. Both were the handiwork of professional promoters aiming at power, but neither group of promoters had any notion of or interest in countervailing power. For organizing the Steel Corporation its promoters realized about $65 million; they also brought temporary stability to an industry threatened by "ruinous" competition. Professional promoters put together the American Can Company and obtained thereby virtually a monopoly of can making. Both concerns absorbed directly or indirectly over a hundred separate manufacturing firms. Industrial history affords no evidence that either of these concerns arose in response to the other. Both arose out of a common institutional framework, the complex web of which cannot be unravelled here.

But perhaps their common rather than their countervailing origin, important as it is to an understanding of the structure of the contemporary economy, would not matter so much to economists if their coexistence—the one as a seller of tin plate, the other as a buyer making tin cans—had brought the beneficial results which Galbraith imagines. It did not. For a quarter of a century after their organization, instead of bringing a compromise that protected canners and ultimately consumers, countervailing power brought secret price discriminations that placed independent can makers at a tremendous disadvantage in competing with the American Can Company. Because American Can as price leader in the industry tied the price of its cans to the price of tin plate, countervailing power meant higher prices for the hundreds of relatively small vegetable and fruit canners who had neither original nor countervailing power. It nowhere along the way protected the consumer. Other illustrations could be given, but this one makes the point.

The Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Company and Sears, Roebuck are in some respects happier selections, but neither represents countervailing power in Galbraith's use of the term. That is to say, neither originated because of the existence of power on the other side of the market. On the contrary, both reflect the genius for organizational innovation of shrewd businessmen who saw a chance of turning an honest penny by doing for distribution what the captains of industry had a generation earlier done for mass production. And while no housewife or farmer is likely to complain of the services which these two great organizations daily perform, the myriad of small, powerless sellers who supply them with goods may have a legitimate quarrel with Galbraith for designating these two corporations as illustrations of countervailing power.

Nor does countervailing power always promise salutary compromise in the field of industrial relations. What of the recent steel strike, where stalemate in time of crisis brought unconstitutional seizure of the industry by a frightened and frustrated President? And this points, I believe, to the greatest weakness of Galbraith's analysis. He finds in countervailing power the last great hope for democratic capitalism. If English or German experiences or our own trends toward industrial and political concentration of power have any significance, it seems more likely that the power of private economic blocs invites, if indeed it does not demand, countervailing political power and perhaps their ultimate coalescence.

A business executive turned author, in commenting recently on public attitudes toward business, said: "What we need is more clear thinking straight from the heart." Mr. Lilienthal's book helps to meet this need. In approaching this subject he states his credo (p. 7; emphasis added):

I believe that we should set about at once to re-examine the outdated structure of our feeling, our thinking and our public policy toward Bigness. We should . . . replace it with a foundation of feeling and of economic and legal policy based upon the realities of the mid-twentieth century. The times call for a rousing affirmation that Bigness can be made the means of promoting and furthering not only our nation's productivity but more important still the freedom and the well-being of its individual citizens.

In proselyting for his faith he has written an impressionistic account of the way in which big business serves society. It is an inspiring account, but it is neither profound nor precise. Mr. Lilienthal confuses big business with big industries; because we need the latter, he assumes that the former is indispensable (Pt. I, "A New Era of Opportunity": Ch. 1, "Feelings versus Facts About Bigness," particularly p. 8; and Ch. 3, "Big Business for a Big Country"). He attributes the prodigious productivity of the past decade to the imagination and daring of our business giants (Pt. III, "The Fruits of Bigness"), but in doing so ignores the expansionary influence of deficit spending by a nation fighting for its life. He is troubled by antitrust suits which tax the energy of business executives and divert them from their customary managerial functions (p. 104), but he fails to examine and analyze the issues and practices involved in the proceedings. In accrediting state regulation of oil production to the farsightedness of big business, he fails to discriminate between reduction of output to maintain prices and control of production to conserve resources (p. 129). He laments the government's suit against the "oil cartel," uncritically concluding before the facts have been established in a court of law that the defendants merely "sought to create some order in the development of world resources of oil, by a kind of production-consumption agreement that has long been recognized as essential" (p. 130). His "responsibility, as a public servant, for industrial operations" and his "study of areas outside" his "own direct experience" convinced Mr. Lilienthal that bigness is essential to high levels of production and low cost in the basic industries (p. 109), and he cites iron and steelmaking as examples (p. 110); but apparently neither his sense of responsibility nor his study has led him to examine the hearings before the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Monopoly before which the president of the world's biggest steel company reluctantly unfolded a sorry story of the corporation's productive inefficiency and managerial ineptness in the quarter of a century before World War II.²

Believing that bigness is betterment, he has harsh things to say about our antitrust statutes, agreeing with Mr. Justice Holmes' privately expressed opinion that "the Sherman Act is a humbug based on economic ignorance and incompetence . . ." (p. 168). Mr. Lilienthal concludes that if we can free ourselves from the shackles of our outworn notions, "Bigness can become an expression of the heroic size of man himself as he comes to a new-found greatness" (p. 204).

Mr. Lilienthal's book is not as confused and confusing as these criticisms suggest. It is an orderly expression of his convictions. It contains a good deal of common sense and shrewd observation. It tells us something about the "new competition" which is apparent to any careful observer of the contemporary scene—the competition of the new product, the better mousetrap, the new process, the improved organization. "In almost every aspect of our life the New Competition is providing us with a kind of 'competition . . . between the objects of desire' undreamed of in the days of the trust busters" (p. 65). It describes in an alluring manner the role of research in big enterprise and gives a graphic and succinct account of diversification and integration in modern business and their significance to competition.

Mr. Lilienthal's book is well written, inspiring, and provocative, but it does not dig deep in searching for the roots that may reveal the kind of socio-economic flower into which bigness may blossom.

Mr. Quinn is a successful businessman turned author and philosopher. The title of his book, Giant Business: Threat to Democracy, both suggests the nature of his preconceptions and foreshadows his conclusions. The book's subtitle, ² "Study of Monopoly Power," Hearings before subcommittee of Committee on the Judiciary, U.S. House of Representatives, 81st Cong., 2d sess. (1950), Serial No. 14, Pt. 4A, "Steel," pp. 627 et seq., esp. pp. 631, 639, 641, 643-46.

The Autobiography of an Insider, indicates how he came by his ideas. From humble beginnings he rose rapidly to the highest executive level in General Electric, holding when he resigned in 1935 a "top-ranking" vice presidency, the chairmanship of General Electric Contracts Corporation, and directorships in a half-dozen General Electric subsidiaries. He apparently was one of General Electric's "fair-haired boys" and was being groomed while in his early forties for the presidency when he chose to leave the company (Ch. 18).

His long experience on the inside of a "giant" corporation has convinced Mr. Quinn not only that big business cannot be justified on economic grounds but also that it constitutes a threat to democracy. General Electric, he alleges, owes its dominant position in the electric lamp field not to its comparative efficiency but to its having combined the leading lamp manufacturing companies and monopolized the patents indispensable to lamp making. As the only producer of lamp bases, General Electric could keep account of the sales of every manufacturer of lamps with whom it in effect divided the market and from whose business it derived a monopoly profit. "We owned and operated most of the machine and parts factories, which contributed to profits that sometimes ran as high as 40 per cent of our sales and higher . . . in relation to the investment" (p. 74). During the bleak 1930's General Electric's lamp business made profits sufficient to compensate for losses in all other departments (p. 125). No other lamp manufacturer was so fortunately situated. Although General Electric never exercised a similar domination over world markets, indirectly through International General Electric and its patent-licensing system it became a member of the international electric lamp cartel which governed the industry. Mr. Quinn not only concludes that competitive forces were hampered in making and selling lamps, but also challenges sharply the effectiveness of the research laboratories of big business as instruments of industrial progress. He concludes his discussion of the significance of the large research laboratories to industrial innovation with this sweeping and devastating generalization: "I know of no original product invention, not even electric shavers or heating pads, made by any of the giant laboratories or corporations, with the possible exception of the household garbage grinder. . . . The record of the giants is one of moving in, buying out and absorbing the smaller creators" (p. 117).

But it is the social and political significance of the giant corporations that most disturbs Mr. Quinn. He believes that they foster managerial ineptness, inhibit initiative, suppress talent, and frustrate ambition. They keep big men little and make little men big. And finally he believes that the failure of competitive free enterprise is paving the way for "the all-powerful socialistic state, a compromise of some kind with communism, or . . . dominating Big Business."

Some economists will find Mr. Quinn's book no more acceptable as an analysis of the causes and consequences of big business than I have found Mr. Lilienthal's. And Mr. Quinn's penchant as a businessman turned philosopher to philosophize about some of the most intricate economic phenomena that confront us, e.g., the causes and consequences of business fluctuations, may particularly trouble them. While recognizing the limitations of even a successful, thoughtful, and well-read businessman in generalizing on topics about which in an age of specialization not even some economists would care to speak, I find his book an engagingly frank and a profoundly discerning discussion of the significance of big business by an insider who quite generally knows what he is talking about.

To anybody reading either the Lilienthal or the Quinn book, I commend the other.

GEORGE W. STOCKING.

Vanderbilt University.

Economics in the Public Service: Administrative Aspects of the Employment Act.

By EDWIN G. NOURSE. (New York: Harcourt, Brace and Co. 1953. Pp. xi, 511. $6.00.)

Mr. Nourse provides his readers with an historical setting for the Employment Act of 1946, a detailed account of the operations of the Council of Economic Advisers and the associated congressional Joint Committee on the Economic Report, and reflections on the meaning and significance of the Act. The title of the book points to the main theme, and the subtitle indicates the data that are utilized to demonstrate the theme. His conclusion after the elaborate survey is to be found in the following sentences: "I do take an exalted view of what is potential in that statute. I believe that, with its declaration for private enterprise and governmental responsibility, with its call for a major state paper of integrated economic policy, with its staff of professional economists in the Executive office and its newly devised pondering committee (with trained staff) in Congress, it may translate a growing economic sophistication of our country into practical means of checking runaway boom, supporting incipient depression, and stabilizing high-level use of our resources to a degree comparable to our achievements in the field of technology."

The first hundred pages is devoted to sketching the background of policy developments in the economic field which enable Mr. Nourse to depict the Employment Act as the "capstone of such an arch of earlier and partial building stones." The novelty in the present legislation is that it is "an attempt to tie together and complete an arch of policy-making agencies or organizations, deriving its strength from all other members of the supporting structure."

After thus surveying the "philosophical background of national economic policy in the United States," the author describes the second part of his analysis in the following terms: "Perhaps I am carrying inductive empiricism too far, but it seemed to me more realistic to let the narrative of actual events unfold with no more of an 'apperceptive mass' in the mind of the reader than there was in the mind of the writer when he entered this field of action. . . ." This part, in accord with the stated thesis, gives a detailed and circumstantial account of the developments in the Council and its relations with the other governmental agencies. Mr. Nourse has done his best to give an objective story, and students of public administration and public policy have gained a document about the operations of a governmental agency that is of rare and substantial quality. There are moments, however, when the reader wishes that Mr. Nourse had been less restrained in his comments on his colleagues and fellow administrators. Enough is said to indicate that in operations under the Act a variety of views as to its philosophy came into being, and it is not too extravagant to suggest that the "objective" story must be a genteel version of a more complicated and intense struggle.

The final section provides the author's reflections on the experience under the Act. This summary is more often than not both penetrating and thoughtful. It is made clear that the Council, if the necessary implication is drawn, must have a synthesizing function in the executive branch in the various areas of economic policy. The application of that principle would compel a revision of many of the current operating habits of that branch.

Two requirements of that implication merit notice here. One delineates the administrative role that the Council would have to play, and the other describes the role as a formulator of economic policies which would be consistent in the multitude of agencies now working on economic matters. In Mr. Nourse's words: "Thus the work of a council of advisers on the problems of economic stabilization in any realistic sense would have to cover many questions of institutional structure and executive and mass behavior. . . ." These mild words signify nothing less than a revolution in administrative behavior in Washington.

Such sweeping changes would not be limited to the executive branch. If there is to be a unified economic policy, the Joint Committee on the Economic Report would have to move into a controlling position in Congress. The various subject-matter committees of that body, with their current perquisites and powers, would have to acknowledge the coordinating policy role of the Joint Committee. That kind of an integrating influence is about as far removed from the current power structure of Congress as it is possible to imagine. The present independence of committees in Congress has existed for a long time, and all efforts, even the mild 1946 legislation on congressional organization, to alter the pattern have been frustrated. This is not to say that such a change cannot be brought about, but it does suggest that the situation required for the successful functioning of the Employment Act does not now exist.

One would be hard put to ascribe any particular accomplishment to the Council in these early years, yet there has been a large body of literature relating to its activities. This volume supplements that literature in many useful ways.

CHARLES B. HAGAN.

University of Illinois.

Community Power Structure: A Study of Decision Makers. BY FLOYD HUNTER. (Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press. 1953. Pp. xiv, 297. $5.00.)

Several years of observation in the field of social work convinced Floyd Hunter that vital decisions affecting community life appear suddenly without any prior consultation with the majority of the community. His conviction that most power is exercised by a few is amply documented in this volume. Although his use of the term "power" is not confined to influence on governmental policy, and while he talks a lot about "community-planning" and "social work professionals," the book is still valuable to political scientists as a study of power.

His method was to make an on-the-spot study of a real community in the tradition of Middletown, Democracy in Jonesville, and Warner's Yankee City series. He employs the same techniques of extensive interviewing and the use of pseudonyms to protect the anonymity of the interviewees. The community chosen is a Southern city of nearly a half-million inhabitants. A tentative list of leaders was whittled down by asking those on the list such questions as "If a project were before the community that required decision by a group of leaders—leaders that nearly everyone would accept—which ten on this list would you choose?" By this procedure some twenty-seven persons were selected for interview and study. Among them there were large numbers of mutual choices, much close acquaintance, and overlapping business directorships.

No one man or family dominates the city as might be true of some small mill or mining town. However, basic decisions are made by a handful of men and then executed by a few hundred. There is no single power pyramid; rather Hunter finds several pyramids, each clustered around some business, whose members consult on policy. Once substantial agreement is reached by these decision makers, a project is definitely launched or killed. The test for admission to this circle of decision makers is a man's position in the business community. Hunter notes that as organized labor has grown in power it has secured more recognition, but none of its representatives has crashed the circle of decision makers. Basic decisions for the whole community are still made by the top men in the business community.

The policy makers reach a decision first; then the word is passed down to be implemented or talked about by lesser professional personnel, preachers, teachers, public relations men. The place of decision is rarely in the formal committee. The top men in the community have little time for committee meetings; they send a lesser man to "front" for them. The top leaders confer by telephone or perhaps meet at a private home to make the basic decisions. In their eyes, they are not behaving in an undemocratic fashion; they consult "everyone who counts," and it is possible for the membership of this group to change.

An excellent chapter describes the power structure in the Negro subcommunity. Here, more power is held by persons other than business leaders. Since Negro leaders have no contact above the third tier of white leaders, their viewpoints can never be presented at the level where the real decisions are made. Political power is examined in a separate chapter which explores the relations between the decision makers and elective officials at all governmental levels. Local officials are purely the creatures of the policy makers. The control of state officials is less absolute; only one leader is able to have the governor come to him rather than the reverse. The influence on the national level is limited to getting a prompt and respectful hearing before congressional committees.

The idea of such a study is not new to political scientists. Harold D. Lasswell has for twenty years been urging such an approach under the caption "elite analysis," but little heed has been taken of his advice. While a case study like this may not justify any generalizations about political behavior, it sets forth the power structure in one community with beautiful clarity, thereby strengthening or invalidating the existing theories on the subject and suggesting new hypotheses. For instance, our guesses as to the reasons for business's love for having power kept in the lower levels of government are brilliantly confirmed. The power of the business leaders is most absolute at the levels of government that are "closest to the people."

More studies of this kind would be a good thing for the profession.

DONALD S. STRONG.

University of Alabama.

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

The Legislative Struggle: A Study in Social Combat. BY BERTRAM M. GROSS. (New York: McGraw-Hill Co. 1953. Pp. xviii, 472. $6.50.)

Bertram M. Gross, in writing this volume, has drawn upon a rich background as staff adviser to various Senate committees and executive secretary to the President's Council of Economic Advisers. For many years he worked intensively on all sorts of legislative matters, at all stages of the slow-moving legislative process—from developing the ideas for legislation all the way to intimate involvement with problems of legislative strategy and tactics. He has had the satisfaction of seeing important bills in which he was thus involved approved by Congress. Stephen Bailey in his brilliant Congress Makes a Law shows what a decisive role a committee staff adviser (such as Bertram Gross) can play in the enactment of a law.

Throughout the volume the author indicates clearly his heavy reliance upon The Process of Government by Arthur F. Bentley who viewed the political process, of which lawmaking is a specialized part, as a group struggle for power. The underlying theme of The Legislative Struggle is a social combat in which the primary movers or "contestants" are three: private organizations, political parties, and government agencies. "The process of government is one of struggle as well as of cooperation."

In Part I of the volume, the author devotes two chapters each to the three actors in the legislative drama. The second chapter of each pair deals with proposals for reform which extend considerably beyond the legislative process. However, it is in Part II, "Combat on the Legislative Terrain," that the author makes a distinctive contribution to the literature of the legislative process. Congress in action is not analyzed as a problem involving the narrow description of rules, procedures, and organizational structures, but rather "for finding out how persons involved in the legislative process behave, claim to behave, or are expected to behave." Every phase of legislative action, enriched by illustrative data, receives attention, not as narrow and isolated steps but as tactical movements in the legislative struggle. This includes discussion of the initiation and sponsorship of a bill, its drafting, and campaigns to achieve enactment, and encompasses the formal organization of Congress and the presidential office, as well as the more informal but decisive outside pressures. The intimate and realistic explanations of action in the standing and conference committees and on the floor are extremely valuable. The author likewise gives a concise, keen, and critical presentation of significant avenues of procedural reform. With very broad sweeps of the brush, he concludes his study with a discussion of the prospects for change in the legislative process in the future, and of the role of social scientists in social change.—BELLE ZELLER, Brooklyn College.

Income Stabilization for a Developing Democracy: A Study of the Politics and Economics of High Employment without Inflation. EDITED BY MAX MILLIKAN. (New Haven: Yale University Press. 1953. Pp. xxi, 730. $5.00.)

In this stimulating and highly useful symposium, some fifteen economists, political scientists, and law professors, including seven from Yale University, explore the economic, political, and administrative problems in the promotion and maintenance of economic stabilization within the framework of a democratic society. The essays are designed to relate the policy of economic stabilization to other significant areas of economic policy, such as fiscal policy, taxation, monetary policy, public expenditure policy, public budgeting, and governmental influencing of private investment; and to examine "the limitations and conditions imposed on economic policy in any actual moment of history by the political, institutional, and social framework within which it must operate and by the developing trends and tendencies of the times." These two objectives establish the basic themes that run through the individual essays and give them a breadth and degree of comprehensiveness rarely found in discussions of economic policy. The authors are by and large agreed on two propositions: first, that the principal purpose of a stabilization program is to maintain the freedoms of the individual that would be lost if extreme fluctuations in the economy were not stabilized; and second, that the real advantages of a predominantly private market mechanism over alternative economic systems "depend on the degree to which the private enterprise system is free of elements of monopoly."

There is a strong temptation to suggest that political scientists should be most interested in the notable contributions made by their colleagues to this study. For example, Francis Coker presents an extremely useful review of the issue of governmental intervention in economic affairs in the light of American political tradition, while Victor Jones discusses ably and provocatively the political framework of stabilization policy and endorses responsible party government as the necessary condition of an effective policy of economic stabilization. Harold Lasswell examines the nature of the communications process and the uses of the tools of communication for implementing stabilization policies, and Thomas Emerson discusses the administrative problems of coordinating and directing a stabilization program and integrating its operations with other governmental and nongovernmental activities. While these and other essays can be read separately with profit, the unique value of this book lies in the comprehensive treatment of the noneconomic as well as the economic issues and problems in the field of stabilization policy. In the light of the current academic preference for dealing with the behavioral and nonpolicy aspects of government and other types of social organization, it is refreshing to read a volume devoted to an enlightening analysis of one of our most significant problems of public policy.—MARVER BERNSTEIN, Princeton University.

The Tidelands Oil Controversy: A Legal and Historical Analysis. By ERNEST R. BARTLEY. (Austin: The University of Texas Press. 1953. Pp. viii, 312. $5.00.)

Considering the constant friction which has marked the relationship of the states and the national government since the Constitution was adopted, it is rather remarkable that no serious question as to the ownership of the marginal sea and the lands under it arose until the past decade or so. It was, of course, the discovery of valuable oil deposits in that area that brought about the clash, which has developed into one of the bitterest political issues of recent years. It is this controversy which Professor Bartley has traced from its inception to its present—but perhaps not final—phase.

The most impressive aspect of his work is his demonstration that until quite recently the title to submerged lands out to the "historical boundaries" was assumed to be in the states. Citing international law, federal and state cases, and federal legislative and administrative action, the author builds up a strong case with careful documentation. Even so redoubtable a fighter for the public interest as Harold Ickes is on record as having made such an assumption in the early days of the New Deal, although he later changed his mind.

After setting the stage, Professor Bartley proceeds to analyze the three Supreme Court cases concerning respectively the claims of California, Texas, and Louisiana, in which the traditional assumption was overthrown, and the national government was said to have "paramount rights" in the area, although the Court refused to go so far as to say that it had actual title. It is in this field that it seems to me the author is open to criticism. He seems unnecessarily to impugn the motives of the Truman Administration and the judgment and impartiality of the Supreme Court.

After all, the Supreme Court is concerned with more than sheer legalism; it is, for better or worse, involved with policy as well. Despite the impressive legal basis of the states' claims, the Court may honestly have been impressed with the government's claim based on international sovereignty—although Professor Bartley's reply to that is that state title has always been held subordinate to the authority of the national government within its constitutional powers. And strongly as the author argues for the states' contention that their control extends to their historical boundaries, he is just as firmly opposed to any claim beyond that, and he ridicules the efforts of Texas and Louisiana to fix their borders at twenty-seven miles from low tide.

Meanwhile a solution of sorts has been reached by the passage of legislation granting the states at least part of their claims. But in view of the Arkansas suit to test the validity of the legislation, it remains to be seen whether the end of the controversy has yet been reached.—J. H. LEEK, University of Oklahoma.

The Supreme Court: Vehicle of Revealed Truth or Power Group, 1930-1937. By ALPHEUS THOMAS MASON. (Boston: Boston University Press. 1953. Pp. 58. $2.50.)

Three lectures, the Gasper G. Bacon Lectures for 1952-53, on the controversies over

Supreme Court personnel from the nomination of Hughes as Chief Justice to the "court packing" controversy of 1937. The distinctive feature of the lectures is the extensive use of the letters of Justice Harlan F. Stone.

The States and the Nation. BY LEONARD D. WHITE. (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press. 1953. Pp. x, 103. $2.75.)

This little volume of three essays, first presented by their distinguished author as the Edward Douglass White lectures at Louisiana State University, treats the ever recurring subject of federal-state relations under the following titles: "The March of Power to Washington"; "Strength and Limitations of the States"; and "The Next Quarter Century." In the concluding essay, Professor White proposes "four directions in which it may be possible to advance in order to achieve a new federal-state balance." These are: the return of some functions to the states; modification of the conditions attached to some federal grants-in-aid; wider use of the interstate compact; and more energetic use of state powers in emerging policy fields.

American State Government. BY W. BROOKE GRAVES. (Boston: D. C. Heath and Co. 4th edition. 1953. Pp. xi, 946. $6.25.)

Completely revised and reset in a new format, this edition includes three new chapters: "Legislative Service Agencies," "The Military Establishment and Civilian Defense," and "County and Municipal Government." It omits two chapters carried in the previous edition: "The Legislature in Action" and "The States in the War and the Postwar." Several chapters have been extensively rewritten. Reference lists have been shortened and bibliographical notes added, the Model State Constitution is no longer carried as an appendix, and the new edition is somewhat shorter than earlier ones.

Readings in Municipal Government and Administration. BY CHARLES M. KNEIER AND GUY FOX. (New York: Rinehart & Co. 1953. Pp. xix, 486. $3.90.)

The first collection of readings concerned solely with urban government to appear in a number of years. The selections run the gamut of modern municipal problems and consist of both documents and articles. The editors provide a brief explanatory introduction to each selection.

Public Administration. BY MARSHALL EDWARD DIMOCK AND GLADYS OGDEN DIMOCK. (New York and Toronto: Rinehart & Co. 1953. Pp. xix, 531. $5.00.)

An introductory textbook which stresses the study of public administration in the political and social setting. The authors have attempted a synthesis of a wide range of materials relevant to public administration. Case illustrations are frequently used. Although the effort to integrate diverse though relevant material results in some excellent and some weak sections, the total product is stimulating and provocative.

Public Administration. BY JOHN M. PFIFFNER AND R. VANCE PRESTHUS. (New York: Ronald Press. 3rd edition. 1953. Pp. viii, 626. $6.00.)

An extensive revision of a well-established textbook. Comparison with former editions shows not only the usual incorporation of recent knowledge but also a change in approach. There is an emphasis upon the total environment of public administration, more extensive use of relevant contributions from other disciplines, and an effort to achieve a balanced consideration of the formal and informal elements of organization and management.

Bibliography on Public Administration: Annotated. BY CATHERYN SECKLER-HUDSON. (Washington: The American University Press. 1953. Pp. vii, 131.)

This fourth edition contains over 1100 entries, with a brief annotation on each. Excluded are references to foreign language literature, individual articles in periodicals, and most of the related works on business administration. Emphasis is placed on national and international administration. Within the limits set, a useful volume of carefully selected references is again brought up to date.

Limited-Term and Excepted Appointments in the Civil Service: A Study of the Legal Provisions by Which They Are Regulated in Fifty-nine Jurisdictions in the United States. BY WILLIAM C. BEYER. (Philadelphia: William C. Beyer. 1953. Pp. iv, 186. $3.00.)

Primarily a reference study of legal provisions in fifty-nine jurisdictions in the United States (the federal government, 20 states, 6 counties, 30 cities, and 2 special districts), with data drawn from the civil service laws and rules in effect at some time during the period 1950-1952. The types of "non-regular," appointments considered are provisional, temporary, seasonal, emergency, and excepted.

Jurisprudence: Men and Ideas of the Law. BY EDWIN W. PATTERSON. (Brooklyn: The Foundation Press. 1953. Pp. xiii, 649. $7.50.)

A textbook, comprehensive in scope and detailed in analysis, purposely written for the intelligent novice.

The Federal Courts and the Federal System. BY HENRY M. HART, JR. AND HERBERT WECHSLER. (Brooklyn: The Foundation Press. 1953. Pp. lvii, 1445. $11.00.)

The Judicial Code and Rules of Procedure in the Federal Courts with Excerpts from the Criminal Code. COMPILED BY HENRY M. HART, JR. AND HERBERT WECHSLER. (Brooklyn: The Foundation Press. 1949. Pp. v, 454.)

A casebook for law school use with ample notes and historical material, and an accompanying selection of statutes and regulations.

American Life: Dream and Reality. BY W. LLOYD WARNER. (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. 1953. Pp. xv, 268. $3.75.)

The author of the Yankee City series summarizes for the general reader his twenty years of research on community studies. With emphasis upon the social-status system, aspects of the modern American scene such as ethnic minorities, mass media, and the family are analyzed from what is called the point of view of social anthropology.

Aid, Trade and the Tariff: Including a Handbook of Major Dutiable United States Imports. BY HOWARD S. PIQUET. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Co. 1953. Pp. vii, 358. $3.75.)

A tariff by tariff discussion of the probable effects on imports of a reduction in the rate.

The Political Economy of Monopoly: Business, Labor and Government Policies. BY FRITZ MACHLUP. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press. 1952. Pp. xvi, 544. $5.50.)

A nontheoretical description of the actual practices of big business and of governmental measures which have been taken to control and regulate those practices.

The Statesmanship of the Civil War. BY ALLAN NEVINS. (New York: Macmillan Co. 1953. Pp. vii, 82. $2.25.)

An illuminating and interesting evaluation of Southern and Northern leadership, particularly that of Jefferson Davis and Lincoln.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE

University of Maryland

ARTICLES AND BOOKLETS

National Government

Brown, Everett S. Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the United States, January 3, 1947-January 3, 1953. George Wahr Publishing Co. 1953.

Bursley, G. H., Patrick, William J. Kirkley, and John P. Obarski. The Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 and the Alien Crewman. George Washington Law Review. December, 1953.

Fellner, William. Problems Behind the Federal Budget. Yale Review. Winter, 1954.

Heller, Walter W., and Irma A. Linse. Implications of a Twenty-Five Percent Ceiling on Federal Income and Death Tax Rates. Iowa Law Review. Summer, 1953.

Stamps, Norman L. A Reappraisal of American Political Institutions. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. December, 1953.

Status of the Hoover Report, 1949-1953. 2 vols. Citizens Committee for the Hoover Report. 1953.

State Government

Action by the Legislatures-1953. State Government. December, 1953.

Arnold, James A., Jr. Budget Estimates and Tax Policy: The New Jersey Experience. National Tax Journal. December, 1953.

Caldwell, John T. Organizing State-Supported Higher Education. State Government. November, 1953.

Gove, Samuel K. Reorganization in Illinois. National Municipal Review. November, 1953.

Halsey, Maxwell. State Traffic Safety: Its Organization, Administration and Programming. Eno Foundation for Highway Traffic Control. 1953.

Heyerdahl, Carl L. Tax Study Commissions in Indiana. State Government. November, 1953.

A Model State Civil Service Law. National Civil Service League and National Municipal League. 1953.

Neuberger, Richard L. The Decay of State Governments. Harper's Magazine. October, 1953.

Oberst, Paul, and Thomas Lewis. Claims Against the State of Kentucky. Kentucky Law Journal. November, 1953.

Schubert, Glendon A., Jr., and Donald F. McIntyre. Preparing the Michigan State Budget. Public Administration Review. Autumn, 1953.

Local Government

Baker, Benjamin. Municipal Charter Revision in New Jersey. Bureau of Government Research, Rutgers University. 1953.

Bogue, Donald J., ed. Needed Urban and Metropolitan Research. Scripps Foundation for Research in Population Problems, Miami University, and Population Research and Training Center, University of Chicago. 1953.

Bollens, John C. Trends and Forecasts in Fringe Areas. Public Management. December, 1953.

Chicago Sanitary District. Illinois Legislative Council. 1953.

Claunch, J. M. Land Grabbing—Texas Style. National Municipal Review. November, 1953.

Daland, Robert T. Municipal Fringe Area Problem in Alabama. Bureau of Public Administration, University of Alabama, and Alabama League of Municipalities. 1953.

Dauer, Manning J., and George John Miller. Municipal Charters in Florida: Law and Drafting. University of Florida Law Review. Fall, 1953.

Elliott, Clarence H. Municipal Responsibility for Cultural Activities. Public Management. October, 1953.

Floro, George K. The Role of the City Manager's Wife. Public Management. October, 1953.

Four Steps to Better Government of New York City. Report of the Temporary State Commission to Study the Organizational Structure of the Government of the City of New York. 1953.

Graves, Richard. Management in the Third Dimension. Public Management. October, 1953.

Ludwig, C. C. Liquor Sales Aid to Cities. National Municipal Review. November, 1953.

Mandelker, Daniel R. Public Purpose in Urban Redevelopment. Tulane Law Review. December, 1953.

Merriam, Robert E., and Norman Elkin. Home Rule for Chicago. Northwestern University Law Review. July-August, 1953.

A Model County and Municipal Bond Law. National Municipal League. 1953.

Morgan, Robert J. A New Voice in Government: The Watershed District. State Government. December, 1953.

Nonconforming Uses: A Rationale and an Approach. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. November, 1953.

Roberts, Samuel M. Trends and Forecasts in Finance. Public Management. December, 1953.

Rosenberg, Harry. Trends and Forecasts in Personnel. Public Management. December, 1953.

Zoning Amendments and Variations, and Neighborhood Decline in Illinois. Northwestern University Law Review. September-October, 1953.

Intergovernmental Relations

Kanter, Burton W. A Critique of Some Federal, State, and Local Tax Coordination Techniques. Indiana Law Journal. Fall, 1953.

Kilpatrick, Wylie. Future Federal-State and Local Relations. Municipal Finance. November, 1953.

Ratchford, B. U. Intergovernmental Tax Immunities in the United States. National Tax Journal. December, 1953.

Constitutional Law and Civil Liberties

Brown, Stuart Gerry. Plural Values and the Neutral State: The American Doctrine of the Free Conscience. Syracuse Law Review. Fall, 1953.

Brownell, Herbert, Jr. Immunity from Prosecution Versus Privilege Against Self-Incrimination. Tulane Law Review. December, 1953.

Cary, William L. The Income Tax Amendment: A Straight Jacket for Sound Fiscal Policy. American Bar Association Journal. October, 1953.

Damages for Breach of Racial Restriction Covenants. Northwestern University Law Review. September-October, 1953.

Equal Protection and Attempts to Avoid

"State Action." Indiana Law Journal. Fall, 1953.

Flynn, Patrick Allen. The Constitution Abroad: The Operation of the Constitution Beyond the Continental Limits of the United States. Texas Law Review. November, 1953.

Harris, Robert J. States' Rights and Vested Interests. Journal of Politics. November, 1953.

Latham, Earl. The Majoritarian Dilemma in the United States Supreme Court. Confluence. December, 1953.

Morgan, Donald G. Justice William Johnson on the Treaty-Making Power. George Washington Law Review. December, 1953.

Richberg, Donald R. The Bricker Amendment and the Treaty Power. Virginia Law Review. October, 1953.

Sutherland, Arthur E. The Bricker Amendment, Executive Agreements, and Imported Potatoes. Harvard Law Review. December, 1953.

Suthon, Walter J., Jr. The Dubious Origin of the Fourteenth Amendment. Tulane Law Review. December, 1953.

Judicial Administration and Law Enforcement

Beverly, Melvin E. Federal-State Conflicts in the Field of Habeas Corpus. California Law Review. Fall, 1953.

Clearfield: Clouded Field of Federal Common Law. Columbia Law Review. November, 1953.

Crane, Benjamin F., and Shelden D. Elliott. Progress in Judicial Administration—1953. State Government. November, 1953.

Dolan, Harry T. New Federal Procedure in Condemnation Actions. Virginia Law Review. December, 1953.

Douglas, William O. A Crusade for the Bar: Due Process in a Time of World Conflict. American Bar Association Journal. October, 1953.

Effect of the Federal Constitution in Requiring State Post-Conviction Remedies. Columbia Law Review. December, 1953.

Financial Responsibility in Motor Vehicle Accidents. Illinois Legislative Council. 1953.

Frankfurter, Felix. Chief Justices I Have Known. Virginia Law Review. November, 1953.

Jackson, Robert H. The Task of Maintaining Our Liberties: The Role of the Judiciary. American Bar Association Journal. November, 1953.

Kleinman, Harold. Admiralty Suits Involing Foreigners. Texas Law Review. October, 1953.

Lederle, Arthur F. Progress in Judicial Administration. Journal of the American Judicature Society. October, 1953.

Lewis, Ellwood W. The Appointment of Mr. Justice Harlan. Indiana Law Journal. Fall, 1953.

Mason, Alpheus Thomas. Extra-Judicial Work for Judges: The Views of Chief Justice Stone. Harvard Law Review. December, 1953.

Otterbourg, Edwin M. Fair Trial and Free Press. Journal of the American Judicature Society. October, 1953.

———. Fair Trial and Free Press: A Subject Vital to the Existence of Democracy. American Bar Association Journal. November, 1953.

Pierson, Welcome D. Instructions and Argument to the Jury: The Defense Point of View. American Bar Association Journal. October, 1953.

Poldervaart, Arie. Legislation by Reference—A Statutory Jungle. Iowa Law Review. Summer, 1953.

Rubin, Samuel. Justice for the Indigent: The Need for Public Defenders. American Bar Association Journal. October, 1953.

Zacherle, Hedo M. Pretrial Fact Press Reports as Contempt. Iowa Law Review. Summer, 1953.

Public Administration and Administrative Law

Adler, Erna W. The Practical Role of Employee Organizations in Public Personnel Management. Public Personnel Review. October, 1953.

Bulchis, Robert. A Junior Management Development Program in the Federal Field Service. Public Personnel Review. October, 1953.

Caldwell, Lynton K. University Assistance in Training Public Personnel. Public Personnel Review. October, 1953.

Durisch, Lawrence L., and Robert E. Lowry. The Scope and Content of Administrative Decision—The TVA Illustration. Public Administration Review. Autumn, 1953.

Frischknecht, Reed L. The Commodity Credit Corporation: A Case Study of a Government Corporation. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1953.

Goldberg, Sidney D., and Harold Seidman. The Government Corporation: Elements of a Model Charter. Public Administration Service. 1953.

Independent Review of Administrative Agency Determinations in the States: The Vitality of the Ben Avon Rule. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. November, 1953.

McLean, Joseph E. Use and Abuse of Authorities. National Municipal Review. October, 1953.

Pffner, John M. Management Must Manage. Public Management. November, 1953.

Prettyman, E. Barrett. Reducing the Delay in Administrative Hearings: Suggestions for Officers and Counsel. American Bar Association Journal. November, 1953.

Schultz, Franklin M. Proposed Changes in Government Contract Disputes Settlement: The Legislative Battle over the Wunderlich Case. Harvard Law Review. December, 1953.

Simon, Herbert A. Birth of an Organization: The Economic Cooperation Administration. Public Administration Review. Autumn, 1953.

Tresolini, R. John. Administrative Tax Enforcement: Legal Concepts. Temple Law Quarterly. Summer, 1953.

Weiss, Tobias. Administrative Reconsideration: Some Recent Developments in New York. New York University Law Review. November, 1953.

Political Parties, Elections, and Public Opinion

Bernstein, Marver H. Political Ideas of Selected American Business Journals. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1953.

Black, Charles L., Jr. He Cannot Choose But Hear: The Plight of the Captive Auditor. Columbia Law Review. November, 1953.

Bradford, Robert F. Politics, Pressure Groups, and the Businessman. Harvard Business Review. November-December, 1953.

Breckenridge, Adam C. Nebraska as a Pioneer in the Initiative and Referendum. Nebraska History. September, 1953.

Burdette, Franklin L. The West Virginia Delegation to the Republican National Convention, 1952. Department of Government and Politics, University of Maryland. 1953.

Childs, Richard S. Election Law Aids Crime? National Municipal Review. October, 1953.

Freeman, Howard E. A Note on the Prediction of Who Votes. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1953.

Gallup, George. The Future Direction of Election Polling. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1953.

Lane, Robert E. Law and Opinion in the Business Community. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1953.

Leiserson, Avery. Problems of Methodology in Political Research. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1953.

"Little Hatch Acts" Provide . . . Election-Time Do's and Don'ts for Public Servants. Good Government. September-October, 1953.

McGarvey, David C. A Theorem on the Construction of Voting Paradoxes. Econometrica. October, 1953.

McLendon, James H. Democratic Presidential Politics in Mississippi, 1952. Mississippi Quarterly. October, 1953.

Norton-Taylor, Duncan. The Leaderless, Lively Democrats. Fortune. January, 1954.

Regulation of Billboards. Illinois Legislative Council. 1953.

Shadgett, Olive Hall. A History of the Republican Party in Georgia. Georgia Review. Winter, 1953.

Simon, Herbert A. Notes on the Observation and Measurement of Political Power. Journal of Politics. November, 1953.

Sorensen, Robert C., and Theodore C. Sorensen. The Admissibility and Use of Opinion Research Evidence. New York University Law Review. November, 1953.

Tugwell, Rexford G. The Progressive Orthodoxy of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Ethics. October, 1953.

Economic and Social Functions

National Economy

Dahl, Robert A., ed. The Impact of Atomic Energy. [Symposium.] The Annals. November, 1953.

Problem of the Public Lands. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. December, 1953.

The Question of Raising the Public Debt Limit at This Time. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. October, 1953.

Business and Labor

Arpaia, Anthony F. A Noteworthy Drift in the Economics of Transportation—The Implications of Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. v. United States. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. November, 1953.

Avakian, Spurgeon. Deductibility of Expenses Growing out of Violations of Law or Public Policy. Journal of the State Bar of California. September-October, 1953.

Brown, W. R. State Legislative Protection from Labor Violence and Coercion. Labor Law Journal. December, 1953.

Bunke, Harvey. The Fetish of Separating

Subsidy from Air Mail Payments. Journal of Air Law and Commerce. Summer, 1953.

Burstein, Herbert. Picketing and Speech. Labor Law Journal. December, 1953.

Dirlam, Joel B., and Alfred E. Kahn. Integration and Dissolution of the A & P Company. Indiana Law Journal. Fall, 1953.

Feldesman, William. Establishment of Collective Bargaining—Principles and Procedures in Representation Cases. Syracuse Law Review. Fall, 1953.

Forkosch, Morris D. Judicial Review of NLRB "Final" Unfair Practice Orders. Labor Law Journal. December, 1953.

Gregory, Charles O. Picketing and Coercion: A Defense. Virginia Law Review. December, 1953.

———. Picketing and Coercion: A Conclusion. Ibid.

Hale, G. E., and Rosemary D. Hale. Market Imperfections: Enforcement of the Anti-Trust Laws in a Friction-Afflicted Economy. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. December, 1953.

Holloway, Pat Sterling. Securities and Exchange Commission Rule X-10B-5: Guided Missile or Flying Saucer? Texas Law Review. December, 1953.

Huntington, Samuel P., Charles S. Morgan, and C. Dickerman Williams. ICC Re-examined: A Colloquy. Yale Law Journal. November, 1953.

Jones, Edgar A., Jr. Picketing and Coercion: A Jurisprudence of Epithets. Virginia Law Review. December, 1953.

———. Picketing and Coercion: A Reply. Ibid.

Justin, Jules J. Arbitrator's Authority in Disciplinary Cases. Labor Law Journal. November, 1953.

Kahn, Alfred E. Standards for Antitrust Policy. Harvard Law Review. November, 1953.

Kulp, Victor H. Recent Developments in Oil and Gas Law. New York University Law Review. October, 1953.

Lane, Robert E. Businessmen and Bureaucrats. Social Forces. December, 1953.

Leary, Leo W. "Fair and Equitable" Distribution of Voting Power under the Public Utility Holding Company Act of 1935. Michigan Law Review. November, 1953.

Lifson, Kalman. The NLRB and the Union's Obligation to Use the Grievance Procedure. Labor Law Journal. November, 1953.

Mayer, Henry. Arbitration and the Judicial Sword of Damocles. Labor Law Journal. November, 1953.

Morgan, Chester A. Union Security—Federal or State Sphere? Labor Law Journal. December, 1953.

Piquet, Howard S. Would Tariff Suspension Hurt U. S. Business? Harvard Business Review. November-December, 1953.

The Question of Revising the Taft-Hartley Labor-Management Relations Act. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. November, 1953.

Richardson, James R. The Taft-Hartley Act—Punishment or Progress? Kentucky Law Journal. November, 1953.

Robbins, Horace H. "Bigness," the Sherman Act, and Antitrust Policy. Virginia Law Review. November, 1953.

Rose, George. The Labor Management Relations Act and the State's Power to Grant Relief. Virginia Law Review. October, 1953.

Schwartz, Charles P., Jr. Niagara Mohawk v. FPC: Have Private Water Rights Been Destroyed by the Federal Power Act? University of Pennsylvania Law Review. November, 1953.

Singer, Morton. Section 10(a) and Arbitrators' Awards. Labor Law Journal. November, 1953.

Steiner, George A. State Aid for Private Enterprise. Economic Digest. December, 1953.

Taft-Hartley's Statute of Limitations. Columbia Law Review. December, 1953.

Taylor, Marvel M. Economic Regulation of Intrastate Air Carriers in California. California Law Review. Fall, 1953.

Thoré, Eugene M. Influence of Federal Powers on the Future of Life Insurance. Journal of the American Society of Chartered Life Underwriters. Winter, 1953.

Tort Immunity and Workmen's Compensation. Virginia Law Review. November, 1953.

Weinfeld, Abraham C. Fair Trade Laws and Other Minimum Price Laws under the Defense Production Act Amendments of 1952. Kentucky Law Journal. November, 1953.

Health, Education, and Welfare

Larson, Arthur. Social Security and Self-Employed Lawyers: A Plea for Re-evaluation. American Bar Association Journal. November, 1953.

Peterson, Val. Coordinating Disaster Relief. National Municipal Review. October, 1953.

tenBroek, Jacobus, and Richard B. Wilson. County of Los Angeles v. State Social Welfare Department—A Criticism. California Law Review. Fall, 1953.

Military Affairs and National Security

Braucher, Robert. Fixed Prices and Price Redetermination in Defense Contracts. Columbia Law Review. November, 1953.

Hardee, Covington. Termination of Military Contracts. Texas Law Review. December, 1953.

Hoopes, Townsend. Civilian-Military Balance. Yale Review. Winter, 1954.

Peltzer, Vernon A. The Military Crime of Prejudicial Conduct: An Appraisal of United States v. Messenger. George Washington Law Review. October, 1953.

GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS

Congress

House. Committee on Agriculture. Long Range Farm Program. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. National Forests Mining Claims. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Committee on Appropriations. Military Construction, 1954. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Committee on Armed Services. Review of Promotions of Officers in the Armed Services. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Committee on Education and Labor. Administrative Practices under the Labor-Management Relations Act. Hearing before Special Subcommittee. 83rd Cong. 1953.

———. Committees on Education and Labor and Government Operations. Strikes and Racketeering in the Kansas City Area. Hearings before Special Subcommittees. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Investigation into Commercial and Industrial-Type Activities in the Federal Government. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Military Supply Management Program. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act (Pesticides). Hearing before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Health Inquiry. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. New Jersey-New York Waterfront Commission Compact. Hearing before Subcommittee No. 3. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Wiretapping for National Security. Hearing before Subcommittee No. 3. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Proposed Amendments to the 1936 Merchant Marine Act. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Committee on Public Works. Lake Michigan Water Diversion. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. St. Lawrence Seaway. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Committee on Ways and Means. Analysis of the Social Security System. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. General Revenue Revision. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Internal Revenue Investigation. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

House and Senate. Joint Committee on the Economic Report. Historical and Descriptive Supplement to Economic Indicators. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation. Reorganization of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Hearing. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

Senate. Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Grazing Policies and Range Improvements in the National Forests. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Communist Infiltration among Civilian Army Workers. Hearings before Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Communist Infiltration in the Army. Hearing before Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. A Compilation of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 with Amendments. . . . Senate Doc. No. 71. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Payments in Lieu of Taxes to States or Local Taxing Units. Hearing. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Alaska Statehood and Elective Governorship. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Stockpile and Accessibility of Strategic and Critical Materials to the United States in Time of War. Hearings before Special Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Amendments to the Trading with the Enemy Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Granting Citizens Who Have Attained the Age of Eighteen the Right to Vote. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Nomination and Election of President and Vice President. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Committee on Rules and Administration. Senator from New Mexico. Hearings before Subcommittee on Privileges and Elections. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

———. Select Committee on Small Business. Battery AD-X2. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1953.

Other Federal

Department of Agriculture. Irrigation-Enterprise Organizations. Circular No. 934. 1953.

Department of Commerce. Bureau of the Census. Governments Division. Compendium of City Government Finances in 1952. 1953.

Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Social Security Administration. Bureau of Public Assistance. Characteristics of State Public Assistance Plans. 1953.

President's Advisory Committee on Government Housing Policies and Programs. Report. 1953.

Selective Service System. Special Groups. [Racial Minorities.] Special Monograph No. 10. 1953.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

Law and Social Change in Contemporary Britain. BY W. FRIEDMANN. (London: Stevens & Sons, Ltd. 1951. Pp. xxiv, 322. 37s. 6d.)

The major purpose of this volume is to examine the impact upon British law and legal institutions of the rapidly changing social pattern of modern England, and particularly of the phenomena commonly called "economic planning" and "the Welfare State." It is primarily a study of English law—and as such draws most of its illustrative material from English cases and statutes—but it proceeds in the context of more general theories of jurisprudence and makes frequent reference to broader trends in Anglo-American law as revealed in the Commonwealth countries and in the United States. Comparisons with continental systems and practices are also made.

Over one-third of the book is devoted to an examination of the changing concepts of the law of property, contract, tort, and other basic common law principles, in an effort to reassess the function of these concepts in contemporary England. The law of property, says the author, has already changed sufficiently to sustain social democracy in Britain, and can no longer be called a citadel of a conservative and capitalist social order. A major problem is the restoration to the individual of some of the freedom of movement formerly derived from ownership, without restoring power to private capital. In the case of the law of contract, he shows that (despite Sir Henry Maine's famous dictum about progress from status to contract) the law of contract today tends more and more to be institutionalized and collective, rather than individual—that it is, in fact, coming to be more and more like public law. Similarly, in the realm of tort, the law has moved steadily closer to a social insurance principle in which the standards of care imposed on manufacturers, occupiers of land, and keepers of machinery, have been tightened and the range of acceptable defenses progressively narrowed. These analyses are interesting and challenging, especially for one who has had some legal training; but the major interest for political scientists probably lies in the remainder of the volume, concerned chiefly with (1) the growth of the acceptance of public law in Britain, (2) the evolution of administrative law as a part of this, (3) the increasing significance of statute law and statutory interpretation, and (4) the possibility of reconciling the "rule of law," properly understood, with the emergence of planning and the Welfare State.

Despite "Dicey's famous heresy," as the author calls it, it is no longer possible to deny that public law has an important and growing place in the English legal system. The flood of new social services, administrative agencies, and public corporations has created public law problems inevitably and increasingly, even though often in the guise of ordinary common law actions. Dicey's legal theory for the completely liberal state regarded the rules of private law as paramount and binding upon rulers and ruled alike, and hence could deny the existence of any "public" law over and beyond this. Professor Friedmann argues that the modern state must be concerned with the balance between social welfare and individual freedom; hence there must be a public law limiting administrative discretion so as to maintain a reasonable balance between the needs of administration and the legal security of the individual. In general, public law problems are seldom appreciated or recognized in their full importance in the common law setting in which they generally appear. And yet both courts and legislature in England are gradually abandoning the former presumption that doubts must be resolved in favor of the special protection of private rights. The predominant judicial attitude (shown in many cases reviewed in the volume) is coming to be one of balancing the interests concerned without any predisposition either way.

The evolving administrative law in Britain suffers from the basic weakness that it is a system of public law which still has to use the categories and remedies of a private law system. The author argues for a more general use of declaratory judgments and injunctions sought by the Attorney-General as guardian of the public interest, to replace penal sanctions and common law actions for damages. He also argues for the abandonment of the fiction of the "shield of the Crown"—already in process—and for establishment of the principle of legal liability of the state where there are state activities of a commercial, industrial, or managerial nature. Relevant to this is a thorough and stimulating analysis of the role of the public corporation and its legal status.

For an American, it is interesting to see that much effort is still required in England to demonstrate that statute law is important and a proper concern of the lawyer. The author attributes this to the lingering distinction between "lawyer's law" and "political law," the latter being somewhat remote and rather suspect in the eyes of the average lawyer. Whatever may have been the situation in the past, the fact now is that the overwhelming proportion of cases decided by the English courts is concerned with statute law and its interpretation. The author examines the various approaches to statutory interpretation, which he labels the "pseudo-logical or textbook," the "social policy," and the "free intuition" approaches. His analysis here adds little to the literature, and his conclusion—that none of these alone is sufficient—is not a particularly striking one. His most helpful contribution in this connection lies in his suggestion that "there are statutes and statutes," and that rules of interpretation might well be different for various defined categories of statutes.

The author concludes with a thoughtful chapter on the possibility of reconciling planning with the essential principles of law in a free democratic society. He discusses the various meanings of the "rule of law," attacking Dicey's misunderstanding of the administrative process and Hayek's revival of "Diceyism" in an exaggerated form. He shows that this concept of the rule of law really means rule by judges and the negation of administrative discretion. His conclusion is that the rule of law, reduced to its essentials, is at the heart of the survival of free democracy in the welfare state, and that "the incompatibility of planning with the rule of law is a myth sustainable only by prejudice or ignorance."—VINCENT M. BARNETT, JR., Williams College.

History of the German General Staff: 1657-1945. BY WALTER GOERLITZ. TRANSLATED BY BRIAN BATTERSHAW. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1953. Pp. xviii, 508. $7.50.)

This is a translation of Der Deutsche Generalstab, in which a contemporary German historian presents a detailed and factual narrative of the development and growth of the German General Staff from 1657 to 1945. He thus deals with an institution whose influence in Germany has not been paralleled by similar groups in other countries and an understanding of which is essential to a comprehension of the nature of the German problem. Dr. Goerlitz seeks to show that in both World War I and II, the politicians demanded of the German military leaders the undertaking of campaigns which the professional military men realized were beyond the social and political strength of the Reich. Their peculiar sense of "devotion to duty" induced them to undertake tasks which they knew were futile from the beginning. Powerful as the Officer Corps was and jealous of its independent position, it was eventually crushed by Hitler and became a dependent unit within the National Socialist system. The remnants of the Officer Corps who survived became in due time, if not willing, at least loyal instruments for the furtherance of the grandiose schemes of the Third Reich. The author defends the General Staff against the accusation that it deliberately caused World War II, maintaining in this respect that the Nuremberg tribunal was never able to find evidence sufficient to prove a case against the generals.

With the proposed integration of Western Germany into a European defense system, it is essential that we understand the psychological motivations of the remnants of the officer class on whom the new German army will of necessity have to be built. Dr. Goerlitz's book gives the reader such insight, and although the conclusions to be drawn from the data by others may differ from those of the author, the factual knowledge presented is of undoubted value to those concerned with the future of a revived Germany.—H. MALCOLM MACDONALD, University of Texas.

Printer to the House: The Story of Hansard. BY J. C. TREWIN AND E. M. KING. (London: Methuen & Co. 1952. Pp. xv, 272. 22/6.)

Hansard's Catalogue and Breviate of Parliamentary Papers: 1696-1834. Reprinted in facsimile. WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY P. FORD AND G. FORD. (Oxford: Basil Blackwell. 1953. Distributed in U. S. by Macmillan Co. Pp. xv, viii, 220. $6.50.)

Select List of British Parliamentary Papers: 1833-1899. BY P. FORD AND G. FORD. (Oxford: Basil Blackwell. 1953. Distributed in U.S. by Macmillan Co. Pp. xxii, 165. $4.50.)

Luke Hansard, as printer to the House of Commons in the latter part of the 18th century and in the first part of the 19th, did much to establish the tradition of promptly and effectively printed parliamentary papers. His further ability to keep an intelligent working control over the stocks of papers at the service of the members of Parliament as well as to prepare some important indexes would seem to have aided materially in the conduct of parliamentary business during a long and rather critical period. The term Hansard as applied to parliamentary debates arose from the taking over by his son, Thomas Curson Hansard, of the publication of Cobbett's Parliamentary Debates. The story of the Hansards, told on the 200th anniversary of Luke Hansard's birth, may do much to show how closely the matter of official printing has at times been intertwined with and has affected the conduct of parliamentary business.

Hansard's Catalogue and Breviate, planned by Luke Hansard, completed by his sons, Luke Graves and James, and printed for the House of Commons in 1836, demonstrates even today a complete mastery of these documents such as was possible only to those so intimately connected with the printing and use of the papers. The Hansards were not merely printers to the House but served as a source of information on the papers. In making this work available once more in reprint form, the editors have added a list of House of Lords papers to which references were not made in the original work.

For "the papers of inquiries into the whole field of constitutional, economic and legal policy," 1834-1899, P. and G. Ford have provided a classified index. At the end, there is a separate class for the Irish reports. An appendix is devoted to a "select list of annual reports." Although in the main the references are given only to the House of Commons sessional papers, references are made to the House of Lords papers when these were not presented to the Commons. The P. S. King and Son's Catalogue of Parliamentary Papers does not give paper and volume numbers. The sessional and general indexes are far from uniform in their treatment of the many thousands of papers bound in the several thousand volumes for the period. For the first time, therefore, we have one key to most of the important British parliamentary papers during the period 1833-1899.

The Select List of British Parliamentary Papers, 1833-1899, together with Hansard's Catalogue and Breviate of Parliamentary Papers: 1696-1834, and A Breviate of Parliamentary Papers, 1917-1939 (1951), provide a key to the important British parliamentary papers, 1696-1939, with the exception of the period 1900-1916, which P. and G. Ford propose to complete next.—JAMES B. CHILDS, Library of Congress.

English Historical Documents: Volume VIII, 1660-1714. EDITED BY ANDREW BROWNING. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1953. Pp. xxxii, 966. $17.50.)

This is the second published volume of English Historical Documents. It is fully up to the standard set by Volume II and contains a rounded picture of all aspects of life in Great Britain during the late Stuart period. It should serve as an indispensable tool for the student of the period.

The Concept of Empire: Burke to Attlee, 1774-1947. EDITED BY GEORGE BENNETT. (London: Adam and Charles Black. 1953. Distributed by The British Book Centre, New York. Pp. xix, 434. $4.00.)

The sixth volume of this series on the British Political Tradition contains useful and hard-to-find commentaries on colonial policy taken from monographs, articles, speeches, and documents.

Politics in the Age of Peel: A Study in the Technique of Parliamentary Representation, 1830-1850. BY NORMAN GASH. (New York: Longmans, Green and Co. 1953. Pp. xxi, 496. $8.75.)

This is not a history but rather an examination of the political life and political practices of the two decades following the Great Reform Bill. Peel is merely a central figure; the primary emphasis is on the electoral and representative system. Valuable commentary on the constituencies, corruption, patronage, and the techniques of political control make this a useful volume for students both of British government and of electoral problems in general.

The Navy as an Instrument of Policy: 1558-1727. BY ADMIRAL SIR HERBERT RICHMOND. EDITED BY E. A. HUGHES. (New York: Cambridge University Press. 1953. Pp. 404. $12.00.)

Richmond was both an admiral and a Cambridge professor. His history is not of the Royal Navy itself but of the political and strategic role of the Navy in the period covered.

The Temper of Western Europe. BY CRANE BRINTON. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1953. Pp. ix, 118. $2.50.)

An urbane historian takes a long view, says that the prophets of doom exaggerate, finds Western Europe materially richer than and not too lamentably changed from thirty years ago, and considers its current temper far more youthful than senile. The volume is based on the James W. Richard Lectures in History, given in April, 1953 at the University of Virginia.

The Government of the Soviet Union. BY S. L. KATARE. (Jabalpur: The Indian Book House. 1952. Pp. xii, 235. $2.50.)

A description of the Soviet government on federal, state, and local levels by an Indian professor of history and political science who claims to be opposed to both communism and capitalism. Based largely on secondary materials, it is designed as a textbook for Indian students.

The Impact of Russian Culture on Soviet Communism. BY DINKO TOMASIC. (Glencoe, Illinois: The Free Press. 1953. Pp. 285. $4.50.)

In an endeavor to find the "social agents which have affected the formation of power and the growth of personality in Russian society and which might be the causes of its political explosiveness," the author traces the development of Russian society from its origins among the Pripyet marshes and the early Mongol-Tartar invasions to the USSR. He discusses such items as the contrast and clash of the Mongolian "power-oriented and predatory warriors of the steppes" and the "group-oriented and anarchistic culture of the Old-Slavonic soil cultivators," the impact of the Byzantine politico-religious system, the mutual relationships within the Russian family, and various social groups and revolutionary movements.

Germany in Power and Eclipse: The Background of German Development. BY JAMES K. POLLOCK AND HOMER THOMAS WITH THE ASSISTANCE AND COLLABORATION OF WILLETT F. RAMSDELL, WM. CLARK TROW, AND MANFRED C. VERNON. (New York: D. Van Nostrand Company. 1952. Pp. viii, 661. $10.00.)

During World War II a team of social scientists at the University of Michigan, headed by Professor Pollock, made a series of comprehensive studies of Germany, which were made available to the U.S. War and State departments. The volume noted here—in essence a handbook—is a summary of the results of the most important of these investigations. It deals with such matters as the land, the people, government and administration, political movements and parties. The longest part is the one on the regional composition of Germany.

State and Local Government in West Germany, 1945-1953, with Special Reference to the U.S. Zone and Bremen. BY J. F. J. GILLEN. (Berlin: Office of the U.S. High Commissioner for Germany. 1953. Pp. ix, 131.)

This useful monograph deals fully with state and local government in Bavaria, Hesse, Württemberg-Baden, and Bremen from 1945 up to the end of 1952. A final chapter briefly surveys state and local governments in the British and French zones.

Anais de Câmara dos deputados. Organizados pela Diretoria de publicidade. 1946, Vols. I-VIII; 1951, Vols. I-VII; 1952 (Convocação), Vols. I-VII. (Rio de Janeiro. 1951-53.)

Although the Chamber of Deputies of the Brazilian Congress first met September 23 after the approval of the 1946 Constitution a few days earlier, it was only beginning in 1951 that some of the volumes of the permanent edition of the debates in octavo started to appear under the title of Anais. Normally the Congress meets each year on March 15th and sits until December 15th. The eight volumes of 1946 extend through the beginning of the extraordinary session on December 16. The seven volumes of the ordinary session of 1951 begin in March and extend through May 21. The seven volumes of the called session of 1952 begin on January 16 and extend to the end of the session on March 9. Each volume contains at the beginning a day by day table of contents of the sittings and an index by members. The volumes of the 1946 and 1951 sessions were printed at the Departamento de Imprensa Nacional, and those of 1952 at the Serviço gráfico do Instituto brasileiro de geographia e estatística. The above mentioned volumes are all that have been printed to date. The daily unindexed congressional record of the debates in both houses of the Brazilian Congress appears as a supplement to the Diário oficial under the title Diário do Congresso Nacional.—J.B.C.

Manual do deputado: Regimento interno da Câmara dos deputados e Constituição da República. (Rio de Janeiro: Depto. de Imprensa Nacional. 1953. Pp. 188.)

The new rules of the Brazilian Chamber of Deputies, as approved on December 31, 1952, are accompanied by a detailed index. The volume also includes the Regimento comum, rules for the joint sessions of the Senate and Chamber of Deputies approved April 20, 1951, and the 1946 Constitution of the Republic.—J.B.C.

Asamblea nacional constituyente de 1949. Tomo I: Antecedentes, Proyecto, Reglamento, Actas. (San Jose, Costa Rica: Imprenta Nacional. 1953. Pp. 675.)

This work represents the first time in the history of Costa Rica that there has been an attempt at a full and systematic printed record of a constituent assembly. Ordinarily the only record available is that printed from time to time in the Diario oficial. The present volume includes the proceedings from the beginning on Jan. 15th to April 8, 1949.—J.B.C.

Almanak nasional. 1953. Tahun ke—III. (Djakarta, Gapura: N. V. 1952. Pp. 400. Rp. $8.50.)

This annual general almanac of Indonesia published in the Indonesian language by the firm of Gapura seems to be the only work containing a full list of the ministries and other agencies of the Republic of Indonesia and also the membership of the parliament.—J.B.C.

India, a Reference Annual, 1953. BY MINISTRY OF INFORMATION AND BROADCASTING, GOVERNMENT OF INDIA. (Delhi: Publications Division, M.I.B. 1953. Pp. 423. Rs. 5.)

A considerable section is included on the returns of the first election held between October, 1951 and May, 1952 under the new constitution for both the central government and the states. There is a brief directory of the governments, both central and state. A ten-page summary of the new constitution is given. The judicial system, defense services, finance, power and irrigation, agriculture, scientific research, and other topics each have separate chapters that are helpful in presenting the present situation of the government of India and its problems.—J.B.C.

Democratic Bulwark in the Middle East: A Review and Analysis of Israel's Social, Economic, and Political Problems during the Period from 1948 to 1953. BY JOSEPH DUNNER. (Grinnell, Iowa: Grinnell College Press. 1953. Pp. v, 37. $1.35.)

The Republic of Israel: Its History and Its Promise. BY JOSEPH DUNNER. (New York: McGraw-Hill Book Co. 1953. Pp. xvi, 269.)

The Republic is a reprinting of a 1950 volume and The Democratic Bulwark brings the Israel story down to 1953 with a consideration of internal population and constitutional changes, the continuing Arab problem, and Israel's foreign policy.

Civil Service in Early Sung China: 960-1067. BY E. A. KRACKE, JR. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1953. Pp. xv, 262. $6.50.)

This study in the Monograph Series of the Harvard-Yenching Institute describes civil service developments during an important period of Chinese history, with particular emphasis on "the policy of promotion through controlled sponsorship." "This technique," the author points out, "consisted in granting special promotions within the service on the recommendation of a superior officer, who thereafter was legally answerable for the quality and the acts of his protégé."

Reader in Bureaucracy. EDITED BY ROBERT K. MERTON, AILSA P. GRAY, BARBARA HOCKEY, AND HANAN C. SELVIN. (Glencoe, Ill.: The Free Press. 1953. Pp. 464. $5.00.)

A useful collection of "various types of analysis of bureaucracy" under the following sectional titles: "Bureaucracy: Theoretical Conceptions"; "Bases for the Growth of Bureaucracy"; "Bureaucracy and Power Relations"; "The Structure of Bureaucracy"; "Recruitment and Advancement"; "The Bureaucrat"; "Social Pathologies of Bureaucracy"; and "Field Methods for the Study of Bureaucracy." A brief introductory statement preceding each section indicates the problems of chief concern in that section. In choosing materials for inclusion in the Reader, the editors have emphasized the sociological aspects of bureaucracy and have given greater attention to governmental than to economic, military, or religious bureaucracy.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

WILLIAM H. ROBERTS

Catholic University of America

General

Arndt, H. J. Demokratie und Aussenpolitik. Frankfurter Hefte. April, 1953.

Beer, S. H. "Les Partis Politiques." Western Political Quarterly. September, 1953.

Belden, A. D. The Problem of Church and State. Hibbert Journal. October, 1953.

Berufsständische Ordnung Heute? Herder Korrespondenz. December, 1953.

Gaudenet, P. M. Derecho Constitucional y Ciencia Política. Revista de Estudios Políticos. March-April, 1953.

Kliesch, G. Demokratie als Organischer Pluralismus. Neue Ordnung. No. 5, 1953.

Mazziotti, M. Diritto al Lavoro e Organizzazione dello Stato in Recenti Esperienze Costituzionali. Civitas. August-September, 1953.

Politik und Glaube. A Symposium. Politische Rundschau. October, 1953.

Specific Areas

United Kingdom

Commercial Television. A Symposium. Political Quarterly. October-December, 1953.

Conservative Party. Research Department. Labour Party and the T.U.C. London, Conservative and Unionist Central Office, 1953.

———. New Labour-Socialist Trends. London, Conservative and Unionist Central Office, 1953.

———. Conservative Conference, 1953; Ministerial Statements. London, Conservative and Unionist Central Office, 1953.

Denationalisation of Iron and Steel. Public Administration. Autumn, 1953.

Dunlop, J. K. Offiziersauslese—das Britische Beispiel. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. November, 1953.

Franchise for Atomic Energy. Economist. November 14, 1953.

Gladden, E. N. An Administrative Centenary, 1853-1953. Parliamentary Affairs. Autumn, 1953.

Great Britain. British Information Service. Reference Division. Social Services in Britain. New York, 1953.

Great Britain. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. The British Civil Service. London, 1953.

Great Britain. House of Commons. Nationalised Industries. Report from Select Committee. (H.C. 332-1.)

Hussey, C. Moderation at Margate. Twentieth Century. November, 1953.

Mackenzie, W. J. M. Committees in Administration. Public Administration. Autumn, 1953.

McWhinney, E. "Sovereignty" in the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth Countries at the Present Day. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1953.

Peacock, A. T. Politique Fiscale et Budget

National en Grande-Bretagne. Revue de Science et de Législation Financière. July-September, 1953.

Reorganisation of Local Government. Public Administration. Autumn, 1953.

Ross, J. F. S. Methods of Election in Single-Member Constituencies. Parliamentary Affairs. Summer, 1953.

Sinker, A. P. What Are Public Service Commissions For? Public Administration. Autumn, 1953.

Colonial Areas

Brown, J. Central African Federation. British Survey. September, 1953.

Lord Hailey. Native Administration in the British African Territories. Part V. London, H.M. Stat. Off., 1953.

Hogan-Shaidali, S. A. E. Communalism and Racism in Malayan Politics. Eastern World. September, 1953.

Malaya's New Nationalists. Economist. October 10, 1953.

Ramphal, S. S. Federal Constitution-Making in the West Indies. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. April, 1953.

Commonwealth of Nations

Alexandrowicz, C. H. The Indian Constitution. Yearbook of World Affairs, 1953.

Ali, M. Pakistan and its Problems. Asian Review. October, 1953.

Amery, L. S. Indian Constitutional Development: the War Years. Asian Review. October, 1953.

Anjaria, J. J. India's First Five Year Plan. Asian Review. October, 1953.

Canada. Minister of National Defense. Canada's Defense Programme, 1953-54. Ottawa, Queen's Printer, 1953.

Cohen, W. J. Social Security and Social Services in the Five-Year Plan of India. Public Welfare. October, 1953.

Ghosal, A. K. Some Administrative Problems under Planning. Indian Journal of Political Science. July-September, 1953.

Mallory, J. R. Delegated Legislation in Canada. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. November, 1953.

Miller, J. D. B. Aspects of the Party System in Australia. Parliamentary Affairs. Autumn, 1953.

Mukerji, K. P. Circumstances Leading to Ceylon's Independence. Indian Journal of Political Science. July-September, 1953.

Sarkar, V. C. Aspects of Indian Law. Inter- national and Comparative Law Quarterly. July, 1953.

Seymour, J. India's Own Revolution. Geographical Magazine. November, 1953.

Shadker, S. L. Two Systems of Financial Procedure in Parliament. Parliamentary Affairs. Summer, 1953.

Unverzagt, K. Der Verfassungstreit in der Südafrikanischen Union und das Wahlgesetz von 1951. Zeitschrift für Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht. October, 1953.

Venkatarangaiya, M. The Pattern of Public Administration in the Five Year Plan. Indian Journal of Political Science. July-September, 1953.

Western Europe

Berlia, G. Le Projet de Révision Constitutionnelle Adopté par l'Assemblée Nationale le 22 Juillet 1953. Revue de Droit Public et de la Science Politique. July-September, 1953.

Cataldi, G. La Réforme Administrative en Italie. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 1, 1953.

Catroux, G. The French Union. International Conciliation. November, 1953.

Cohn, E. J. The New Swiss Nationality Act. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. July, 1953.

Cole, T. Reform of the Italian Bureaucracy. Public Administration Review. Autumn, 1953.

Le Conseil Economique. Revue de Droit Public et de la Science Politique. July-September, 1953.

De La Gressaye, B. Le Code du Travail des Territoires d'Outre-Mer. Droit Social. June, 1953.

Einaudi, M. Italy in Crisis. Toronto, Canadian Institute of International Affairs, 1953.

The French Atomic Energy Project. Atomics and Atomic Technology. August, 1953.

Hargrove, C. R. France's Familiar Crisis. Banker. November, 1953.

Hilton, R. Portugal Makes History. Dublin Review. 3d Quarter, 1953.

La Iglesia y el Estado en España. A Symposium. Ecclesia. October 31, 1953.

Ingber, D. The Grand Duchy of Luxemburg. Contemporary Review. October, 1953.

Das Konkordat zwischen dem Heiligen Stuhl und Spanien. Herder Korrespondenz. October, 1953.

Krier, H. Le Budget de 1953. Revue de Science et de Législation Financière. July-September, 1953.

Lambert, J. D. The Council of the Republic in France. Parliamentary Affairs. Autumn, 1953.

Langrod, G. Quelques Aspects de la Procédure Parlementaire en France, en Italie et en Allemagne Fédérale. Revue Internationale de Droit Comparé. July–September, 1953.

Laufenburger, H. Technical and Political Aspects of Reform of Taxation in France. National Tax Journal. September, 1953.

Loveday, A. F. Spanish Affairs. Quarterly Review. October, 1953.

Marcus, F. Die Dänische Verfassung vom 5. Juni 1953 und das Thronfolgegesetz vom 27. März 1953. Zeitschrift für Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht. October, 1953.

Martínez, J. C. El Orden de Leyes Fundamentales de España desde la Perspectiva de la Ley de Sucesión. Revista de Estudios Políticos. May–June, 1953.

Middleton, W. L. French Parliamentary System. Contemporary Review. October, 1953.

Napolitano, G. Politica Economico-Finanziaria del Governo e Operatore Economico Pubblico. Rivista di Politica Economica. January, 1953.

Nelson, G. R. Social Welfare in Scandinavia. Copenhagen, Danish Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs, 1953.

Nilson, S. S. Aspects de la Vie Politique en Norvège. Revue Française de Science Politique. July–September, 1953.

Outrey, A. Histoire et Principes de l'Administration Française des Affaires Étrangères. Revue Française de Science Politique. July–September, 1953.

Podestà, L. La Riforma della Previdenza Sociale in Italia. Civitas. August–September, 1953.

Pouvoir Politique et Pouvoir Économique. A Symposium. Esprit. June, 1953.

Rich, C. A. L. Political Trends in Italy. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1953.

Roepke, F. Das Kolonialbewusstsein der Franzosen. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. October, 1953.

Rougier, L. Les Traités Diplomatiques et les Constitutions. Revue des Deux Mondes. December 1, 1953.

Sebastiani, A. J. La Riforma della Legislazione sulle Camere di Commercio, Industria e Agricoltura. Rivista di Politica Economica. December, 1952.

Stibbe, P. Le Mécanisme de la Répression. Esprit. September, 1953.

Suisse: Ordonnance du 1er Juin 1953 sur l'État Civil. Documentation Juridique Étrangère. Nos. 6/7, 1953.

Temmerman, J. A. Constitutional Customs in Belgium. Parliamentary Affairs. Autumn, 1953.

Tobriner, M. O. A Lawyer Looks at French and Italian Labor. Labor Law Journal. September, 1953.

Toutee, J. Le Commissariat à l'Énergie Atomique. Ses Aspects Juridiques. Droit Social. June, 1953.

Tremelloni, R. The Parliamentary Inquiry into Unemployment in Italy. International Labour Review. September, 1953.

Williams, P. Crisis in France: a Political Institution. Cambridge Journal. October, 1953.

Zimmermann, E. Die Neuregelung der Auswärtigen Gewalt in der Verfassung der Niederlande. Zeitschrift für Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht. October, 1953.

Central Europe

Bachof, O. German Administrative Law. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. July, 1953.

Bonn, M. J. Whither Germany? Bankers' Magazine. September, 1953.

Briefs, G. Kritische Bemerkungen zum Mitbestimmungsrecht. Merkur. October, 1952.

Dirks, W. Die Christliche Demokratie in der Bundesrepublik. Frankfurter Hefte. September, 1953.

Gehlen, A. Beamtentum im Parteienstaat. Wort und Wahrheit. October, 1953.

Hillhouse, A. M. Tax Courts in Western Germany. Public Finance. No. 3, 1953.

Holzgreve, W. Soziale Demokratie gegen Politische Vermassung. Gewerkschaftliche Monatshefte. August, 1953.

Kleinrahm, K. Gesetzgebungshilfsdienst für Deutsche Parlamente? Zur Ontologie der Gesetzgeberischen Willensbildung. Archiv des Öffentlichen Rechts. October, 1953.

Kurth, J. Die Stellung der Gewerkschaften in der Verfassung. Gewerkschaftliche Monatshefte. August, 1953.

Mookerjee, G. K. A Study of German Political Parties (II). India Quarterly. July–September, 1953.

Müller, A. Sozialprogramme der Parteien. Gewerkschaftliche Monatshefte. August, 1953.

Paetel, K. O. The Rule of the Black Order: A Typology of the SS. Diogenes. Summer, 1953.

Schlochauer, H.-J. Fragen zur Neuordnung der Verwaltungsgerichtsbarkeit. Archiv des Öffentlichen Rechts. October, 1953.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

Armstrong, T. E. Soviet Siberia. Royal Central Asian Journal. January, 1952.

Beloff, M. The Foundation of Soviet Foreign Policy (Review Article). Soviet Studies. October, 1953.

Budget Law Adopted by USSR Supreme Soviet. Current Digest of the Soviet Press. October 10, 1953.

Bulgarie: Loi du 26 Mars 1948 sur la Nationalité Bulgare. Textes Législatifs Étrangers. No 3, 1953.

Bulgarie: Ukase du 12 Octobre 1951 (No. 82) sur les Entreprises d'État. Documentation Juridique Étrangère. Nos. 6/7, 1953.

De Pue, B. E. M. The Soviet Army. Military Review. November, 1953.

Dudin, L. Changes in the Structure of the Party and the Government of the USSR. Materials of the Conference of the Institute for the Study of the History and Culture of the USSR convened in New York on 20-22 March, 1953. Munich, 1953.

F. F. The Fall of Beria and the Nationalities Question in the USSR. World Today. November, 1953.

G.L. New Policy in Czechoslovakia. World Today. October, 1953.

Guins, G. C. The Academy of Sciences of the USSR. Russian Review. October, 1953.

Heimann, E. Atheist Theocracy. Social Research. Autumn, 1953.

Holzman, F. D. The Soviet Budget, 1928-1952. National Tax Journal. September, 1953.

Hongrie: Loi No. LX de 1948 sur la Nationalité Hongroise. Textes Législatifs Étrangers. No. 3, 1953.

Hulička, K. Political Education in Soviet Schools. Soviet Studies. October, 1953.

J. A. Czechoslovakia, Past and Present. British Survey. August, 1953.

Kemény, G. Eastern Europe: Developments in Social and Economic Structure. World Politics. October, 1953.

Koch, H. Weltmacht Sowjetkirche 1943-1953. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. December, 1953.

Koutaissoff, E. Soviet Education and the New Man. Soviet Studies. October, 1953.

M.P. The Satellite Police System. World Today. December, 1952.

Matl, J. Economía, Sociedad y Cultura del Sovietismo. Revista de Estudios Políticos. November-December, 1952.

Meissner, B. Die Neue Parteiführung. Osteuropa. April, 1953.

Ollero, C. Evolución politicoconstitucional de Polonia y Constitución del 22 de Julio de 1952. Revista de Estudios Políticos. September-October, 1952.

Pattern of Soviet Foreign Policy. Problems of Communism. No. 5, 1953.

Polyzoides, A. T. The Soviet Union in Transition. World Affairs Interpreter. October, 1953.

Pravda on the Role of the Party and of the Individual. Soviet Studies. October, 1953.

Ratto, M. O. Un Dittatore Economico in Polonia. Rivista di Politica Economica. January, 1953.

Roumanie: Décret No. 199 du 11 Août 1950 pour la Répression de Certain Crimes Mettant en Danger la Sécurité de l'État. Documentation Juridique Étrangère. Nos. 8/9, 1953.

Schapiro, L. B. Developments in the Soviet Communist Party between 1939 and 1952. Yearbook of World Affairs, 1953.

Scheuerle, W. A. Sowjetrussische Staats- und Rechtstheorie. Archiv für Rechts- und Sozialphilosophie. No. 2, 1952.

— Les Personnes Morales en Droit Soviétique. Revue Internationale de Droit Comparé. July-September, 1952.

Slapnicka, H. Der Aufbau der Verwaltung in der Tschechoslowakei. Europa-Archiv. September 20, 1953.

Soviet Nationality Policy—Past and Present. Problems of Communism. No. 5, 1953.

Standley, W. H. The Dilemma of Georgi Maximilianovich Malenkov. U.S. Naval Institute Proceedings. September, 1953.

Sweet, J. V. The Problems of Nationalities in Soviet Asia. Ukrainian Quarterly. Summer, 1953.

Tchécoslovaquie: Loi No. 194 du 13 Juillet 1949 Relative à l'Acquisition et à la Perte de la Nationalité Tchécoslovaque. Textes Législatifs Étrangers. No. 3, 1953.

Tchécoslovaquie: Loi du 19 Décembre 1951 (No. 110) Portant Création des Réserves de Travailleurs. Documentation Juridique Étrangère. Nos. 6/7, 1953.

Timoshenko, V. P. Agriculture in Soviet Spotlight. Foreign Affairs. January, 1954.

Middle East and Africa

Abel, M. Berber und Araber. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. November, 1953.

Afghanistan: Its History and Position in Asia. British Survey. October, 1953.

Balandier, G. Messianismes et Nationalismes en Afrique Noire. Cahiers Internationaux de Sociologie. No. 14, 1953.

- Barbour, N. Nationalism in Morocco. Middle Eastern Affairs. November, 1953.
- Berlin, I. Israel: a Survey. Asian Review. October, 1953.
- Bleiber, F. Afghanistan und Paschtunistan. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. February, 1953.
- Buchanan, L. M. Local Government in the Sudan since 1947. Journal of African Administration. October, 1953.
- Fischer, A. J. Syrien unter Schischkali. Aussenpolitik. November, 1953.
- G. E. K. Some Aspects of Lebanese Trade Unionism. World Today. September, 1953.
- Great Britain. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. The Sudan 1899-1953. London, 1953.
- Iran: Loi du 10 Février 1953 sur les Fonctionnaires. Documentation Juridique Étrangère. Nos. 6/7, 1953.
- Jafri, F. Communism in the Muslim World. Royal Central Asian Journal. July-October, 1953.
- Khadduri, M. Nature and Sources of Islamic Law. George Washington Law Review. October, 1953.
- Khadra, O. A. Nationalism and Arab Nationalism. Bulletin of the Near East Society. September, 1953.
- Kraines, O. Israel: the Emergence of a Polity (I). Western Political Quarterly. September, 1953.
- Maroc. A Symposium. Esprit. September, 1953.
- Patterson, G. Israel's Economic Problems. Foreign Affairs. January, 1954.
- The Personal Law of the Autochtones in Countries with Differing Civilizations. Civilizations. No. 2, 1953.
- Robertson, Sir James. Sudan in Transition. African Affairs. October, 1953.
- Steppat, F. Die Islamischen Monarchien. Aussenpolitik. October, 1953.
- Syrie: La Loi Électorale Syrienne. Décret Législatif No. 11 du 30 Juillet 1953. Documentation Juridique Étrangère. Nos. 8/9, 1953.
- Transformation of Social and Legal Systems in the Near and Middle East as a Result of Technological Developments. International Social Science Bulletin. No. 1, 1953.
- Watt, W. M. Forces Now Moulding Islam. Muslim World. July, 1953.
- Southeast Asia*
- Coast, J. Some Aspects of Siamese Politics. New York, Institute of Pacific Relations, 1953.
- Hall, M. Aspects of the Present Situation in Indochina. Royal Central Asian Journal. July-October, 1953.
- Irvine, R. J. New Central Banking Legislation in Indonesia. Far Eastern Survey. October, 1953.
- Lévy, D. La Constitution de la République d'Indonésie. Revue Internationale de Droit Comparé. April-June, 1952.
- Mansfield, M. Indochina. Washington, U.S. Govt. Printing Office, 1953.
- Mills, L. A. Indonesia's Growing Pains. Foreign Policy Bulletin. November 1, 1953.
- O. de Politieke Partijen in Indonesië. Internationale Spectator. September 16, 1953.
- Vandenbosch, A. The Indonesian Political Scene. Far Eastern Survey. October, 1953.
- Venkatarangaiya, M. Some Recent Developments in Asia, 1946-1952—Constitutional. India Quarterly. July-September, 1953.
- Pacific and Far East*
- Benirschke, H. Bauer und Sozialismus in China. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. October, 1953.
- Boeke, J. H. Agrarian Reforms in the Far East. American Journal of Sociology. January, 1952.
- Bovenkerk, H. G. A Century of Protestantism in Japan. Far Eastern Survey. December, 1953.
- Bünger, K. Die Rechtsidee in der Chinesischen Geschichte. Saeculum. No. 2, 1952.
- Chao, Kuo-Chun. The Government and Economy of Manchuria. Far Eastern Survey. December, 1953.
- China Prepares for Elections. Economist. October 10, 1953.
- Chine: Loi de la République Populaire Chinoise sur les Assurances Sociales (Décret No. 134 du 26 Février 1951). Documentation Juridique Étrangère. Nos. 8/9, 1953.
- Gaskill, G. E. Far Eastern Bibliography 1952. Far Eastern Quarterly. August, 1953.
- The Guiding Principles of Taiwan Provincial Administration. Information Department of Taiwan Provincial Government, 1953.
- Japan: Nationality Law and Other Regulations Concerned. Tokyo, Civil Affairs Bureau, Attorney General's Office, 1951.
- The Kuomintang Manifesto and Platform. Adopted by the Seventh National Convention (October 1952). Taipei, Taiwan, The Fourth Department, Central Committee, Kuomintang, 1953.
- Lichauco, M. P. Roxas and Philippine Independence. India Quarterly. July-September, 1953.

Maki, J. H. Japan's Subversive Activities Prevention Law. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1953.

Mander, L. A. New Trends in South Pacific Administration. Far Eastern Survey. October, 1953.

Müller, W. D. Formosa: Völkerrechtliche Fiktion und Politische Realität. Aussenpolitik. November, 1953.

Renne, R. R. Agrarian Problems and Foreign Aid in the Philippines. Far Eastern Survey. December, 1953.

Reports of Scholastic Achievements on Law and Politics in Japan. Japan Science Review. No. 4, 1953.

Royama, M. National Defense and the Constitution. Oriental Economist. September, 1953.

Siu, Kia-Pei. La Structure Administrative en Chine à travers les Âges. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 4, 1952.

Thomas, S. B. Government and Administration in Communist China. New York, Institute for Pacific Relations, 1953.

Tokoyama, T. Economic Recovery and Public Finance in Post-War Japan. Public Finance. No. 3, 1953.

Van Briessen, F. Die Rolle des Gelehrten in der Chinesischen Revolution. Aussenpolitik. October, 1953.

Von Eickstedt, E. Der Zusammenschluss der Völker China's. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. October, 1953.

Watnick, M. Continuity and Innovation in Chinese Communism. (Review Article). World Politics. October, 1953.

Wright, A. F. Struggle vs. Harmony: Symbols of Competing Values in Modern China. World Politics. October, 1953.

Latin America

Brésil: Loi No. 818 du 18 Septembre 1949 Régulant l'Acquisition, la Perte et le Recouvre-ment de la Nationalité ainsi que la Perte des Droits Politiques. Texts Législatifs Étrangers. No. 3, 1953.

Cuevillas, N. A. Una Revolución Anticapitalista Tipo: La Boliviana. Revista de Estudios Políticos. May-June, 1953.

De Galíndez, J. La Inestabilidad Constitucional en el Derecho Comparado de Hispanoamérica. Boletín del Instituto de Derecho Comparado de México. May-August, 1952.

De la Souchère, E. Le Péronisme. Esprit. August, 1953.

Goldschmidt, W. Vida Jurídica en la Argentina Contemporánea. Revista de Estudios Políticos. November-December, 1952.

Hillekamps, C. H. Argentinien's Überwundene Krise. Aussenpolitik. December, 1953.

Kantor, H. A Bibliography of Unpublished Doctoral Dissertations and Masters Theses Dealing with the Governments, Politics and International Relations of Latin America. Gainesville, Inter-American Bibliographical and Library Association. Series I. Vol. 13. 1953.

Kraske, E. Das Kollegiale Staatshaupt in der Verfassung der Republik Uruguay vom 26. Oktober 1951. Zeitschrift für Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht. October, 1953.

Martins, D. H. Estatuto del Funcionario. Revista de Derecho, Jurisprudencia y Administración. April-June, 1952.

Muñoz, H. C. La Constitución de 1952 y la Legislación que Atribuye al Poder Judicial en Materia Contencioso-Administrativa. Revista de Derecho, Jurisprudencia y Administración. April-June, 1952.

Soler, J. J. La Recepción del Derecho Argentino en el Paraguay. Revista de la Facultad de Derecho y Ciencias Sociales (Buenos Aires). May-June, 1952.

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

Truth is Our Weapon. BY EDWARD W. BARRETT. (New York: Funk and Wagnalls. 1953. Pp. xviii, 355. $4.00.)

Few programs of our government have sustained such demoralizing public attack as has our international propaganda program. The European field investigation of our library centers by Messrs. Schine and Cohn is still fresh in mind as is the public dissection of the Voice of America. This series of probes has left the information program very much in need of some forthright championing. Such is the purpose of Mr. Barrett who was formerly, as Assistant Secretary of State, in charge of our cold war propaganda. The product is a readable discussion of the importance, techniques, and organization of our efforts toward selling America to the world. It is not a scholarly history or critique, nor is it intended as an addition to the technical literature on psychological warfare or international propaganda. It, nonetheless, deserves a reading by specialists in foreign policy and congressional-administrative relations, as well as by students of mass communication.

The author shows commendable restraint in devoting only a minimum of attention to Senator McCarthy's charges. Most of the argument consists of a positive discussion of the necessities of an information program in the face of an enormous Soviet propaganda barrage. Barrett does not offer psychological weapons as a cure-all for all our ills. There is genuine awareness that we cannot simply transfer our expertise in selling chlorodent in Des Moines to peddling liberty in Southeast Asia. Fortunately, Barrett says, "ballyhoo experts gave way to area experts" some time ago. That "this is a war for the minds and hearts of men" has become a part of our everyday speech.

The author, who at the time was engaged in top level work in the Psychological Warfare Branch of the Eisenhower headquarters, draws upon his experiences to show the utilization of "Sykewar" in World War II. While he strives mightily to restrain his enthusiasm, he occasionally claims more than communication analysts have found conclusive evidence for. Thus, his account of the impressive handling of the Japanese surrender offer by O.W.I. is somewhat marred by the decisive way in which he evaluates the effect of that leaflet operation. "That cinched the surrender, which became official two days later" (p. 14). Much credit must, however, be given to those, such as the author himself, who played by ear during the trial and error days when much had to be done quickly. The experiences of that period are recounted and drawn upon for relevance to present cold war psychological strategy. And if Barrett's discussion of our strategy in supporting Admiral Darlan and our demand for unconditional surrender is meager, he does succeed in pointing up the psychological aspects of such decisions.

His discussion of the problems we must solve in our current war of words with the Kremlin is much more satisfactory. Especially valuable is the bill of particulars which goes far to refute the all too common view that we are losing the cold war. Far too many have succumbed to the myth of Russian invulnerability reminiscent of that built up about the Nazis. There is some consolation to be drawn from the case Barrett establishes. One example cites the three-power disarmament proposal which President Truman offered the United Nations. The discussion of the propaganda strategy that went into that offer and how the requirements of a "Truth Campaign" influenced that strategy is worth the telling. The success of that psychological weapon was heightened by Vishinsky's blundering response that he had been unable to sleep for laughter. A good psychological warrior such as Mr. Barrett could have informed him that one does not laugh at disarmament proposals, at least not in public.

Despite this and other successes which are recounted, the author fails to come to grips with the less favorable elements in the current scoreboard of cold war psychological battles. There is no consideration of the gains of "neutralism" in Europe and, most alarmingly, in Britain. The discussion of the Malenkov "peace overtures" does not go quite far enough. It is all well and good to be alert to the semantics of saying "no" in good psychological warfare terms. Thus, we can see the need for Mr. Dulles' elaborate caution in saying "No" affirmatively so as not to appear undesirous of peaceful compromise and yet keep up our guard in the face of another Soviet propaganda ruse. But this hardly begins to represent a policy which must convince skeptical millions that America and not the Soviets represents the best hope for peace, for economic well-being, and for an end to colonialism and racial discrimination.

So far as the organization of a propaganda agency is concerned, the author regards its proper place as with the military in time of war (i.e., combat operations) and keyed in with the State Department in time of peace. In war or peace, he is a firm supporter of a propaganda coordinator on the President's staff. As he points out, the evaluation techniques which we possess are such as to make a sober appraisal of the effectiveness of our "set-up for persuasion" very difficult. Given the political differences which prevail over foreign policy, as well as the unsolved technical problems, it would not be surprising to discover that we have blundered as well as advanced our cause. Yet the record seems one of which the propaganda agencies can be proud. The author is not seeking to escape responsibility for errors committed during his tenure when he complains of his program being made into a political football. "Indeed, one of my chief regrets is that I, like my predecessors, was forced to spend more effort on this struggle than on the contest with Soviet propagandists" (p. 80).

The publisher is to be congratulated for the inclusion, despite a lengthy text, of valuable appendices; one of them is a lengthy reply to detailed questions submitted to the Information Service by Senator McCarran, as chairman of the subcommittee on State Department appropriations. Also reprinted is the text of a "Typical Country Plan . . . a hypothetical plan to illustrate the approach used by the U. S. Information Services in tailoring the information program to a target country." Several photographs illustrate various items of psychological warfare.—HERBERT GARFINKEL, Dartmouth College.

Challenge to the Kremlin. BY HARRY HODGKINSON. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1953. Pp. 190. $2.75.)

This book underscores the primary importance of ideologies in the struggle between Tito and the Kremlin. Published some time before the death of Stalin, and brilliantly analyzing the late dictator's views in several crucial areas relating to the internal and foreign affairs of the Soviet Union, it is also suggestive with regard to current Soviet policies now that Stalin has passed from the scene.

The author hammers home the importance of the multiple repercussions of the Tito-Stalin rift within the Communist world. Titoism revealed to all that under Stalin the ideas of Marx as interpreted by Lenin were being radically altered to produce a monolithic state party domination at home, and a Russian imperialism (under the façade of liberating the proletarians of all lands) abroad. Regardless of the present or eventual effect of Tito's example upon the loyalty of other Communist countries to Moscow, the challenge to the Kremlin's domination of the Communist world, has, in one sense, been successful. Moscow, despite its ruthless pursuit of "Titoist wreckers" all over the world, particularly in eastern Europe, must operate under the glare of Tito's charges that Stalin strayed from the path of true Marxism-Leninism. And any diplomatic adjustments that are made between Russia and Yugoslavia, now that Stalin is dead, must appear to be concessions to the Yugoslavian dictator's position.

Hodgkinson indicates how Yugoslavia's relations with the West during the past five years constitute a refutation of the still basic post-World War II Russian idea that the world is divided into two irreparably hostile camps. Tito, despite Moscow invectives, has demonstrated how a Communist state can carry on correct, if not the friendliest, relations with capitalistic United States, thus securing needed economic assistance not obtainable elsewhere while maintaining its presumed socialist character. This must be a severe lesson, indeed, to those Russian satellites whose overtly expressed hopes of participation in the original Marshall Plan were squelched by Moscow.

Another result of the Tito-Kremlin conflict has been the establishment in Yugoslavia of what the author terms "laissez-faire communism," or "a sort of socialism without the state." The author indicates that the charges of the Yugoslav leaders against the Soviet Communist Moloch state made it all the more necessary that they themselves seek to eliminate the evils of centralized political bureaucracy. It will seem to some that the author is too optimistic concerning the progress that Yugoslavia has made in this direction. "Laissez-faire communism" may be realized some day in that country. If it is, however, the world will have witnessed the spectacle of a Moscow-trained Yugoslavian Bolshevik who successfully defied the Kremlin partly because he applied the ruthlessness he learned against his former teachers, uniquely turning Marxism-Leninism upside down.—CARROLL HAWKINS, Michigan State College.

Who Speaks for Man? BY NORMAN COUSINS. (New York: Macmillan Company. 1953. Pp. x, 318. $3.50.)

This book is based upon the conviction that the USA and the USSR are about to repeat the fatal cycle which led Athens and Sparta to destroy ancient Greek civilization. They did it because they had no way of preventing the final error of one war too many. This tragedy was preceded by the golden age of Pericles, in which he made male citizenship universal and used public money to build Athens into "the most beautiful city the world has ever known." Then came the war and his death, after which "every form of iniquity took root in the Hellenic world," according to Thucydides. The military took control in Athens and the wise precepts of Pericles were not only disregarded: they "hadn't even been remembered."

Cousins believes that men will always come to similar catastrophe unless there is a single government over the geographic unit in which they live and that the earth is now such a unit. The problem is not to unite the two super powers but to get a degree of world government which will keep them apart, not to make the world safe for either ideology, but to make it safe for diversity.

This can only be done, the author holds, by a strong initiative on the part of the United States to give the UN real governmental powers, sufficient to offer Russia, and all nations, reliable security against armed aggression. There would be a single world sovereignty, but state jurisdiction over everything except the war-making power.

No one can deny the necessity of such a development. The new atomic weapons clearly confront us with the imminent destruction of Western civilization, according to the rule that great powers must fear and fight, with whatever weapons they can lay hands upon. The only question left is whether to make a desperate effort to reduce the tensions between the Big Two before attempting to move toward world government.

Prime Minister Nehru, of India, who contributed a long recorded interview to the book, believes that this must come first. Since "today fear is almost all-pervasive," he holds that our primary task is to lessen tensions and reduce fear.

This has seemed to this writer to be the most urgent imperative ever since the cold war boiled up. The war must be prevented. Then everything else is possible. However, Cousins makes a strong case for putting a bold move for world government first, as the indispensable means of preventing the war. He has an impressive chapter showing that men all around the world, of all races and cultures, already hold common basic beliefs. More than any rabid nationalist suspects, man is already one. But "who speaks for man?"

The book contains significant reports of two official missions by the author to Germany and Japan. There are unforgettable accounts of the degradation forced upon men in the Nazi murder camps, and of the refusal of present Germans to admit that they had any conceivable responsibility for these horrors, or for Nazism itself. He found Germany becoming "the principal means in Europe for priming the pump of war between the West and Russia." But the Mayor of Hiroshima told him that "we the people of Hiroshima are sick at heart to look out at the world and see that nations are already fighting the initial stages that can grow into a full war."

By all past precedents the war will come, after the atomic weapons have made the death of Western civilization certain. Who Speaks for Man? is one man's attempt to avert that supreme disaster.—D. F. FLEMING, Vanderbilt University.

The Ultimate Weapon. By OLEG ANISIMOV. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Co. 1953. Pp. xvii, 163. $3.50.)

By the "ultimate weapon" the author (formerly of Latvia) means the "militant democratic internationalism which submerges petty national differences and false pride in behalf of the dignity and survival of the individual." He is greatly dissatisfied with the way the United States has been handling its psychological warfare, one of his main objections being that the U.S. expends too much energy to prove that life is better in America but does not say what it proposes to do to help the oppressed peoples. "No democratic revolutionary movement is possible behind the iron curtain without revolutionary forms of American political action." Hence the author recommends a new strategy which would boldly take advantage of discontent and of the "dormant moral strength" behind the Iron Curtain. Among other things he suggests the "creation of a permanent veto-free system" in the U.N., some sort of democratic-sponsored world organization which would be "a counterpart to the Cominform," creation of "revolutionary cadres among the Soviet escapees and the issuing of daily information, advice, and instructions to the anti-Communists behind the curtain," and establishment of "small anti-Communist cells" in all parts of the Soviet-dominated world. The book also contains an interesting discussion of the psyche of the average Soviet citizen, based on the author's own observations and experiences in Russia and among Russian POWs and on an analysis of Western European attitudes bearing on the cold war.—EDUARD TABORSKY, The University of Texas.

Documents and Speeches on British Commonwealth Affairs: 1931-1952. EDITED BY NICHOLAS MANSERGH. (London, New York, Toronto: Oxford University Press. 1952. 2 vols. Issued under the auspices of the Royal Institute of International Affairs. Pp. xli, 604; xvii, 605-1308. 84s. net.)

These volumes are a rich addition to the growing collection of documentary and interpretative works on the empire-commonwealth issued by the Oxford University Press. Professor Mansergh has recently published a supplement to Hancock's Survey of British Commonwealth Affairs and the present collection serves as a sequel to Berriedale Keith's similar collection for the years 1918 to 1931. The speeches and documents here assembled bring the story from the Statute of Westminster, 1931, to the present day. Their inevitable emphasis is on constitutional matters but extensive materials on foreign and defense policy, financial stability, and economic development are also included.

World Population and Production: Trends and Outlook. By W. S. WOYTINSKI AND E. S. WOYTINSKI. (New York: The Twentieth Century Fund. 1953. Pp. lxxii, 1268. $12.00.)

Replete with tables, maps, and graphs, this book gives in elaborate detail the present condition of man in relation to the economic aspects of his environment, and indicates possible developments in the future. Most of the figures include generous samples from the past, thereby lending historical perspective to the view, and division of the statistics along geographic and national lines affords the basis for a comparison of region with region, country with country. The contents are arranged in five major divisions, viz., Man and His Environment, World Needs and Resources, Agriculture, Energy and Mining, and Manufactures.

Der Diplomatische Dienst: seine Geschichte und Organisation in Frankreich, Grossbritannien, und den Vereinigten Staaten. By RICHARD SALLER. (Stuttgart: Deutsche Verlags-Austaet. 1953. Pp. 368.)

This is a meticulous, detailed, and carefully documented description and explanation of the diplomatic services of the countries named. It is intended to inform its German readers and lead them forward in the creation of a new diplomatic service of their own. Needless to say, it provides a wealth of useful information for American readers. The author has had sufficient experience with Nazi Germany, with England and France and the United States—including Harvard College—to give him both a detached outlook and an intimate understanding of the things whereof he writes.—P.B.P.

Ventures in Diplomacy. By WILLIAM PHILLIPS. (Boston: The Beacon Press, 1953. Pp. xxv, 477. $5.50.)

No secrets are revealed, but thoroughly fascinating are these informal recollections of a man whose public career began in 1903 as secretary to the American Ambassador in London (Joseph Choate) and ended as a member of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry on Palestine. In the intervening years the author served as, among other positions, Assistant Secretary of State during the first World War, Minister to Holland, Under-Secretary of State during the Coolidge Administration, Ambassador to Belgium, Minister to Canada, Under-Secretary again from 1933 to 1936, Ambassador to Italy, director of OSS in London, the President's Personal Representative in India in 1943, and political adviser with SHAEF. The concluding few pages contain some wise advice for would-be foreign service officers.

The United States in World Affairs: 1952. By RICHARD P. STEBBINS. (New York: Harper & Bros. 1953. Pp. xiv, 492. $5.00.)

Documents on American Foreign Relations: 1952. EDITED BY CLARENCE W. BAIER AND RICHARD P. STEBBINS. (New York: Harper & Bros. 1953. Pp. xv, 391. $5.00.)

The Council on Foreign Relations' annual volume is an admirable and well-written survey of a year full of the usual crises and alarms and marked by two other events of international significance—the U.S. presidential elections in which foreign affairs were a major topic, and the Nineteenth Congress of the Communist party. The final chapter, "NATO in the Doldrums," reflects concern over the apparent dwindling of the common purpose shared by the Western allies. The volume is also available in text edition.

The book of documents covers most of the subjects considered in the survey volume, and is organized in topical fashion for handy reference.

International Relations: Basic Documents. By ELMER PLISCHKE. (New York: D. Van Nostrand Co. 1953. Pp. xii, 194. $2.95.)

Over 200 documents provide illustrative material for the various customary divisions of the international relations course; a number of charts show the organization of foreign offices, the UN, international conference delegations, etc.

Year Book of the United Nations. 1952. (New York: Columbia University Press in co-operation with the United Nations. 1953. Pp. ix, 981. $12.50.)

This sixth annual yearbook, handsomely prepared, summarizes the UN's history from 1946 and presents a detailed report of its activities in 1952. These activities are now conveniently presented under subject-headings covering the whole organization.

How Nations See Each Other: A Study in Public Opinion. BY WILLIAM BUCHANAN AND HADLEY CANTRIL. (Urbana, Ill.: University of Illinois Press. 1953. Pp. ix, 220. $5.00.)

The results of a UNESCO-sponsored poll in nine countries testing opinions—as well as national variations—on such questions as the possibility of world peace, the acceptance of a supranational world government, and the people for which the most and least friendliness is felt.

Fédération Internationale: Idées D'hier—Possibilités de demain. BY LASZLO LEDERMANN. (Neuchâtel, Suisse: Editions de la Baconnière. 1950. Pp. 174.)

A lucid essay-like and highly readable small volume by a lecturer at the University of Geneva who is a staunch partisan of federalization as a means of facilitating the solution of many major world problems. It includes comments on the federal ideas of Saint-Simon and Proudhon and, by way of contrast, on those of the German Constantin Frantz; as well as a brief and rather superficial review of a number of federal and quasi-federal arrangements of the past.

The United States and Italy. BY H. STUART HUGHES. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1953. Pp. xi, 256. $4.00.)

A condensed survey discussing the land and the people, the recent history, the legacies of Mussolini, the consequences of war, the struggle with social, economic, and political problems since 1945, and, in conclusion, the election of June, 1953. As with other books in the American Foreign Policy Library, U.S. relations are dealt with only briefly.

The South Seas in Transition: A Study of Post-War Rehabilitation and Reconstruction in Three British Pacific Dependencies. BY

W. E. H. STANNER. (Sydney, Wellington, London: Australasian Publishing Co. 1953. Pp. xiv, 448. $6.00.)

Sharp comment on the Western approach to "development" in non-Western lands concludes this exhaustive report on rehabilitation and reconstruction in the British Pacific dependencies of Papua-New Guinea, Fiji, and Western Samoa. The manuscript was completed in 1947 but essential additions have been made through 1950.

Soviet Policy in the Far East: 1944-1951. BY MAX BELOFF. (London, New York, Toronto: Oxford University Press. 1953. Pp. vii, 278. $4.00.)

A careful compilation and analysis of available information by an English historian who allows himself only the most tentative of conclusions as to what "plan" the Soviets may have had for the Far East, and to what extent events in the Far East really may be traced to Soviet influences.

What Price Israel. BY ALFRED M. LILIENTHAL. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Co. 1953. Pp. viii, 274. $3.95.)

An American of Jewish faith insists upon the need to distinguish among Jews, Zionists, and Israelis; the first are members of an organized religion, the second sought the creation of a national state for Jews, and the third are nationals of that state. Not all Jews are Zionists, and the author is concerned about the possible consequences if American Jews forget the obligations of American citizenship in their enthusiasm for Israel.

Struggle for Africa. BY VERNON BARTLETT. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1953. Pp. ix, 246. $3.95.)

A political and economic survey based largely on the author's travels. It attempts to deal with the political problems of the entire continent—a rather comprehensive task for such a brief volume.

The Economic Impact on Under-Developed Societies: Essays on International Investment and Social Change. BY S. HERBERT FRANKEL. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1953. Pp. vii, 179. $3.25.)

A collection of essays by an Oxford professor on various colonial (largely African) economic problems. The central theme is the conflict between industrialism and the indigenous economies.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

H. ARTHUR STEINER*

University of California (Los Angeles)

ARTICLES

International Politics and National Policies

General

Blau, Peter M. Orientation of College Students toward International Relations. American Journal of Sociology. November, 1953.

Deutsch, Karl W. Political Community at the International Level: Problems of Definition and Measurement. Foreign Policy Analysis Series, No. 2 (Princeton University). September, 1953.

Halle, Louis J. Force and Consent in International Affairs. Department of State Bulletin. September 21, 1953.

United States

The Anglo-American Quarrel [two views]. Twentieth Century. October, 1953.

Attlee, Clement R. Britain and America: Common Aims, Different Opinions. Foreign Affairs. January, 1954.

Byroade, Henry A. The World's Colonies and Ex-Colonies: A Challenge to America. Department of State Bulletin. November 16, 1953.

Dean, Arthur H. The Bricker Amendment and Authority over Foreign Affairs. Foreign Affairs. October, 1953.

Duffield, Eugene S. Organizing for Defense. Harvard Business Review. September-October, 1953.

Holborn, Hajo. American Foreign Policy and European Integration. World Politics. October, 1953.

Inkeles, Alex. The Soviet Attack on the Voice of America: A Case Study in Propaganda Warfare. American Slavic and East European Review. October, 1953.

Kernohan, Frances K. Organization for Foreign Social Policy. Social Work Journal. October, 1953.

Morton, Thruston B. Major Foreign Policy Issues Confronting the United States. Department of State Bulletin. November 16, 1953.

Palmer, Norman D. Factors Shaping

United States Policy towards China. India Quarterly. July-September, 1953.

Stearns, Monteagle. Democratic Diplomacy and the Role of Propaganda. Foreign Service Journal. October, 1953 [to continue].

Suchman, Edward A. et al. Attitudes toward the Korean War. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1953.

United States Diplomacy. Current History. October, 1953.

Weir, Ernest T. Why Not Negotiate with Russia? Harper's. December, 1953.

Wriston, Henry M. The Voices of America. Foreign Affairs. January, 1954.

Latin America

Betancourt, Rómulo. La Opinión Continental Frente a la X Conferencia Interamericana. Cuadernos Americanos. September-October, 1953.

Cortina, Alphonso. Latin America and United States Materials Policy. Social Science. October, 1953.

Figueres, José. Point Four: A Latin American View. Central America and Mexico (Houston). April, 1953.

Hanson, Simon G. The End of the Good Neighbor Policy. Inter-American Economic Affairs. Autumn, 1953.

Latin America: Area of Population Explosion. Population Bulletin. October, 1953.

Matthews, Herbert L., and Holmes, Lula T. The U.S. and Latin America. Foreign Policy Association Headline Series, No. 100. July-August, 1953.

Padilla, Ezequiel. The Meaning of Pan-Americanism. Foreign Affairs. January, 1954.

Taylor, Amos E. Problems of Foreign Private Investment in Latin America. Social Science. October, 1953.

Commonwealth of Nations

Catlin, George. India in the International Field. Asian Review. October, 1953.

Craig, Gerald M. Canada's Foreign Policy. Behind the Headlines (Toronto). September, 1953.

Feer, Mark C. India's Himalayan Frontier. Far Eastern Survey. October, 1953.

* Prepared with the assistance of Mr. John H. Schaar.

Gelber, Lionel. The Commonwealth and the United Nations. Behind the Headlines (Toronto). October, 1953.

Karan, Pradyumn. India's Role in Geopolitics. India Quarterly. April-June, 1953.

Middle Ground between America and Russia: An Indian View. Foreign Affairs. January, 1954.

Monk, W. F. New Zealand Faces North. Pacific Affairs. September, 1953.

Pakistan: Relation to the Crown. Round Table. September, 1953.

Schuster, George. India and Britain in the Modern World. India Quarterly. April-June, 1953.

Wilmot, Chester. Britain's Strategic Relationship to Europe. International Affairs. October, 1953.

Western and Central Europe

Aspecten der Franse Politiek Jegens Duitsland. Internationale Spectator. October 14, 1953.

Batavus. The Strategic Importance of the Netherlands. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. November, 1953.

Bilainkin, George. Spain and the Powers. Contemporary Review. November, 1953.

Black, Martha M. The German Debt Settlement. Department of State Bulletin. October 12, 1953.

Catroux, Gen. George. The French Union. International Conciliation. November, 1953. [Similar in: Politique Étrangère, September-October, 1953.]

De Hampton, John. Portugal and the Atlantic Pact. United Nations News (London). October-December, 1953.

Einaudi, Mario. Europe after Stalin. Yale Review. September, 1953.

Foreign Policy. Italian Affairs (Rome). September, 1953.

Habicht, Max. The Special Position of Switzerland in International Affairs. International Affairs. October, 1953.

Hecksher, Kay. Denmark and NATO. Contemporary Review. November, 1953.

Hiscocks, Richard. Austrian Prospects. International Journal. Autumn, 1953.

Oud en Nieuw in de Duitse Politiek. Internationale Spectator. September 30, 1953.

Paris, J.-C. Les Élections Italiennes et l'Europe. Monde Nouveau Paru. No. 71 (1953).

von Salis, J. R. Historische Grundlagen der Europapolitik. Der Monat. August, 1953.

Trieste Question

Broz-Tito, Josip. A Solution for Trieste. Yugoslav Review. September, 1953.

Kardelj, Edvard. Trieste and Yugoslav-Italian Relations. Review of International Affairs (Beograd). November 16, 1953 (supplement).

Trieste and Italy. Italian Affairs (Rome). November, 1953.

[Trieste Issue.] Review of International Affairs (Beograd). August 1, 1953.

U.S.S.R. and Eastern Europe

Beloff, Max. The Foundation of Soviet Foreign Policy. Soviet Studies. October, 1953.

Caroe, Olaf. Soviet Colonialism in Central Asia. Foreign Affairs. October, 1953.

Kemény, George. Eastern Europe: Developments in Social and Economic Structure. World Politics. October, 1953.

Mosely, Philip E. The Kremlin's Foreign Policy since Stalin. Foreign Affairs. October, 1953.

The Revolution in the Satellites. New Leader. September 21, 1953.

Stone, William T. Russia's European Satellites. Editorial Research Reports. November 4, 1953.

Middle East and Africa

Barbour, Neville. Nationalism in Morocco. Middle Eastern Affairs. November, 1953.

Coate, Winifred A. The Condition of Arab Refugees in Jordan. International Affairs. October, 1953.

Dr. Mosaddiq and After. World Today. October, 1953.

Gherson, Randolph. The Anglo-Egyptian Question. Middle East Journal. Autumn, 1953.

Monroe, Elizabeth. The Arab-Israel Frontier. International Affairs. October, 1953.

Poliak, A. N. Geopolitics of the Middle East. Middle Eastern Affairs. August-September, 1953.

Pacific and Far East

Beal, Edwin G. Microfilmed Archives of the Japanese Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Library of Congress Quarterly Journal of Current Acquisitions. November, 1953.

Cohen, Maxwell. Communist China—To Recognize or Not To Recognize. International Journal. Autumn, 1953.

Collar, H. J. British Commercial Relations with China. International Affairs. October, 1953.

Durbin, Tillman, and Smith, Robert A. China and the World. Foreign Policy Association Headline Series, No. 99. May-June, 1953.

Goodrich, Leland M. Korea: Collective Measures against Aggression. International Conciliation. October, 1953.

Kawai, Kazuo. The New Anti-Americanism in Japan. Far Eastern Survey. November, 1953.

Kinoshita, Hanji. Echoes of Militarism in Japan. Pacific Affairs. September, 1953.

Levenson, Joseph R. Western Powers and Chinese Revolutions: The Pattern of Intervention. Pacific Affairs. September, 1953.

McConaughy, Walter P. China in the Shadow of Communism. Department of State Bulletin. January 11, 1954.

Robertson, Walter S. Policy Problems in the Far East. Department of State Bulletin. October 19, 1953.

Wu, Yuan-li. Communist China and Trade with the West. Pacific Spectator. Autumn, 1953.

Zinkin, Maurice. Asien und der Westen. Der Monat. October, 1953.

Southeast Asia.

Fall, Bernard B. Indochina: The Seven-Year Dilemma. Military Review. October, 1953.

Malaya after the Emergency. Round Table. September, 1953.

Mallory, Walter H. Making a Friend of Indonesia. Foreign Affairs. January, 1954.

Progress under the Colombo Plan. Current Notes on International Affairs (Canberra). June, 1953.

International Economic Policy and Relations

Black, Eugene R. International Investment and Economic Progress. Department of State Bulletin. October 5, 1953.

Conick, M. C. Stimulating Private Investment Abroad. Harvard Business Review. November-December, 1953.

East-West Trade in Europe. Swiss Review of World Affairs. November, 1953.

The End of Dollar Aid. Round Table. September, 1953.

Harrod, Roy. Self-Help and "Helpfulness" in British-American Trade. Foreign Affairs. October, 1953.

Hawtrey, R. G. Confidence and Convertibility. International Affairs. October, 1953.

Hoeffding, Oleg. East-West Trade Possibilities: An Appraisal of the Moscow Economie Conference. American Slavic and East European Review. October, 1953.

International Cooperation for Higher Living Standards. Indonesian Affairs (Djakarta). February, 1953.

Pigou, A. C. Long-run Adjustments in the Balance of Trade. Economica. November, 1953.

Richter, J. H. Population and Food Supply. Social Research. Autumn, 1953.

International Law

Albrecht, A. R. War Reprisals in the War Crimes Trials and in the Geneva Conventions of 1949. American Journal of International Law. October, 1953.

Bishop, Wm. W., Jr. International Law in American Law Schools Today. American Journal of International Law. October, 1953.

Bruegel, J. W. The Right to Petition An International Authority. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. October, 1953.

Flynn, Patrick A. The Constitution Abroad: The Operation of the Constitution beyond the Continental Limits. . . . Texas Law Review. November, 1953.

Kulski, W. W. Les Tendances Contemporaines dans le Droit International Soviétique. Revue de Droit International de Sciences Diplomatiques et Politiques. July-September, 1953.

Liang, Yuen-li. The Establishment of An International Criminal Jurisdiction: The Second Phase. American Journal of International Law. October, 1953.

Lissitzyn, Oliver J. The Treatment of Aerial Intruders in Recent Practice and International Law. American Journal of International Law. October, 1953.

Mancini, Antonio. La Giurisdizione della Corte Internazionale di Giustizia. Revue de Droit International de Sciences Diplomatiques et Politiques. July-September, 1953.

Pella, Vespasian. Le Code des Crimes contre le Paix et la Sécurité de l'Humanité. Revue de Droit International de Sciences Diplomatiques et Politiques. April-June and July-September, 1953.

Rode, Zvonko R. The International Claims Commission of the United States. American Journal of International Law. October, 1953.

Significant Postwar Developments in the Progress of International Law. Proceedings of the American Society of International Law. 1953.

Smith, J. A. Clarence. Personal Jurisdiction. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. October, 1953.

Szuldrzynski, Jan. Legal Aspects of OEEC. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. October, 1953.

Van Panhuys, J. H. F. The Netherlands Constitution and International Law. American Journal of International Law. October, 1953.

International Organization

General

Aghnides, H. E. Thanassis. Standards of Conduct of the International Civil Servant. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 1 (1953).

Fowler, Donald D. and Bryce, Murray A. Building Team Spirit in An International Staff. Personnel Administration. September, 1953.

Langrod, Georges. Les Problèmes Fondamentaux de la Fonction Publique Internationale. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. No. 1 (1953).

Nomenclature of International Meetings. Bulletin NGO-ONG. October, 1953.

United Nations

Alstedter, Norman. Problems of Coalition Diplomacy; The Korean Experience. International Journal. Autumn, 1953.

Bell, Coral. The United Nations and the West. International Affairs. October, 1953.

Birdwood, Lord. Reflections on World Government. Twentieth Century. October, 1953.

Brecher, Michael. Kashmir: A Case Study in United Nations Mediation. Pacific Affairs. September, 1953.

Buch, Jusuf. The Role of Non-Governmental Organizations in the Implementation of the Principles of the United Nations. Bulletin NGO-ONG. October, 1953.

Dexter, Byron. Locarno Again. Foreign Affairs. October, 1953.

Etude des Méthodes de Consultation Développées par les Nations Unies. Bulletin NGO-ONG. October, 1953.

Gross, Ernest A. Revising the Charter. Foreign Affairs. January, 1954.

Issues before the Eighth General Assembly. International Conciliation. September, 1953.

Loveday, A. Suggestions for the Reform of the United Nations Economic and Social Machinery. International Organization. August, 1953.

Murphy, Robert. The United States Looks at the United Nations. Department of State Bulletin. December 7, 1953.

Military and Security Questions

The European Defence Community. Round Table. September, 1953.

Frenay, H. Communauté Européenne de Défense: Réponse à Un Réquisitoire. Monde Nouveau Paru. No. 72 (1953).

Germain, Victor W. Military Lessons from Korea. Contemporary Review. November, 1953.

Gruenther, Gen. Alfred M. The Defense of Europe. Department of State Bulletin. November 9, 1953.

Kveder, Lt. Gen. Dushan. "Territorial War": The New Concept of Resistance. Foreign Affairs. October, 1953.

von dem Bussche, Axel. German Rearmament: Hopes and Fears. Foreign Affairs. October, 1953.

Regional Organizations

American Committee on United Europe. European Union: A Survey of Progress. Vol. III (August, 1953).

Armstrong, Hamilton Fish. The Grand Alliance Hesitates. Foreign Affairs. October, 1953.

Bebr, Gerhard. The European Coal and Steel Community: A Political and Legal Innovation. Yale Law Journal. November, 1953.

Manger, William. Regional Collective Security in the Americas. Social Science. October, 1953.

Oreamuno, J. Rafael. The Bases of Inter-American Economic Cooperation. Sociol Science. October, 1953.

Servoise, René. L'Union Française devant l'Intégration Économique Européenne. Politique Étrangère. September-October, 1953.

DOCUMENTS

General and Miscellaneous

Ad hoc Assembly Instructed to Work Out a Draft Treaty Setting Up a European Political Community. Draft Treaty Embodying the Statute of the European Community. Information and Official Documents of the Constitutional Committee October 1952-April 1953. Paris, Secretariat of the Constitutional Committee, 1953.

Food and Agriculture Organization. Report of the Director-General: The Work of FAO 1952-1953. Rome, FAO, 1953.

——— Report on the Activities of FAO under the Expanded Technical Assistance Program for 1952-1953. Rome, FAO, 1953.

Germany. Bundesministerium für Gesamtdeutsche Fragen. Revolt in June; Documents and Reports on the People's Uprising in East Berlin. . . . 1953.

—— Bundesministerium für den Marshallplan. Schriftum zum Marshallplan und zur Wirtschaftlichen Integration Europas [A bibliography]. Bad Godesberg, 1953.

International Court of Justice. Yearbook 1952-1953. The Hague, 1953. (Sales No. 107.)

International Labour Office. Director-General. World Labour Report 1953. Geneva, ILO, 1953.

North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The NATO Handbook. Paris, NATO, 1953.

United Kingdom. British Information Services. Reference Division. The Sudan: 1899-1953. I.D. 1179. New York, 1953.

—— West Indian Federation. I.D. 1185. New York, 1953.

United Nations

All entries under this heading bear the imprint of the United Nations (New York), 1953.

Economic and Social Council. Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance. Fifth Report of the Technical Assistance Board. 1 June 1953. (Doc. E/2433.)

—— Report . . . Covering the Period from 2 August 1952 to 5 August 1953. September, 1953. (Doc. A/2430.)

General Assembly. Agenda of the 8th Regular Session. . . . Adopted . . . 17 September 1953. (Doc. A/2481.)

—— Ad hoc Committee on South-West Africa. Question of South-West Africa. Report . . . to the General Assembly. 16 September 1953. (Doc. A/2475.)

—— Committee on Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. Report. . . . September, 1953. (Doc. A/2465.)

—— International Law Commission. Nationality Including Statelessness. 2nd Report on the Elimination or Reduction of Statelessness. . . . 8 August 1953. (Doc. A/CN.4/75.)

—— Report . . . Covering the Work of its 5th Session, 1 June-14 August 1953. September, 1953. (Doc. A/2456.)

—— Special Committee on the Question of Defining Aggression. Some Aspects of the Definition of Aggression. Memorandum prepared by the Secretariat. 5 August 1953. (Doc. A/AC.66/1.)

High Commissioner for Refugees. Report . . . to the General Assembly. . . . August, 1953. (Doc. A/2394.)

Secretariat. Department of Public Information. Everyman's United Nations. . . . 4th ed. (Pub. 1953.I.7.)

—— Yearbook of the United Nations 1952. (Pub. 1953.I.30.)

Secretary-General. Annual Report . . . on the Work of the Organization 1 July 1952-30 June 1953. (Doc. A/2404.)

Security Council. Report . . . to the General Assembly Covering the Period from 16 July 1952 to 15 July 1953. August, 1953. (Doc. A/2437.)

Trusteeship Council. Report . . . Covering the Period from 4 December 1952 to 21 July 1953. September, 1953. (Doc. A/2427.)

Unified Command. The Korean Question. Special Report . . . on the Armistice in Korea. 7 August 1953. (Doc. S/3079 or Doc. A/2431.)

United States

All entries under this heading bear the imprint: "Washington, Government Printing Office, 1953"; all congressional materials are those of the 83rd Congress, 1st Session.

Congress. House. Committee on Foreign Affairs. Favoring Extension of Diplomatic Relations with Republics of Ukraine and Byelorussia. Hearing . . . July 15, 1953.

—— Mutual Security Act Extension. (1) Hearings . . . March 11 . . . June 6, 1953, on H.R. 5710. (2) Report . . . June 16, 1953. H. Rep. No. 569.

—— Subcommittee on Foreign Economic Policy. Foreign Economic Policy. Hearings . . . March 12 . . . May 12, 1953.

—— The Mutual Security Act and Overseas Private Investment. Preliminary Report . . . June 3, 1953.

—— Senate. Committee on Appropriations. Mutual Security Appropriations for 1954. Hearings. . . .

—— Investigations Division. The Foreign Aid Program in Europe. Report . . . July, 1953.

—— Committee on Banking and Currency. An Organizational Survey of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. September 10, 1953.

—— Legislative History of the Export-Import Bank of Washington. September 10, 1953. (Committee Print.)

—— Committee on Foreign Relations. Agreements Relating to the Status of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, Armed Forces, and Military Headquarters. (1) Hearings . . . April 7 and 8, 1953. (2) Supplementary Hearing, June 24, 1953.

—— Indochina. Report of Senator Mike Mansfield . . . October 27, 1953.

————— Mutual Security Act of 1953. (1) Hearings . . . May 5 . . . 29, 1953. (2) Report . . . June 13, 1953. S. Rep. No. 403.

————— North American Regional Broadcasting Agreement. Hearings before the Subcommittee . . . July 8, 9 and 10, 1953.

————— Special Subcommittee on Security Affairs. Strength of the International Communist Movement. October 15, 1953. (Committee Print.)

————— Committee on Government Operations. Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations. Composite Index to Hearings and Report . . . [on] State Department Information Program. . . . April 1, 1953.

————— Security-United Nations. Hearings . . . September 17 and 18, 1953.

Department of State. The International Information Administration. Tenth Semi-annual Report of the Secretary of State . . . , July 1952–December 1952. (Pub. No. 5105.)

————— Our Foreign Policy in Latin America. Four Speeches [President Eisenhower,

John M. Cabot (2), and Nelson A. Rockefeller]. (Pub. No. 5285.)

————— Participation of the United States in International Conferences July 1, 1951–June 30, 1952. (Pub. No. 4900.)

Director of Foreign Operations [Stassen]. World Wide Enforcement of Strategic Trade Controls. Third Report to Congress [under] Mutual Defense Assistance Control Act of 1951. First Half of 1953.

Eisenhower, Milton S., Special Ambassador. United States–Latin American Relations. Report to the President. November 18, 1953. Department of State Bulletin, November 23, 1953.

National Commission for UNESCO. Where to Go for UN Information. (Department of State Pub. No. 5112.)

President. The Mutual Security Program for Fiscal Year 1954. Basic Data Supplied by the Executive Branch. Revised Committee Print [For House Committee on Foreign Affairs and Senate Committee on Foreign Relations], June 5, 1953.

POLITICAL THEORY, RESEARCH, AND METHODOLOGY

Les idées politiques en France sous la Restauration. By DOMINIQUE BAGGE. (Paris: Les Presses Universitaires de France. 1952. Pp. xiv, 462. Fr. 1,500.)

This is an exceptionally good study of the political ideas of an unusually interesting period of French history.

Twenty-five years before, the centuries-old regime of France had been shaken, then wiped out. A new regime had grown among enthusiastic supporters, but at the price of terrible internal and international struggles. Bonaparte had tried to consolidate the social conquests of this new regime while returning to normalcy. He had been led to wars and had failed in his turn. Nothing had been spared of established ideas and the most firmly settled habits of thought.

This was a conjuncture most favorable to a proliferation of political ideas. In his study of the period, the author distinguishes three great streams of thoughts. The individualistic stream, issuing mainly from the Revolution, comprises the libéraux (Madame de Staël, Benjamin Constant), the doctrinaires (Royer-Collard, Guizot), the Républicains (Destutt de Tracy, Thiers, Courrier, Béranger), and, to a certain extent, some royalistes, such as Chateaubriand. Opposite to it, the theocratic and counter-revolutionary school numbers such representatives as Joseph de Maistre, Bonald, and La Mennais. But a new idea grew out of the great whirlwind of ideas of this epoch and from the new conditions of life: socialism, advocated chiefly by Fourier, Saint-Simon, Enfantin, Bazard, and Auguste Comte.

The study of this period could not be made more fascinating than it is in this book. The brightness of the style, which strikes the reader from the very beginning, never leads to any sacrifice of the substance. The reasoning is always strong as well as sharp. Moreover, from the huge amount of documentation gathered through a thorough study of the books, newspapers, manifestos, and pamphlets published at the time, the author selected the most illustrative sentences or passages, thereby helping to make the text more attractive and more lively. The book, which has received considerable attention from French political scientists, deserves to be known in the United States.—ANDRÉ R. TUNC, University of Grenoble.

Politik als Wissenschaft. By OSSIP K. FLECHTHEIM. (Berlin: Deutsche Hochschule für Politik. 1953. Pp. 42.)

Arousal of interest in political science in Germany has been one of the accomplishments of the American "re-education" efforts in that country. There are now a number of chairs at the regular universities, and several special "Schools of Politics," among them the Berlin Hochschule fuer Politik (successor to the only prewar German institution of this kind). What still worries German political scientists, however, is the problem of the "scientific" character of their new discipline. This problem is the object of a little study (only 42 pages in length but full of ideas) which has appeared in the new series of publications of the Berlin Hochschule. Its author discusses the following questions: What is the realm of the "political," and how can it be distinguished from the general field of social phenomena? Is politics art or science? What are the specific methods of political science? How far can it be value-free? To what extent can it predict events? In what is perhaps the most interesting section, the author takes up the problems of the sociological foundations of political science—problems which generally have been much neglected and yet are of great importance in a world where independent research is more and more threatened, and this not only in totalitarian sectors.—JOHN H. HERZ, College of the City of New York.

Political Science in Western Germany: Thoughts and Writings, 1950-1952. By A. R. L. GURLAND. (Washington: Library of Congress, Reference Department, European Affairs Division. 1952. Pp. viii, 118. $1.00.)

A descriptive and analytical survey of West German books and articles relative to political science published in 1950-52. Arranged according to topics and includes a reference index of authors.

Das Studium der Politischen Wissenschaften im In- und Ausland. By GÜNTER OLZOG. (München: Isar Verlag. 1953. Pp. 156.)

A German scholar summarizes the present arrangements for study of political science in thirty-five nations.

Thorstein Veblen: A Critical Interpretation. By DAVID RIESMAN. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1953. Pp. xiii, 221. $3.00.)

Writing in the chatty, personal-essay style with which his many readers are familiar, Riesman draws a fascinating portrait of an extraordinary personality. In so doing he emphasizes the inchoate and seemingly amorphous character of Veblen's exposition, thus leaving the reader in considerable doubt as to whether Veblen had anything to say that is of any great significance for the present generation.

The Economics of Sellers' Competition: Model Analysis of Sellers' Conduct. By FRITZ MACHLUP. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press. 1953. Pp. xx, 582. $6.50.)

A simplified presentation of price theory with relatively little use of geometry and no use of algebra or calculus. Among the novel concepts developed are polypoly (many sellers) and pliopoly (new sellers in an old field, i.e., more sellers).

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON POLITICAL THEORY

FRANCIS G. WILSON

University of Illinois

History and Criticism

Aliprandi, Giuseppe. Giovanbattista Vico ed il Commercio. Nuova Rivista Storica. XXV/V-VI. 1951.

Altheim, Franz. Tacitus. Die Neue Rundschau. 64/2. 1953.

Barbatti, Bruno. Der Heilige Adalbert von Prag und der Glaube an den Weltuntergang im

Jahre 1000. Arch. für Kulturgeschichte. 35/2. 1953.

Bastid, P. Althusius et le Droit Public Moderne. Revue Internationale d'Histoire Politique et Constitutionnelle. January-March, 1953.

Bayet, A. Le Suicide Héroïque sous la Révolution Française. Revue Internationale

d'Histoire Politique et Constitutionnelle. January–March, 1953.

Blayney, M. S. Sir John Fortescue and Alain Chartier's "Traité de l'Esperance." Modern Language Review. October, 1953.

Bloch, Herbert. The Exegetes of Athens and the Prytaneion Decree. American Journal of Philology. October, 1953.

Buechner, K. Die Beste Verfassung [Cicero]. Studi Italiani Filologia Classica. XXVI/1952.

Burekhardt, Carl. Érasme. La Revue de Paris. September, 1953.

Butterfield, H. Acton and the Massacre of St. Bartholomew. Cambridge Historical Journal. XI/I. 1953.

Carré, M. H. Ralph Cudworth. Philosophical Quarterly. October, 1953.

Corish, P. J. Two Contemporary Historians of the Confederation of Kilkenny: John Lynch and Richard O'Farrell. Irish Historical Studies. March, 1953.

Crocker, Lester G. Truth and Falsehood in the Enlightenment. Journal of the History of Ideas. October, 1953.

Curti, Merle. Human Nature in American Thought: The Age of Reason and Morality, 1750–1860. Political Science Quarterly. September, 1953.

Dahl, Curtis. Bulwer-Lytton and the School of Catastrophe. Philological Quarterly. October, 1953.

Didier, Noël. Henri de Suse, Évêque de Sisteron (1244–1250) [Hostiensis]. Revue Historique de Droit Français et Étranger. 31/2. 1953.

Drozdowski, E. and Parker, H. Lord Acton: A Prophet for This Generation? South Atlantic. October, 1953.

Ellis, Frederick E. Cardinal Newman on Education. Educational Theory. October, 1953.

Ferguson, Wallace K. The Church in a Changing World: A Contribution to the Interpretation of the Renaissance. American Historical Review. October, 1953.

Fievez, M. "Opera, Peregrinationis Huius" ou les Étapes de la Composition du De Officiis. Latomus. July–September, 1953.

Forbes, Duncan. The Rationalism of Sir Walter Scott. Cambridge Journal. October, 1953.

Galindo Herrero, Santiago. Donoso Cortés en su Paralelo con Balme y Pastor Díaz. Revista de Estudios Políticos. May–June, 1953.

Garner, John. The Enfranchisement of Roman Catholics in the Maritimes. Canadian Historical Review. September, 1953.

Heimert, Alan. Puritanism, the Wilderness and the Frontier. New England Quarterly. September, 1953.

Henneke, Werner. Visión Cristiana de la Historia. Revista de Estudios Políticos. May–June, 1953.

Hill, Christine M. Symphorien Champier's Views on Education in the Nef des Princes and the Nef des Dames Vertueuses. French Studies. October, 1953.

Hinton, R. W. K. Government and Liberty under James I. Cambridge Historical Journal. XI/I. 1953.

Hochberg, Herbert. Empirical Philosophy of Roger and Francis Bacon. Philosophy of Science. October, 1953.

Jacobson, Norman. The Anti-Rationalist Heritage in America: Political Realism and the Age of Reason. Review of Politics. October, 1953.

Jones, A. H. M. The Athenian Democracy and its Critics. Cambridge Historical Journal. XI/I. 1953.

Jung, Eva-Maria. Evangelism in 16th-Century Italy. Journal of the History of Ideas. October, 1953.

Kirk, Russell. The Prescience of Tocqueville. University of Toronto Quarterly. July, 1953.

Klotz, A. Die Arbeitsweise des Polybios. La Nouvelle Clio. May–June, 1953.

Knight, Frank A. Professor Tawney: Essayist and Christian Socialist. Journal of Political Economy. October, 1953.

Kozue, A. Un Disciple Inconnu de Godwin. Études Anglaises. August, 1953.

Labrousse, Roger. Hobbes et l'Apologie de la Monarchie. Revue Française de Science Politique. July–September, 1953.

Lach, Donald F. Sinophilism of Christian Wolff. Journal of the History of Ideas. October, 1953.

Lanning, John Tate. Dr. Narciso Esparragosa y Gallardo. [Interamerican Conference, Historical Collection, No. 2, 1953]

Levene, R. Les Idées Politiques de San Martin. Revue Internationale d'Histoire Politique et Constitutionnelle. January–March, 1953.

Librizzi, Carmelo. Gioberti e Rosmini. Sophia. July–December, 1953.

Lubac, H. de and Bernard-Maitre, H. La Découverte du Bouddhisme. Bulletin de l'Association Guillaume Budé. October, 1953.

McCormick, John O. Emerson's Theory of Human Greatness. New England Quarterly. September, 1953.

McLachlan, H. J. Michael Servetus: A Cause Célèbre. Hibbert Journal. October, 1953.

Macchioro, B. G. Louis Blanc e la Rivoluzione di Febbraio. Nuova Rivista Storica. XXV/III-IV. 1951.

Mautz, Kurt. Leo und Ranke. Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte. 27/2. 1953.

May, Arthur J. Seward and Kossuth. New York History. July, 1953.

Mead, Robert G. Manuel González Prada: Peruvian Judge of Spain. PMLA. September, 1953.

Mendieta y Núñez, Lucio. Juan Bautista Vico, Precursor de la Sociología. Revista Mexicana de Sociología. XV/I. 1953.

Michaelsen, Robert S. Changes in the Puritan Concept of Calling or Vocation. New England Quarterly. September, 1953.

Mitchell, Broadus. The Secret of Alexander Hamilton. Virginia Quarterly Review. Autumn, 1953.

Mora, José F. Suárez and Modern Philosophy. Journal of the History of Ideas. October, 1953.

Morrison, John L. American Catholics and the Crusade against Evolution. Records of the American Catholic Historical Society of Philadelphia. June, 1953.

Munilla, Octavio Gil. Iturbide; El Sentido de la Emancipación Mexicana. Estudios Americanos. August-September, 1953.

Netchkine, V. Voltaire en Russie. Annales Historiques de la Révolution Française. July-September, 1953.

Oake, Roger B. Montesquieu's Religious Ideas. Journal of the History of Ideas. October, 1953.

Otto, Eberhard. Die Endsituation der Ägyptischen Kultur. Die Welt Als Geschichte. XI/4. 1951.

Paoli, Ugo Enrico. Droit Attique et Droit Romain dans les Rhéteurs Latins. Revue Historique de Droit Français et Étranger. 31/2. 1953.

Pedersen, Olaf. The Development of Natural Philosophy 1250-1350. Classica et Mediaevalia. XIV/1-2. 1953.

Popkin, Richard H. The Sceptical Crisis and the Rise of Modern Philosophy (I). Review of Metaphysics. September, 1953.

Prélot, Marcel. Influence de Locke. Études. October, 1953.

Pucelle, J. Coleridge Philosophe. Les Études Philosophiques. 8/1. 1953.

Raymond, Irving W. D'Ailly's Epistola Diaboli Leviathan. Church History. September, 1953.

Rebora, Piero. Milton a Firenze. Nuova Antologia. October, 1953.

Reynolds, Beatrice. Shifting Currents in Historical Criticism. Journal of the History of Ideas. October, 1953.

Riasanovsky, Nicholas. Fourierism in Russia. American Slavic and East European Review. October, 1953.

Saint-Denis, E. Sénèque et La Bruyère. Les Études Classiques. October, 1953.

Schaefer, R. L'Intinéraire Dialectique des "Lois" de Platon et sa Signification Philosophique. Revue Philosophique de la France et de l'Étranger. July-September, 1953.

Schiffman, Joseph. Edward Bellamy's Religious Thought. PMLA. September, 1953.

Schmidt, George Paul. Colleges in Ferment. American Historical Review. October, 1953.

Schmidt, H. D. The Idea and Slogan of "Perfidious Albion." Journal of the History of Ideas. October, 1953.

Scoville, Warren C. The Huguenots in the French Economy, 1650-1750. Quarterly Journal of Economics. August, 1953.

Sellers, Charles G. Walter Hines Page and the Spirit of the New South. North Carolina Historical Review. October, 1952.

Skalweit, Stephan. Ranke und Bismarck. Historische Zeitschrift. October, 1953.

Smith, Willard A. Napoleon III and the Spanish Revolution of 1868. Journal of Modern History. September, 1953.

Soler, W. G. John Dickinson's "Ode, on the French Revolution." American Literature. November, 1953.

Stamm, Israel S. Gellert: Religion and Rationalism. Germanic Review. October, 1953.

Ste. Croix, G. E. M. de. Demosthenes' τιμημα and the Athenian Εισφορα in the Fourth Century. Classica et Mediaevalia. XIV/1-2. 1953.

Steinen, Helmut von den. Sokrates und Plato. Die Neue Rundschau. 64/2. 1953.

Stenzel, Bertha. Is Plato's Seventh Epistle Spurious? American Journal of Philology. October, 1953.

Strakhovsky, L. I. Count Paul Ignatiev's Efforts to Save the Monarchy of Nicholas II. University of Toronto Quarterly. October, 1953.

———. The Historicism of Gogol. American Slavic and East European Reviews. October, 1953.

Sun, Siao-Fang. Chuang-Tzu's Theory of Truth. Philosophy East and West. July, 1953.

Surtz, Edward. St. Thomas More and His Utopian Embassy of 1515. Catholic Historical Review. October, 1953.

Thomas, J. D. The Public Purposes of

George Gissing. Nineteenth Century Fiction. September, 1953.

Toulmin, George B. The Political Ideas of Winthrop Sargent, A New England Federalist on the Frontier. Journal of Mississippi History. October, 1953.

Tritonj, Romolo. Critica del Concetto Marxista della "Lotta di Classe." Rassegna Italiana. August-September, 1953.

Tugwell, Rexford, G. The Progressive Orthodoxy of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Ethics. October, 1953.

Tuzet, H. Alfieri et Chateaubriand. Revue de Littérature Comparée. July-September, 1953.

Vaek, Van der, M. H. Homer's Nationalistic Attitude. L'Antiquité Classique. 22/1. 1953.

Venturi, F. Il Populismo di Černyševskij. Ricerche Slavistiche. I/1952.

Voegelin, Eric. The World of Homer. Review of Politics. October, 1953.

Waas, Adolf. Religion, Politik und Kultur in der Geschichte der Kreuzzüge. Die Welt als Geschichte. XI/4. 1951.

Whitfield, J. H. Machiavelli and Castruccio. Italian Studies. VIII/1953.

Legal Theory and Public Law Issue

Communism. Effectiveness of State Anti-Subversive Legislation. Indiana Law Journal. Summer, 1953.

Constitution, The. [Various Articles on W. W. Crosskey]. University of Chicago Law Review. Autumn, 1953.

Jackson, Robert H. The Task of Maintaining Our Liberties: The Role of the Judiciary. American Bar Association Journal. November, 1953.

Mayda, Jaro. The Value of Studying Foreign Law. Wisconsin Law Review. July, 1953.

Mullen, James Morfit. The Supreme Law of the Land. Virginia Law Review. October, 1953.

Muslim Law, A Symposium. George Washington Law Review. October, 1953.

Pegues, Frank. Medieval Origins of Modern Law Reporting. Cornell Law Quarterly. Summer, 1953.

Neumann, Franz L. The Concept of Political Freedom. Columbia Law Review. November, 1953.

Richberg, Donald R. The Bricker Amendment and the Treaty Power. Virginia Law Review. October, 1953.

Wearing, Leo J. Economic Factors in the Drafting of the Federal Constitution. Marquette Law Review. Fall, 1953.

Widen, Irwin. Should Parochial Schools Receive Public Funds? Educational Theory. October, 1953.

Special Study and Analysis

Aiken, Henry David. Moral Reasoning. Ethics. October, 1953.

Alexander, Robert J. Splinter Groups in American Radical Politics. Social Research. Autumn, 1953.

Anderson, John. The Freudian Revolution. Australasian Journal of Philosophy. August, 1953.

Arendt, Hannah. Religion and Politics. Confluence. September, 1953.

Arnold, G. L. French Politics: Failure and Promise. Partisan Review. November-December, 1953.

Asiaticus. Il Comunismo e l'Islam. Rassegna Italiana. August-September, 1953.

Aufrecht, Hans. A Restatement of Political Theory: A Note on Eric Voegelin's "The New Science of Politics." Western Political Quarterly. September, 1953.

Balandier, Georges. Messianisme et Nationalismes en Afrique Noire. Cahiers Internationaux de Sociologie. XIV/1953.

Belden, Albert D. The Problem of Church and State. Hibbert Journal. October, 1953.

Beneyto, Juan. Espacio, Tierra, Historia. Revista de Estudios Políticos. May-June, 1953.

Benjamin, A. Cornelius. Some Theories of the Development of Science. Philosophy of Science. July, 1953.

Biddle, Francis. La Libertà negli Stati Uniti. Nuovi Argomenti. September-October, 1953.

Black, Wilfred W. Historians and American Foreign Policy. Social Studies. February, 1953.

Bobbio, N. Croce e la Politica della Cultura. Rivista di Filosofia. XLIV/2. 1953.

Boisdé, Raymond. Liberalisme Actif. Hommes et Mondes. October, 1953.

Borasio, Domenico. Il Pensiero dei Cattolici su Alcune Questioni Sociali del Giorno. Rivista di Politica Economica. December, 1952.

Borkenau, Franz. Vom Kreislauf der Eliten [Pareto]. Der Monat. August, 1953.

Bourricaud, François. La Sociologie du "Leadership" et son Application à la Théorie Politique. Revue Française de Science Politique. July-September, 1953.

Bradford, Robert F. Politics, Pressure Groups, and the Businessman. Harvard Business Review. November-December, 1953.

Brinton, Crane. The Prospects for Western Europe. Virginia Quarterly Review. Autumn, 1953.

Brown, Thomas N. Nationalism and the Irish Peasant, 1800-1848. Review of Politics. October, 1953.

Buber, Martin. Geltung und Grenze des Politischen Prinzips. Neue Schweizer Rundschau. September, 1953.

Buck, August. Ortega y Gasset als Kulturkritiker. Universitas. October, 1953.

Buddeberg, Else. Heideggers Rilke-Deutung. Deutsche Vierteljahrsschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte. 27/3. 1953.

Cairns, John C. Clio and the Queen's First Minister. South Atlantic. October, 1953.

———. International Politics and the Military Mind: The Case of the French Republic, 1911-1914. Journal of Modern History. September, 1953.

Calvo Serer, Rafael. La Iglesia en la Vida Pública Española desde 1936. Arbor. July-August, 1953.

Carmichael, Peter A. The Metaphysical Matrix of Science. Philosophy of Science. July, 1953.

Catlin, George. Propaganda and the Cold War. Yale Review. Autumn, 1953.

Chaix-Ruy, J. Les Classes Sociales et l'Origine de l'Inégalité. Cahiers Internationaux de Sociologie. XIV/1952.

Chenot, Bernard. Rousseau Avait Raison. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. October, 1953.

Cobban, Alfred. The Decline of Political Theory. Political Science Quarterly. September, 1953.

Cocut, John T. Does Social Ownership Have Any Meaning? Ethics. October, 1953.

Crossman, R. H. S. The Hiss Case. Political Quarterly. October-December, 1953.

Cruz Pinillos, Vicente. Premesse Storiche a una Futura Missione della Spagna. Civitas. August-September, 1953.

Cushman, Robert E. Greek and Christian Views of Time. Journal of Religion. October, 1953.

Daniélou, J. Prière et Poésie: Fondements de la Civilisation. Études. October, 1953.

Davis, Harold E. Three Interpretations of America in History. Americas. October, 1953.

Diéz del Corral, Luis. Ortega Ante el Estado. Revista de Estudios Políticos. May-June, 1953.

Dirks, Walter. Die Christliche Demokratie in der Deutschen Bundesrepublik. Frankfurter Hefte. September, 1953.

———. The Enlightenment—Unfinished Business. Partisan Review. September-October, 1953.

Eichler, Hermann. La Struttura del Diritto di Proprietà. Nuova Rivista di Diritto Commerciale Diritto dell'Economia Diritto Sociale. VI/5-8. 1953.

Elliott, W. Y. Ideas and Ideologies. Confluence. September, 1953.

Fedosseev, P. Socialisme et Patriotisme. Cahiers du Communisme. August-September, 1953.

Fellman, David. Political Immaturity. Prairie Schooner. Fall, 1953.

Ferré, Nels F. S. Philosophy and Religion Face the Future Together. Journal of Religion. October, 1953.

Flemming, D. F. Is Coexistence with Communism Impractical? Western Political Quarterly. September, 1953.

Frankel, Charles. Liberalism and Political Symbols. Antioch Review. Fall, 1953.

Franzel, Emil. Das Sozialdemokratisches Jahrhundert. Neues Abendland. November, 1953.

Freedom in America [Various Articles.] Southwest Review. Autumn, 1953.

Friedrich, Carl J. European Unity and European Tradition. Confluence. September, 1953.

Gallagher, J. and Robinson, R. The Imperialism of Free Trade. Economic History Review. August, 1953.

Gambra, Rafael. El Doble Significado de lo Social. Arbor. July-August, 1953.

García Pelayó, Manuel. Introducción al Estudio de los Derechos del Hombre. Cuadernos Periodicos. [Argentina] No. 2, 1953.

Gossett, W. T. Human Rights and the American Bar. American Scholar. Autumn, 1953.

Graeber, Isacque. An Examination of Theories of Race Prejudice. Social Research. Autumn, 1953.

Haden, James C. The Challenge of the History of Science (I). Review of Metaphysics. September, 1953.

Hamilton, David. Veblen and Commons: A Case of Theoretical Convergence. Southwestern Social Science Review. September, 1953.

Harrigan, Anthony. The Modern Temper. Dalhousie Review. Summer, 1953.

Hartley, Margaret L. The Protestant Underworld. Southwest Review. Autumn, 1953.

Heald, Morrill. Business Attitudes toward European Immigration, 1880-1900. Journal of Economic History. Summer, 1953.

Heckscher, August. Where Are the American Conservatives? Confluence. September, 1953.

Heimann, Eduard. Atheist Theocracy. Social Research. Autumn, 1953.

Holden, David. John Dewey and His Aims of Education, Educational Forum. November, 1953.

Holstein, H. Le Mystère de l'Obeissance. Études. September, 1953.

Huess, Theodor. Grenzfragen des Religiösen und Politischen. Universitas. September, 1953.

Janowitz, M. and Marvick, D. Authoritarianism and Political Behavior. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1953.

Jouvenal, Bertrand de. A Discussion of Freedom. Cambridge Journal. September, 1953.

———. L'Apport des Théories du "Welfare" à la Théorie Politique Normative. Économie Appliquée. 1953.

Kahn, Sholem J. The Problem of Evil in Literature. Journal of Aesthetics and Art Criticism. September, 1953.

Kent, William. John Dewey's Philosophical Principles and Their Political Significance. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1953.

Kirk, Russell. The Broken Cake of British Custom. Southwest Review. Autumn, 1953.

Koch, Adrienne. Power and Morals and the Founding Fathers: Thomas Jefferson. Review of Politics. October, 1953.

Kulski, W. W. Les Tendances Contemporaines dans le Droit International Soviétique. Revue de Droit International. July-September, 1953.

Kuper, Leo. The Background to Passive Resistance (South Africa, 1952). British Journal of Sociology. September, 1953.

Koutaissoff, E. Soviet Education and the New Man. Soviet Studies. October, 1953.

Legón, Faustino J. Esbozo y Perfil del Estado. Cuadernos Periodicos [Argentina]. No. 2, 1953.

Leites, Nathan. Stalin as an Intellectual. World Politics. October, 1953.

Lener, S. I Diritti di Libertà nella Costituzione Italiana. La Civiltà Cattolica. October 3, 1953.

Liberty: Civil and Academic. [Various Articles.] Antioch Review. Fall, 1953.

MacLeish, Archibald. Loyalty and Freedom. American Scholar. Autumn, 1953.

Malick, Clay P. Some Thoughts on the Public Interest. [University of Colorado Studies, Series in Political Science, No. 1, 1953].

Marcel, Gabriel. The Concept of Spiritual Heritage. Confluence. September, 1953.

Marks, Harry J. Ground under Our Feet: Beard's Relativism. Journal of the History of Ideas. October, 1953.

Martin, Curtis. Some Reflections on Individualism. [University of Colorado Studies, Series in Political Science, No. 1, 1953.]

Mason, Edward S. The New Competition. Yale Review. Autumn, 1953.

Mayer, Charles. Laissez-faire ou Dirigisme. La Revue Libérale. October, 1953.

Mirkine-Guetzévitch, B. Le Devenir des Droits de l'Homme. Eleventh International Congress of Philosophy, 1953.

———. Quelques Réflexions sur les Droits de l'Homme. Revue Philosophique. July-September, 1953.

———. Réflexions sur la Crise de l'État Libre. Fédération Internationale des Sociétés de Philosophie. No. 1199, 1953.

Muller, H. L'État n'est plus dans l'État. La Vie Intellectuelle. August-September, 1953.

Nadeau, Maurice. Les Intellectuels et le Communisme. Les Lettres Nouvelles. October, 1953.

Neilson, F. Time and the Pattern of History. American Journal of Economics and Sociology. October, 1953.

Niceforo, Alfredo. Pobres y Pobreza. Revista Mexicana de Sociología. XV/I. 1953.

Noble, David W. The Paradox of Progressive Thought. American Quarterly. Fall, 1953.

O'Connor, D. J. Value Judgments and the Social Sciences. Sociological Review. July, 1953.

O'Doherty, E. F. Logic of the Social Sciences. Sociological Review. July, 1953.

Paz, Octavio. Labyrinthe de la Solitude [Mexico]. Esprit. July, 1953.

Perdomo García, José. En Torno a la Filosofía HispanoAmericana. Estudios Hispano-americanos. August-September, 1953.

Rath, John. The Failure of an Ideal: The Viennese Revolution of 1848. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. September, 1953.

Riemer, Svend. Empirical Training and Sociological Thought. American Journal of Sociology. September, 1953.

Robson, William A. De 'Welfare State' in Groot Brittanië. De Gids. August-September, 1953.

Rossi, Mario. Neo-Fascism in Italy. Virginia Quarterly Review. Autumn, 1953.

Rougier, Louis. Le Peuple est-il Souverain? La Revue de Paris. September, 1953.

Rouquette, Robert. French Catholicism Confronts Communism. Thought. Autumn, 1953.

Schlesinger, W. Herrschaft und Gefolgschaft in der Germanisch-Deutschen Verfassungsgeschichte. Historische Zeitschrift. October, 1953.

Schmid, Peter. The German's Present Conservatism: Its Roots. Commentary. November, 1953.

Sears, Laurence. Liberals and Conservatives. Antioch Review. Fall, 1953.

Sieburg, Heinz Otto. Démocratie et Dictature (II). Documents. August, 1953.

Social Class Structure and American Education. [Various Articles.] Harvard Educational Review. Summer, 1953.

Souchère, Elena de la. Expérience Bolivienne et Révolution Hispanique. Les Temps Modernes. October, 1953.

Stibbe, Pierre. Le Mécanisme de la Répression Politique. Esprit. September, 1953.

Stockwell, H. C. R. Jean-Paul Sartre. Cam- bridge Journal. September, 1953.

Vlastos, Gregory. Of Sovereignty in Church and State. Philosophical Review. October, 1953.

Voigt, Frederick A. Das Ende des Englischen Sozialismus. Deutsche Rundschau. 79/9. 1953.

Westow, T. L. Dutch Catholicism in Perspective. Dublin Review. Third Quarter, 1953.

Wilder, Amos N. Moral Aspects of German Recovery. Religion in Life. Autumn, 1953.

Wollheim, Richard. The Political Philosophy of Existentialism. Cambridge Journal. October, 1953.

Wormuth, Francis D. Learned Legerdemain: A Grave but Implausible Hand. Western Political Quarterly. September, 1953.

Wright, Arthur F. Struggle vs. Harmony: Symbols of Competing Values in Modern China. World Politics. October, 1953.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON METHODOLOGY AND RESEARCH IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

HERBERT A. SIMON

Carnegie Institute of Technology

Philosophy of Social Sciences

Moore, Barrington, Jr. The New Scholasticism and the Study of Politics. World Politics. October, 1953.

Parsons, Talcott. Some Comments on the State of the General Theory of Action. American Sociological Review. December, 1953.

Shaffer, Laurance F. Of Whose Reality I Cannot Doubt. American Psychologist. November, 1953.

Turner, Ralph H. The Quest for Universals in Sociological Research. American Sociological Review. December, 1953.

Research Methods and Organization

Goodman, Leo A. Ecological Regressions and the Behavior of Individuals. American Sociological Review. December, 1953.

Gross, Neal and Mason, Ward S. Some Methodological Problems of Eight-Hour Interviews. American Journal of Sociology. November, 1953.

Knapp, Robert H.; Greenbaum, Joseph J.; and Wertheimer, Michael. Recent Undergraduate Origins of Scholars in the Behavioral Sciences. American Psychologist. September, 1953.

Leiserson, Avery. Problems of Methodology in Political Science. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1953.

Moss, Louis. Sample Surveys and the Administrative Process. International Social Science Bulletin. 1953, #3.

Perloff, Harvey S. Planning Concepts and Regional Research. Social Forces. December, 1953.

Sheatsley, Paul B. and Hyman, Herbert H. The Use of Surveys to Predict Behavior. International Social Science Bulletin. 1953, #3.

Whyte, William F. Interviewing for Organizational Research. Human Organization. Summer, 1953.

Motivation and Personality

Attneave, Fred. Psychological Probability as a Function of Experienced Frequency. Journal of Experimental Psychology. August, 1953.

Balfour, W. Campbell. Productivity and the Worker. British Journal of Sociology. September, 1953.

Bender, I. E. and Hastorf, A. H. On Measuring Generalized Empathic Ability (Social Sensitivity). Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. October, 1953.

Deutsch, J. A. A New Type of Behavior Theory. British Journal of Psychology. November, 1953.

Gage, N. L. Accuracy of Social Perception and Effectiveness in Interpersonal Relations. Journal of Personality. September, 1953.

Pfiffner, John M. and Wilson, Robert C. "Management-Mindedness" in the Supervisory Ranks. Personnel. September, 1953.

Roy, Donald F. Work Satisfaction and Social Reward in Quota Achievement. American Sociological Review. October, 1953.

Taguiri, Renato; Blake, Robert R.; and Bruner, Jerome S. Some Determinants of the Perception of Positive and Negative Feelings in Others. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. October, 1953.

Opinions and Attitudes

Adelson, Joseph. A Study of Minority Group Authoritarianism. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. October, 1953.

Bernberg, Raymond E. Prestige Suggestion in Art as Communication. Journal of Social Psychology. August, 1953.

Blau, Peter M. Orientation of College Students toward International Relations. American Journal of Sociology. November, 1953.

Brown, Roger W. A Determinant of the Relationship between Rigidity and Authoritarianism. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. October, 1953.

Eysenck, H. J. Primary Social Attitudes: A Comparison of Attitude Patterns in England, Germany, and Sweden. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. October, 1953.

Goodstein, Leonard D. Intellectual Rigidity and Social Attitudes. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. July, 1953.

Gump, Paul V. Anti-Democratic Trends and Student Reaction to President Truman's Dismissal of General MacArthur. Journal of Social Psychology. August, 1953.

Janowitz, Morris and Marvick, Dwaine. Authoritarianism and Political Behavior. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1953.

Kelman, Herbert C. and Hovland, Carl I. "Reinstatement" of the Communicator in Delayed Measurement of Opinion Change. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. July, 1953.

Morsh, Joseph E. and Smith, Madorah E. Judgment of Prejudice before, during and after World War II. Journal of Social Psychology. August, 1953.

Solberg, Patricia Anne. Attitudes of Canadian Veterans to Political and Economic Issues. Journal of Social Psychology. August, 1953.

Suchman, Edward A.; Goldsen, Rose K.; and Williams, Robin M. Jr. Attitudes toward the Korean War. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1953.

Stern, Eric and Keller, Suzanne. Spontaneous Group References in France. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1953.

Group Behavior

Adams, Stuart. Status Congruency as a Variable in Small Group Performances. Social Forces. October, 1953.

Albert, Robert S. Comments on the Scientific Function of the Concept of Cohesiveness. American Journal of Sociology. November, 1953.

Campbell, H. Some Effects of Joint Consultation on the Status and Role of the Supervisor. Occupational Psychology. October, 1953.

Caplow, Theodore. The Criteria of Organizational Success. Social Forces. October, 1953.

Cassinelli, C. W. The Law of Oligarchy. American Political Science Review. September, 1953.

Cattell, R. B.; Saunders, David R.; and Stice, Glen F. The Dimension of Syntality in Small Groups. Human Relations. 1953, #4.

Davis, Keith. Management Communication and the Grapevine. Harvard Business Review. September-October, 1953.

Duffield, Eugene S. Organizing for Defense. Harvard Business Review. September-October, 1953.

Durish, Lawrence L. and Lowry, Robert E. The Scope and Content of Administrative Decision: The TVA Illustration. Public Administration Review. Autumn, 1953.

Fearing, Franklin. Toward a Psychological Theory of Human Communication. Journal of Personality. September, 1953.

Freeman, Howard E. A Note on the Prediction of Who Votes. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1953.

Freidson, Eliot. The Relation of the Social Situation of Contact to the Media in Mass Communication. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1953.

Gage, N. L. and Exline, Ralph V. Social Perception and Effectiveness in Discussion Groups. Human Relations. 1953, #4.

Gallup, George. The Future Direction of Election Polling. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1953.

Gross, Neal; Martin, William E.; and Darley, John G. Studies of Group Behavior: Leadership Structures in Small Organized Groups. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. July, 1953.

Hartung, Frank E. Common and Discrete Group Values. Journal of Social Psychology. August, 1953.

Hastings, Philip K. The Independent Voter in 1952: A Study of Pittsfield, Massachusetts. American Political Science Review. September, 1953.

Maas, Henry S.; Prince, Charles H.; and Davie, George E. Personal-Social Disequilibrium in a Bureaucratic System. Psychiatry. May, 1953.

Macy, Josiah, Jr.; Christie, Lee S.; and Luce, R. Duncan. Coding Noise in a Task-Oriented Group. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. July, 1953.

Pellegrin, Ronald J. The Achievement of High Statuses and Leadership in the Small Group. Social Forces. October, 1953.

Rock, M. L. and Hay, E. N. Investigation of the Use of Tests as a Predictor of Leadership and Group Effectiveness in a Job Evaluation Situation. Journal of Social Psychology. August, 1953.

Ruesch, Jurgen. Synopsis of the Theory of Human Communication. Psychiatry. August, 1953.

Simon, Herbert A. Birth of an Organization: The Economic Cooperation Administration. Public Administration Review. August, 1953.

Stedman, Murray S. A Group Interpretation of Politics. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1953.

Sutton, Willis A. Jr. A Conceptual Scheme for the Sociological Analysis of Election Campaigns. Social Forces. December, 1953.

Swanson, G. E. A Preliminary Laboratory Study of the Acting Crowd. American Sociological Review. October, 1953.

Culture and Institutions

Adams, Walter. Competition, Monopoly, and Countervailing Power. Quarterly Journal of Economics. November, 1953.

Bagby, Philip H. Culture and the Causes of Culture. American Anthropologist. October, 1953.

Baltzell, E. Digby. Social Mobility and Fertility within an Elite Group. Millbank Memorial Fund Quarterly. October, 1953.

Bernstein, Marver H. Political Ideas of Selected Business Journals. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1953.

Boulding, Kenneth E. Economic Issues in International Conflict. Kyklos. 1953, #2.

Buchanan, W. Mass Communication in Reverse. International Social Science Bulletin. 1953, #3.

Burton, William H. Education and Social Class in the United States. Harvard Educational Review. Fall, 1953.

Deasy, Leila Calhoun and Anderson, C. Arnold. Selectivity in the University. Journal of Higher Education. March, 1953.

Hetzler, Stanley Arthur. An Investigation of the Distinctiveness of Social Classes. American Sociological Review. October, 1953.

Hoselitz, Bert F. Social Structure and Economic Growth. Economia Internazionale. August, 1953.

Inter-University Summer Seminar on Comparative Politics. Report. AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW. September, 1953.

Lane, Robert E. Businessmen and Bureaucrats. Social Forces. December, 1953.

Lane, Robert E. Law and Opinion in the Business Community. Public Opinion Quarterly. Summer, 1953.

Lange, Charles H. The Role of Economics in Cochiti Pueblo Culture Change. American Anthropologist. December, 1953.

Mintz, Alexander. The Failure of a Propaganda Campaign Attempting to Influence the Behavior of Consumers in the National Interest by Predominantly Selfish Appeals. Journal of Social Psychology. August, 1953.

Rosenberg, Morris. Perceptual Obstacles to Class Consciousness. Social Forces. October, 1953.

Spengler, Joseph J. Changes in Income Distribution and Social Stratification: A Note. American Journal of Sociology. November, 1953.

Watson, James B. Four Approaches to Cultural Change. Social Forces. December, 1953.

Value Theory and Social Policy

Levin, Harvey J. Social Welfare Aspects of FCC Broadcast Licensing Standards. American Journal of Economics and Sociology. October, 1953.

Richter, J. H. Population and Food Supply. Social Research. Autumn, 1953.

Rothenberg, Jerome. Conditions for a Social Welfare Function. Journal of Political Economy. October, 1953.

OTHER BOOKS RECEIVED

- A Standard Classification of Municipal Accounts. Chicago: National Committee on Governmental Accounting. 1953. Pp. ix, 129.
- BALLOU, RICHARD BOYD. The Individual and the State: The Modern Challenge to Education. Boston: The Beacon Press. 1953. Pp. xxviii, 305. $4.50.
- BARLOW, E. R. Management of Foreign Manufacturing Subsidiaries. Boston: Harvard Business School. 1953. Pp. xi, 223. $3.50.
- BEARD, MARY R. The Force of Women in Japanese History. Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1953. Pp. iv, 196. $3.75.
- BIXLER, PAUL (ED.). The Antioch Review Anthology: Essays, Fiction, Poetry, and Reviews from The Antioch Review. Cleveland and New York: The World Publishing Co. 1953. Pp. ix, 470. $6.00.
- BULEY, R. CARLYLE. The American Life Convention, 1906-1952: A Study in the History of Life Insurance. New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts. 1953. 2 vols. Pp. xxx, 680; viii, 681-1397. $15.00.
- EVANS, MEDFORD. The Secret War for the A-Bomb. Chicago: Henry Regnery Co. 1953. Pp. xviii, 302. $3.95.
- Everyman's United Nations: A Ready Reference to the Structure, Functions and Work of the United Nations and Its Related Agencies*. New York: United Nations, Department of Public Information. 1953. 4th ed. Pp. vi, 433. $1.50.
- FITCH, GERALDINE. Formosa Beachhead. Chicago: Henry Regnery Co. 1953. Pp. ix, 267.
- FORD, EDWIN H., AND EMBRY, EDWIN (EDS.). Highlights in the History of the American Press: A Book of Readings. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press. 1953. Pp. xi, 398. $6.50.
- GELBER, LIONEL. The American Anarchy: Democracy in an Era of Bigness. New York: Henry Schuman. 1953. Pp. viii, 179. $3.50.
- HOFFMAN, PAUL G., JOHNSON, GERALD W., ROYALL, KENNETH C., WRISTON, HENRY M., AND MAXWELL, ALLEN (ED.). The Present Danger: Four Essays on American Freedom. Dallas: Southern Methodist University Press. 1953. Pp. vi, 99. $2.00.
- HOGAN, DAVID. The Four Glorious Years. Dublin: Irish Press Ltd. 1953. Pp. 404. 12/6.
- KAUB, VERNE PAUL. Communist-Socialist Propaganda in American Schools. Boston: Meador Publishing Co. 1953. Pp. 192. $2.50.
- KEISTEAD, B. S. An Essay in the Theory of Profits and Income Distribution. Oxford: Basil Blackwell. 1953. Distributed by Augustus M. Kelley, New York. Pp. vi, 110. $1.75.
- KIMCHE, JON. Seven Fallen Pillars: The Middle East, 1945-1952. New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1953. Pp. xxvi, 439. $4.50.
- The Limits of Taxable Capacity*. Princeton: Tax Institute, Inc. 1953. Pp. viii, 84. $5.00.
- MARSH, BENJAMIN C. Lobbyist for the People: A Record of Fifty Years. Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1953. Pp. xii, 224. $3.00.
- MARSHALL, HUBERT, AND YOUNG, ROBERT J. Public Administration of Florida's Natural Resources. Gainesville: Public Administration Clearing Service, University of Florida. 1953. Pp. ix, 257. $1.00.
- MARTS, ARNAUD C. Philanthropy's Role in Civilization: Its Contribution to Human Freedom. New York: Harper & Bros. 1953. Pp. xvi, 206. $3.00.
- MURPHEY, RHOADS. Shanghai: Key to Modern China. Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1953. Pp. xii, 232. $4.50.
- PORTERFIELD, AUSTIN L. Wait the Withering Rain? Studies in the Conditions of Survival and Peace beyond 1976. Fort Worth: Leo Potishman Foundation. 1953. Pp. ix, 147. $2.50.
- ROALFE, WILLIAM R. The Libraries of the Legal Profession. St. Paul, Minn.: West Publishing Co. 1953. Pp. xviii, 471.
- ROMIER, LUCIEN. TRANSLATED AND COMPLETED BY A. L. ROWSE. A History of France. New York: St. Martin's Press. 1953. Pp. xvii, 487. $6.50.
- RUOPP, PHILLIPS (ED.). Approaches to Community Development: A Symposium Introductory to Problems and Methods of Village Welfare in Underdeveloped Areas. The Hague, Bandung: W. Van Hoeve Ltd. 1953. Pp. xvi, 352. $3.00.

NEWS AND NOTES

PROFESSIONAL CONFERENCES

NEXT ANNUAL MEETING OF THE ASSOCIATION

The Fiftieth Annual Meeting of the American Political Science Association will be held September 9-11, 1954, at the Sherman Hotel in Chicago. The Chairman of the Program Committee is Professor Stephen K. Bailey, Wesleyan University; the Chairman of the Committee on Local Arrangements is Professor C. Herman Pritchett, University of Chicago.

The Fifty-Ninth National Conference on Government of the National Municipal League was held in Richmond, Virginia, November 8-11, and attracted 1033 registered visitors, as well as hundreds of high school and college students. An important aspect of the meeting was the method by which the Conference and its facilities were made available to all of Richmond's high schools, colleges, and universities. Seven school and college assemblies were arranged at which six leading Conference participants delivered addresses on the general topic "Youth in Civic Affairs." Among the speakers were George Gallup, Director of the American Institute of Public Opinion and new president of the National Municipal League; Charles Edison, former Governor of New Jersey; and Charles Coates, General Manager of the Citizens' Committee for the Hoover Report. More than 7,000 students were reached by these speakers.

Main speakers at the luncheon and dinner meetings of the Conference were Mr. Gallup and Mr. Edison, Frank C. Moore, former Lieutenant Governor of New York, Karl Detzer, Roving Editor of Reader's Digest and Spencer Miller, Jr., Assistant Secretary of Labor. More than 400 civic and business leaders, state and local officials, political scientists, and interested citizens attended the twenty-two panel sessions of the Conference. Among the topics discussed were: "Cities and the National Government," led by Sherwood Reeder, President of the Pennsylvania Economy League; "Consider the Whole City," Hugh Pomeroy, Planning Director of Westchester County, New York; "Effective Citizens' Associations," Mrs. Siegel W. Judd, Grand Rapids Citizens' Action; "Ethics for Legislators," Professor Belle Zeller, Brooklyn College; "Women as Campaigners," Margaret Hickey, Public Affairs Editor, Ladies Home Journal; "More Responsible States," Frank C. Moore, President, Government Affairs Foundation, Inc.; "The Newspaper as a Civic Force," Virginius Dabney, Editor, Richmond Times-Dispatch; and "Policymaking Machinery in the Council-Manager Plan," J. M. Kernochan, Columbia University.

Featured at the Conference was the presentation of twenty-two "cases," before a jury of twelve, by finalist cities in fifteen states competing for the 1953 "All-America Cities" awards. Half of those communities competing will be selected later in the year. The awards will be given on the basis of evidence presented before the jury of local progress achieved as the result of citizen action. The contest is sponsored jointly by Look Magazine and the National Municipal League.

The Twenty-Fifth Annual Meeting of the Southern Political Science Association was held on November 5-7 at the University of Florida in Gainesville as a part of the centennial celebration of that institution. Approximately 160 persons were in attendance. Panel discussions were devoted to the following topics: "The First Nine Months of the Eisenhower Administration," "Problems of Suburbia," "Southern Politics—Effects of the 1952 Elections," "The Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952," "Recent Trends in Methodology in Political Science," "Problems in United States Foreign Policy," and "The Supreme Court and Segregation." The presidential address was delivered by Professor Charles B. Robson, and Dr. Hugh L. Elsbree, Managing Editor of the AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW, addressed the meeting briefly as representative of the American Political Science Association. Two other major addresses were delivered by Professors Francis W. Coker and John Gaus on the respective subjects, "Free Speech and the Silent Professor" and "The University, Political Science and the Public Service." Special recognition was accorded to the past presidents of the Association on this Twenty-Fifth Anniversary occasion, and Professor Cullen B. Gosnell of Emory University, first president of the Association, responded on behalf of the past presidents. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: Professor Walter H. Bennett, University of Alabama, president; Professor John Hallowell, Duke University, vice-president; Professor Arthur B. Dugan, University of the South, recording secretary; Professor David R. Deener, Tulane University, Professor Robert K. Gooch, University of Virginia, and Dr. Robert E. Lowry, Tennessee Valley Authority, members of the executive council. Professor Lee S. Greene of the University of Tennessee was elected Editor of the Journal of Politics for the remaining two years of the unexpired term of Professor René de Visme Williamson who had resigned.

From August 29 to September 4, the Citizenship Clearing House sponsored three regional workshops in practical politics for a selected group of young teachers in political science who are interested in training for political participation. The New England session was held at Newtown, Connecticut, under the direction of Professor E. E. Schattschneider; the Midwest Workshop, at Michigan State College, East Lansing, under the direction of Professor James W. Miller; and the Pacific Northwest meeting, at the University of Washington, Seattle, under the direction of Professor Hugh Bone.

Designed to provide an informal course on practical politics, these workshops were limited to twenty-five young political scientists. The emphasis was on informality, and much of the discussion was conducted through panel sessions. The faculties of the workshops were composed of political leaders and more experienced political scientists, and in the three workshops more than thirty political leaders and ninety-four political scientists were involved.

Among the political leaders at the New England session were: John M. Bailey, Connecticut Democratic State Chairman; Professor Stephen K. Bailey, Mayor of Middletown, Connecticut; General Raymond Watt, former Assistant to Governor Lodge; Gus Tyler, Director of the Political Department, ILGWU. In the Midwest, political leaders included: Byron G. Allen, Minnesota Democratic National Committeeman; D. Hale Brake, State Treasurer of Michigan; Governor G. Mennen Williams; Mrs. Margaret Price, Michigan Democratic National Committeewoman; Bradshaw Mintener, Chairman, Minnesotans for Eisenhower; Owen J. Cleary, Michigan Secretary of State; John Feikens, Chairman, Michigan Republican State Committee, and Neil Staebler, Chairman, Michigan Democratic State Committee. Prominent at the Pacific Northwest Workshop were George C. Kinnear, Republican State Chairman; Ed Munro, Democratic State Committeeman; and Mr. and Mrs. Richard Neuberger, members of the Oregon Legislature.

The discussion at these workshops was oriented toward encouraging students to participate in, as well as to understand, our governmental institutions. The scope of the conferences can perhaps be best illustrated by the program of the Midwest Workshop, which included such topics as: the development of course techniques and materials for interesting students in practical politics, field work courses, the importance of the political party in the lawmaking process, interdisciplinary studies in political behavior, local political surveys, programs and projects to provide both academic and political experience for students, and the role of college administrators in encouraging political participation by young college men and women.

The Political Science Group of the University Center in Georgia held a dinner meeting on November 23, at Stone Mountain, Georgia. Present were political scientists from Emory University, Georgia Institute of Technology, Oglethorpe University, University of Georgia and the Atlanta Division, University of Georgia. Cullen B. Gosnell, chairman of the group, presided over the meeting. The topic of the program was "Techniques of Teaching the Introductory Course in Political Science." Participating on the panel which led the discussion were: Morris W. H. Collins, Jr., University of Georgia, who served as moderator; George Brasington, of Emory University; Samuel J. Mantel, Jr., of Georgia Tech.; Willard E. A. Range, of the University of Georgia; and Robert J. Steamer, of Oglethorpe University. Particular attention was given to newer techniques of instruction, viz., case method, role-playing, laboratory field research, and use of audio-visual aids.

The annual Mid-West Conference of Political Scientists will be held on the University of Iowa campus on April 29, 30 and May 1. Presiding at the sessions will be President Harry Voltmer of DePauw University. The chairman of the program committee for the year is Professor David Fellman of the University of Wisconsin.

Through an oversight, the minutes of the September 9, 1953 meeting of the Council of the American Political Science Association, published in the December, 1953 issue of the REVIEW, did not list the selections for the 1953 book awards, for which books published in 1952 were eligible.

The Woodrow Wilson Foundation Award for the best book in the field of government and democracy went to Clinton Rossiter's Seedtime of the Republic; the Franklin D. Roosevelt Foundation Award for the best book in the field of government and human welfare, to Mulford Q. Sibley and Philip E. Jacob's Conscription of Conscience; and the Freedom House, Willkie Memorial Building Award for the best book in the field of international relations, to F. S. C. Northrop's The Taming of the Nations.

OTHER ACTIVITIES

Methods of nominating presidential candidates in the United States will be the subject of scientific study by the Brookings Institution, it was announced jointly in October by Robert D. Calkins, President of the Institution, and Francis H. Lindley, President of the Haynes Foundation of Los Angeles, which has made a grant of $42,300 for the project. The investigation will be under the direction of Paul T. David, senior staff member of the Brookings Institution. The study will re-examine convention procedures. It will compare practices in states having presidential primaries for selecting delegates to national conventions with those using other methods. Also to be studied are the apportionment of voting strength among the states, instructed delegations, the unit rule, problems of communication among delegates and leaders during convention sessions, the pressures on the individual delegate, and similar topics. A special inquiry will be made into the voting behavior at the 1952 conventions to examine the conduct of delegations sent from state conventions as compared with that of delegations selected by state primaries.

The Brookings study is a sequel to the research now being completed by the American Political Science Association, scheduled for publication this spring under the title, Presidential Nominating Politics in 1952. This is a five-volume report prepared for the Association under the direction of Paul T. David, who was loaned by the Brookings Institution to the Association for the purpose.

A traveling seminar of professional persons to visit Yugoslavia, Greece, Turkey, Syria, Lebanon, Israel, Jordan, and Egypt is announced by the San Francisco State College for the coming summer. Under the direction of Dr. Alfred G. Fisk, professor of philosophy, the group will leave New York by air on June 29 with return scheduled for September 1. Visits will be made to governmental ministries, educational and social service institutions, and historic sites, and interviews with prominent persons will be held in all the countries visited. The group will travel on a cooperative, non-profit basis. College credit is available but not required. Inquiries should be addressed to Dr. Alfred G. Fisk, San Francisco State College, San Francisco 27, California.

A new organization, The Population Council, Inc., has recently been established as a non-profit corporation to encourage research and education concerning the relationship of the world's population to its material and cultural resources. The Council plans to study the problems of the increasing population of the world, to support research, and to make known the results of such research. It will serve as a center for exchange of facts and information on population questions and cooperate with individuals and institutions having similar interests. The trustees of the Council are the Messrs. Frank G. Boudreau, Detlev W. Bronk, Karl T. Compton, Frank W. Notestein, Frederick Osborn, Dr. Thomas Parran, John D. Rockefeller, III, and Lewis L. Strauss.

The Council does not plan to conduct research or educational activities with its own staff. It has already made a small number of research grants to universities and other established organizations, and has established a number of fellowships for the training of students in the field of population. The purpose of the Council's fellowship program is to assist in the advanced training in the study of population of students in the social and natural sciences at the predoctoral or postdoctoral levels. The Council is planning to grant approximately six fellowships (for study in the United States and elsewhere) during the academic year 1954-55, to be divided between students from the United States and from other countries. Fellows will normally receive support for fulltime work for a period of about one year. The basic stipend at the rate of $2500 per year may be supplemented to provide for maintenance of dependents, and especially in the case of foreign students, for travel or exceptional expenses. It may be diminished to take account of lesser needs or partial support from other sources. Somewhat larger stipends may be granted to postdoctoral than to predoctoral fellows. Preference will be given to candidates who are not over forty years of age.

For information or application forms relating to this program, inquiries should be addressed to Mr. Frederick Osborn, Executive Vice-President of the Council, 230 Park Avenue, New York 17, New York.

A unit of the Citizenship Clearing House to function for the eastern half of Pennsylvania has been established at the University of Pennsylvania. The program for the current year includes a student conference in which political party leaders will participate; a series of dinner meetings to be held at several locations in eastern Pennsylvania for the purpose of mutual exploration of relationships between educational institutions and the organized political parties; a survey of current political activity of graduates who have majored in political science; and a workshop to bring together for purposes of practical education party functionaries and young instructors teaching in the field of government.

The Deutsche Hochschule für Politik at Berlin-Schöneberg has been awarded a two-year grant of DM 69,000 by the Rockefeller Foundation for the preparation of a series of outlines and source books in political science. These are intended primarily for the use of students in view of the fact that no such material is yet available in Germany. An editorial committee has been appointed, consisting of the Director of the School, Otto Suhr, Dr. Hans Reif, and Professor O. K. Flechtheim. Professor Flechtheim, who has been relieved of his teaching duties at the school for a period of two years, is to serve as managing editor. Most of the volumes will be written by members of the faculty of the Hochschule. They will be devoted to the German party system, foreign governments, political theory, international organization, and German government and administration.—OSSIP K. FLECHTHEIM.

The Carnegie Corporation, on September 24, 1953, approved a grant of $75,000 to the Inter-University Case Program for the three-year period ending in March, 1957. The Inter-University Case Program, a collaborative venture carried on by forty-five colleges and universities, has stimulated the development and use of case studies in policy formation and public administration. To date the Program has published forty-two case studies. Twenty-six of these appeared in a casebook, Public Administration and Policy Development, edited by Harold Stein.

For the seventh consecutive year, the Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan will hold its Annual Summer Institute in Survey Research Techniques. This special program is designed to illustrate the theory and application of survey research to such fields as business and human relations, education, psychology and sociology, political behavior, public affairs, public health, economics, statistics, etc. Again this year a special workshop will be offered in the practical application of survey research methods to these individual fields. The dates for the regular session are July 19 to August 13, with an introductory session from June 21 to July 16. Further information may be obtained from the Survey Research Center, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, Michigan.

In November, the University of Georgia was granted approximately $4,000,000 to establish a comprehensive program in continuing education. The Kellogg Foundation granted the University some $2,000,000 and the remainder will come from state funds. An elaborate continuing education center will be constructed on the University campus at Athens, including a television station, extensive film-producing facilities, and hotel accommodations for some 400 persons. Morris W. H. Collins, Jr., assistant professor of political science and director of the Bureau of Public Administration, served on the four-man University research committee which helped prepare the proposal on which this grant was based. Plans for the program in continuing education envisage a greatly expanded program of training public officials by the Bureau of Public Administration of the University of Georgia.

Several members of the department of political science at the Pennsylvania State University are participating in an educational program for labor leaders from other countries of the world who are brought to the University by the U. S. Office of Education and the Foreign Operations Administration. Participants have been Professors Elton Atwater, Vernon Aspaturian, Wallace Brewster, John H. Ferguson, Nelson McGeary, and Neal Riemer.

Members of the department of political science at the University of California (Los Angeles) held two seminars in December, 1953. On these occasions the department was host to Thomas L. Stokes, distinguished journalist, and Murray Chotiner, campaign manager for Vice-President Richard M. Nixon.

Joseph E. Black, assistant professor of government at Miami University, has been appointed supervisor of the Foreign Study Program of Miami University Abroad. The academic portion of this summer travel program, which offers academic credit in political science, economics, and history, includes study at the London School of Economics and the Sorbonne.

Phillips Bradley, of Syracuse University, will accompany a class from the University on a six-weeks' tour of American government during the coming summer. Two weeks each will be spent in Albany, New York, New York City, and Washington, conferring with officials and studying special problems of the federal system.

Arnold Brecht, professor of political science, jurisprudence, and public finance on the Graduate Faculty, New School for Social Research, will become professor emeritus in March, 1954. He has accepted an invitation from the University of Heidelberg, Germany, to lecture on political science as a guest professor from May through July, but plans to return to the United States in September.

John J. Corson, manager of the Washington office of McKinsey and Company, management consultants, and former Director of the U. S. Employment Service, opened the 1953-54 series of "Lectures in Administration" given at the Cornell University School of Business and Public Administration. Dr. Corson spoke on November 10, 1953, on the "Use of Logic in Administration." Other scheduled lecturers are Charles P. Taft, attorney; Hubertus J. van Mook, of the United Nations' Technical Assistance Administration; Robert Moses, Park Commissioner of New York City; Eugene Holman, President of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey; and Victor Emanuel, Chairman and President of the Avco Manufacturing Corporation.

Professor Marshall Dimock has assumed his duties as Head of United Nations Mission in Ankara, Turkey. He is Co-Director of the Institute of Public Administration for Turkey and the Middle East and is also Acting Resident Representative of the United Nations Technical Assistance Board. During the first three months of 1954 he took leave to participate as a staff member in the Administrative Staff College, Henley-on-Thames. Professor Dimock will return to the United States at the end of the summer, 1954.

Professor Henry W. Ehrmann of the University of Colorado has been appointed a member of the National Selection Committee for Fulbright Awards for the current year. He returned recently from France where he prepared a study on French management organizations.

Two members of the American Political Science Association, Professor Russell H. Fitzgibbon of the University of California at Los Angeles and Professor Harry Kantor of the University of Florida, were the guests of the Costa Rican government at the ceremonies held in connection with the inauguration of the new president of Costa Rica, Jose Figueres. Professors Fitzgibbon and Kantor were invitados especiales. Over 600 diplomatic representatives and outstanding men of letters, scholarship, business, and other fields from all over the world attended the ceremonies.

Professor B. Mirkine-Guetzévitch has resumed his duties as Dean of the Faculty of Law and Political Science of the French Ecole Libre des Hautes Etudes in New York. He has recently returned from Paris where he served as a professor in the Institute of Advanced International Studies at the University of Paris, and in the Ecole Nationale d'Adminis- tration. He has also resumed the publication of the collection, La Vie Juridique des Peuples, of which he is the editor. Professor Mirkine-Guetzévitch was elected Vice-President of the New International Institute of Political Philosophy recently established at the Sorbonne.

Saul K. Padover, professor of political science on the Graduate Faculty, New School for Social Research, spent the fall of 1953 on a lecture tour of Southeast Asia. He lectured before universities, colleges, and civic groups in India, Rangoon, Mandalay, Bangkok, Kuala Lumpur, Penang, Saigon, and Hongkong. His topics included the American federal structure, the United States Supreme Court, the American concept of democracy, minorities, and the capitalist system. Professor Padover resumed his work at the New School in December.

Norman D. Palmer, professor of political science at the University of Pennsylvania, delivered lectures on "Indian Attitudes toward the United States" at a meeting of the World Affairs Council of Philadelphia on October 7, and at the Ursinus College Forum on November 11.

Leo C. Riethmayer, chairman of the department of political science at the University of Colorado, was elected in November to a six-year term on the Boulder City Council. For the past year he has served as Vice-Chairman of the Boulder County Planning Commission.

E. E. Schattschneider, of Wesleyan University, will serve as visiting scholar at the University of Georgia, Emory University, and Agnes Scott College during the first week of March, 1954. Professor Schattschneider's visit is being sponsored by the University Center in Georgia.

Leo Strauss, professor of philosophy at the University of Chicago, gave a series of Walgreen Foundation lectures at that institution during November on the subject "Machiavelli and Machiavellianism."

FACILITIES OF THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, DEPARTMENT OF STATE, AVAILABLE TO UNIVERSITIES AND COLLEGES

The Department of State is interested in cooperating with universities and colleges in their efforts to meet the need for widespread understanding of foreign policy problems. Among the services which the Department, through the Public Services Division, is prepared to offer in response to requests are: arranging for Department of State officers to speak to student, faculty, or community groups throughout the country, when it is possible for them to do so; holding policy briefings in the Department of State for interested groups; providing films and other visual media; issuing special background materials, other than Department of State publications, to meet particular needs.

The Department has cooperated with universities and colleges in holding two or three day regional conferences for the adult public from surrounding areas. These conferences have been devoted to a single foreign policy problem, or to a more general consideration of foreign policy. The Department has, on request, assisted with the planning, supplied relevant Department of State publications, and provided speakers. The Department welcomes the opportunity to discuss problems with the public and to learn the views of interested citizens. These conferences have been an exceptionally successful method of encouraging a two-way flow of information. Inquiries should be addressed to the Public Services Division, Department of State, Washington 25, D. C.

Many university and college libraries are on the Department's mailing list for publications and periodicals. In addition, nineteen regional distribution centers have been established throughout the country from which Department of State publications may be obtained. They are: (1) World Affairs Council of Northern California, 421 Powell Street, San Francisco 2, California; (2) University of Denver, Social Science Foundation, Denver 10, Colorado; (3) Chicago Council on Foreign Relations, 116 S. Michigan Avenue, Chicago 3, Illinois; (4) Thomas F. Cunningham Reference Library, International House, Gravier and Camp Streets, New Orleans 12, Louisiana; (5) Minnesota World Affairs Center, University of Minnesota, Minneapolis 14, Minnesota; (6) United Council on World Affairs, 355-A Boylston Street, Boston 16, Massachusetts; (7) Woodrow Wilson Foundation, 45 East Sixty-fifth Street, New York 21, New York; (8) Southeastern Association for Adult Education, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, North Carolina; (9) Council on World Affairs, 922 Society for Savings Building, Cleveland 14, Ohio; (10) University of Utah Library, Salt Lake City, Utah; (11) American Association for the United Nations, 909 Fourth Avenue, Seattle 4, Washington; (12)

International Center, University of Louisville, Louisville 8, Kentucky; (13) Institute of International Affairs, 1620 S.W. Park Avenue, Portland 1, Oregon; (14) Buffalo Council on World Affairs, Inc., 921 Genesee Building, Buffalo 2, New York; (15) Woodrow Wilson School of Foreign Affairs, University of Virginia, Charlottesville, Virginia; (16) World Affairs Council of Philadelphia, 3rd Floor Gallery, John Wanamaker Store, Thirteenth and Market Streets, Philadelphia 7, Pennsylvania; (17) Dallas Council on World Affairs, 2419 Maple Avenue, Dallas, Texas; (18) St. Louis Council on World Affairs, Inc., 511 Locust Street, St. Louis 1, Missouri; (19) American Association for the United Nations, Ambassador Hotel, Los Angeles, California.

Faculty members may request that their names be put on the mailing list of the Public Services Division for single copies of Department of State publications. Larger quantities may be ordered from the Superintendent of Documents, U. S. Government Printing Office, Washington 25, D. C. Subscriptions to the weekly Department of State Bulletin ($7.50 a year, single copies twenty cents), the bi-weekly Foreign Policy Briefs ($1.00 a year, single copies five cents), and the bi-monthly Field Reporter ($1.50 a year, single copies thirty cents), and orders for catalogues of State Department publications may also be placed with the Government Printing Office.

The Public Services Division as the division of the Department of State most actively engaged in working with the public will be glad to consider any requests which universities and colleges may send them for these services, and to work with them to serve their particular needs.—RICHARD FRIEDMAN, Chief, Organization Liaison Branch, Public Services Division.

APPOINTMENTS AND STAFF CHANGES

Willard F. Barber, formerly Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Latin American Affairs, recently transferred from the U. S. Embassy at Lima, Peru, where he was Counselor, to the U. S. Embassy at Bogota, Colombia, where he is serving as Chargé d'Affairs.

Paul Beckett has resumed his position as associate professor of public administration at the State College of Washington after a two-year leave of absence. While on leave, Professor Beckett was responsible for setting up and directing a new Department of Public Administration as part of a technical assistance program sponsored by the U. S. Technical Cooperation Administration at the American University of Beirut, Beirut, Lebanon.

Guthrie S. Birkhead returned to the faculty of the department of political science, Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, Syracuse University, after one year's leave as the first staff fellow of the National Municipal League.

Donald C. Blaisdell is visiting professor of political science for the academic year 1953-54 at the University of Florida. He has returned to the United States from a Department of State assignment in Geneva, Switzerland, where he was representative to international organizations with headquarters in Geneva.

Anthony T. Bouscaren left the University of San Francisco in July, 1953, to become Director of the Institute of Soviet and Communist Studies in Winnetka, Illinois. He lectured in the fall semester at Loyola University, and has accepted an appointment as chairman of the department of political science at Marquette University beginning February 1, 1954.

Donald W. Brandon, who was recently a fellow and teaching assistant at the University of California (Berkeley), has been appointed instructor in political science at the University of San Francisco.

John E. Burton, Vice-President—Business of Cornell University and Chairman of the New York State Power Authority, has been appointed a lecturer in public administration at the Cornell University School of Business and Public Administration.

Fred V. Cahill, Jr., recently on military leave from Yale University where he was assistant professor of political science, has been appointed professor of government at the University of Massachusetts. During his tour of military duty Professor Cahill was assigned to the Office of the Assistant Chief of Staff, G-2, Intelligence, Department of the Army.

Werner J. Cahnman, formerly with the Evaluation Staff of the Voice of America, has been appointed adviser to the Italian-American Student Exchange Program of the Institute of International Education.

Francis M. Carney, graduate student at the University of California (Los Angeles), has accepted an appointment as instructor in political science at the University of California (Riverside), effective in February, 1954.

Asher N. Christensen, of the University of Minnesota, is serving as a member of the faculty of the Salzburg Seminar in American Studies for the January session.

George A. Coddington, Jr., who completed his graduate work at the University of Geneva (The Graduate Institute of International Studies) in 1952, has been appointed a lecturer in the department of political science at the University of Pennsylvania.

James S. Coleman accepted an appointment as instructor in political science at the University of California (Los Angeles), effective in September, 1953.

Thomas I. Cook is serving as acting chairman of the department of political science at the Johns Hopkins University during the current academic year.

David Cooperman has been appointed teaching intern in the department of political science at the University of Minnesota under a grant from the Fund for the Advancement of Education.

Morton H. Couden, formerly of the City College of New York, is serving as an instructor in the department of political science at Washington University on a one-year appointment.

Claude B. Cross, who received his Ph.D. degree in political science from the State University of Iowa in August, 1953, has been appointed to the political science faculty of the State College of Washington.

Melvin G. de Chazeau, of the Cornell University School of Business and Public Administration, has been named a consultant to the President's Council of Economic Advisers in Washington.

Ithiel de Sola Pool, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, has been appointed visiting lecturer in political science at Yale University.

Karl W. Deutsch resumed his duties as professor of history and political science at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology after a year's leave of absence spent with the Center for Research on World Political Institutions at Princeton University.

Andreas Dorpalen, recipient of grants from the Guggenheim Foundation and the Institute for Advanced Study, is on leave of absence from St. Lawrence University during 1953-54.

Eugene Dvorin, graduate student at the University of California (Los Angeles), spent three months in Africa studying the new federation of Northern Rhodesia, Southern Rhodesia, and Nyasaland.

William Ebenstein, professor of politics at Princeton University, is on leave during the spring term to do research under a Ford Faculty Fellowship.

Lewis J. Edinger, formerly of the Woman's College of the University of North Carolina, has been appointed to an assistant professorship at the Air University, Maxwell Field, Alabama.

Willard H. Elsbree, assistant professor of government at Ohio University, was a member of the United States Delegation to the sixteenth session of the Economic and Social Council which met this past summer in Geneva, Switzerland.

Donald Farmer has been appointed teaching intern in the department of political science at the University of Minnesota under a grant from the Fund for the Advancement of Education.

John H. Ferguson, professor of political science at the Pennsylvania State University, is serving as Director of the Social Science Research Center at that institution. He is scheduled half-time in the department and half-time with the Research Center.

Leroy Ferguson, associate professor of social science and political science at Michigan State College, is on sabbatical leave during 1953-54 and is working with the Survey Research Center at the University of Michigan.

Jason Finkle, formerly a research assistant at the University of Michigan, has been appointed instructor in the department of political science at the University of Florida.

Julian Foster, a former tutor in New College, Oxford University, is presently serving half-time as a visiting lecturer in political science at the University of Michigan.

Robert S. Friedman, who completed requirements for the Ph.D. degree at the University of Illinois last summer, has accepted an appointment as research assistant in the Bureau of Governmental Research, University of Maryland.

Manuel R. García-Mora, assistant professor of political science at the University of Detroit, has been appointed vice-chairman of the department of political science at that institution.

Charles Gilbert, who has been making a case study of the legislative behavior of a United States Senator under a grant from the Social Science Research Council, spent the fall term on the staff of the department of political science at Swarthmore College.

Gilbert F. Gilchrist has been granted a renewal of his General Education Board Fellowship to continue his studies at the Johns Hopkins University.

William Goodman has been promoted to associate professor of political science at the University of Tennessee.

Luther G. Hagard, Jr., who was recently a member of the faculty at The Citadel, has accepted an appointment as assistant professor of government at West Texas State College.

Royal G. Hall is a visiting professor at Stetson University during 1953-54.

Philip S. Haring, formerly of the faculty of the School of Public Relations and Communications, Boston University, is teaching at Northwestern University during the current academic year.

Frederick H. Hartmann is on leave from the University of Florida for the academic year 1953-54 on a Fulbright award. He is spending the year at the University of Bonn, Germany, on research.

William C. Havard has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the University of Florida, succeeding Hugh Marshall who has accepted an appointment at Stanford University. In addition to teaching, Professor Havard will participate in the program of the University of Florida Public Administration Clearing Service.

Paul M. Herzog, formerly Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, has been appointed Associate Dean of the Harvard Graduate School of Public Administration. Mr. Herzog is making a survey, financed by a three-year grant from the Carnegie Corporation, of programs of training for the public service.

Duane W. Hill, who received his Ph.D. degree in political science from the State University of Iowa in August, 1953, has been appointed to the staff of Bradley University.

Ralph T. Jans has been appointed lecturer in political science and research associate in the Institute of Public Administration at the University of Michigan for 1953-54.

Henry L. Janssen, recently of the University of California (Santa Barbara Campus), has been appointed assistant professor of political science at San Diego State College.

Claudius O. Johnson resumed his duties at the State College of Washington on February 1 after a year's leave of absence during which time he served as a Fulbright lecturer at the Universities of Sydney and Melbourne in Australia.

Donald Bruce Johnson, of the University of Iowa, was promoted to assistant professor of political science, effective July 1, 1953.

Evans C. Johnson has accepted an appointment as assistant professor on the faculty of Stetson University.

Ned V. Joy, formerly of Princeton University, has joined the political science faculty of San Diego State College as an assistant professor.

Thomas E. Joyner, recently of Champlain College, has accepted an appointment as acting associate professor of political science at the University of Tennessee.

John H. Kautsky, formerly of the Office of Intelligence Research, Department of State, joined the Center for International Studies, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, as a research associate last August.

Jarold A. Kieffer, who has recently been serving as Assistant to the Executive Officer, Office of Defense Mobilization, has been appointed Assistant to Commissioner Arthur S. Flemming, a member of the new Hoover Commission.

Robert S. Lancaster has been promoted to an associate professorship in political science at the University of the South.

John W. Lederle, of the University of Michigan, has taken leave of absence as director of the Institute of Public Administration and has been appointed by Governor G. Mennen Williams as Controller, Michigan Department of Administration.

Edward H. Litchfield, Dean of the Cornell University School of Business and Public Administration, is serving as a consultant to the Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, in connection with the Commission's research concerning all federal programs that involve expenditures of funds in cooperation with state and local governments.

John Logue, who is pursuing his doctorate at the University of Chicago, has been appointed instructor of political science at the University of Notre Dame.

Lewis C. Mainzer has been appointed instructor in government at the University of Massachusetts. For the past two years Mr. Mainzer has been engaged in research in Washington, D. C., on research policy formation in the Department of Agriculture.

Gerard J. Mangone has been promoted to the rank of associate professor of political science at Swarthmore College. During the summer he was in charge of political orientation aboard student ships for the Council of Student Travel.

Dean E. McHenry, professor of political science at the University of California (Los Angeles), has received a Fulbright appointment to teach at the University of Western Australia in Perth and to do research on Australian politics at Canberra. Professor McHenry will be on sabbatical leave from U.C.L.A. in 1954.

William McIntosh has been advanced to an associate professorship in political science and head of the department of political science at Tennessee Agricultural and Industrial State University, Nashville, Tennessee. He was granted the Ph.D. degree from the University of Minnesota in June, 1953.

Frederick C. Mosher, of Syracuse University, has been appointed Editor of the Public Administration Review.

Rita W. Nealon, of New York University, has been advanced to the rank of associate professor and has been appointed Director of the Citizenship Clearing House for Southern New York.

Charles R. Nixon, associate professor of political science at the University of California (Los Angeles), has received a one-year appointment at the University of Natal in Durban, Union of South Africa. Financed by a grant from the Carnegie Corporation, Professor Nixon will assist in the formation of a program of advanced training in social science research which has been inaugurated by the Union's national council for social research. During 1954, Mr. Nixon will be on a special leave from U.C.L.A.

Marbury Bladen Ogle has been named head of the reorganized department of history, government and philosophy at Purdue University.

Gene Overstreet, instructor of political science at Michigan State College, is on leave during 1953-54 to study Indian political parties under a Ford grant.

Frank P. Piskor has been advanced to the rank of associate professor in the department of political science, Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, Syracuse University.

Otto C. Press is serving as a teaching intern in political science at the University of Minnesota during 1953-54 under a special grant from the Fund for the Advancement of Education.

Henry Reiff, chairman of the department of history and government at St. Lawrence University, is on leave of absence this year to teach at Ibrahim University, Cairo, Egypt, under the Fulbright program.

Bennett M. Rich, visiting associate professor of political science at the University of Michigan, has been appointed acting director of the Institute of Public Administration.

Nelson M. Robinson, formerly assistant professor of political science at Albright College, has been appointed assistant professor of political science and acting associate director of the Bureau of Public Administration at the University of Tennessee.

Lester G. Seligman has resigned his position at the University of Chicago to accept an assistant professorship in the department of political science at the University of Oregon, where he will participate in the social science honors program and teach in the field of American political behavior.

Ruth C. Silva, assistant professor of political science at the Pennsylvania State University, has returned from a year's leave of absence as a Fulbright exchange professor at the University of Cairo, Egypt.

Theodore H. Skinner has been appointed Acting Director of Evening Studies at Washington Square College, New York University, for the academic year 1953-54. He is replacing Professor Morley Ayearst who is doing research at the University College of the West Indies on a Fulbright award.

Bruce Lannes Smith, until recently associate professor of political science in the Foreign Service Institute, Department of State, is now an associate professor of political science at Michigan State College. He continues to serve as the American editor of International Political Science Abstracts.

David G. Smith has accepted an appointment as instructor in the department of political science at Swarthmore College.

Albert Somit has been appointed Director of the Falk Research Program in Political Participation at New York University. He replaces Professor Ray F. Harvey who is now serving as Director of the new Office of the Budget at the University.

Frank Sorauf, who received the Ph.D. degree at the University of Wisconsin in 1953, was appointed in September as instructor of political science at the Pennsylvania State University.

Robert B. Stauffer has been promoted to an assistant professorship in the department of government at the University of Hawaii.

Kenneth W. Thompson, associate professor of political science at Northwestern University, is on leave for the year 1953-54 to serve as adviser in international relations to the Rockefeller Foundation.

Tang Tsou is serving as a lecturer in political science at the University of Utah during the winter and spring quarters.

Robert W. Tucker has been appointed assistant professor of political science at the Johns Hopkins University. He assumed his new duties at the beginning of the second semester.

Hubertus J. van Mook, Director of Public Administration, Technical Assistance Administration, United Nations, has been appointed a visiting professor of comparative public administration at the Cornell University School of Business and Public Administration during 1953-54.

IN MEMORIAM

Oliver Peter Field died suddenly at his home in Bloomington, Indiana, of a heart attack on October 22, 1953, at the age of fifty-six.

He was born of Norwegian ancestry in Fergus Falls, Minnesota, October 21, 1897. He acquired an interest in people and public discussion in the forum of his father's grocery store and at the age of fourteen contributed to the success of his father's mayoralty campaign by writing speeches. His bent for extracting the most from circumstances was shown by his practice of keeping live fish in a tub from which he could supply, at a price, such fishermen as were reluctant to return home empty-handed. Poor vision, precarious health, delay in learning English until he started school, and the necessity of working his way through college were obstacles which he successfully overcame.

After receiving the Bachelor's degree from St. Olaf College in 1919 and the Master's from the University of Minnesota in 1924, Oliver Field came to Indiana University in the latter year as an instructor in political science, advancing to assistant professor in 1926. He received in 1927 the Bachelor of Laws degree from the Indiana University School of Law. A Sterling Fellowship enabled him to study in the Yale Law School, where he earned the degree of Doctor of Jurisprudence in 1928. He then joined the faculty of the University of Minnesota, where, except for a year as lecturer in government at Harvard University, he was a member of the department of political science, serving as full professor from 1931 to 1939. He returned to the government department at Indiana University in the fall of 1939, where he served as acting chairman during the two years preceding his death.

Early in his career Professor Field's capacity for scholarship was demonstrated; the last of his many writings appeared only shortly before his death. His first book was a collaborative text in state government. The second was also a text, the widely used Cases and Authorities on Constitutional Law. These were followed by a monograph, The Effect of an Unconstitutional Statute. He then turned to the developing field of administrative law and there established another reputation, his chief work among several smaller monographs and many articles being Civil Service Law in the United States. In later years, Professor Field's interests included the broader aspects of political science. He found that the study of Utopias afforded a unique insight into political motivation. He was also engaged in an examination of the literature of various cultures concerning the training of the King. Although these inquiries were far advanced, the responsibilities of the departmental chairmanship had intervened to preclude further progress.

Professor Field's attainments in public law and political science were early recognized by the American Political Science Association. He participated frequently in its programs and his counsel was often sought on its policies. He served the Association in an official capacity on the Board of Editors, as a member of the Executive Council, and as a Vice-President.

Oliver Field entertained a warm sentiment for Indiana University and for the Bloomington community, a feeling which found a willing and hearty response among his wide circle of friends on the campus and in the town. Two of his writings are devoted to the University. One is an account of political science at Indiana University from 1829 to 1951 and the other, still to be published, a history of Indiana University during World War II. These writings he regarded as the tribute of an alumnus to his alma mater.

Oliver Field's personality was one of many facets. It is not alone his keen insight into the ways of men, his understanding of the society about him, or the high distinction accorded to him by his profession for which he will be remembered. It is these things and more: his kindly spirit, his wise counsel, his confidence in the common man, his patient uncomplaining endurance of handicap, his contagious zeal for learning, his unconquerable optimism. All of these things together make him memorable to those who were privileged to know him.—EDWARD H. BUEHRIG and JOHN E. STONER.

Hans Leonhardt, professor of political science at Michigan State College, died in Chicago, Illinois, on September 11, 1953, at the age of fifty-two. He had been in ill health for the last two years of his life and was finishing a sabbatical leave from Michigan State College, having returned from Europe a few weeks prior to his death.

A native of Dusseldorf, Germany, Professor Leonhardt had been for many years a maritime lawyer in the former Free City of Danzig. After the advent of the Nazi regime in Germany he acted as legal advisor to the opposition parties in Danzig, negotiating frequently on their behalf between 1934 and 1937 with the High Commissioner of the League of Nations. Following the Nazi successes in Danzig, Professor Leonhardt came to the United States in 1938.

Dr. Leonhardt was educated in Germany at the Universities of Freiberg, Munich, and Berlin. He was a former judge in Dusseldorf and Elberfeld. After coming to the United States he entered the graduate school of the University of Chicago. His doctoral thesis, initiated under the direction of Quincy Wright, was later published under the title The Nazi Conquest of Danzig.

Professor Leonhardt came to Michigan State College in 1942 as an instructor. By 1949 he had advanced to the rank of professor. In recognition of his previous legal experience and his many services to the Michigan community he was given an honorary membership in the Ingham County (Michigan) Bar. His crowded classes, his reputation as a brilliant interpreter of international politics earned by his frequent off-campus lectures, and his contributions to professional journals attest to his artistry as a stimulating teacher and to his reputation as a public servant and scholar. But perhaps his colleagues at Michigan State will best remember him for his integrity and his courageous resistance to attacks upon the dignity of the individual.—CARROLL HAWKINS.

SALE OF REPRINTS OF REVIEW ARTICLES

As previously announced, reprints of articles appearing in current issues of the REVIEW will no longer be obtainable at the Washington Office. As in the past, authors will be supplied with a substantial number of copies of reprints. In order to dispose of reprints on hand, the Washington Office is offering copies of any of these reprints at ten cents each. The following titles are available:

September, 1953

La Palombara, "The Italian Elections and the Problem of Representation" Frischknecht, "The Democratization of Administration: The Farmer Committee System"
Davis, "Reflections of a Law Professor on Instruction and Research in Public Administration"
Thompson, "Collective Security Re-examined"
Cassinelli, "The Law of Oligarchy"
Davey, "The Legislative Council Movement in the United States, 1933-1953"
Laves, "Increasing the Number of Americans Potentially Available for Foreign Assignments"
Hastings, "The Independent Voter in 1952: A Study of Pittsfield, Massachusetts"
Rourke, "Doctoral Dissertations in Political Science in American Universities" Overacker, "Publications on Australia Useful to a Political Scientist"

June, 1953

Pritchett, "Libertarian Motivations on the Vinson Court"
Lipson, "The Two-Party System in British Politics"
Campbell, Gurin, and Miller, "Political Issues and the Vote: November, 1952"
Holcombe, "An American View of European Union"
Egger, "Nature Over Art: No More Local Finance"
Ostrom, "State Administration of Natural Resources in the West"
Scammon, "British By-Elections, 1952"
Khadduri, "The Role of the Military in Middle East Politics"
Wright, "Agrarian Syndicalism in Postwar France"

March, 1953

Leich, "The Hoover Commission's Personnel Recommendations"
Miller, "Party Preference and Attitudes"
Bosworth, "The Politics of Management Improvement in the States"
Coker, "Some Present-Day Critics of Liberalism"
Leiserson, "Notes on the Theory of Public Opinion Formation"
Cook and Moos, "The American Idea of International Interest"
Adams and Barile, "The Implementation of the Italian Constitution"
Fellman, "Constitutional Law in 1951-1952"
Düll, "The Japanese General Election of 1952"

December, 1952

Deener, "Judicial Review in Modern Constitutional Systems"
Pollock, "The Electoral System of the Federal Republic of Germany"
Duverger, "Public Opinion and Political Parties in France"
MacRae, "The Relations Between Roll Call Votes and Constituencies in the Massachusetts House of Representatives" Hocking, "Problems of World Order"
Hartz, "The Whig Tradition in America and Europe"
Kort, "The Issue of a Science of Politics in Utilitarian Thought"
SSRC Interuniversity Summer Seminar, "Research in Political Behavior"

September, 1952

Leibholz, "The Federal Constitutional Court in Germany and the Southwest Case"
Pennock, "Responsiveness, Responsibility and Majority Rule"
Adrian, "Some General Characteristics of Nonpartisan Elections"
Eldersveld, "The Independent Vote"
Appleby, "Roosevelt's Third-Term Decision"
Davies, "Some Relations between Events and Attitudes"
Kohn, "Pan-Slavism and World War II"
Catlin, "Contemporary British Political Thought"
Miller, "A Selective Survey of Literature on Mongolia"

June, 1952

Dimock, Rossiter et al, "Goals for Political Science: A Discussion"
Kort, "The Qualifications of Aristotle's Theory of Revolution"
Pierce, "France Reopens the Constitutional Debate"
Steiner, "Recent Literature on Chinese Communist Party History"
Nicholas, "British General Election of 1951"
Milne, "Britain's Economic Planning Machinery"
Huitt, "Federal Regulation of the Uses of Natural Gas"
Carroll, "Recent German Publications and German Foreign Policy"
Cook and Moos, "Foreign Policy: The Realism of Idealism"
Hawley and Dexter, "Recent Political Science Research in American Universities"
Kallenbach, "Constitutional Limitations on Re-eligibility of National and State Chief Executives" Latham, "The Group Basis of Politics"

March, 1952

Snider, "American County Government"
Fellman, "Constitutional Law in 1950-1951"
Mason, "American Individualism: Fact and Fiction"
Evans, "The Colombia-Peruvian Asylum Case"
Tucker, "Professor Morgenthau's Theory of Political 'Realism' "
Frenkel-Brunswik, "Interaction of Psychological and Sociological Factors in Political Behavior" Ehrmann, "The French Peasant and Communism"

December, 1951

Fesler, Hartz, et al., "Goals for Political Science: A Discussion"
Kammerer, "Record of Congress in Committee Staffing"
Epstein, "British Labor Left and U. S. Foreign Policy" Feely, "Analysis of Administrative Purpose"
Rice and Kappel, "Strategic Intelligence and Publication of Statistics"
Dishman, "Public Interest in Emergency Labor Disputes"
Bone, "New Party Associations in the West"
Hall, "An Open Letter Proposing a School of Cultural Legal Studies"
Pennock, "Political Science and Political Philosophy"
Odegard, "Variations on a Familiar Theme"
Kenyon, "Where Paine Went Wrong"

In the list of panel papers on pages 1237-38 of the December, 1953 issue of the REVIEW, incorrect titles were given for two papers. The correct titles are as follows:

Sherman, Harvey, "United States Technical Assistance in Public Administration."
Tickner, F. J., "The United Nations Programme of Technical Assistance in Public Administration."

OFFICERS OF THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

President

RALPH J. BUNCHE
United Nations

President-Elect

CHARLES MCKINLEY
Reed College

Vice-Presidents

TAYLOR COLE
Duke University

J. A. C. GRANT
University of California
(Los Angeles)

CLAUDIUS O. JOHNSON
State College of Washington

Secretary

HARVEY C. MANSFIELD
The Ohio State University

Treasurer

EDWARD H. LITCHFIELD
Cornell University

Executive Director

JOHN GANGE
1785 Massachusetts Ave., N. W.
Washington 6, D. C.

Managing Editor American Political Science Review

HUGH L. ELSBREE
Library of Congress

COUNCIL

Above-named Officers ex officio

WALTER H. BENNETT
University of Alabama
HUGH A. BONE
University of Washington
ROBERT A. DAHL
Yale University
DAVID FELLMAN
University of Wisconsin
VICTOR JONES
Wesleyan University
JACK W. PELTASON
University of Illinois
EMMETTE S. REDFORD
University of Texas
CLINTON ROSSITER
Cornell University

MANNING J. DAUER
University of Florida
EARL LATHAM
Amherst College
ARNAUD LEAVELLE
Stanford University
DAYTON D. MCKEAN
University of Colorado
J. ROLAND PENNOCK
Swarthmore College
C. HERMAN PRITCHETT
University of Chicago
WALLACE S. SAYRE
College of the City of New York
DWIGHT WALDO
University of California (Berkeley)

FORMER PRESIDENTS

FRANK J. GOODNOW
ALBERT SHAW
FREDERIC N. JUDSON
JAMES BRYCE
A. LAWRENCE LOWELL
WOODROW WILSON
SIMON E. BALDWIN
ALBERT BUSHNELL HART
W. W. WILLOUGHBY
JOHN BASSETT MOORE
ERNST FREUND
JESSE MACY
MUNRO SMITH
HENRY JONES FORD
PAUL S. REINSCH
LEO S. ROWE

WILLIAM A. DUNNING
HARRY A. GARFIELD
JAMES W. GARNER
CHARLES E. MERRIAM
CHARLES A. BEARD
WILLIAM B. MUNRO
JESSE S. REEVES
JOHN A. FAIRLIE
BENJAMIN F. SHAMBAUGH
EDWARD S. CORWIN
WILLIAM F. WILLOUGHBY
ISIDOR LOEB
WALTER J. SHEPARD
FRANCIS W. COKER
ARTHUR N. HOLCOMBE
THOMAS REED POWELL

CLARENCE A. DYKSTRA
CHARLES GROVE HAINES
ROBERT C. BROOKS
FREDERIC A. OGG
WILLIAM ANDERSON
ROBERT E. CUSHMAN
LEONARD D. WHITE
JOHN M. GAUS
WALTER F. DODD
ARTHUR W. MACMAHON
HENRY R. SPENCER
QUINCY WRIGHT
JAMES K. POLLOCK
PETER H. ODEGARD
LUTHER H. GULICK
PENDLETON HERRING

“OGG and RAY”

A Complete and Detailed Presentation

INTRODUCTION TO AMERICAN GOVERNMENT

10th EDITION

Comprehensive but Less Detailed

ESSENTIALS OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENT

7th EDITION

A Study of the National Government Only

INTRODUCTION TO AMERICAN GOVERNMENT THE NATIONAL GOVERNMENT

10th EDITION

APPLETON-CENTURY-CROFTS

THE LETTERS OF THEODORE ROOSEVELT

VOLUMES VII AND VIII: THE DAYS OF ARMAGEDDON

Selected and Edited by ELTING E. MORISON. The eventful last ten years of Roosevelt's life in two volumes of letters which complete "a record which no future biographer or historian of the era can afford to ignore."—Amy Loveman

Volumes I, II—The Years of Preparation, 1868-1900

Volumes III, IV—The Square Deal, 1901-1905

Volumes V, VI—The Big Stick, 1905-1909

Volumes VII, VIII—The Days of Armageddon, 1908-1919

Each two volume set, $20.00; All eight volumes, $75.00

The REPUBLICAN ROOSEVELT

By JOHN MORTON BLUM. The Associate Editor of The Letters of Theodore Roosevelt presents a vigorous new interpretation of Roosevelt the conservative, the professional Republican politician, and the successful leader of men—and of Republican Party problems and politics in that critical period.

Coming April 12, $3.50.

PROFESSIONAL PEOPLE IN ENGLAND

By ROY LEWIS and ANGUS MAUDE. What is a "profession"? And what are the problems and the future of the professional man—or woman? Here is a witty and profound social history of our time in England—"The state as a client," "Professional people in business," "The disappearing clergy"—which is pointedly relevant to conditions in the U. S. $4.00

TERROR AND PROGRESS—USSR

SOME SOURCES OF CHANGE AND STABILITY IN THE SOVIET DICTATORSHIP

By BARRINGTON MOORE, JR. How can you judge future Soviet policy and direction? Here is an evaluation of possible lines of development, and of the conditions under which each might arise and which each would in turn produce. Here are the pressures—such as mass terror—imposed by the Soviet system of control, and the counterpressures they generate among workers, farmers, intellectuals. With data gleaned from interviews with Soviet refugees and a pioneer survey of Soviet technical journals. Published March 31. $4.50

CHINA'S RESPONSE TO THE WEST

A DOCUMENTARY SURVEY, 1839-1923

By SSU-YÜ TENG and JOHN K. FAIRBANK. How did Chinese leaders of this past century react to the influx of the West and the rise of a new ideology? Here for the first time are key statements—tracing the great ideological change which has affected one-fifth of mankind. Here is a key to full understanding of Communist China. April, $6.75

The Companion volume, RESEARCH GUIDE for "China's Response to the West," paper covers, May, $4.00

At your bookstore, or

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

44 Francis Avenue, Cambridge 38, Massachusetts

NEW

Local Government and Administration

Principles and Problems

James E. Pate, College of William and Mary

Covering both municipal and county government, this stimulating book at once helps every student to become an informed and active citizen of his community and lays the foundation for future courses of study for those students who plan to go into government at the local level. The discussion of principles is thorough, accurate, and fully illustrated with examples of actual practices.

The Great Powers and Eastern Europe

John A. Lukacs

Chestnut Hill College and LaSalle College

"... a valuable narrative and analysis of events in a relatively misunderstood area by a man who escaped from behind the Iron Curtain in 1946. ... The author has a dramatic sense and a lively style. ... His account is generally impartial, scholarly, and based on a very wide reading of documents and memoirs. ..."

—Sidney B. Fay, Harvard College

Roots of Political Behavior

Introduction to Government and Politics

Richard Carlton Snyder and H. Hubert Wilson
Princeton University

"I have rarely seen a collection of readings which was so intriguing in its approach and so judiciously selected and integrated."

—Roger H. Wells, Bryn Mawr College

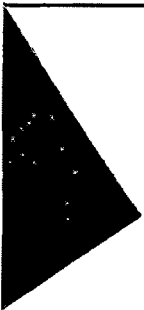

American Book Company

COLLEGE DIVISION

55 Fifth Avenue
New York 3, N.Y.

Cincinnati • Chicago
Boston • Atlanta
Dallas • San Francisco

RECENT BOOKS IN POLITICAL SCIENCE

THE ADVICE AND CONSENT OF THE SENATE

by Joseph P. Harris.

A study of a key function of the U. S. Senate combining a factual review of all major conflicts over Presidential appointments from Washington to Truman with an examination of the customs, rules, and practices of the Senate in dealing with Presidential nominations. 470 pages $5.00

LAW AND POLITICS IN THE WORLD COMMUNITY:

Essays on Hans Kelsen's Pure Theory and Related Problems in International Law

Compiled and edited by George A. Lipsky.

Seventeen teachers and writers from around the world contribute to this symposium on the central features of Hans Kelsen's teachings in international law, public law, and legal philosophy. 394 pages $6.00

THE WHITE UMBRELLA:

Indian Political Thought from Manu to Ghandi

by D. Mackenzie Brown.

A broad, documented survey of ancient and modern Hindu thought which interprets for the Western reader one of the world's oldest systems of political science. 220 pages $3.75

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA PRESS

Address: Berkeley 4, California

COMPARATIVE POLITICAL INSTITUTIONS

By Daniel Wit. A fresh, functional approach to comparative government. "Very original and long overdue in its organization by principal problems of government."—Frank Munk, Reed College. $4.75

MAN AND MODERN SOCIETY

By Karl de Schweinitz, Jr., and Kenneth W. Thompson. A well-organized and stimulating group of selections by eminent social thinkers. "... essential reading for anyone who wishes to understand the social, economic, and political problems of the modern world."—Dr. T. C. Bryan, North Georgia College. $5.25

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT

By William Anderson and Edward W. Weidner. Fourth edition, 1953. A complete re-orientation with special emphasis on the operational characteristics of our national government. "An excellent text . . . well-written, helpfully illustrated, and with adequate coverage of the subject."—Mark Mohler, Skidmore College. $6.50

THE PEOPLE, POLITICS, AND THE POLITICIAN

By A. N. Christensen and E. M. Kirkpatrick. A treasury of the foremost writings on the practical aspects of government administrations, this new, brief edition contains the 40 best of the original readings and 16 new selections. Paper only, $2.90

CONGRESS AT WORK

By Stephen K. Bailey and Howard D. Samuel. The dynamic inside story of our highest legislative body and how it operates, depicted in actual case histories. "... alive, illuminating, informative."—James A. Burns, Williams College. $4.10

A COLLEGE TEXT IN AMERICAN NATIONAL GOVERNMENT

By Harold R. Bruce. An exceptionally well-organized presentation of the national government, written in a highly readable style. "... a splendid job, excellently written and eminently sound."—Valentine Jobst, III, University of Illinois. $5.75

AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL DECISIONS

By Charles Fairman. Presents 36 fundamental Constitutional decisions, together with a penetrating analysis of their significance. $3.00

Supplement, 1952, .30

HENRY HOLT AND COMPANY
383 Madison Avenue, New York 17

Check list of Basic and Supplementary Texts for Political Science Courses

✓	AMERICAN STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT By Clyde F. Snider	639 pp., $5.50
✓	Introduction to MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT AND ADMINISTRATION By Arthur W. Bromage	677 pp., $5.50
✓	BASIC ISSUES OF AMERICAN DEMOCRACY By Hillman M. Bishop and Samuel Hendel 2nd EDITION	323 pp., $2.25
✓	LEADING CONSTITUTIONAL DECISIONS By Robert E. Cushman 9th EDITION	395 pp., $3.25
✓	THE AMERICAN PROBLEM OF GOVERNMENT By Chester C. Maxey 5th EDITION	651 pp., $5.50
✓	SAIT'S AMERICAN PARTIES AND ELECTIONS By Howard R. Penniman 5th EDITION	574 pp., $5.00
✓	GETTELL'S HISTORY OF POLITICAL THOUGHT By Lawrence C. Wanlass 2nd EDITION	418 pp., $5.00
✓	INTERNATIONAL LAW 3rd EDITION By Charles G. Fenwick	714 pp., $5.50
✓	THE LAW OF NATIONS 2nd EDITION By Herbert W. Briggs	1008 pp., $8.00
✓	DOCUMENTS OF AMERICAN HISTORY By Henry Steele Commager 5th EDITION	750 pp., $5.50
✓	SELECTIONS FROM THE FEDERALIST By Henry Steele Commager	Paperbound, 145 pages, $.45

APPLETON-CENTURY-CROFTS

Publishers of the New Century Cyclopedia of Names

35 West 32nd Street, New York 1, N. Y.

Revised and Enlarged
POLITICS AMONG NATIONS

by Hans J. Morgenthau of The University of Chicago

It is with special pride that ALFRED A. KNOFF, Inc. announces the forthcoming publication of a revised and considerably enlarged edition of this important work. Nearly one third of the book has been rewritten, a great deal of fresh material has been added, and the entire text has been brought up to date. A set of new and distinguished maps has been included, and a useful teaching aid, in the form of a unique Historical Glossary, has been added.

Ready in April; details to be announced.

Examination copies on request

ALFRED A. KNOFF, Publisher

501 Madison Avenue College Department New York 22

HOUGHTON
MIFFLIN COMPANY

A spring publication

ORGANIZING FOR PEACE

International Organization in World Affairs

In this new book, international organizations are studied as part of the total pattern of world political, economic, and ideological pressures, not in legalistic or idealistic isolation. Emphasis is placed on the continuous development of international organization, indicating the direct relationship between the operations of contemporary organizations and their predecessors. Special attention is given to regional organizations, particularly in the European-Atlantic areas. The lively style of Organizing for Peace provides absorbing reading for students and interested citizens alike.

BOSTON
NEW YORK
CHICAGO
DALLAS
SAN FRANCISCO

Daniel S. Cheever

Harvard University

H. Field Haviland, Jr.

Haverford College

The Catholic Church in World Affairs

Edited by Waldemar Gurian and M. A. Fitzsimons

April 3, 420 pp. $4.25

Here is both a realistic and a scholarly account of Catholicism in the contemporary world. Edited by Waldemar Gurian and M. A. Fitzsimons and containing articles by sixteen outstanding scholars, the book covers a wide range and variety of material. The first half of the book deals largely with current issues—the Church-State problem, the Popes and peace in the twentieth century, Papal diplomacy, and the new situation of continental protestantism after World War II. The latter half of the book goes into Catholicism in individual countries—England, Germany, France, Italy, Spain, Latin America and the United States.

Pan-Slavism: Its History and Ideology

By Hans Kohn

Carlton Hayes in the January, 1954, American Historical Review writes of the author: "For with his Prague background, his knowledge of eastern as well as western European languages, his perseverance in research and flair for synthesis, he has here produced, in very readable English, a kind of classic on the history of Pan-Slavism. It supersedes the hitherto standard work (in German) of Alfred Fischel, which was published in 1919. It is more broadly based on original sources, better organized, more critical, and, in view of contemporary developments in eastern Europe, far more illuminating. It casts light no less helpful to statesmen and publicists than to scholars."

$6.25

Bolshevism: An Introduction to Soviet Communism

By Waldemar Gurian

". . . One of the most instructive and authoritative studies of Soviet Communism we possess in English . . . Gurian is eminently successful in maintaining a creative tension between the conceptual and historical aspects of his analysis, so that the reader carries away with him not only an understanding of the "idea" of Soviet Communism, but also a feeling for the ever-shifting manifestations of the "idea" through three and a half decades."—Will Herberg in The Commentary. "This, to my knowledge, is the best analytical history of Bolshevism."—Hannah Arendt in The Partisan Review.

$3.25

University of Notre Dame Press
Notre Dame, Indiana

outstanding government texts =====

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT in THEORY and PRACTICE

By Carr, Morrison, Bernstein & Snyder. This highly praised treatment of the national government may also be used as an introduction to political science. It includes extended treatments of congressional investigations, civil liberties, and foreign relations. 1094 pp., $5.50

STATE and LOCAL GOVERNMENT

By Joseph E. McLean. This recently published supplement represents an expansion of AMERICAN GOVERNMENT IN THEORY AND PRACTICE: NATIONAL GOVERNMENT. It presents state and local government with stress on intergovernmental relations and current trends and problems. 192 pp. When used with the text: $.50. When purchased separately: $1.85.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

By Dimock & Dimock. An introductory text with a practical approach, this book presents the subject systematically with stress on principles. Summaries of case studies are provided throughout. 531 pp., $5.00

===== and supplementary readings =====

KNEIER & FOX:

Readings in Municipal Government and Administration

486 pp., $3.90

NIGRO:

Public Administration: Readings and Documents

493 pp., $4.50

FELLMAN:

Readings in American National Government

Revised Edition. 399 pp., $2.75

LANCASTER & BRECKENRIDGE:

Readings in American State Government

347 pp., $2.50

COMBINED EDITION OF THE ABOVE: Readings in American National and State Government by Fellman, Lancaster & Breckenridge. 781 pp., $3.75

RINEHART & COMPANY

232 madison avenue

new york 16, n.y.

Announcing the most impressive analysis yet made of a national election by the survey method

THE VOTER DECIDES

by DR. ANGUS CAMPBELL, Director, Survey Research Center, University of Michigan; GERALD GURIN, Study Director, Survey Research Center, University of Michigan; and WARREN E. MILLER, Study Director, Survey Research Center, University of Michigan.

This new book analyzes the thinking of the voter in the 1952 election through use of the sample survey. . .

"... it develops a new framework for the analysis of electoral decisions . . . (which) aids in explaining the election of 1952 . . . it also contributes toward a better understanding of electoral behavior in general."—V. O. Key, Jr. in the Foreword

This survey was planned and data were gathered and analyzed to meet the kinds of problems that concern both the political scientist and the social psychologist.

Part I: Describes the behaviors and attitudes of the voters in the 1952 election. Studies such questions as: What was the process by which people made up their minds in 1952? What was the extent and nature of public interest and participation in the campaign? How did groups of people—occupation categories, income levels, unionists, metropolitan dwellers, and so forth—vote? How did people perceive parties and candidates?

Part II: Three independent variables are established (party identification, candidate orientation, and issue orientation). The interrelationships of these variables in the 1952 polling are studied. By the identification and measurement of these variables, a means has been found to explain to a considerable degree variations in participation and variations in the direction of the vote. The concepts and categories of this theory are of sufficiently high level of generality to fit a wide range of voting situations.

Part III: Appendices—(1) Sense of Political Efficacy; (2) Sense of Citizen Duty; (3) Primary Group Influences and Political Behavior; (4) The Perceived Political Relevance of Demographic Groups; (5) The Questionnaires; and (6) Sample Design.

To be published in late May.

Probable Price: $4.75

GROUP DYNAMICS: Research and Theory

edited by Dorwin Cartwright and Alvin Zander

The first authoritative research findings on group functions and patterns. $6.00

Write for full details

Evanston
Illinois

Row, Peterson and Company

White Plains
New York

MATHEMATICAL THINKING IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

EDITED BY PAUL F. LAZARSFELD

- I Introduction by Paul F. Lazarsfeld
- II Probability Models for Analyzing Time Changes in Attitudes by T. W. Anderson
- III Two Models: Imitative Behavior and Distribution of Status by Nicolas Rashevsky
- IV An Expository Analysis of Some of Rashevsky's Social Behavior Models by James S. Coleman
- V Probability in the Social Sciences by Jacob Marschak
- VI The Principal Components of Scalable Attitudes by Louis Guttman
- VII A New Approach to Factor Analysis: The Radex by Louis Guttman
- VIII A Conceptual Introduction to Latent Structure Analysis by Paul F. Lazarsfeld
- IX Some Strategic Considerations in the Construction of Social Science Models by Herbert A. Simon

$10.00

STUDIES IN THE SCOPE AND METHOD OF "THE AUTHORITARIAN PERSONALITY"

EDITED BY RICHARD CHRISTIE AND MARIE JAHODA

- I Introduction by Marie Jahoda
- II Authoritarianism: 'Right' and 'Left' by Edward A. Shils
- III "The Authoritarian Personality": A Methodological Critique by Herbert A. Hyman and Paul B. Sheatsley
- IV Authoritarianism Reexamined by Richard Christie
- V The Selective Effect of Personality on Political Participation by Harold D. Lasswell
- VI Further Explorations by a Contributor to "The Authoritarian Personality" by Else Frenkel-Brunswik

$4.50

We will be pleased to send you our complete catalogue of books in print. Both these books will be on sale at bookstores on March 1, or may be ordered directly from The Free Press.

THE FREE PRESS
GLENCOE, ILLINOIS

MUHLENBERG • Philadelphia

THE DILEMMA OF CHURCH AND STATE

by

G. Elson Ruff

An analysis of the dilemma within the democratic form of government, describing the difficulty in arriving at a reasonable balance between the church and state in modern society. 110 pages. At All Book Stores $1.50

HARPER

NEW POLITICAL SCIENCE
TEXTS ~ SPRING 1954

A Preface to the Social Sciences
POWER, ORDER, and the ECONOMY

By MARBURY B. OGLE, JR., LOUIS SCHNEIDER, JAY WILSON WILEY
Purdue University

This outstanding basic text for social science orientation is an outgrowth of Purdue's well-known course, developed after an intensive study of what had proved successful in many institutions. The authors are, respectively, a political scientist, a sociologist, and an economist. Focusing on the key concepts of power, order, and economy, it provides a skillfully integrated picture of the entirety of the social world—a clearly written conceptual and analytical treatment, presented with a wealth of descriptive data.

854 pages

$6.00

April

THE ISMS
A History and Evaluation

By EUGENE O. GOLOB, Wesleyan University

This brilliant volume performs an important service in these times of ideological warfare: it clarifies the issues by bringing to bear upon conflicting social philosophies both historical perspective and theoretical analysis. They are viewed both as doctrines whose growth has been part of European and American social history, and as they have entered the practical world of politics and economics. They are evaluated from the point of view of modern economic and political criticism and of the traditional Western conceptions of personal liberty.

681 pages

$6.00

March

CONTEMPORARY WORLD POLITICS

By NORMAN HILL, University of Nebraska

This well-rounded and interestingly written text deals with foreign policies and how they are made, methods of diplomacy, historical and area backgrounds of present world affairs, motivation in foreign policies, forces at work in international affairs (such as power, nationalism, imperialism, economic drives, social forces) and the general problem of war and peace—in brief, with world politics. Conflicting points of view are presented objectively. Important documents are appended to the chapters where they apply. By the author of the recent text, International Organization.

714 pages

$6.00

February

HARPER & BROTHERS PUBLISHERS

49 East 33d Street

New York 16, New York

Three Important New Books in the

McGRAW

HILL

Series in Political Science

A SHORT HISTORY OF INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION

By Gerard J. Mangone, Swarthmore College. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. 326 pages, $5.00

A brilliantly written basic text, this volume presents an outstanding survey of international organizations, their origin, development, and structure. It extends its coverage throughout history, but with particular emphasis on the 19th and 20th centuries. Through examination of international organizations in full historical perspective, their contributions and importances are fully seen and appreciated, and directions of change and potential growth toward world order are indicated.

ELEMENTS OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENT New second edition

By John H. Ferguson, Pennsylvania State University and Dean E. McHenry, University of California at Los Angeles. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. In press

Here is a brief treatment text for the general course on American Government treating federal, state and local government. The new edition is up to date, easy to read, 100 pages less than the first edition, more copiously and effectively illustrated than previously, and largely rewritten.

THE DYNAMICS OF DEMOCRATIC GOVERNMENT

By John P. Roche, Haverford College and Murray S. Stedman, Swarthmore College. McGraw-Hill Series in Political Science. In press

This introductory account of democratic government views democratic institutions not as ends in themselves but as a part of the broader framework of democratic political theory. By means of a functional approach similar institutions in democratic countries are analyzed and compared so the reader can discover at each operational level the degree to which each institution in each country fulfills or fails to fulfill the requirements of democratic theory. No attempt is made to settle the issue; rather the authors raise key questions and suggest possible solutions.

McGraw-Hill Book Company, Inc.

330 West 42nd Street

New York 36, N.Y.

Send for copies on approval

NEW THIS SPRING!

GOVERNMENT BY THE PEOPLE, 2nd Edition

By JAMES M. BURNS, Williams College and JACK W. PELTASON, University of Illinois

Here is a new edition of the popular study of American government that stresses people and dynamic processes, rather than minutiae of laws and institutions. The new edition covers the first year of the Eisenhower Administration; added factual material is presented, and the book has been reorganized in such a way that facts are more easily grasped by the student.

960 pages • 6" x 9"

PRINCIPLES OF AMERICAN GOVERNMENT, 2nd Edition

By ALBERT B. SAYE, MERRITT B. POUND, and JOHN F. ALLUMS; all in the Political Science Department, University of Georgia

This text presents the basic principles, organization, and functions of American government, with particular emphasis on constitutional principles and civil rights. It provides an effective orientation to the field of political science. In the new edition, many chapters have been expanded, and material has been brought completely up to date with new developments such as the Steel Seizure Case and the McCarran Immigration Act.

448 pages • 5½" x 8¾"

THE GREAT ISSUES OF POLITICS

By LESLIE LIPSON, University of California, Berkeley

This text offers a new analysis of the fundamentals of the political process. These are presented to the reader as a series of basic issues which arise in every political system, in any kind of state, in all forms of government. The book is original in its theme and approach, treating the subject in a novel way never before attempted. Designed as a discussion between the author and the reader, its aim is to help the reader think about the problems which are basic to politics.

480 pages • 5½" x 8¾"

INTRODUCTION to INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

By CHARLES P. SCHLEICHER, University of Oregon

Drawing upon several of the social sciences to give students an integrated approach, this is a clear and comprehensive introduction to international relations. The text focuses upon the dynamics of the international political process, national power, nationalism, sovereignty, international law, war, and pacific settlement of disputes. It discusses the attempts to organize a world society, describes the machinery for conducting interstate relations, explains the foreign policies of many nations. It concludes with a summary of the major problems and trends of contemporary international society.

960 pages • 5½" x 8¾"

For approval copies write

PRENTICE-HALL, Inc. • 70 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 11, N.Y.

OXFORD Books in Political Science

Principles and Problems of American National Government—Revised Edition

By JOHN M. SWARTHOUT, Oregon State College and ERNEST R. BARTLEY, University of Florida

This book, dealing with the vast organization of modern American government, was first published in 1951. It is now being carefully revised in all details and brought up to date in the light of recent legislation and the change in administration. Many of the tables and graphs will be improved and a number of new ones added.

Coming early in 1955

British Government

By HIRAM MILLER STOUT

"The most comprehensive survey of British Government to appear in the post-war period. . . . Throughout the whole work Mr. Stout demonstrates a familiarity with even the most obscure aspects of politics and administrative procedure."—WILLIAM HAVARD, Louisiana State University, in the Southwestern Social Science Quarterly.

442 pp.

1953

College ed.

$5.00

Political Power in the U.S.S.R.
1917-1947

By JULIAN TOWSTER, University of California, Berkeley

Based almost entirely on source material available only in the Russian language, this is a study of political practice and policy in the Soviet Union. "The best book on Soviet government I have seen yet, and it has solved the test problem in our basic courses on the political system of the U.S.S.R."—D. LINCOLN HARTER, U. of Pennsylvania.

460 pp.

1948

College ed.

$5.00

Free Government in the Making

By ALPHEUS T. MASON, Princeton University

These readings in American political thought are arranged chronologically to show characteristic viewpoints on specific controversies, from pre-Revolutionary conflict with Britain to the current problems of civil rights.

864 pp.

1949

$6.50

Elements of Democratic Government

By J. A. CORRY, Queen's University, Kingston, Ont.

The governments discussed are those of the United States and Britain, with material on the Soviet Union. Second American Edition, Revised and Enlarged.

653 pp.

1951

$5.00

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS, 114 Fifth Avenue, N.Y. 11

Publishers of Fine Books for nearly Five Centuries

A revealing picture of our complicated governmental organization

The American Government— Democracy in Action

Sound in approach, this new introductory book provides an insight into the organization of American government by placing the three levels—national, state, and local—in their proper perspective. Attention is first focused on the state as the counterbalance of political power and as the basic unit of political activity in this country.

Stressing the human aspect of government, this book makes government everybody's business. Political and governmental processes become a living reality, with special attention given to such phases of working politics as parties, bosses and machines. The college student is impressed with the necessity for intelligent participation in democratic living and the importance of government in his own life.

944 pages, 176 illustrations and maps

CHARLES E. MERRIAM
ROBERT E. MERRIAM

Both of the authors draw on their combined experience as practicing politicians and students of theory in the writing of this book.

Ready early in April

Home Office: Boston
Sales Offices:

New York 11
Chicago 16
Atlanta 3
Dallas 1
Columbus 16
San Francisco 3
Toronto 7

VAN NOSTRAND FOR COLLEGE TEXTS

FAR EASTERN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS: CHINA AND JAPAN

by Paul M. A. Linebarger, Djang Chu, and Ardath W. Burks

This singularly important new book presents the governments of China and Japan in a comparative study, historically applied. Here are descriptive presentations of selected, actual systems of government, with some reference to the historical events which led to the foundation of each system and its supersession by another. Included in this up to date work are the first complete treatments of Formosa and the Communist Government of China to be found in any general text. Ready in May

INTRODUCTION TO RUSSIAN HISTORY AND CULTURE, 2nd Edition, by Ivar Spector

This New Second Edition, with its thorough revision and expansion, retains its unique feature of appropriately and successfully integrating the history of Russian culture with formal Russian history. Professor Spector brings to this study an awareness of Russian history and culture derived from his own environmental experiences in the area, which permits him to write with such insight and acumen. New and additional data on Russia in Asia has been added. Ready in May

RUSSIAN WRITERS: THEIR LIVES AND LITERATURE, by Janko Lavrin

The author's intention is to present in a brief, suggestive manner the growth and character of Russian literature, which, having assimilated western methods and influences and asserted her own originality, became one of the leading literatures of the world. The author has chosen to dwell on a series of striking personalities and their work, showing them against their historical and cultural background. Lavrin writes with authority, lucidly, and with sound interpretation. Ready in April

GOVERNMENTS OF LATIN AMERICA

by Miguel Jorrín

This important new book offers an understanding of the complexities of the phenomena of government in this increasingly important area. It gives an excellent description and interpretation of the political institutions and practices of the Republics of the South.

385 pages (1953)

$4.50

Send for copies on approval

D. VAN NOSTRAND COMPANY, INC.

PUBLISHERS SINCE 1848

250 FOURTH AVENUE

NEW YORK 3, NEW YORK

● Was there ever such a thing as “civilized warfare”?

READ THE PROVOCATIVE ANSWER IN—Advance to Barbarism

HOW THE REVERSION TO BARBARISM IN WARFARE
AND WAR-TRIALS MENACES OUR FUTURE

By F. J. P. VEALE, with a Foreword by the Very Rev.
WILLIAM RALPH INGE, former Dean of St. Paul's

● One of the most timely and important books to appear on world affairs in our generation. Praised by experts on both military and legal history in England and the U. S., it deals primarily with the following topics in military and legal history and current world problems:

1. The evolution of warfare to the creation of a civilized code following 1700.
2. The termination of civilized warfare as the result of strategic bombing of civilians and civilian property by the air forces in the second World War.
3. The judicial, logical, and ethical fallacies of the Nuremberg and other post-war trials.
4. The rise of the Orwellian period in warfare with the Cold War and Korean War.
5. The bearing of the above factors upon the further barbarization of warfare in the future, with the grave dangers of the destruction of western civilization.

“Should be read by everyone living.” “Veale's book is supported by exact and fascinating detail, is phrased with precision and irony, and has many statements in summation which have never before been expressed, or never expressed so well. . . . As the facts apply to the prospects, life, and hopes of everyone immured in this tragic age, it would be desirable that this book be read by everyone living.”

—GEORGE MORGENSTERN in Human Events

“To his honor, F. J. P. Veale correctly describes the indiscriminate slaughter of civilians by the world's so-called ‘Strategic Air Forces,’ the judicial lynchings of the Nuremberg mock trials and, most of all, the vile theories of war now current.”

—HOFFMAN NICKERSON

“The case for civilization.” “An important and deeply disturbing book.”—The Law Times (London). “A book of great importance. Displaying the rare combination of a deep knowledge of military history and an acute legal insight, it is a brilliant and courageous exposition of the case for civilization.”—CAPT. RUSSELL GRENFELL “Outstanding” . . . “Impressive.” “This is a very outstanding book. . . . The author shows a real knowledge of war.”—GENERAL J. F. C. FULLER. “Most interesting and impressive.”—CAPT. B. H. LIDDELL HART.

● Illustrated, 322 pages, indexed, $4.50 at booksellers, or postpaid from

C. C. NELSON COMPANY, Publishers, APPLETON, WISCONSIN

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION ★

JOHN M. PFIFFNER, The University of Southern California; and
R. VANCE PRESTHUS, Michigan State College

Third Edition of this textbook which has been a standard in its field since publication of the original volume—rewritten to emphasize predominant new studies in public administration. "A well balanced introductory treatment. . . Both teacher and student will find this a provocative work. . . Any variation in views should challenge the teacher to articulate his disagreements and thus increase the vitality of the course for students."—National Municipal Review. 626 pp. $6

CONSERVATION LAW AND ADMINISTRATION

WILLIAM F. SCHULZ, JR., University of Pittsburgh School of Law

A case study of law and resource use in Pennsylvania, this is the first comprehensive examination of a state's conservation program. Covers wildlife, game, and fish; water management; forests; recreation; etc. Includes a Model Conservation Administration Act based on critical analysis of the law. "Merits wide reading by those who legislate on conservation."—Soil Science. A Conservation Foundation study. 607 pp., 34 ill. $10

FUNDAMENTALS OF POLITICAL ECONOMY

Edited by OSSIP K. FLECHTHEIM, Colby College; 7 contributing authorities

An introductory textbook integrating the entire field of political science. "An extremely interesting book, in that it stresses the relationship of political science to the other social studies such as philosophy, psychology, history, and sociology."—Popular Government. "Most favorably impressed by its scope and quality of the contributions."—PROFESSOR PETER H. ODEGARD, University of California (Berkeley). 584 pp. $5.50

RESOURCES AND THE AMERICAN DREAM

SAMUEL H. ORDWAY, JR.

A conservationist's answer to the problem of our dwindling natural resources. In a sober warning to the "Cornucopians," it shows how consumption of raw materials can be brought into balance with supply through such measures as land use planning and industrial rationing. "Ordway has gone to the heart of a problem basic to modern civilization."—PAUL B. SEARS, Chairman, Conservation Program, Yale University. $2

"Edward H. Litchfield, one of General Clay's principal advisers, . . . edited this symposium of twenty articles on the origins and the political processes of postwar German democracy. The contributors, chosen for their competence and their first-hand experience in governing Germany, describe in admirable detail the formal elements of German politics. The result is without question the most comprehensive survey of present-day German political institutions."—The Saturday Review

Governing Postwar Germany

EDWARD H. LITCHFIELD, Cornell University, Editor. Dr. Litchfield is President of the Governmental Affairs Institute, and was formerly Executive Director of the American Political Science Association. He has also been the Director of the Civil Administration Division of the Office of Military Government for Germany and Consultant to the Secretary of the Army.

Government on local, state, and federal levels is here considered from the point of view of legislative, judicial, and administrative processes. Political parties, elections, and electoral methods are appraised; the influence of the occupation is considered. Contributors include such experts as Arnold Brecht, Henry L. Bretton, Kurt Glaser, John Hay, Robert M. W. Kempner, Hertha Kraus, Richard M. Scammon, Herbert J. Spiro, Roger H. Wells, and others.

Contents. PART I. EVOLUTION OF POSTWAR GOVERNMENTS. 1. Political Objectives and Legal Bases of Occupation Government. 2. Emergence of German Governments. PART II. LEVELS OF GOVERNMENT. 3. Local Government. 4. State Government. 5. The Constitution of the German Federal Republic. 6. Governments of Soviet Germany. 7. Germany in International Organization. PART III. PROCESSES OF GOVERNMENT. 8. Legislation. 9. Justice. 10. Personnel Management. 11. Organization and Methods Control. 12. Budget Management. 13. Public Finance. PART IV. FUNCTIONS OF GOVERNMENT. 14. Labor Relations. 15. Health and Welfare. 16. Police Administration. 17. Currency, Banking, Domestic and Foreign Debt. 18. Education. PART V. POLITICS. 19. Political Parties. 20. Post-war Elections and Electoral Processes. Appendices. Index.

678 Pages, Illustrations, Tables.

$7.75

124 ROBERTS PLACE

CORNELL UNIVERSITY PRESS

ITHACA, NEW YORK

American State Legislatures

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON AMERICAN LEGISLATURES
AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION

BELLE ZELLER, Editor
Brooklyn College

► TO what extent are the state legislatures equipped to handle the tasks that confront them? This report contains answers to this and many similar questions and presents recommendations for reorganization.

February, 1954 294 pages $3.50

The Legislative Process in Congress

GEORGE B. GALLOWAY

*Legislative Reference Service
Library of Congress*

► "I consider this the best single-volume account of the functions and procedures of the Congress of the United States available today."

William H. Young, University of Wisconsin
1953 689 pages $6.00

Latin American Politics and Government

SECOND EDITION

AUSTIN F. MACDONALD

University of California

► THE politics and the government of each Latin American country, with some historical background. Politics—political leaders—forms of government. Revised to 1954.

April, 1954 672 pages Illus. $6.00

A Primer of Statistics for Political Scientists

V. O. KEY, JR.

Harvard University

► "A brief and simple device for introducing political science students to basic statistical techniques. It fills the bill admirably."

David B. Truman, Columbia University
1954 209 pages 38 figures $2.50

THOMAS Y. CROWELL COMPANY
432 Fourth Avenue New York 16, N.Y.

Recently Published

AMERICAN STATE GOVERNMENT

FOURTH EDITION

by W. BROOKE GRAVES, Chief, Government Section Legislative Reference Service, Library of Congress; Adjunct Professor of Political Science, The American University

Complete revision and resetting of the most authoritative text in this field has brought all material up to date. The book reports and analyzes significant recent developments in the forward movement of the states since World War II. 960pp. $6.25

"... This is clearly an outstanding textbook. Dr. Graves covers the subject thoroughly, yet interestingly. His treatment is certainly authoritative. Dr. Graves brings to the revision of this important text qualifications unequalled by any other student of American State Government, and this is reflected on almost every page of the fourth edition. . . ."

Professor John H. Ferguson, Pennsylvania State College

D. C. HEATH AND COMPANY

Sales Offices: NEW YORK 14 CHICAGO 16 SAN FRANCISCO 5 ATLANTA 3
DALLAS 1 Home Office: BOSTON 16

Public Affairs Press

announces

A TEXT ON SOVIET FOREIGN POLICY AND WORLD COMMUNISM

IMPERIAL COMMUNISM

by

ANTHONY TRAWICK BOUSCAREN

Marquette University

"A most timely book . . . we commend this book to the attention of all who are following closely the advances of International Communism." Kenneth De Courcy, Intelligence Digest

"The book demonstrates both thoroughness and diligence." Martin Ebon, Saturday Review

"... informative and helpful in understanding the role played by Soviet Russia in world politics." Frederick T. C. Yu, World Affairs Interpreter

$3.75

Order from

WORLD AFFAIRS INSTITUTE

646 Prospect Ave.

Winnetka, Illinois

The Dynamics of Soviet Society

By W. W. ROSTOW, in collaboration with Alfred Levin, and with the assistance of others at the Center for International Studies, Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

This analytical synthesis of Russian studies has been produced in an effort to contribute a firmer basis for understanding the problems of American foreign policy. The book is focused on the motivations of the Soviet regime and the prospect for change throughout Soviet society in the future. It reviews the pattern of change in the Soviet past: its higher politics, foreign policy, ideology, economic life, social structure, and culture. This is not primarily a commentary on the current scene; rather, it attempts to portray the Soviet system, not as something unchanging, but as a recognizable process of historical evolution. In the words of Prof. William Langer, Harvard University, it is "one of the few books on Soviet Russia that really explains what has been happening there."

Published Nov., 1953.

Trade Edition $3.95. Text Edition $2.95

W. W. NORTON & CO. "BOOKS THAT LIVE"

101 Fifth Avenue, New York 3, N.Y.

What happened to the Liberals?

A century ago, liberals, championing struggling middle and lower classes, denounced as "meddlesome influences" with individual rights social legislation that would be described "humanitarian" today. By 1914, they had abandoned their laissez-faire attitude, adopting a welfare state philosophy. Why?

For the answer, read . . .

THE RISE AND DECLINE OF LIBERALISM

Thomas P. Neill

Author of Makers of the Modern Mind

"... the opening sentence . . . quotes Max Lerner's observation that Liberalism is 'perhaps the most disputed term of our generation.' The very making of this statement argues the necessity for this book . . . a substantial contribution to the literature on Liberalism." — Commonweal

$5.50

AT YOUR BOOKSTORE

THE BRUCE PUBLISHING COMPANY

1903 Bruce Bldg.
Milwaukee 1, Wis.

PHILOSOPHICAL LIBRARY BOOKS

□ DICTIONARY OF EUROPEAN HISTORY by William E. Roeder, with an introduction by Harry Elmer Barnes. Concise information concerning most of the events and prominent personalities from 500 A.D. to the present. $5.00

□ DICTIONARY OF SOCIOLOGY edited by Henry Pratt Fairchild. Consolidates and standardizes the usages in its field and provides a precise working vocabulary. $6.00

□ 20th CENTURY SOCIOLOGY edited by George Gurvitch & Wilber E. Moore. A group of outstanding sociologists presents all the major developments in modern sociological science. $6.00

□ 20th CENTURY POLITICAL THOUGHT edited by Joseph S. Roucek. A complete survey of modern developments in political thought by 27 nationally-known specialists. Sums up what needs to be known of ideological trends reshaping the world of today. $6.00

□ AN INTRODUCTION TO POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY by A. R. M. Murray. A critical examination of the principal theories advanced by political philosophers from Plato to Marx. $4.75

□ ESSAYS IN SCIENCE by Albert Einstein. An abbreviated edition of some of the papers of the distinguished physicist. $2.75

□ THE CAUSES & TREATMENT OF BACKWARDNESS by Sir Cyril Burt. Describes the main causes of backwardness and the various methods which the teacher may usefully adopt in his work. $3.75

□ THE EXPERIENCE OF DEATH by Paul-Louis Landsberg. A concentrated examination of the principal arguments for and against suicide. $2.50

□ THE DISPOSAL OF THE DEAD by Professor C. J. Polson, Dr. R. P. Brittain, and Dr. T. K. Marshall. An exhaustive exposition of the cultural, legal and technical post-mortem problems and practices encountered by anthropologists, pathologists, clerics, and police officers. $7.50

□ UNDERSTANDING THE JAPANESE MIND by James Clark Moloney. Dr. Moloney examines the interesting and plausible thesis that systems of psychotherapy are culture-bound. $3.50

□ AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL CUSTOM by Burleigh Cushing Rodick. Its growth from the colonial founders to the election of Jefferson. $4.75

□ DEVELOPMENT OF NEGRO RELIGION by Ruby F. Johnston. An interpretation of Negro religion in terms of the American culture. $3.00

□ EUROPEAN IDEOLOGIES edited by Feliks Gross, with an introduction by Robert M. MacIver, Columbia University. Surveys the social, economic and political ideas of Europe which have helped determine world orientation. $12.00

□ THE SOVIET IMPACT ON SOCIETY by Dagobert D. Runes. Examines the cultural and social changes brought about in the Western and Eastern world by the materialization of Marxist ideology. $3.75

□ A FREE SOCIETY: AN EVALUATION OF CONTEMPORARY DEMOCRACY by Mark M. Heald. A timely and comprehensive analysis of the doctrines of liberal democracy. $4.75

PHILOSOPHICAL LIBRARY, Publishers

15 East 40th St., Desk 282

New York 16, N.Y.

Expedite shipment by prepayment

Announcing the publication of LETTERS ON PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION —from a Dean to his Graduates—

By LENT D. UPSON

A public administrator's problems delightfully discussed in a series of essays. This book should be read by every governmental official—and the citizens who work with them.

Introduction by LUTHER H. GULICK, President
Institute of Public Administration

Republished to meet the demand from those who are acquainted with these essays by the Citizens Research Council of Michigan

810 Farwell Building
Detroit 26, Michigan

178 pages
Cloth Bound

Price: $1.75

A new kind of reference work
THE NEW CENTURY CYCLOPEDIA OF NAMES

A guide to world knowledge, based on the names that have made the news from the dawn of history to the present day

Seven years in preparation . . . costing over $500,000 . . . the work of Clarence L. Barnhart and hundreds of specialists.

The first single, complete, authoritative source of information, arranged by name, about people, events, places, ideas, achievements, art, literature, music, etc.

A milestone in the organization and presentation of human knowledge. Over 100,000 entries, over 1,000,000 specific facts, alphabetically arranged, with 20,000 cross references.

A whole library in a single comprehensive work. Three beautiful volumes, each volume 7½" x 11" x 2⅞". Handsome, durable library binding. Gold stamping. 4370 pages. Price $39.50 the set.

At all bookstores
APPLETON-CENTURY-CROFTS
35 West 32nd St., New York 1, N. Y.

The American Political Science Review

VOL. XLVIII

JUNE, 1954

NO. 2

PUBLIC OPINION AND THE INTELLECTUALS*

FRANCIS G. WILSON

University of Illinois

I

A study of the relation of intellectuals to public opinion suggests the outlines of a sociology of the intellectuals as a functioning social group. The *libertas philosophandi*¹ has long been asserted by the educated elite, and in pre-democratic days the theoretical relation to public opinion was quite clear. Philosophers have had the civil liberty to criticize government, but the same right was not generously extended to the vulgar conscience, or the common men who composed the "open public." Actually, the rise of democracy has not really clarified the issue, though the mass or Gnostic movements of modern times have asserted the right to judge the government, the intellectuals, and any other group that might stand in the way of political victory. The democratic intellectual can hardly say that the revolting mass does not have the right to judge him, but he can and does say that public opinion must be reformed, purified, educated, or directed by the latest in scientific hypothesis. More especially, however, the modern selfconscious intellectuals have directed their fire against other groups or elites who have a following and who in fact provide a pluralistic leadership of public opinion.²

Yet in this type of discussion, the intellectuals have seldom analyzed themselves as Julien Benda attempted to do in La Trahison des Clercs. In general, the intellectuals have raised the question of the conditions of culture and whether or to what extent the intellectual may offer his loyalty to it. And because the libertas philosophandi has so often involved

* This article is based on a lecture given at Emory University in the spring of 1953.

¹ Robert B. Sutton, "The Phrase Libertas Philosophandi," Journal of the History of Ideas, Vol. 14, pp. 310-16 (April, 1953).

² See, for example, José Ortega y Gasset, The Revolt of the Masses, trans. from the Spanish (New York, 1932). Or, in contrast, Julien Benda, The Treason of the Intellectuals [La Trahison des Clercs], trans. Richard Aldington (New York, 1928).

the assertion of revolutionary and highly negative judgments, the existing popular culture, so often permeated with Western religious ideas, has come in for harsh criticism. A moment of reflection will suggest that, on the contrary, the intellectuals should look in a scientific spirit at other groups whose traditional judgments do not agree with theirs. It is easy for the clerk to laugh satirically at the country bumpkin, who in a democracy may occupy the highest political post, but he might on occasion look at himself in all humility, without the arrogance that the possession of knowledge (not necessarily wisdom) so often induces. In any case, one of the issues of analysis in contemporary politics and culture is the examination of the intellectual; the creation, one might suggest, of an inwardly directed sociology of the intellectuals.³

In all honesty, the issue becomes finally one of philosophy. One must acquire a metaphysical focus before any such tension as that between public opinion and intellectuals can be fully understood. But in the discussion there is seldom a proper confrontation of issues, since less fundamental controversies and the praise and denunciation of personalities obscure what otherwise might be an enlightening area of discourse. In a basic sense, the issue is the liberal affirmation of various forms of empiricism against variations of theistic philosophy, or the struggle between the affirmations of scientific and religious interpretations of man.⁴ It becomes the conflict between the interpretation of "secular democracy" and some modern form of a sacral or religiously influenced society. However, this is only the fundamental form of the question, since the number of secularized ideologies is large and the number of morally and religiously influenced systems of ideas is also considerable in the diverse modern political structure of the West.⁵ For example, the contemporary struggle over the content of education surely involves the most fundamental of philosophical questions, but the battle is actually fought in a half-light, or with a spotlight illumination of personalities in a fog of personal recrimination and epithet.

³ Crane Brinton, "Something Went Wrong: Three Views of the Heritage of the Early Nineteenth Century," Journal of the History of Ideas, Vol. 14, pp. 457-62 (June, 1953), deals with this issue by being sharply critical of Peter Viereck, who had offered criticism of the contemporary intellectuals.

⁴ See J. Grimmond, "The Principles of Liberalism," The Political Quarterly, Vol. 14, pp. 236-42 (July-Sept., 1953).

⁵ Lord Acton in the nineteenth century was interested in counting the number of systems of thought which might be used to explain political movements in his time. Since Acton was attempting to reconcile British liberalism with his own religious ideas, he tended to blunt the conflict between liberalism as a secular system of thought and Christianity. See G. E. Fasnacht, Acton's Political Philosophy (New York, 1953), pp. 140-41.

II

Public opinion has been a subject of active discussion for more than a hundred years,⁶ though it is only recently that it has become a separate study in universities. And now students of public opinion have become experts in communication, propaganda analysis, polling, and political prediction. One might add that emphasis on polling, prediction, and propaganda has all but drained away the theoretical or philosophical content of the study of public opinion. The analysis of the media of mass communication, the study of public policy in relation to radio and television, and the emergence of "sykwar," or the military application of propaganda, is a singularly barren field for those who are in search of ideas, social concepts, or philosophy in general. Moreover, the intellectuals of our time, both in Europe and America, feel themselves isolated from systems of mass communication.⁷ They know little about it as a technical subject, and they have felt that the media suitable for a mass culture are unsuited for the expression of high humanistic values.

There is no standard way of defining public opinion. There are almost as many definitions as there are experts on the subject. There is no possibility in our time of a common statement of definition, but there are some common points of interest out of which most statements concerning it arise. The oldest and most important of these points is the ancient tension between those who rule and those who are ruled. Governors have had opinions about their subjects, but this has seldom been called public opinion. Subjects of a government have always had judgments about the deeds of their rulers, and this has commonly been called public opinion. Ever since the moral wisdom of man made its appearance in the great philosophical and religious literatures of the world, and ever since there has been some agreement on the moral code under which men live, there has been in elemental form some kind of public opinion. For it was possible with a moral code to approve or disapprove of the actions of rulers. It has not always been possible to do anything about what a government might do, and the victims of government generally are the least likely to leave a literary monument of their judgment. Intellectuals or clerks, let us say, have often surrounded rulers and they have taught the masses what they should think of their governors; these are the ones who have left records of what should be thought about a given political society. Yet the great sources of ancient wisdom or prudence have not always agreed that rulers were wise or beneficial, as one may find in the Confucian Classics, and among the philosophers of Greece.

⁶ See William A. Mackinnon, On the Rise, Progress and Present State of Public Opinion in Great Britain and Other Parts of the World, 2d ed. (London, 1828).

⁷ See Confluence, Vol. 2, pp. 69-114 (March, 1953), for various articles on this problem.

Public opinion, then, is outside of government; it is outside of the circle of those who make decisions; it is opinion that moves from the outside in, from the great circle of functioning groups in society to the narrowing circle of those who finally make decisions about what government shall attempt to do. As public opinion, it is general and open. But this idea suggests something else. Are the opinions we keep locked in our hearts public opinion? Must not public opinion be something that people will talk about to their fellows? Tom Harrisson observed some years ago that public opinion is anything that people will say out loud; it is anything you will talk to anybody about.⁸ Private opinion may be the potential public opinion of tomorrow, since a wave of general talk may emerge on any question. But private opinion may never reach the out-loud stage, since the means of communication may be closed to it, and the leaders of a society may refuse to discuss the question in a formal way. One function of a leader in a democratic society is to keep the slums of the human mind private; it is to keep such opinions from becoming public. One of the things that makes a democracy work is the insistence that many subjects people might like to talk about openly must not become public issues; that is, they must not be talked about out loud. Such opinions must not become factors in public decision. But it is an equally important function of democratic leadership to see that certain issues, long dormant in private thought, come into the clear light of day for out-loud discussion and political decision. Some public opinion must be forced back into secret and private discussion, and some private opinions must be made public and a factor in democratic decision.

Now in a democracy we say, often without thinking very much about what it means, that the people rule. In truth, any form of government can stand for long periods so long as the subjects would rather live under the government than die resisting it. Revolution is more difficult than it was in the last century because of mass communication and fire power. But the old saying goes, for there are times when men can be driven by such desperation that even the strongest government can be overthrown, especially when there is the least faltering in the exercise of political and military power. However, in a democracy we are concerned with more peaceful political action; we think of the articulate opinions of those who have some share in making public decisions as public opinion. We do not assume that all democratic citizens are very close to government, for always government is largely secret; and we do not assume that all decisions must be made finally by the people. We recognize, moreover, that in some areas the masses of the people have more power to make decisions than in others. In our democracy, we have a rather cumbersome way in which people can select some of the important rulers, but once these are elected they make their decisions with an eye to some future election, or with the avoidance of the penitentiary in mind.

⁸ "What is Public Opinion?," The Political Quarterly, Vol. 11, pp. 374-83 (Oct.-Dec., 1940).

Modern democracy has made more effort than any other system to connect the opinions of the citizens with governmental decision, but even so government is very remote from the ordinary man and his group life. One of the most impressive things about current democracy is that practically no effort is being made to make participation more effective than it has been. The great periods of democratic reform for us seem to be over. Public opinion has probably reached its highest point of influence in history. With the increase in the importance of foreign affairs in our political life, public opinion has no doubt less influence than before the emergence of the present world crisis. We think more today of efficiency in administration and calculation by the experts of international risks than of the opinions of those who pay their taxes, or who serve in the armed forces. As participants in government, the public is an organ of the state, but it is also a series of functional groups that talk about government openly and judge as effectively as they may in the light of the things they believe.

III

Let us turn to the intellectuals. First of all, we must keep in mind a distinction that is of profound significance. There is a difference between the intellectuals and intelligence. There is intelligence throughout society, and wherever it is it should be used in private lives and in the operation of government. Intellectuals in the European sense, that is, the intelligentsia, have a special kind of intelligence. They are functioning groups of society, like any of the professionals, such as lawyers, doctors, engineers, professors, journalists, and more recently the scientist of whatever kind he may be. Intellectuals as a group are characterized by specialized study and function; they have gathered information, and by the logic of their professional status they use such information to make judgments on the world around them. For long centuries they have sat in judgment on the popular mind, and here we have an issue that was as important yesterday as it is today. The intellectual has often seemed to say: "You must forgive us if we seem a little proud, and if we feel that the power of organized society should be largely in our hands. You must forgive us if we disdain the ideas of the common man, because when the common man agrees with us we will like him. We want to remake him in our own image, if only to the extent that he is willing to accept our leadership when important questions of public policy are involved. We are not opposed to freedom, but we feel more capable than other men of defining freedom and justice."

Reflection on the rise of the modern Western intellectual class since the revival of the study of Roman Law in the twelfth century, the reintroduction of Greek or Aristotelian philosophy into the great European universities of the past, and the rise of medicine and theology as disciplines, may lead one to think there is more than a grain of truth in such a statement. Some intellectuals, like the theologians and the medical men, have generally had a large following among the "vulgar," as it was once stated. Others like the humanists with their knowledge of ancient tongues, and the philosophers who have rejected the religious beliefs of ordinary men, have been at war with society for nearly five hundred years. In our own time, the spectacular achievements of the scientists have separated them from ordinary people. The scientist has become the realization of "superman," and for the first time in American history the scientist as the aide of the military has been envisaged as the next possible destroyer of civilization, rather than its obedient servant.

The great symbolic intellectual figure, however, has been the philosopher, the lover of wisdom.⁹ This symbol has been forceful ever since the beginning of Greek speculative thought. It has found its most powerful exponent in Plato, and perhaps Pythagoras as well. True knowledge was a mystery that only the initiated might savor. Others sat unhappily in Plato's den, where only shadows of philosophical reality might be seen by those whose backs were always turned against the light of dialectical knowledge. Some years ago Walter Lippmann¹⁰ described public opinion as a set of stereotypes that partially informed men use to explain the world; the stereotype is like a shadowy picture in Plato's den; it does not include a proper range of information; it is distorted; it is merely a picture of the world, and not the reality and the truth of the world. Thus, every man who becomes in his heart an intellectual, that is, a philosopher of some kind or other, must make a great decision: he must decide whether the ordinary man sits in a cave with his back to the light. He must decide whether common opinion about the world is merely a set of stereotypes, or distorted idea forces. He must decide whether to sit in judgment on the world and all poor mortals who inhabit it. It is a profound and disturbing issue, and if one is a democrat, the issue is all the harder. To the aristocrat at heart there is no issue, because knowledge is something that only the few ever get.

⁹ Cf. Eric Voegelin, The New Science of Politics (Chicago, 1952).

¹⁰ In his Public Opinion (New York, 1922).

And now we reach a striking paradox. The intellectuals who are most passionately for the earthly salvation and reform of men and institutions are those who least respect what may be called the traditional values of any long-standing or operating community. For, in truth, no existing society can be called a utopia, and never somehow do men escape from the frustrations of living, or the failure of their own characters to measure up to their philosophical potential. Such an intellectual Gnostic will say in a democratic society that man can be educated to greater awareness of what ought to be done to make society better; in other words, public opinion can by education be slowly recast and loyalty for the new, transfigured society can be created. But when the tradition-bound mortal refuses the new light, the intellectual in a democracy logically can only accept defeat and start over. In a totalitarian society, those who object may be put in concentration and slave-labor camps, and others can be driven by fear into silence in order that they may survive in a world where the "social" is the enemy. Meanwhile, those who run the slave-labor camps would say that they greatly love the people, that their eyes are upon a golden future, and that the pain of today is justified by the promise of tomorrow.

Against these intellectuals there are others who might be called conservatives.¹¹ Somehow they respect the tradition of a people; they are willing to believe with ordinary men in their religion, and in the wisdom that ancestral experience has fed into the minds of those who are not intellectuals. Likewise, they believe that values, that good and evil, may be demonstrated with logical and reasonable methods. Science is a fact, and none denies it, but justice and morality are also facts that live in more refined statement in the intellectual traditions of religions and nations. Moreover, these conservative intellectuals may say that they do not believe that a new society is immediately possible; they may say also that men are unfortunate or evil in their deeds, not because of a lack of knowledge, but because of a lack of character. Because, in short, men are sinners. Perhaps there is more humility in such an intellectual, and there may be less of a lust for human and political power, or, let us say, less superbia and pleonexia. But these qualities are yet there, though it may be pride in the fact that men follow and love them. They may agree with St. Paul that the least of God's children may have as much moral wisdom as the philosopher; that the knowledge of the Christian, informed by his faith, may measure up against the secular and positivistic morality of an unfriendly world.

¹¹ See Russell Kirk, The Conservative Mind (Chicago, 1953); Peter Viereck, Conservatism Revisited (New York, 1949).

In the extreme, then, we have two great types of intellectuals in relation to common sentiment, or the public opinion of any society. The philosopher in the Greek sense, the lover of wisdom, and the Christian thinker may agree that all can share in the transcendental aims of the human soul. There is always a higher wisdom that ordinary men keep alive and share in, and sometimes induce others to accept as the proper standard of their behavior, both private and public. Plato would call the other type of intellectual the Sophist; he teaches success in life; he has few standards and is Machiavellian,¹² and though he may exploit tradition for purposes very much like propaganda, he has a profound contempt for the traditional morality of the society in which he works.

Let us try to state now more clearly the practical and philosophical issue for democracy. How can the functioning citizen of a democracy get along with the intellectuals? On the other hand, how can the intellectuals get along with the members of a democratic society? What kind of intellectuals and what kind of citizens work best with each other? Now one thing is clear. Ever since the founding of the great Western universities, one of their functions has been the training of public servants, the teachers in the schools, and members of professions like medicine and theology. In the history of Western governments, the transitions of society can be marked by the changing character of the intellectuals who have served the government. One can almost say, indeed, that the intellectuals, of whatever kind, formulate the policies of government in any detailed or specific sense, regardless of the form of government. But the lawyer trained in the Roman Law and the Common Law who became the adviser of modern absolute rulers was different from the clerk or the cleric who preceded him before the rise of these systems.¹³ Moreover, the techniques of the trained servant of government vary with different systems, but even in a democracy so much is secret that our own policies are often formulated and put into effect before there is any publicity. Immanuel Kant was facing this issue when he said that any policy of government might be accepted if it were compatible with publicity, and this was to him one of the transcendental pillars of freedom. In general, in a democracy the expert or the professional man is merely slowed down. With the idea of the career service becoming increasingly accepted by us, even a change in political regimes might not alter greatly the advice on particular policies that the President or the Congress receives.

¹² Cf. Max Lerner's introduction to the Modern Library edition of Machiavelli's The Prince and The Discourses (New York, 1940).

¹³ Christopher Saint-German's The Doctor and Student in 1518 may be regarded as a statement of the older position of the supremacy of the higher law, but the Student in the dialogues expresses many of the ideas of absolutism. See José Antonio Maravall, "La Formación de la Conciencia Estandamental en los Letrados," Revista de Estudios Políticos, No. 70, pp. 53-81 (July-Aug., 1953).

Thus, the relation of public opinion and the intellectuals is not primarily a matter of the form of government, though one could hardly deny the importance of different systems of making political decisions. One can range a gamut from the Greek devices of popular participation, through the emergence of nineteenth-century democracy, and on to the corruption of traditional democratic devices in modern totalitarian systems. And it seems that the important issue is what kind of philosophy the intellectuals hold and what kind of traditional values the people believe in. Sometimes the intellectuals and the common man agree on basic propositions and sometimes they do not, though it is generally true that whether there is agreement or disagreement there is a difference between the statement of traditional belief and the manner in which the intellectuals argue their propositions. What kind of truth is sought? What reality is sought? What is involved here is not just a question of economic motivation, for all men, however they may reason, must have the necessities of life; it is not just a matter of psychoanalysis either, for men, whether intellectuals or not, have their frustrations and mental disturbances. In the end it becomes a question of values, or what kind of values should be reflected in the spirit and the policy of government. It is a question of how values are determined and sustained, and it is a question of what they are.

While the tension between intellectuals and ordinary people is always present, this tension, sometimes growing and sometimes in abeyance, has been peculiarly characteristic of the modern world. It began at the end of the middle ages or in the early Renaissance in the universities of northern Italy, and it has been the secular theory of intelligence that has increasingly dominated intellectual thought. It was not a new conflict, because it was present among the Greeks and the Romans, and, indeed, it may be found in any society that has left a literature for posterity. We sometimes call it humanism, sometimes liberalism, sometimes scientific thought; sometimes it is our modern historicism, and sometimes it is neo-Platonism as against the older medieval Aristotelianism. But it meant in essence that the human mind at its educated best is autonomous, that reason gives men their own law, that the quest of reason is more the creation of standards of justice than finding a justice that already exists in some kind of moral order in the universe.¹⁴ Greek philosophy especially was a substitute for the great development of Christian philosophy.

In this development, which to some is the essence of modernity, there was an increasing separation between the intellectuals—that is, professors, philosophers, lawyers, and medical men—and the common man. The bridge between them had been a common Christian faith, but this was being slowly eroded away. Through many centuries one can find the intellectuals talking about the vulgar, the plebs, the unlettered, and there is in general a fear of what people in the mass can or will do. Many political philosophers, for example Jean Bodin, have considered the plebs violent and uncertain,¹⁵ something to be guarded against rather than obeyed. From the genial Religio Medici of Sir Thomas Browne we read that “Every man is not a proper Champion for Truth, nor fit to take up the Gauntlet in the cause of Verity.”¹⁶ To the intellectual, whether he was a lawyer, a Catholic, a Puritan, a Lutheran, or what not, the common people were an uncertain lot, filled with superstition and unlearned, and storm was always latent behind the façades of peace. But this is also true: whenever the lettered and the learned saw that the people disagreed with them, the people were wrong. The intellectual aristocrat was always right. The common man was always wrong. This proposition has not changed through modern history, though the character of philosophy and the dominant types of intellectual effort have changed, and changed fairly frequently if one takes in a broad enough sweep of event.

Intellectuals have always been divided, of course, for by their nature one intellectual must be critical of another, this being one of the aspects of the autonomous reason, the reason emancipated from all standards save those that are self-imposed. We are concerned here, however, with the dominant form of intellectual life which sought to serve the state, and to share in the training of its civil servants. First, we may observe a shifting from Christian values to Greek philosophy, to both Plato and Aristotle, and to such of the learning of the ancient world as was available. It was literary and philosophical study independent of the ¹⁴ See C. N. R. McCoy, “The Turning Point in Political Philosophy,” this REVIEW, Vol. 44, pp. 678-88 (Sept., 1950).

¹⁵ Jean Bodin, Method for the Easy Comprehension of History, trans. Beatrice Reynolds (New York, 1945), passim.

¹⁶ Modern Library edition (New York, 1943), p. 327.

Christian order that was at stake. The great values of the past, shared, indeed, with all men, were to be proved in a different way. But soon the values themselves came into question, and the revolutionary intellectual, who believed he might reshape the world around him, began to make his appearance. From the time of the development of science, the materialistic and empirical attitude of mind became stronger, and values could be proved, if at all, only by a scientific method. Finally, in the nineteenth century the social scientists began to think of values as not being provable at all, or else to be proved in a utilitarian or quantitative fashion. But the intellectual was rapidly getting to the point where, in social life, he could believe hardly anything. Values, the judgment of men and nations as in the past, were simply a relative phase of culture. From Christian and humanistic learning we moved toward a scientific treatment of what most men thought. It was possible, so it seemed, that we were approaching ethics and politics simply as a subdivision of a kind of descriptive anthropology.¹⁷

IV

If one seeks the fundamental cleavage between different types of intellectuals, it is no easy quest. It has been stated in various ways by many who have sought the fundamental issues of philosophy. But if one keeps in mind the relation of men to a human order, the issue may be stated like this: Is there such a thing as a transcendent order, or is all reality, including social and private experience, immanent? Is reality only the here and now? Is this the only divinity that men can know, and can it be discovered only by some application of what may be called positivism in social science? The predominant Greek philosophy that has survived as the core of many centuries of liberal education asserted the existence of a transcendent order, and so did Christian thought, whether based on Plato or Aristotle, or on a more direct examination of the implications of the Bible and Church tradition. The soul of man was open to something more than empirical data. Thus, Greek and Christian thought were looking for a spiritual reality transcendent to all men, whether they were among the learned or the vulgar. In more recent times, it is precisely the denial of such an order that has made up much of modern epistemology and metaphysics. Indeed, it has been the effort of many intellectuals to deny metaphysics by denying the existence of the spiritual and the transcendent. And it has been precisely this denial that has caused much of the conflict between the intellectuals and the democratic citizen.

¹⁷ Contemporary American philosophy, especially Pragmatism and Positivism, may illustrate this point. There is much valuable material on this issue in H. W. Schneider, A History of American Philosophy (New York, 1946), Ch. 39.

It is said that Plato's God was always busy with geometry; and that, according to some scholars,¹⁸ is a peculiarly aristocratic and snobbish idea of science. It was a science beyond the comprehension of ordinary men; it was beyond the possibility of their participation in it. One may say, naturally, that Plato failed as a statesman or as advisor to kings and tyrants, but that in his Laws he seems to be trying to construct a society that would raise men to the highest level of which they are capable, and that in truth it was to a level very far from any modern idea of democracy. The dialectic that the rulers were to study in the Republic was only for a few, who in turn could direct the rest of society with wisdom. Here was a transcendental order clearly anti-democratic in implication. However, in Aristotle, both in the Ethics and in the Politics, the conservative mind comes closer to ordinary human habit, and there is a much more generous attitude toward what common people may think. They may still be directed by philosophers who have in mind a transcendent order, but the ordinary man participates in virtue. Moreover, the collective judgment of men is praised in Aristotle as a good standard for political behavior. One feels that the criticism of the city state in its time of decay was much milder in Aristotle than in Plato, even though Aristotle held that some men were slaves in their nature. On the other hand, Aristotle's praise of the common judgment was stated in the light of higher rational standards that were drawn from a knowledge of the purposes of nature. And some have gone so far as to assert that Aristotle had a profound influence even on the Stoic ideas of the natural equality of men. These points are emphasized because it seems that the path of reconciliation between the learned and the vulgar is the common acceptance of a transcendent order. This order may be known more intimately by those who are philosophers, but it is shared in and known to some extent by the education of all men in the habits of virtuous living. In this situation reason and faith have a common and supplemental function, and faith does not become the object of derision by those who have stressed the unlimited creativeness and autonomy of the educated reason. But it is also clear that there is a great dualism in human existence, for all men are existentially in both an immanent and a transcendent order, and the higher objectives of the transcendental are never to be realized in their fullness in that which is immanent and directly social.

¹⁸ See Benjamin Farrington, Science and Politics in the Ancient World (New York, 1939); Alban D. Winspear, The Genesis of Plato's Thought (New York, 1940).

It may seem paradoxical, but the intellectual who accepts a transcendental order that is above all men can be more easily reconciled to democracy and the forces of public opinion than one who does not. Such a view stands in criticism of much of the current theory of democracy. For in the intellectually predominant view of the present, democracy is almost incompatible with any standards that philosophy and religion may propose.¹⁹ It is asserted by some that only a philosophy of pragmatism is compatible with democracy. In other words, democracy must be based on something like William James' radical empiricism, or the instrumentalism of John Dewey. Or, one might say that because no standard of human justice can be proved, the only standard is that which is approved by some majoritarian procedure.

If this proposition states the current situation, it must arise from some qualities within the intellectual himself; it must be a kind of existential statement of the tensions of his life. In a direct sense, the answer may be found in the attitude of the intellectual toward political power. Those who deny a transcendental realization must attain whatever objectives they have in mind in the organization of society, and this primarily through the force of the state. Thus, they are driven to seek power, or sometimes in futility to deride it. On the other hand, those who, like Boethius, seek the consolation of philosophy, may speak of the vanity of the world. The order of wisdom is both here and beyond, and knowledge can be its own reward and spiritual consolation. Such an intellectual's primary activities are teaching and writing, so that the artes liberales will become the proud possession of the coming generation. He is happiest when he is directing a school, the Lyceum or the Academy in Athens, or perhaps the cathedral schools that preceded the foundation of the Western universities. What he asks is freedom from the ruler, not freedom to direct the government.

One is driven, therefore, to the conclusion that the intellectual who rejects the higher order of human experience is existentially a seeker of power. The free commitment of his will may be to him a painful experience, but in the end he has tried to remake the world; that is, historically, he has sought to be the servant and the advisor of kings. His writings, like those of Pierre DuBois or Marsilius of Padua in the fourteenth century, become the manifestoes of the new and planned society. From the time of the rise of science and the troubles of the Reformation and Counter-Reformation, the idea of a utopia has been congenial to such intellectuals. From the eighteenth century to our time there has always been an intellectually-led political revolution in the making. The Tudor humanist, for example, might stress obedience to the king,²⁰ but he was also a dreamer of the kind of society that autonomous human knowledge might make. Humanism was far more committed to the historic belief in a divine order than was the intellectualism of the eighteenth century, but the humanist was trying to be a philosopher and a bureaucrat. Consider, for example, the controversy over the objectives of Thomas More in his Utopia. Some have said that he was merely justifying English imperialism, but most students have said either that he was trying to reform society or that he was deriding the possibility of any reform. More was a great servant of the king, and he finally died as a martyr for his religious faith. But in the Utopia he seems to be struggling with the problem of personal power.²¹ Should he seek power in order to reform the world, or should he say that the injustice of the world could not be cured, owing to the corruption of men and government? Latterly, some have said that More was really arguing with himself as to whether he should be a lover of wisdom and the liberal arts or seek to reshape society nearer to the heart's desire. There is no question here of what the people may want, for the philosopher is able to say what justice is and what is proper for the people. But as a bureaucrat he would surely be at war with common opinion.

¹⁹ See Karl Pribram, Conflicting Patterns of Thought (Washington, 1949).

If we consider the seventeenth century, the picture is more clear. The ideal of science has dawned, and the literary humanism of a previous time is being pushed aside or into a darkened background where it has been ever since. Men seek now to wrest away the secrets of nature through mathematics, and through new methods that are scientific. They would, like Francis Bacon, another servant of the throne and author of the first scientific utopia, the New Atlantis, develop a new technology and create a kingdom governed by scientists who are continually engaged in scientific experimentation. But it is the government of a society that is at stake; it is science and politics hand in hand, and there is no room for the traditions and values of ordinary men who might turn away from the chilly efficiency of the new technology. When you do not believe in the traditional religious and humanistic values, as a modern you believe in science. And when you believe that the methods of natural and physical science can be applied to the social relations of people, you must turn to the state, for the state is the means whereby the new objectives can be attained. Likewise, one does not bother with ideas of natural rights and limitations on power when the state becomes the chief agency for the attainment of scientific results, whether those results are simple technology or the creation of a new social theory, as Robert Owen proposed.

²⁰ See Irving Ribner, "Sir Philip Sidney on Civil Insurrection," Journal of the History of Ideas, Vol. 13, pp. 257-65 (April, 1952).

²¹ See Eric Voegelin, "More's Utopia," Österreichische Zeitschrift für Öffentliches Recht, Band III, Heft 4.

V

At this point a digression into the history of political ideas is appropriate. With the beginning of the seventeenth century, certain major and traditional views in politics had emerged. There were the Calvinists, the Lutherans, the Anglicans, the Catholics, the minor and dissenting religious sects, and there were those who against all other traditions sustained the authority of the state and who were the proponents of various doctrines of sovereignty. It is clear, of course, that all of these views were internally divided, but each one took a position on the central issue of time: the relation of religion and politics. One can generalize as follows: those who supported a religious tradition, especially when it was on the defensive, were likely to be exponents of the consent of the governed, tyrannicide, and the power of the traditional estates or parliaments of the realm. They were more inclined than the defenders of sovereignty to seek the support of the general population. On the other hand, it was a time of the emergence of the modern conception of the authority of the state, modelled not a little on the authority of the Roman Empire and the Civil Law which had been used as a support for imperial power. Those who asserted the sovereignty of the monarch were not interested in what the people thought, but only in their obedience to the law. The doctrine of sovereignty was a kind of civil theology that was to take the place of the various Christian theologies which struggled against each other in Western Europe. Under the Tudors and the Stuarts, English official doctrine might be moving toward the assertion of the divine right of kings as the civil theology of Anglicanism, and Lutheranism had similar though not so well stated doctrines. But the divine right of kings was simply a passing phase of the argument. It is not the argument upon which the power of the modern state was built.

The question involved here is the function of intellectuals in relation to what might be called the general currents of popular opinion. It is clear that the religious traditions appealed with success to the citizen body, otherwise the religious wars would not have been fought, kings would not have been assassinated, and general and violent repression of religious dissent would not have been possible. To be brief, the secular, empirical, and scientific intellectuals were on the side of political authority, and to them a strong monarchy became all too often a symbol of the denial of the power of the people. The intellectuals framed the new theory of power. Though the lawyers had long used the model of the Roman Emperor in the analysis of kingly power, the secular mind used the new mathematical and scientific theories to justify the supremacy of the state over all dissent. In other words, much of the political theory of the time that now finds itself ensconced in the standard treatises is a defense of political power. The lawyers, the humanists, the poets, the philosophers, and the writers of systematic works in political analysis were generally on the side of sovereignty. One should not underestimate the force of protest, the defense of consent, and the emergent theory of constitutional liberty. But down to the eve of the French Revolution the philosophes were often supporters of the monarchy and they were contemptuous of the ideas of the ordinary citizen. Ignorance, faction, and sedition comprised the treadmill of the common man. The idea of the centralized and powerful state was rationalized by the intellectuals; it is a lasting, but perhaps unhappy, contribution to the history of modern times.

In no small degree Machiavelli became the symbol of the organized power of the state, though he was denounced often by those who used him most. Sir Thomas Browne said of him: "I confess that every county hath its Machiavel, every age its Lucian, whereof common Heads must not hear, nor more advanced Judgments too rashly venture on: it is the Rhetorik of Satan and may pervert a loose or prejudicate belief."²² In contrast, Francis Bacon, one of the great apostles of scientific method, and who was slightly senior to Browne, read avidly the Italian historians such as Paolo Sarpi, and he said: "We are much beholden to Machiavel and others that wrote what men do, and not what they ought to do."²³ Here is an essential credo of the new science of national power; here is the principle that description and not values forms the core of the effort of the student of politics. The people must be managed and prevented from organizing so that discontent can never be a force on government. Thomas Hobbes, on the other hand, had few reservations as to the action of a totalitarian state. Not only must the common people be told what to think; the preacher and the professor must be dealt with in the firmest way. But Hobbes tried his hand at theology, and he rather fancied himself as a theologian. He reduced obedience to God to obedience to the theology that was incorporated into the civil statutes of the realm. Anyone who resisted the prince or the government was not only violating a civil law and worthy of condign punishment, but was also a rebel against his God. Moreover, the sovereign could command whatever he could get away with. Religion was thus reduced to a necessary annoyance; at best it was a department of government, as under the peculiar English system. Behind Hobbes' religious ideas, moreover, was a materialistic and utilitarian philosophy that in effect left no room for natural or divine law, for under Hobbes' covenant of death each individual had conceded all to the sovereign power of the state.

²² Religio Medici, Modern Library edition (New York, 1943), p. 344.

²³ The Essays of Francis Bacon, ed. M. A. Scott (New York, 1908), LXXX.

Fortunately for England, the long decades of disturbance and revolution ended, and a man like Locke could take many of the same philosophical ideas and create a moderate political philosophy that even led in the direction of religious toleration. And that great skeptic Hume, like William James, insisted that we must believe, but always under a powerful government that did not allow for the religious assertiveness of other days.²⁴ In both Locke and Hume, the ideas of the common man get a hearing, and the stabilized custom, tradition, and public opinion of a nation may be considered in the calculations of public policy. But one of the great sources of modern liberty is the insistence on a genuine religious liberty, and though Locke moved far in that direction—farther than Milton—religious freedom was not a fact of political life. For example, Spinoza is cited for his defense of intellectual freedom, but it was the freedom of the philosopher that he defended. Spinoza's comments on religious liberty are often omitted from the books giving selections from his works. In his Tractatus Theologico-Politicus he argues in Chapter XIX that the right over matters spiritual lies wholly with the sovereign, and that the outward form of religion should be in accordance with public peace, if we would obey God aright. This is Hobbes all over again—the sharp Erastianism, or state supremacy over religion, that was characteristic of the critical and intellectual mind of the time. Some, like Giambattista Vico in his New Science, might argue that in the custom of nations the right of the common man to share in society is an embodiment of the natural law, but Vico was a forgotten figure in his Neapolitan isolation until almost the beginning of the nineteenth century.

With these ideas in mind, some comment must be made on the modern age of revolutions that began with the French Revolution. The philosophers of France in the eighteenth century played a large role in bringing about the revolution, for the intellectual origins of the French Revolution are among the most important, as Daniel Mornet has argued in his study of the subject.²⁵ The intellectuals, such as Rousseau, provided the ideas that a Robespierre might use, even to the establishment of the worship of reason. Ever since the eighteenth century the battle over political ideology has centered on the philosophy of the French Revolution. A liberal must believe in it, and a conservative cannot. Burke and Wellington stand against Sieyès and Napoleon, and their successors adopt similar intellectual and ideological postures. The revolutionist would destroy the things the people love in the name of the people; the conservative would preserve the things the people love in the name of duty. But the participants in ideological battle may be consoled by Alexis de Tocqueville, who believed that the French Revolution had already occurred before 1789, and that the institutions of France had long since undergone a deep-seated remodelling.

²⁴ J. B. Shouse, "David Hume and William James: A Comparison," Journal of the History of Ideas, Vol. 13, pp. 514-27 (Oct., 1952).

²⁵ See Daniel Mornet, Les Origines Intellectuelles de la Révolution Française (Paris, 1933), passim.

The philosophical battle over the French Revolution and its successor revolutions is different in at least one respect from the present struggle over the Russian Revolution. Those who accepted the French Revolution and those who rejected it believed that values in social life could be demonstrated or proved. Values such as justice, liberty, natural rights, were accepted by both sides; Burke and Thomas Paine were trying to prove the same thing, but with widely variant theories of how to prove them. But since then values have tended to become myths and power has tended to become technique in the atheistic humanism of the nineteenth century, as in the thought of Feuerbach, Comte, and Nietzsche. Against the relativist and pragmatic democratic intellectual, the Marxian, the supporter of the Russian regime and its expansion, insists he has a scientific answer to everything. And in the cold light of the all-encompassing ideal of science, it is hard for the intellectual to say why the values of democracy can stand against dialectical materialism. To say, as some of the followers of John Dewey have done, that group experience, the dominance of the group, will give us answers, is surely futile, when the processes of group interaction produce the irreconcilable conflicts of modern times. C. Wright Mills in his recent book White Collar has suggested that to many intellectuals the revolution has become vulgar and the system of democratic society is accepted in a purely mechanical manner. To resist the new revolution, there must be an alternative faith. While we have many enthusiasts for revolution like Richard Price among us, there are few of the insight of Edmund Burke.

VI

But common men still believe in many things. They are largely theistic and opposed to the secular intellectual whenever they understand what the clamor of wordy battle is all about. If the common herd, as Browne said, follows the intellectual you may have a revolution to remake society; but if the functioning citizen distrusts the intellectual leaders of important segments of society, the progress of society may be retarded, and retarded sharply in battle concerning values that are as old as the struggles between Plato and the Sophists. In a democratic society where there is a free communication of ideas and free elections, the people can at least make some sort of effective choice of what is offered them by those who edit the pharmacopoeia of the better world.

What then do the intellectuals promise? They promise a secular democracy, in which somehow spiritual values must take care of themselves. It is said that with psychology, the frustrations of the common man can be removed; with engineering and science, we can produce more worldly goods than he can consume; with economics, we can give assurance of a stable economy and high wages; with proper government policies, there can be liberty and security, and the lasting peace that poet and saint have so long prophesied. Art can be made popular and it can be appreciated; there will be plenty of novels to read, and entertainment will not lack. The great revolution, it is sometimes said, has already come and is behind us. The new frontiers of welfare beckon. But in all this there is another note: public opinion must be obedient; it must follow, and not be recalcitrant. Men must select the proper leaders and then not criticize them. It is surely uncertain whether the democratic citizen of our time is going to accept this prescription and such a leadership. It is not certain that he has accepted the secular democracy.

THE CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE: A CASE STUDY*

RALPH K. HUITT

University of Wisconsin

"Congressional government is Committee government" said Woodrow Wilson in 1884,¹ and political scientists since that day have seen no reason to disagree with him. It would be reasonable to suppose then that once committees ceased to meet secretly (as they did when Wilson wrote) and began to keep verbatim public records of their proceedings, the committee process would be subjected to relentless and systematic study. Such has not been the case. The frequency with which Wilson is quoted is as much a reflection of a lack of substantive research by later students as it is a tribute to his intuitive insights.

It would not be hard to make a case for close and continuous study of congressional committees. On every count, they would seem to hold as much interest for the student of politics as administrative bodies or the courts, upon which so much more attention has been lavished. They are decision-making agencies of crucial importance; it is a commonplace that they hold life-or-death power over legislation. Again, they provide a point of focus for the political process; they are "miniature legislatures," "microcosms" of their parent bodies²—not in the sense that they epitomize the larger houses, but rather that the committees are subject to the same influences and power drives, which are easier to intercept and analyze here than in the larger and more complex houses themselves.

A third reason for studying the committee is less obvious but no less important. Each house of Congress is a human group, with leadership, a hierarchy of influence, and a set of norms which control, more or less, the behavior of its members. The man who goes to Congress joins a going concern. He accepts and shares a group life.³ One factor in any decision he makes is the influence on him of his house as an institutionalized group. But the group life of the congressman is exceedingly complex. Like other men he is a member of many groups, with any one of which he might identify in a particular situation; but unlike most other men he is a representative, under obligation consciously and deliberately to take into account the wishes of the groups which support him. As we have said, he is part of the status pattern in his legislative house, in which both formal and informal leadership patterns impose obligations and afford access to power. His success as a professional legislator depends to a large extent upon his conforming with the group norms of his colleagues. But congressmen, too, follow the election returns; prestige and influence in the internal system of the legislature are responsive to success in meeting external demands upon the member. In these respects, to be sure, the group life of a

* The research on which this article is based was made possible by a grant from The Research Committee of the Graduate School, University of Wisconsin.

¹ Woodrow Wilson, Congressional Government, preface to 1884 edition.

² George B. Galloway, Congress at the Crossroads (New York, 1946), p. 53.

³ See David B. Truman, The Governmental Process (New York, 1951), pp. 343-46.

legislative body is not different in kind from that of those small groups which have been studied with impressive results.⁴ But it certainly is more complex and its members are more sophisticated. Consequently, it presents more formidable problems than do simpler groups.

A study of the group life of Congress might well begin with the standing committee. It is a small group, susceptible in most of its operations to close observation. Because its membership is relatively stable, its leaders men of long committee tenure, it has a continuous group life of its own. One factor in that group life, of course, is the pressure from the house whose creature it is, but the committee is worth studying as a human group in its own right. Furthermore, there is the attractive possibility that techniques so developed will be useful in the more difficult undertaking with the larger group of which it is a part. And it is relatively accessible to research: most of its hearings are open to the public and an adequate record is kept. The public hearing is only a part of the activity of a committee, but it is an important and often revealing part.

The standing committee then is a promising group with which to begin a study of the behavior of congressmen in the legislative struggle for at least four reasons. One is the greater frequency of interaction of individual congressmen in committees than on the floor of their house. On the floor a congressman may speak seldom, and on a particular issue may confine himself to a single prepared speech. But in a committee in which he is active he talks many times and with less formality. A second reason is that in the committee hearings a group of congressmen are subject to common stimuli. They hear the same witnesses and react to the same comments. The third is that the committee is a group of manageable size for intensive study. It is possible to observe it closely, and its members are few enough that roles can be kept straight and relationships plotted. A fourth is that it has, within limits, a continuous life. Its membership changes, but members are encouraged by the seniority principle to stay on a committee. And the change of membership is never complete and seldom drastic at one time; group norms can easily be transmitted to new members. Thus the committee is a subgroup of its house which is itself a going concern.

I. SOME HYPOTHESES ABOUT THE COMMITTEE

We are not without generalizations about the roles that committees—and inferentially committee members—play in the legislative process. The general literature on legislation and the political process furnishes several which might serve as hypotheses for further testing. One of the most tenacious of the basic concepts has the committee discovering, protecting, and advancing the general interest out of the welter of special interests contending for support. As Professor Chamberlain puts it: "The committee itself must be the guardian of the general public interest, too large and too vague to be organized. What is in the general interest is for the committee to determine, after hearing advocates of the special interests who appear before it."⁵ After giving a number of examples of committee actions, he asserts that "the committee played principally the part of a legislative court, listening to the evidence of fact and law brought before it by interested parties, considering their suggestions . . .", then deciding what should be done.⁶

⁴ See especially George C. Homans, The Human Group (New York, 1950), in which five distinguished studies in social behavior are examined in detail to develop both an organic theory of the human group and a system of analysis for further study of the group.

This notion of the committee's function perhaps is accepted implicitly in the recent emphasis on the committee's role as a fact-finding agency. Political scientists, and some congressmen, have insisted that committees need professional staff with secure tenure, capable of serving either party with equal competence.⁷ To insure the non-partisan and objective character of their service, some have urged a legislative career service, perhaps with staff members to be drawn from a pool, with a professional personnel director in charge of recruitment. The argument is that the professional staff could get objective facts for the committee, thus ending the committee's dependence upon the selected facts of lobbyists and the not disinterested experts borrowed from the bureaus.

A second function, not unlike the first, is that of providing, through its public hearings, an open public forum.⁸ The special interests still vie with each other, the general interest still must emerge from their clamor, but the stage is heightened, and a larger audience participates in the decision.

A somewhat different set of generalizations—or hypotheses—rests upon the conception of the legislative process as simply one phase of the political struggle, in which contending groups seek access to governmental power at a number of points, the legislative committee being one.⁹ The committee members are not judges, discovering the general interest; they are themselves participants in the political struggle, as indeed are all other governmental officials. No one ⁵ Joseph P. Chamberlain, Legislative Processes: National and State (New York, 1936), p. 79.

⁶ Ibid., pp. 72-73. Emphasis added.

⁷ The Reorganization of Congress, A Report of the Committee on Congress of the American Political Science Association (Washington, D.C., 1945), p. 79; Galloway, Congress at the Crossroads, pp. 158-61; Ernest S. Griffith, Congress: Its Contemporary Role (New York, 1951), pp. 70-75; Estes Kefauver and Jack Levin, A Twentieth Century Congress (New York, 1947), pp. 167-68; Organization of the Congress, Report of the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress, pursuant to H. Con. Res. 18, H. Rep. No. 1675, 79th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 9-11; and Report from the Special Committee on the Organization of Congress, Sen. Rep. No. 1400, 79th Cong., 2d sess., pp. 21-24. See also the frequent recommendations of this nature in Organization of Congress, Hearings before the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress, pursuant to H. Con. Res. 18, 79th Cong., 2d sess.; Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, Hearings before the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, U.S. Senate, 80th Cong., 2d sess.; Organization and Operation of Congress, Hearings before the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, U.S. Senate, 82d Cong., 1st sess.

⁸ Chamberlain, p. 64.

⁹ See especially Arthur F. Bentley, The Process of Government (Bloomington, Ind., 1949), first published in 1908; Truman, The Governmental Process (cited in note 3); and Bertram M. Gross, The Legislative Struggle (New York, 1953). The latter devotes three chapters (14-16) to a realistic description of the operations of congressional committees.

knows what the "general interest" is; there is none in which everyone shares. Public policy emerges from the pull and haul of groups, and the whole thing is kept from flying to pieces because overlapping memberships in groups prevent the perfect mobilization of any interest. In this frame of reference Professor Truman sees the committee using its public hearing for three purposes.¹⁰ The first, and probably least important, is that of "transmitting information, both technical and political, from various actual and potential interest groups to the committee." The second use is as "a propaganda channel through which a public may be extended and its segments partially consolidated or reinforced." Thus the public forum is provided but the committee is not neutral; what is presented is not so much a fair debate as a set piece. The third use is to provide a catharsis for frustrations and grievances, "a quasi-ritualistic means of adjusting group conflicts and relieving disturbances through a safety-valve."

This is not, of course, an all-inclusive list of the general propositions about the roles of congressional committees, nor is it suggested that these propositions are mutually exclusive. But they are useful hypotheses for empirical research. The purpose of this study is to see how well these generalizations explain what took place in a series of public hearings before a particular committee on a given issue. The hearings chosen for a case study are those held before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency in the Spring of 1946 on the question whether the price control and stabilization program of 1942 should be continued, and if so, whether and what changes should be made in it.¹¹ No claim is made that these are "typical hearings," from which valid generalizations about all committee hearings can be made. No doubt there are numerous "types." But there are several reasons why these hearings are selected for the purposes of this study. (1) The problem is intensely political, i.e., many powerful groups have a stake in the issue and are prepared to make strong efforts to influence the outcome. (2) It is a problem which involves the "general interest"; everybody in the country will be affected in some degree by the outcome. (3) Facts would seem to have some relevance in arriving at the policy decision. There are huge quantities of data available and there are substantial bodies of politico-economic theory to which they can be related. (4) This is not a new problem. It has a history in the three years of administration of public policy in a war economy and nearly a year in a peacetime economy. It is the kind of problem, therefore, which should bring into play all the elements necessary to test the generalizations about committee behavior which we have stated.

The limitations of this kind of study are obvious. It is limited to the public hearings, although much that is important, and perhaps what is decisive, takes place elsewhere. Moreover, it is limited to the printed record of those hearings, where only what is said can be found, and that subject to editing. Inferences therefore must be made from behavior which is recorded incompletely, and perhaps inaccurately. The principal defense of a study thus restricted lies in the fact that it is made with materials which are available in profusion to the kind of people who will make most of the studies of legislative behavior. Few academic persons have data-gathering organizations at their disposal, or freedom for continuous participant-observer research. But the printed record is within the reach of the most modest seminar, making possible endless repetition and refinement. Furthermore, hypotheses which are formulated in crude studies may be used to guide studies which can employ more precise procedures.

¹⁰ The Governmental Process, pp. 372-77. Emphasis added.

¹¹ 1946 Extension of the Emergency Price Control and Stabilization Acts of 1942, As Amended, Hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency, U.S. Senate, 79th Cong., 2d sess., on S. 2028. Cited hereafter as Hearings.

II. ROLES OF COMMITTEE MEMBERS

From even a casual reading of the record it would seem that these generalizations may be extended and refined by focusing on the behavior of individual members of the committee. A multiplicity of roles are played by various members, and sometimes by a single member. The status committee chairman, for example, can be described by formal and informal powers attributed to that status. But the human chairman is a man in space and time, interacting with other men. More than that, the human chairman occupies more than one status. He is a committee chairman, but he is also a representative of a district, and a member of a complex of groups which make claims upon him and with which he identifies from time to time. And not even the status chairman can be simply defined: at one moment the status is that of the fair presiding officer, under a moral obligation to treat all interested groups fairly; at another moment it may be that of the party leader with a commitment to a program; and again it may be that of a champion of the clientele his committee serves. The role the human chairman will play, his behavior itself, will depend upon many things: upon the constituency, sectional, and party interests in the issue; upon the size of his majority and his hold over it; upon the power and popularity and party of the man in the White House.

The concepts status and role which we are using here are neither novel nor very complicated. They are used in the sense that Professor Linton uses them in his The Cultural Background of Personality.¹² Every culture, no matter how simple, is organized into a number of systems which relate the individual to his culture, among the most important being those of age-sex, family, occupation, and association groups. In a complex society with a high degree of division of labor such as our own, these systems are multifold and overlapping. "The place in a particular system which a certain individual occupies at a particular time" is referred to by Linton as "his status with respect to that system." The term role he uses "to designate the sum total of the culture patterns associated with a particular status. It thus includes the attitudes, values, and behavior ascribed by the society to any and all persons occupying this status. It can even be extended to include the legitimate expectations of such persons with respect to the behavior toward them of persons in other statuses within the same system. . . . In so far as it represents overt behavior, a role is the dynamic aspect of a status: what the individual has to do in order to validate his occupation of the status." A role thus is defined by what other people expect of the person filling it. Behavior consists of what the person actually does in filling the role. An individual congressman may occupy a number of statuses: he is a middle-aged man, a father, a congressman, a Democrat, a member of the Ways and Means Committee third in seniority, and so on. In each of these statuses he has learned to play certain roles, and to expect other people to play certain roles. He cannot play all these roles simultaneously, of course; "although he occupies statuses and knows roles at all times, he operates sometimes in terms of one status and its role, sometimes in those of another." The congressional role probably is most usefully conceived not as a single role but as a multiplicity of roles, defined for the congressman by the varying expectations of the groups which he represents or with which he identifies. These roles may be and frequently are conflicting, requiring the individual congressman temporarily to abdicate one or another of his roles, or to find some way to conciliate them, or perhaps to withdraw from the conflict which he cannot resolve.

¹² Ralph Linton, The Cultural Background of Personality (New York, 1945), pp. 76-77.

The price control controversy in the Spring of 1946 subjected congressmen to just such conflicting demands, and by the time the issue reached the Senate Committee they were well-defined. The extensive hearings before the House Committee on Banking and Currency, which culminated in a series of proposed amendments to the existing law, made certain of that. It is easy, as a consequence, to identify a representative sample of congressional roles from the behavior of the members of the Senate Committee.¹³

The only person to play clearly the role of a national party leader was Senator Robert A. Taft, and he seemed to play it consistently. To him the price control contest was simply one round in a continuing battle with the Administration. Officials of the Administration he regarded not as individuals but as representatives of a generalized program which he was attacking on all fronts. Taft made this explicit when Chester Bowles protested that Taft was criticizing him for opinions which he (Bowles) did not hold: "Mr. Bowles, may I say this: I don't distinguish you from the administration. The administration has one policy; you are the Director of Economic Stabilization. What your particular views are make no difference to me. You are carrying on the policies of the administration. When I say 'You' I should be more explicit. I mean the administration. I am not attacking you personally on it, or anything of the sort. I am criticizing your analysis of the situation which is only affected by administration policy; not by what you personally think. That makes no difference to me."¹⁴ The loan to Britain was a special target of Taft's frequent attacks on aspects of the Administration program not within the Committee's jurisdiction. But in his role of national leader, Taft did not hesitate to tell representatives of specific industries that he did not believe they should be decontrolled.¹⁵ His role apparently was appreciated by the spectators; when he excused himself from the session with Bowles, Senator Millikin noted that Taft's departure cost the Committee half its audience.¹⁶

¹³ The Democratic members of the Committee were Robert F. Wagner, New York, Chairman; Carter Glass, Virginia; Alben W. Barkley, Kentucky; John H. Bankhead 2d, Alabama; George L. Radcliffe, Maryland; Sheridan Downey, California; Abe Murdock, Utah; Ernest W. McFarland, Arizona; Glen H. Taylor, Idaho; J. William Fulbright, Arkansas; Hugh B. Mitchell, Washington; and E. P. Carville, Nevada. The Republican members were Charles W. Tobey, New Hampshire; Robert A. Taft, Ohio; Hugh A. Butler, Nebraska; Arthur Capper, Kansas; C. Douglass Buck, Delaware; Eugene D. Millikin, Colorado; Bourke B. Hickenlooper, Iowa; and Homer E. Capehart, Indiana.

There was no Democratic counterpart of Taft. The chief burden for the Administration was carried not by the ageing and ailing chairman, Senator Wagner, but by Hugh Mitchell. It was Mitchell who apparently was forewarned of the nature of impending testimony against OPA, and so was ready to confront a hotel association's witness with the statement of a firm specializing in hotel accounting that "the hotel industry of this country is at its peak;" a meat institute's spokesman with a retail grocers' attack on the institute's market survey; the automobile dealers' representative with a court decision upholding the OPA cost absorption policy complained of; and a retail dry goods association's director with a Small Business Committee report claiming that prevailing prices were not hindering production by established firms.¹⁷ Mitchell's favorite tactics were to call for figures and more figures, and then discredit or interpret the figures if possible. But he was content to undertake no more than his role on the Committee required, leaving a general defense of the Administration to another time and place.

Another familiar legislative role, that of representative of a sectional interest, was played with almost classic purity in these hearings by Senator Bankhead. His concern was the Southern cotton farmer and the textile industry which buys his product; like a sensitive seismograph picking up vibrations in far corners of the globe, Bankhead reacted to testimony which remotely affected his chief interest. A lumber manufacturer was asked about timber on land owned by farmers, and the price of southern pine compared with western pine. A general discussion of how OPA figured profits was turned into a specific discussion of how it was done on cotton textiles. No suggestion that the industry was doing better than during an OPA base period was acceptable.¹⁸ A general discussion of industry advisory committees led him to point out that the 15-member committee on women's blouses had not a single member from the South, and get a promise of OPA action.¹⁹ Bankhead's interventions were devoted almost ¹⁴ Hearings, p. 43.

¹⁵ Hearings, pp. 965, 1265.

¹⁶ Hearings, p. 29.

¹⁷ Hearings, pp. 986-87, 1094, 1295-96, 1311.

¹⁸ Hearings, pp. 704-6, 1730-31.

¹⁹ Hearings, p. 325. There followed this colloquy:

Senator Tobey: That is not Senator Claghorn speaking. That is Senator Bankhead.
Senator Bankhead: What was that?

Senator Tobey: That was a joke, Senator. I said it was not Senator Claghorn, it was my friend Senator Bankhead speaking about the South.

Senator Bankhead: I am always trying to get justice for them. That is a hard task very often, I will say to my New England Senator friend.

exclusively to his one interest, and when witnesses equipped to talk about that were on the stand his usual taciturnity vanished. On one morning the Committee heard seven witnesses, three of whom represented the cotton textile industry.²⁰ With these three witnesses Bankhead accounted for more than one-third of all the interruptions (questions and comments). Of the other four (representing apartment owners and hotels) he asked no questions at all. Bankhead presided over the hearings on two occasions; on one, the principal witnesses represented the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Grange, and the National Cooperative Milk Producers Federation; on the other, the witness was the Secretary of Agriculture.²¹

The Committee members seemed most impressive when they were acting as representatives of specific constituency interests in their states. Here they seemed to speak as experts in their own right. The clichés fell away, the fuzziness and amateurishness disappeared; here the facts were clear and the grasp sure. As a consequence, when the senators talked details of the products and industries of their states with each other they could get together on what they meant, the frustrations of contradictory figures and shifting frames of reference relieved for the moment. Mitchell on the dairy industry in Washington, Murdock and Millikin on dairy cattle in Utah and Colorado, Hickenlooper on land prices in Iowa, Fulbright on strawberries and poultry in Arkansas²²—these are but a few examples of members speaking easily and with authority on the interests of their states.

This role occupied Senator McFarland to the virtual exclusion of any other. He took very little part in the hearings. His interest was in the subsidies paid to the lead, copper, and zinc industries, which were important in Arizona. Early in 1942 the OPA froze the prices of these metals, and then sought to increase production by awarding subsidies for increments over base-period output on a mine-to-mine and month-to-month basis. McFarland proposed an amendment, supported by the industries, which would shift 60 per cent of the subsidies into the prices of the metals and put the remainder on a noncancelable basis. McFarland came late for Bowles' presentation and made sure the matter had not come up. In the meeting devoted to it, McFarland carefully guided the testimony of the industry representatives and answered many of the senators' questions himself. He displayed no interest in the subsidy question in regard to anything else. He took little part in the remainder of the hearings until the last day, when the OPA administrator of meat prices was called by the Committee in reference to several telegrams from Arizona meat dealers received by McFarland.²³

There is a difference, of course, in seeking to amend a law, which is the legislative function in its primary form, and interceding with an administrative agency in behalf of a constituent. The latter is the "errand-boy" role, and by ²⁰ Hearings, pp. 931-1041.

²¹ Hearings, pp. 637-777, 1043-88.

²² Hearings, pp. 176, 687-88, 1046-49, 1721-23.

²³ Hearings, pp. 74-75, 436-95, 1733, 1791-93.

the accounts of legislators themselves a large part of their time is spent playing it.²⁴ There is eloquent testimony in the hearings to the importance of the role to both legislator and administrator: in the senators' complaints that OPA handled congressional mail slowly, and in Paul Porter's reply that the agency got 1500 congressional letters a week and had a rule, not always carried out, that they must be answered in three days.²⁵ The errand boy role was not dropped at the committee room door. Capehart brought up three wires from merchants in Indiana complaining about the trouser problem ("Do you have a trouser expert here, Mr. Porter?"); Taylor the case of a packer in Idaho; Mitchell that of a packing company in Tacoma, Washington; Buck that of a factory in Johnstown, Pennsylvania, about which he had a letter; and Bankhead that of a Mr. Flagg of Florence, Alabama.²⁶ Names were called and action solicited. Hickenlooper, for example, instructed Porter to "make available to me all of the records of Mr. Slotkin and his meat operations for the last 4 years and whatever investigations you have made and alleged infractions and shortcomings; all the meat quotas and his record of ceiling purchases. . . . I would like to see the file and know why something has not been done about it."²⁷ Tobey raised the case of a New Hampshire veteran who thought OPA was stopping him from fabricating lumber he had logged himself. The OPA man present could not answer the question, but it was later handled to Tobey's satisfaction, although, curiously enough, not to that of Millikin of Colorado.²⁸ Senatorial interventions in the administrative process, of which these are samples, were made frankly and the administrators commended for prompt service. Hickenlooper spoke appreciatively of Porter's alacrity in the one case the Senator asked him personally to handle, and Capehart stated: "I personally have been over to OPA on any number of occasions, and I must say that I think my batting average has been about 99 percent in the matter of getting adjustments."²⁹

Still another role is involved when an industry brings its problems before the Committee and, in effect, gets a review of the policy and rulings of the administrative agency. This happened several times during the hearings. Typically, the industry in question was not one in which any individual senator was particularly interested; it simply was one which was not satisfied with the results it had gotten in its dealings with OPA. The senators allowed themselves to become entangled in the technical details of the industry's problems, frequently accepted the industry's version, and then called on OPA for action. A good example occurred early in the hearings, when representatives of the underwear industry appeared and complained in detail of OPA procedures and policies. It soon became obvious that their problems had a long history and that the Committee was not competent to legislate in detail for the underwear

²⁴ See the statements in Galloway, Congress at the Crossroads, pp. 57-63.

²⁵ Hearings, pp. 1725-26. Tobey suggested that a review board be established to handle congressional cases faster.

²⁶ Hearings, pp. 175-76, 181, 182, 130-32, 110.

²⁷ Hearings, p. 1743.

²⁸ Hearings, pp. 1667, 1693.

²⁹ Hearings, pp. 132, 111.

industry. An OPA man was sent for, and there followed a confrontation scene between him and the underwear maker he allegedly was driving out of business.³⁰

The usual effect of the Committee's interest in a particular industry or business was that the OPA then tackled the complainant's applications with speed, giving him real service. The Committee thus constituted itself a kind of super-administrative agency, intervening capriciously and depending upon business to initiate the process. Capehart got an assurance that a price increase would be granted the cheese industry, and Taft a promise of immediate action on evaporated milk.³¹ In some cases the outcome was ambiguous, as with Capehart's efforts in regard to the price of butter and oil, and Millikin's attempt to "get an airtight promise out of OPA to decontrol poultry."³² In one instance a glove-maker under suit for alleged violation of the law brought his case to the Committee, and strong pressures were placed on the OPA enforcement chief by Committee members, apparently in an effort to persuade him to drop the case.³³

One way to intercept the shifting roles of the Committee members is to observe the variations in their behavior when different witnesses appear before them—representatives of the Administration, of interest groups, businesses, etc. The Administration point of view, in support of extension of price control "without crippling amendments," was well represented on the Committee. Wagner, Mitchell, Barkley, Taylor, Radcliffe, Murdock, Fulbright, and Tobey (a Republican), were usually dependable, and sometimes aggressive, supporters of OPA. But it would have been hard to tell it during the testimony of Bowles or Porter, the first two witnesses before the Committee. Despite Bowles' hopeful introductory comment that he would like to read his statement through and then answer questions on it, Taft, Capehart, and Millikin promptly took charge. In his first appearance there is no page of uninterrupted testimony, in his second only three.³⁴ So intensive was the barrage that at one point the roles were reversed, with Bowles cross-examining Taft on the Senator's statements.³⁵ In all of Bowles' testimony, there are no more than four interventions by Administration senators to ask leading questions in support of the witness. In the two early appearances of Porter, who on the whole was treated more gently than Bowles, there are only three.³⁶ It is hard to escape the conclusion that the senators were content to let the bureaucrats take care of themselves as best they could. The role of the legislator versus the bureaucrat is an old one, rooted in an institutional jealousy never hard to arouse. Anti-OPA witnesses were well aware of it: statements that "Congress treated us fairly but OPA interpretation stripped away relief" and charges of "OPA usurpation" were staples of their testimony. And the target was well-chosen; even the gentle Barkley, staunch friend of OPA, remarked once ". . . I won in the Senate, but I lost in OPA."³⁷ Administration witnesses were not all treated the same, needless to say; Fred ³⁰ Hearings, pp. 229-73.

³¹ Hearings, pp. 845-46, 1725.

³² Hearings, pp. 853-58, 1087, 1724.

³³ Hearings, pp. 1516-38.

³⁴ Hearings, pp. 6-75.

³⁵ Hearings, pp. 25-26.

³⁶ Hearings, pp. 77-208.

³⁷ Hearings, p. 956.

Vinson was the only important witness who was allowed to read his statement through without interruption.³⁸ Among his many services to his country, the Secretary of the Treasury could count six terms in the House of Representatives.³⁹

The lethargy of the Administration senators, which hung on through the appearances of several spokesmen of particular industries, disappeared instantly with the appearance of Robert R. Wason, president of the National Association of Manufacturers.⁴⁰ Before Wason had read two hundred words of his statement, his right to speak for the public, for industry, or even for the NAM, had been challenged. From that point on the fight seems pretty even, as it was later when James B. Carey, secretary-treasurer of the Congress of Industrial Organizations, appeared.⁴¹ NAM and CIO were the principal ideological protagonists in the fight over the extension of price control, and this was clearly reflected in the interest group split on the Committee when their representatives appeared.⁴² Neither man was allowed a page of uninterrupted testimony. The role here was that of legislator pro-or-con interest groups. The senators clearly were identifying with private interest groups in a struggle which cut across the separate branches of the government.

Other group identifications can be perceived in the hearings. For instance, the special position of farm groups in American politics was underlined. In the welter of name-calling and exaggerated charges, there is not one criticism of farmers. Everyone agreed they deserved well of the republic. On one occasion Taylor came dangerously close to a critical remark; in defending the government's paying a premium price for grain, he said: "The farmers knew that they [starving people] had to have it, but unfortunately they have held on to the wheat and corn. I don't think it is to the credit of the American farmers themselves. . . ." But Capehart forthwith restated the official congressional position: ". . . I don't agree with the Senator that the American farmer is unpatriotic. I think they are among the most patriotic people this Nation has and I want the record to so state. I don't agree with that statement at all."⁴³ Ed O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, reflected the magnificent immunity of the farmers when he blamed the inflation, with fine impartiality and without challenge, on the Congress, both parties, the Treasury, the Federal Reserve, and the whole Administration, as well as OPA.⁴⁴ Again, ³⁸ Hearings, pp. 1551-78.

³⁹ In the 68th to 75th Congresses, except for the 71st.

⁴⁰ Hearings, pp. 392-428. ⁴¹ Hearings, pp. 573-603.

⁴² Consider this fine exchange:

Mr. Carey: There are no such things as "natural economic laws."

Senator Millikin: Who repealed those?

Mr. Carey: They never existed.

Senator Millikin: My God! That is astounding information.

Mr. Carey: In the first place, economic laws are a prostitution of the aims of nature, whose first purpose is to fill the needs of man . . . (Hearings, p. 576. Emphasis added).

⁴³ Hearings, p. 800.

⁴⁴ Hearings, pp. 668-69.

it was reflected in the lack of any interrogation of James G. Patton, president of the National Farmers Union, whose record as a political actionist might have been expected to invite cross-examination.⁴⁵

One identification any congressman is likely to make is that with his former, or other, occupation. This is borne out in the lawyer-like conduct of the legislative hearing itself, with its cross-examinations and its concern for "the record." As Ernest Griffith has remarked, "The majority of congressmen were (and still are) lawyers, and, to a lawyer, truth emerges from a battle of protagonists."⁴⁶ But other occupations also are represented, and the label "lawyer" frequently covers a variety of activities. It is a virtue of the legislature that it is made up of "general" men, and it is natural that legislators should test what they hear against the commonsense of their own experience. The senators on this committee did so; Murdock, for example, talked to a livestock man about his own grass-fed steers, and Millikin remarked: "I am speaking somewhat categorically on this because I have had considerable experience in the oil business."⁴⁷ But this is not the same thing, quite, as identifying with an occupational group and perceiving facts in their frame of reference. That is what Capehart seemed to do. A farmer and manufacturer, Capehart had been in the Senate less than two years. He made reference to both of his other occupations, but it was clear that Capehart saw price control in his role as businessman. Over a quarter of a century of experience had conditioned him to trust a businessman's judgment and resent the bureaucrat's interference in the economy. As he put it himself (objecting to questions asked of a businessman): "My observation is that anyone that comes in here from an industry knows his business. They are the people who are trying to make things and do business under all the difficulties that confront them, and trying to be honest and sincere and conscientious, and in the hope that they will be permitted to remain in business. I think that to question their integrity and honesty . . ." To which Barkley replied, in part: "We had a witness here yesterday who questioned the sincerity and honesty and integrity of everybody in the Government and you didn't complain about that."⁴⁸ But Barkley, who first went to Congress in 1913, had complained the day before, as he did on every occasion when government officials were attacked indiscriminately.

That Senator Capehart continued to regard price control as a businessman would, so long as he remained a minority member of the Committee, is suggested by his writing in 1951 what President Truman called "the terrible Capehart amendment," which Truman said made price control impossible. But in 1953 Capehart assumed the new status of Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, and with it a new role requiring him to accept primary responsibility for the legislation reported by the Committee. In his new role he ⁴⁵ Hearings, pp. 691-99.

⁴⁶ Congress: Its Contemporary Role (cited in note 7), p. 63.

⁴⁷ Hearings, pp. 1205, 1718. Millikin is an example of the lawyer in Congress: his biography in the Congressional Directory includes law, the army, and politics, but not the oil business.

⁴⁸ Hearings, p. 1316.

advocated stand-by controls for prices, wages, and rent. He found it hard to understand the intransigence of groups which were "unalterably opposed" to any concession to the principle of controls, and understandably shocked to hear himself accused by a business lobbyist of espousing a philosophy of the "left." It would be hard to find a more striking example of the effect of a change of status.⁴⁹

Senator Tobey appeared briefly from time to time in his peculiarly personal role of moral prophet. He was inclined to indict the whole people for lacking the moral fiber to resist the tainted opportunities afforded by the black market. In the tones of Jeremiah, later to become familiar to the television audience of Kefauver's crime investigation, he called upon the people "to rise up and say 'Unclean, unclean'."⁵⁰

Some of the roles which might have been anticipated were not played by anybody. That of the dictatorial chairman, sure of his power, was one. That of the subject-matter expert, whose prestige in a given field is widely accepted (e.g., O'Mahoney on economic questions⁵¹), was another. The hectoring-inquisitor role was not played consistently by anybody.

The limitations upon what can be done in a study of behavior from the printed record alone have already been acknowledged. The pattern of interactions among the members can be studied fully only from first-hand observation. What does it mean in the climate of the hearing for a particular member to be present? Or absent? It can be seen from the record that questions, and sometimes tempers, tended to get shorter when Senator Taft was on hand. That is tantalizingly suggestive, but not enough. Who supports, who opposes, whom? Who retreats into silence from whom? Such questions can be answered only by the observer. The item in the record which might reveal significant interactions may be the very one which is subsequently edited from it.

It is hard to evaluate the role of leadership with any method, and especially so when reliance must be placed on the printed record. On the surface, it would appear that Senator Wagner had little control over his Committee in the price control controversy. The power of the committee chairman is justly celebrated in political journalism, but it may be that like so many other concentrations of power in the Congress, it can be used most effectively against a majority only in a negative way. The chairman can prevent committee consideration, prevent a report, prevent floor consideration, much more easily than he can command a balky majority to do something positive. When Congress passes legislation requiring periodic reenactment, as it does so often now, it must counteract to some extent the power of the few to control the many. Wagner was not able to get his way with this Committee. He refused to sign the report. Barkley signed it only to get it on the floor, making clear his opposition to it. What went on in the executive sessions, where the bill was amended heavily over the opposition of the chairman, obviously is not to be learned from the record, and perhaps not in any other way.

⁴⁹ See Robert Bendiner in "The Apostasy of Homer Capehart," The Reporter, May 12, 1953, pp. 30-32, for an interesting description of the Senator's discomfiting experience.

⁵⁰ Hearings, p. 1673.

⁵¹ See Earl Latham, The Group Basis of Politics (Ithaca, N. Y., 1952).

Some elaborate studies based on role theory have been made of complex organizations,⁵² and the congressional committee would seem to be an inviting subject for such research. That much, at least, seems clear from the foregoing analysis; no generalizations about the committee are valid which do not take into account the varied and complex statuses which congressmen hold, and the shifting roles which they play in filling first one and then another of them. A congressional committee is an agency for the implementation of the purposes of congressmen. Functionally, it gives to bills the detailed consideration which the full house cannot, but in other ways it is simply another point of focus of the political process, as its parent house is also. It is a part of "the legislative struggle," to use Bertram Gross's term, but, as he indicates, the struggle is a confused one in which the participants fight for different and changing purposes and represent many and sometimes opposing causes. National and parochial ends are inextricably entwined in the Congress, and so they are in the committee. Taft, holding no elective party office in the Senate and sharing eighth rank in seniority with three others, nevertheless chooses the role of national leader for himself and effectively shapes the expectations of others to that role. The committee hearing is no more than a shift of scene for him. McFarland, soon to lead the Democrats in the Senate, chooses for reasons of his own to use this time and place to plead narrowly for the industries of his state. Therein lies the value of the committee hearing for the student of political behavior: within a more manageable compass, the congressmen behave like congressmen.

III. THE COMMITTEE AS A FACT-FINDING AGENCY

The Committee's performance as a fact-finding agency is worth special consideration. Quantitatively, at least, an impressive job was done. Nineteen days were consumed in public hearings, during which 12 public officials, 38 spokesmen of business and business groups, five representatives of organized labor, eight farm group leaders, and nine persons representing other groups—72 witnesses in all—testified before the Committee. The printed record ran to 2212 pages, including 541 exhibits, charts, statements, letters, and telegrams. Thousands of questions were asked and answered. Out of this welter of facts and opinions, what did the Committee learn about the problems of economic stabilization? What kinds of questions did its members ask? What picture of the factual situation emerged from the answers they got? In the light of the Committee's performance, what might be done to make legislative committees generally more effective as fact-finders?

These questions would be easier to answer if the Committee had ever formulated a set of questions to which the hearings should supply answers. That the ⁵² See Eugene Jacobson, W. W. Charters, Jr., and Seymour Lieberman, "The Use of the Role Concept in the Study of Complex Organizations," The Journal of Social Issues, Vol. 7, pp. 18-27 (No. 3, 1951), and the publications of the Survey Research Center, University of Michigan, which are listed there.

Committee did not do. Nevertheless there were questions which, because of their pertinence, were raised again and again, by the witnesses and by the senators themselves. For the purposes of this study, several of these recurring questions were traced carefully through the hearings, to see whether any or all of them could be answered, unambiguously, from the record. Careful attention was paid to the leading questions and gratuitous statements of the senators, to see what facts they accepted, and whether their conceptions of the "facts" ever changed. From this procedure there emerged, not one picture of the factual situation, but two. The senators who supported OPA accepted one, those who opposed OPA the other. Some sharpening of details in each picture doubtless occurred, but there was no indication of a change in the general picture for either group. Each group seemed to come into the hearings with a ready-made frame of reference. Facts which were compatible were fitted into it; facts which were not compatible, even when elaborately documented, were discounted, not perceived, or ignored. This is not so hard as it sounds. A disagreeable fact is not an isolated fact, but one of a constellation of facts. Which is the relevant one? And when statistics seem accurate beyond dispute, there is the question of selecting the relevant variable or the proper base period, or perhaps of whether there is not a serious contrary trend which began too late to be reflected in the figures. Thus contradictions need not be resolved, and in these hearings they were not resolved. The hearings could be said not to have progressed. At the end the same questions were being asked as at the beginning, and were receiving the same sets of answers.

There was not necessarily agreement within either group over what should be done about price controls. The pro forma claim that "I don't know how I'm going to vote on this matter" was made frequently, and most of the senators would say that price controls ultimately would be extended—with modifications. What divided them was that one group would accept statements of fact which put the OPA in a good light, and receive sympathetically the claims of groups which supported the OPA and the Administration. The other group would not. The first group was made up loosely of the Democrats Wagner, Mitchell, Barkley, Taylor, Fulbright, Murdock, and Radcliffe, and the Republican Tobey. The opposing group was composed of the Republicans Capehart, Millikin, Taft, Hickenlooper, Buck, and Butler, and the Democrat Bankhead. Other members of the Committee did not participate frequently enough to be placed with any confidence. The first group's conception of the facts was shared roughly with Administration spokesmen, labor representatives, the president of the National Farmers Union, and several other group representatives purporting to speak for the "liberal" or the consumer point of view. The second group listened most receptively to business spokesmen and the representatives of the other farm groups. These classifications are rough, of course, and should be taken that way. They are not meant to indicate anything approaching complete uniformity.

Some of these questions, and the ways in which the two groups answered them, may now be considered.

What was the "lesson" of World War I? The Administration clearly thought that the experience of World War I supported the extension of price controls. Every Administration witness mentioned, it, and charts were brought in to support their story.⁵³ Starting back in 1914, it ran, prices rose precipitously until some voluntary controls were partially successful in checking the rise in 1917-18. After a brief post-Armistice recession, with controls off, prices rose sharply again in 1919-20, causing a snowballing of demand and a hoarding of inventories, in anticipation of even higher prices. Ultimately a buyers' strike caused collapse; deflation and depression were the result of the unchecked spiral of prices. To these witnesses and their supporters the moral seemed clear: weakening the price control program in 1946 would bring the same disastrous results.

To the other side it was not clear at all. They doubted the relevance of the earlier experience to the problem at hand. Or they were impressed with the shortness of the periods of inflation and deflation in World War I. Taking the post-Armistice figures alone (which they frequently did), neither the climb nor the subsequent drop looked so bad. They pointed out that a "flood of goods" had eventually forced prices down, forgetting that prices had gone up three times as much as industrial production, and that the "flood of goods" had been released—not produced—by deflationary dumping. Even recollections of the period fell conveniently into place; Glen Taylor remembered it as a dreadful experience, Capehart as not bad at all.⁵⁴ Millikin was perhaps the most intransigent. He could see on the government's charts only one fact, that prices had gone down. The buyers' strike had prevented an "explosive inflation"—by which he meant not the 150 per cent increase the World War I charts showed, but the kind of runaway inflation the Germans had.⁵⁵

What causes inflation? This question caused difficulty, because whenever it was discussed seriously it took the Committee quickly outside its jurisdictional field. Farm policy, fiscal policy, the wages of labor, and many other things not the Committee's business were involved in the stabilization program. But the question had to be raised. The Administration group saw the principal inflationary threats in the economic forces OPA sought to control. The pent-up demands from the war period, supported by 225 billions in purchasing power, exceeded the total current supply of goods. Production was at a record high level, despite labor shortages and the problems of reconversion, but it would take time to "fill the pipelines" from producer to consumer and meet the demand. In this interim period, price controls were imperative to prevent a disastrous spiral. These were the bed-rock economic facts, but this group suspected more. They believed that businessmen were hoarding inventories, thus ⁵³ The statements used in this section were all selected because they were made many times. Therefore, no attempt will be made to document them except where a particular quotation is used by way of illustration. For a representative Administration statement of the World War I experience, see the testimony of John D. Small, head of the Civilian Production Administration, at pp. 1449-50.

⁵⁴ Hearings, pp. 206-7.

⁵⁵ Hearings, pp. 1585-86.

aggravating the shortages, in order to make huge profits if price controls were removed. They also believed that speculation—"betting on inflation"—made the control job harder.

The charge of inventory-hoarding is a good example of the influence of group ideology on the perception of facts. It was made repeatedly by pro-OPA witnesses, and apparently believed implicitly. Yet when the opposing senators demanded proof, it was sometimes promised but never furnished. Paul Porter could report an incident he knew about, and surmise that the situation, whatever it was, would get worse as the date for the expiration of controls drew near.⁵⁶ A member of a CIO local told about finding a back room full of oil at a place where he had been told there was no oil.⁵⁷ That was the extent of the proof of inventory-hoarding, but the charge would not down; it was an essential element of the version of the facts held by OPA supporters. Their opponents, curiously enough, accepted inventory-hoarding as a fact sometimes, justifying it on the grounds that the hoarders could not make a profit under OPA, or that they hoped OPA would see "the light" and treat them fairly.

Anti-OPA witnesses and senators found the chief causes of inflation in the policies of OPA itself. OPA kept prices unrealistically low, forcing producers to concentrate on high price lines or inferior substitutes. By refusing to recognize rising costs of production, OPA impeded production. OPA propaganda and "scare talk" created an inflation psychology, leading to panic buying and hoarding. Other Administration policies, including the unbalanced budget and the loan to Britain, compounded the pressures on prices. So did the wage increases which the Administration permitted. To this group, wage increase always started an inflationary spiral, just as a price increase did for the pro-OPA group. Similarly, Taft would not agree with Bowles that repeal of the excess profits tax was inflationary, but he was sure the loan to Britain was.⁵⁸

What has been the overall effect of price controls on the economy? OPA and its friends were sure that OPA had stabilized the economy and prevented inflation. Their charts showed it; the cost-of-living index had risen only about 30 per cent since 1939.⁵⁹ They claimed that the cost-of-living had risen only about $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent since price controls became effective in 1943, and had gone up only .7 per cent since V-J day. In this time, controls had prevented neither production nor profits. Everyone knew that production had been enormous, and the charts showed that it had risen at its wartime peak nearly 140 per cent over the 1939 level. Their opponents would contest it, but OPA was prepared to support the claim that business profits had been high, too. OPA believed that it had preserved economic stability and made planning possible.

Its opponents believed that the overall effect of OPA on the economy had been bad. Some were willing to accept it as a wartime necessity, and to make a grudging admission that it had done an acceptable, even a good job, if only its powers could be terminated soon. But others would not concede that it had done a good job. The kindest view was that it was not OPA's fault: the economy

⁵⁶ Hearings, p. 198.

⁵⁷ Hearings, p. 608.

⁵⁸ Hearings, p. 39.

⁵⁹ Hearings, p. 1450.

was too complex for controls, and besides, price controls could only treat effects, not causes. Some argued that inflation had been serious in spite of OPA (amounting to 32 per cent over 1941)⁶⁰ but generally the figures did not seem to matter much; they did not settle the question, as they might have been expected to do. Millikin said again and again that OPA never had held a line when there was real pressure on it, that the goods simply flowed into the black market and the price line became a "fiction." OPA had made it impossible for farmers, dry goods wholesalers, retail meat dealers (and others, explicitly and by inference) to operate legally. The government's figures actually demonstrated a chief vice of OPA: the agency concentrated on controlling the cost-of-living index, rather than encouraging production through incentive prices where needed. The bill of particulars against OPA was a long one; in addition to hampering production, penalizing the efficient producer, and diverting goods to the black market, OPA had used its consumer subsidy program to increase the demand for the limited supply of goods. The overall effect of OPA, they believed, had been to aggravate inflationary pressures.

What is the administrative record of OPA? The administrative performance of OPA was under continuous attack; the agency and its friends never got off the defensive. OPA was charged with handling appeals slowly, with issuing orders that were hard to understand, with tying up business with red tape. It was not improving, or if it were, it still was not good enough. OPA was inflexible; it handled individual firms with industry-wide orders, and refused to modify those orders. These criticisms were to be expected, but there were worse. The agency had "continuously and directly violated the Price Control Act,"⁶¹ Taft said, and Goss, master of the Grange, was even more sweeping when he said: "For four years the OPA has thumbed its nose at Congress, has violated the basic law under which it was created, and has pursued an illegal but politically expedient course which has fed the fires of inflation and then tried to control the fire by stopping up the chimney."⁶² Its "vicious propaganda" had created a "scare psychology" among buyers. OPA was accused especially of refusing to grant relief in hardship cases, as provided for by law, and of holding up production by maintaining inadequate ceiling prices which they had the power to raise. This line of criticism fell into a syllogism: every increase requested is necessary to production; any delay in granting it holds up production; therefore, OPA is responsible for critical shortages (e.g., in housing for veterans).⁶³ Since there was no question of the righteousness of every request for an increase, if OPA held one up a year it was only because of administrative ineptitude; the fact that it was granted ultimately proved it was right all the time, without regard to any change in circumstances which might have occurred.

Under this drum-fire of criticism, OPA was pushed into defending itself by citing the number of adjustments it had made and price increases it had allowed.⁶⁴ The agency officers contended they had a "realistic" approach to price

⁶⁰ Hearings, p. 866.

⁶¹ Hearings, p. 1243.

⁶² Hearings, p. 674.

⁶³ Hearings, pp. 301-4.

⁶⁴ Hearings. See, for example, pp. 82, 155-56, 159-62, 783-84, 1580, 1727.

control (i.e., one which allowed prices to go up). The ambivalence in their position was resolved by claiming that, while they had held the line against general inflation, they had granted adjustments to get production or relieve hardship. The Administration group was willing to admit mistakes, but insisted that OPA's procedures had been improved and made more than reasonably efficient. A detailed account of procedures employed to reduce delay in handling individual adjustment cases was placed in the record, with statistics demonstrating their effectiveness.⁶⁵ Breakdowns in production were traced to shortages in labor and materials, not to administrative delay. But the criticisms, needless to say, were not affected in the least.

The influence of group ideology on fact perception was clearly reflected in the image of OPA as a human organization which each group held. The opponents of OPA saw the agency people as theorists, inexperienced in business, telling experienced businessmen what to do. The complaint that "OPA does not understand the underwear industry" (or the construction industry, or any other) was frequently heard, and doubtless it was true. As one OPA official put it, it was impossible to have an expert in every line. To a businessman involved in the unique particulars of his own business, the edicts of an agency which of necessity sought to generalize its rules were bound to seem amateurish and arbitrary. Thus the professor, whom the Congress had tried to legislate out of OPA, proved as a stereotype to be ineradicable. Consequently, the anti-OPA senators were prepared to accept assertions of industry representatives that inexperienced men were dictating terms to their particular industries. Detailed statements of the experience of men in those branches of OPA were of no avail.⁶⁶ The automobile dealers complained that there were no persons remaining in OPA who had experience in the retail automobile business; Porter listed four in the Automotive Branch, and the dealers carried the debate into the appendix of the record.⁶⁷ In answer to the lumbermen's charge, Porter listed 17 employees with a total experience in the lumber business of 400 years.⁶⁸ But Taft was sure that no retail lumberman knew anything about pricing for the industry. And so it went. That there was more involved than the legislator's stereotype of the bureaucrat is clear from the persistence with which the Administration senators defended the competence and experience of OPA administrators, whom they believed to be able and patriotic men who frequently were hired away from OPA by business.

What are the motives of OPA? The contrary images of OPA extended to the motives imputed to the administrators themselves. Their opponents saw them as enemies of capitalism, who hated profits, liked controls for their own sake, and wanted to perpetuate their own jobs. "Last year, this year, next year, the year after" was heard again and again, summing up the anti-OPA belief that ⁶⁵ Hearings, pp. 138-45.

⁶⁶ See the list of OPA personnel connected with pricing of textile industries, Hearings, pp. 118-25.

⁶⁷ Hearings, pp. 1272, 1760, 1874-76.

⁶⁸ Hearings, p. 1713.

OPA would always ask for extension of its regulatory powers. The statements were bitter. Bowles was compared to Hitler and Mussolini, without rebuke from anti-OPA senators. OPA officials belonged to that "school of thought that believes that the wholesaler, jobber, and distributor are excrescences on the body politic." Again, "... the fundamental philosophy of OPA is the abolition of profits, the regulation of profits, and the stifling of private enterprise." The kindest construction put on their motives was that they were "a group of very sincere, honest young people that want to reshape the world nearer to their heart's desire ... but they seem to disregard the effect of these regulations on legitimate established business."⁶⁹ Given this image of OPA, it was easy to believe in specific acts of duplicity and abuses of power. When a price increase was granted an industry the day before its spokesman appeared before the Committee, Capehart was sure the timing was deliberate. The OPA contention that at least two months were required to clear a price order did not move him (although usually he would accept the argument that OPA could do nothing in a hurry).⁷⁰ OPA was charged with allowing a rental 50 per cent above ceilings on some new apartment buildings in New York, just to prevent apartment owners from claiming there was no new building under OPA.⁷¹

OPA's own statements of its policies and practices obviously would not be acceptable to senators who saw them in this light. Porter stated the decontrol policy of OPA this way: "... if we can find that there is a reasonable prospect that there will not be inflationary increases to the extent that would jeopardize the general policy of stabilization, we can take [price control] off." But Millikin was sure that if OPA should take "a long look through the future and if you see some little dislocation ahead that might interfere with prices, you are not going to decontrol."⁷² Some of the senators favored writing a rigid decontrol formula into the law, on the ground that OPA could not be trusted to decontrol otherwise. Perhaps the blackest picture of OPA was painted by Millikin in grilling the OPA deputy administrator for enforcement. Millikin insisted that OPA set quotas for its enforcement officers, smeared innocent business men and set traps for them with sweeping injunctions, and forced federal judges to render judgments they knew to be unjust. Murdock finally was moved to protest that OPA did not write the law, nor confirm the federal judges, and "that if you go to the length that Senator Millikin wants you to, we must assume that we have a fool on the bench as well as a rather vicious fool in the OPA Enforcement Section."⁷³

The Administration group could see no justification for impugning the motives of OPA officials. As they saw it, "they are all down here on loan from busi-

⁶⁹ Hearings, pp. 1185-86, 1356, 971, 1356. See p. 971 particularly for the contrast in the images of OPA held by the president of the National Apartment Owners' Association and by Senator Glen Taylor.

⁷⁰ Hearings, pp. 1311, 1319.

⁷¹ Hearings, p. 1492.

⁷² Hearings, p. 1718.

⁷³ Hearings, p. 1691. This remarkable cross-examination is worth a complete reading. See pp. 1663-1705.

ness enterprises and at a financial sacrifice, most of them, and they are anxious to get back."⁷⁴ OPA administrators were selfless, patriotic men, who believed in the profit system and allowed for profits in their pricing, and who were motivated by a desire to save the business system from the evil effects of an inflationary spiral.

How has labor fared in the postwar economy? If one question were wanted, of all those asked in the hearings, to provide an index to the whole constellation of facts accepted as true and relevant by the person answering, this one probably would serve as well as any other. The result would turn on whether the answer mentioned hourly wage rates, which generally were up, or take-home pay, which generally was down.⁷⁵ This is another way of saying that the two groups divided sharply on their attitudes toward organized labor. The pro-OPA group, senators and witnesses (including the consumer groups and the Farmers Union), was sympathetic toward it; the other was not. One brief exchange perhaps will serve to illustrate. Ed O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, presented a series of elaborate tables designed to show, generally, that the earnings of labor had advanced much faster than the cost-of-living, and that conversely the cost of food had advanced relatively very little.⁷⁶ Senator Mitchell pointed out that the NAM compilation showed the cost of food and the price of farm products as having gone up more than the AFBF figures did. Replied O'Neal: "... We farmers are getting awfully tired of the workingmen in America and a lot of propagandists in the administration blaming the farmer. We are all pretty mad about it." To which Mitchell countered: "How about the National Association of Manufacturers? Their compilation shows that the farmer is getting more out of the increase, a greater increase, than anybody else." But Mitchell could not make O'Neal criticize the NAM.⁷⁷

Obviously, hourly wages and take-home pay are two aspects of the same thing, and both were relevant to the Committee's problem. Hourly wages are part of the cost of production and affect the price at which a producer can sell. Take-home pay is what the worker relates to the cost-of-living; together they determine whether he makes ends meet. But both groups were reluctant in the extreme to consider both factors. Taft, for instance, wanted the AFL to put in the record "a figure on the increase in straight-time hourly earnings since before the war." Green did not have those figures, but "I have a few figures here," he said—all showing declining earnings since VE-day. Taft did not want postwar figures; he wanted a simple comparison of the increase of the cost-of-living and of straight-time hourly earnings since January 1, 1940, which he believed would show that labor had done very well. Needless to say, ⁷⁴ Hearings, p. 971.

⁷⁵ See the colloquy of Taft and Bowles, Hearings, p. 58.

⁷⁶ Hearings, pp. 654-65. Significantly, the only group chosen for comparative purposes is labor.

⁷⁷ Hearings, p. 667. Emphasis added. Contrast the attack on NAM by James Patton, president of the Farmers Union, pp. 694-98.

when the figures were submitted he got a great deal more than that, but never precisely that, and the showing did not come out his way at all.⁷⁸

The cleavage on facts related to labor never was closed. Earlier in the year a wage increase had been granted to steel-workers, followed by an increase in the price of steel. These related facts were neatly divided in the testimony; neither side willingly talked about both. To one, the wage increase meant that the government had abandoned wage controls; to the other, the "$250,000,000 bribe to the steel industry" was a hard blow at stabilization. Goss and O'Neal, like the businessmen, stressed the wage increase; Patton and Carolyn Ware (speaking for the consumer) said that their organizations had protested the price increase. One group saw labor's preferred position relative to other groups continuously being improved by a sympathetic Administration which allowed wages to rise unchecked and forced businesses to absorb increased costs without price relief. The other saw disadvantaged labor striving to meet increased costs of living with diminished take-home pay, and forced to bargain with businesses which could recoup strike losses from tax returns.

Other questions. Many other questions showed the same division as to what the facts were; a few, briefly treated, will have to suffice.

One of the cliches accepted by everybody was that production was the only thing that would solve the problem of inflation. What, then, was the level of production at the time of the hearings? The Administration group offered figures many times to show that production was at the highest level in our history, that only the pent-up demand of a population loaded with purchasing power made it insufficient.⁷⁹ This made the problem simply one of what to do about prices until the excess of demand could be satisfied. Higher prices, they were sure, would not increase production, when the real bottlenecks were shortages of labor and materials. There was no indication that the figures ever convinced anybody. "How do you get production?," remained the crucial question for the opponents of OPA. Even the everyday experiences of the protagonists seemed to be affected by what they thought to be true. Senator Taylor found the evidences of production in the stores; he had found tools he wanted with no trouble. A representative of the National Retail Associations, on the other hand, could not buy a little hatchet, search as he would.⁸⁰

A related question concerned the profits of business. In an economy of hundreds of thousands of businesses, it may be doubted whether aggregates or averages could mean much; but the profits of business were part of the picture and a try had to be made. Some elaborate statistics were presented, but the Committee never really got beyond the question of how profits should be computed. Profits before, or after, taxes? Figured as a percentage of net worth, or net sales? Bowles' figures were based on net worth; Taft countered with tables showing the percentage of national income paid out to various types of recipients between 1929 and 1945, and corporate profits before and after taxes as a percentage of national income for the same period.⁸¹ Similar difficulty was had with a question of business practice. One of the House amendments would require OPA to set a ceiling price for every product which would allow the cost of the product plus a reasonable profit for both producer and distributor. OPA argued that most industries make a variety of products, some of which make high, others low profits and still others no profit at all. What mattered to the industry was its overall profit. OPA supporters could and did buttress, with personal experience, their contention that no businessman expected to make a profit on every item. But their opponents had had contrary experience in business; they were equally sure no businessman ever willingly lost money on anything.⁸²

⁷⁸ Hearings, pp. 787-93. Emphasis added.

⁷⁹ Hearings, pp. 870-71, 1449-51, 1461-62, 1708-9.

⁸⁰ Hearings, p. 867.

A question with which the public was concerned in 1946 was what had happened to meat, and what should be done to get more of it. The question was extensively discussed in the hearings, by the persons best qualified to give the answers. The several levels of the meat industry all wanted price ceilings removed. They quoted Department of Agriculture figures to show a great supply of cattle, enough to meet demand, and needing to be reduced. They argued that legitimate packers had trouble getting steers because they had been diverted to small black-market operators, who wasted valuable by-products as well as overcharging the public. They estimated that the removal of controls would send prices up 15-20 per cent (again based on Agriculture figures), which was about what they thought people were currently paying in the black market. With decontrol, the industry people believed, meat would flow into legitimate channels, probably forcing prices down. If meat were not decontrolled now there never would be a better time.

The experts in OPA, and their friends on the Committee, thought the black market in meat and the wastage of by-products had been greatly exaggerated. They recognized that there had been diversion of meat into the black market, but they pointed out that a new control order put into effect on May 1 had within a week increased the volume of inspected slaughter cattle by 12 per cent to a figure only one per cent below the volume for the same time in 1945. They believed, therefore, that the problem was being solved. Some of them questioned the Agriculture Department's figures; they did not believe there was enough meat. But Patton and the CIO packinghouse workers both thought the "shortage" was deliberately engineered by the large packers.⁸³ They were sure that the removal of ceilings would send prices up at least 50 per cent, wreck other food controls, and end stabilization. It would be better to decontrol later, when a larger supply of durables and consumer goods would drain off purchasing power and relieve the pressure on foods.

⁸¹ Hearings, p. 42. Perhaps the most remarkable piece of statistical gymnastics was performed by James Carey, CIO, who put corporate profits during the war years at 52 billion dollars (before or after taxes?). Although he stated that 25.9 billions had been paid to stockholders, he then said: "For every dollar of these unused reserves [sic] it means one hour of unemployment for some American worker. In other words, $52,000,000,000 means 52,000,000,000 man-hours of unemployment" (p. 585).

⁸² For representative examples of these exchanges, see Hearings, pp. 47-48, 286, 807, 987, 1589-90, 1623-25.

⁸³ Resolution of United Packinghouse Workers of America, CIO, Hearings, pp. 641-44; testimony of James Patton, pp. 698-99.

The disagreement extended even to small and ascertainable facts. What is the most efficient use of grain? Fulbright asserted that "a pound of wheat, used in bread, will produce about 2,400,000 calories, and if it is fed to a beef cow it will produce only a little over 200,000 calories." To which Hickenlooper replied: "... I am quite certain that the statistics show in every study that has ever been made of ultimate food values that human beings get more definite, substantial value out of grain fed through meat animals than they do from the grain itself. That is they get more proteins and more vitamins. . . ." ⁸⁴ Like the large contradictions, this small one remained unresolved.

Many facts, of course, have handles on both ends. Wason, of NAM, for instance, produced newspaper advertisements to show that grocery prices had gone up more than Bowles claimed. This might seem to prove that Bowles had lied and that OPA had failed to control grocery prices, or it could show that the grocers had no reason to complain of OPA. ⁸⁵ When a CIO member recited high prices he had to pay, it might demonstrate, as he thought, the laborer's need for continued protection; but perhaps it was unwitting testimony to OPA's ineffectiveness. ⁸⁶ Or take the question of the level of production of any commodity. If it were conceded to be low, and not equal to demand, it could be said to prove that price control was needed until production could meet the demand, or, contrarily, that control should be abolished in order to get production. If it were conceded to be high, it might prove that production and profits could be gotten under price control, or that control could now be abolished with safety.

IV. INFLUENCE OF GROUP IDEOLOGY ON FACT PERCEPTION

What has been argued in the preceding section is that the Committee and its witnesses were made up of two loose groups of people who disagreed, not so much in their opinions upon what should be done about a known or ascertainable fact situation, as upon what the underlying facts themselves were. As advocates, neither side could afford to accept the other's conception of the facts, for that would be to concede the battle; policy is rooted in the assessment of the situation. But if common experience can be trusted, the people on both sides believed in good faith that they were stating the facts, and from this flowed the sincerity and even passion with which they seemed to talk. As Walter Lippmann put it, "a public opinion is a moralized and codified version of the facts." ⁸⁷ The interest group orientation furnished the pattern of preconceptions through which the facts were screened. It was easy for one side to see an entrenched bureaucracy meddling with a free economy, for the other to see a democratic ⁸⁴ Hearings, pp. 1209-10.

⁸⁵ Hearings, pp. 395-402.

⁸⁶ Hearings, pp. 604-9.

⁸⁷ Public Opinion (New York, 1922), p. 125.

government protecting the helpless from exploitation. After that it was just a matter of filling in the details.

There is, to be sure, nothing new in this conception. It is at least as old as Plato, who expressed it with moving beauty in his allegory of the cave.⁸⁸ But it has a relevance for a theory of the group process in politics that has not been sufficiently appreciated. In the price control controversy (and surely in others like it) the senators were not sitting as arbiters of the group struggle, but as participants; it flowed through them. But it was not perceived so clearly and simply as that by those in the struggle. It is generally accepted that there are many opinions, but not that there are many versions of the facts—or at least, not that there is no single true one. This is the crucial problem of communication between social groups, as it is, to a greater degree, of intercultural communication. Given its own version of the facts, and believing it to be the only true one, each side could fight for the general interest and impute bad motives to its opponents in all sincerity. In this sense the Committee was concerned with promoting the general interest, but so were most of the spokesmen of special interests who appeared before it. Social conflict over group interests, clearly perceived and rightly identified, should be easy to mediate; a rough appraisal of the balance of power and frank bargaining should be enough. It is the quantum of concern for the general interest in every calculation that makes the trouble.

It should be emphasized that the price control question was highly political, with a long history. The kinds of information committee members would want, the kinds of facts they would be able to perceive, their willingness to accept relatively objective data, surely would vary with the kind of question under consideration. Nevertheless, the conception of the social nature of fact perception should be useful to political science. In regard to policy, it suggests one of the limits to the usefulness of uncommitted social intelligence to the politician. In regard to research, perception of the fact situation surely is one of the crucial variables, both in the group struggle which is the political process, and in the behavior of the individual actors in it.⁸⁹ Conversely, the perception of the fact situation by public officials might provide a useful index to their group orientations.

V. CONCLUSION

This study began with two sets of generalizations, one of which suggested that committee members sit as judges representing the general interest presiding over the public debate of the special interests; the other suggested that committee members themselves are participants in the struggle of contending groups, one phase of which is the public hearing. The analysis of the hearings conducted in 1946 by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency on the question of extending price control would seem to support the latter. The members of this Committee did not sit as legislative judges to discover an abstract general interest, nor did they seem concerned with presenting a balanced debate for public consideration. On the contrary, most of them did take sides. The Committee hearings clearly were used as a public platform for opposing groups with which the senators identified. A great deal of information was received from interested groups, which the senators accepted or rejected in accordance with their preconceived notions of the facts. What was made perfectly clear was that the groups opposing price control were more numerous and more militant than the groups supporting it. This was, of course, crucial information. The remark of Kefauver and Levin (in urging professional staff for committees), that "Congress cannot function today without lobbyists,"⁹⁰ will always be true, for only the lobbyists can tell what their groups will fight for and how hard they will fight. It is reasonable to suppose that some social catharsis was provided by the institutionalized conflict, as Professor Truman suggested, but there was no way to tell in this study.

⁸⁸ This was the central idea of Lippmann's Public Opinion. See especially Karl Mannheim, Ideology and Utopia (New York, 1951), and Ralph K. Merton's essay, "The Sociology of Knowledge," in Twentieth Century Sociology, eds. G. Gurvitch and W. E. Moore (New York, 1945).

⁸⁹ See the distinction between process and behavior made by David Easton in The Political System (New York, 1953), pp. 203-6.

But this is not to be taken to mean that Professor Chamberlain's generalizations are wrong. What is suggested rather is that members of the Committee behaved in a variety of ways, depending upon the roles they chose to play. It seems indeed unlikely that we have exhausted the repertory of committee roles; quite the contrary. In hearings on a different issue, under other circumstances, some or all of the members surely might choose the judicial role, some or all of the time. The number and range of roles permitted by the norms of a given committee, the variations in what is acceptable which may exist between committees, are matters for further research.

Other questions should be asked. Why does a legislator choose a particular role, and not another? What is the effect of the subject matter of the hearing upon role selection? Upon the perception of facts, and the willingness of committee members to accept relatively objective data? The records of hearings of congressional committees, readily accessible in embarrassing abundance, can be used extensively to formulate hypotheses based on these and other questions, which might then be tested in more intensive research. State legislatures, which seldom keep verbatim records of committee hearings, nevertheless multiply the opportunities for studies involving close observation, interviews, and other techniques in the arsenal of behavior research. It should not be too much to hope that ultimately some general propositions might be fashioned which would contribute to a viable theory of politics.

⁹⁰ A Twentieth Century Congress (cited in note 7), p. 156.

THE ACCOUNTABILITY OF THE BRITISH NATIONALIZED INDUSTRIES*

ELDON L. JOHNSON

University of Oregon

Great Britain's giant nationalized industries pose unprecedented problems for a free nation. Are the old governmental forms appropriate? Can the new forms be held accountable to the public? Can public accountability and business efficiency be reconciled? The five key industries, formed out of thousands of former enterprises, employ almost two million workers—almost three times the number of civil servants.¹ Even the strictly "business" problems are unprecedented. In personnel, the transport industry is double the size of American Telephone and Telegraph. Coal is three times the size of General Motors. Admitting that the final answers on accountability had not been found, Herbert Morrison, then Lord President of the Council, well stated the prevailing British attitude: "We are in the early years of novel constitutional and social experiments of great long-term significance, and we can be certain that as experience grows the methods which are in use at present will need to be modified and additional methods will be evolved."²

The problem of public accountability, already challenging because of the new subject matter, commercial enterprise, is greatly accentuated by the organizational form chosen for nationalization: the public corporation. The "public corporation," a combination of the governmental adjective and the business noun, spins restlessly between the worlds of government and business. It evolved from a fear of governmental power on the one hand and business irresponsibility on the other; or, conversely, from the attraction of the independent initiative of private business and the dependent accountability of public government. It understandably became the common denominator, the point of compromise, between the contending political forces which molded the nationalization of Britain's basic industries. The mere removal of the profit motive, some people thought, would enable an equilibrium of accountability to be established short of the full-fledged departmental type of organization.

While the public corporation was going into eclipse in the United States, it was emerging in Great Britain to shine with unprecedented brightness on socialism's brave new world. What the skeptical Congress was trussing up, compara-

* The author gratefully acknowledges indebtedness to the London School of Economics and Political Science, particularly to Sir Alexander Carr-Saunders, Director, for the generous extension of facilities, and to Professor William A. Robson for the stimulation of his seminar, Michaelmas Term, 1951. The substance of this paper was read at the annual meeting of the American Political Science Association in Washington, D. C., in September, 1953.

¹ J. H. Smith and T. E. Chester, "The Distribution of Power in Nationalized Industries," The British Journal of Sociology, Vol. 2, pp. 275-93, at pp. 275-76 (Dec., 1951).

² "Mr. Morrison's Views on Public Accountability," Public Administration, Vol. 28, pp. 176-78, at p. 176 (Autumn, 1950).

tively speaking, in the Government Corporation Control Act of 1945, the optimistic Parliament was unshackling for unparalleled extensions of the public's business. It is true that the new British public corporations are held accountable in ways unknown in the prewar prototypes and that, therefore, both the United States and Great Britain have moved toward more control. It is significant, however, that the "more" is much less in Great Britain, where the new pattern is still the "pure" and "authentic" type of public corporation. The board form of government is used exclusively; the function is invariably business; and independence is great, with self-sufficiency the goal. It is paradoxical that the private business form which built Western capitalism has become the public form which is making socialist Britain—and making it when America, at least, seems to be less and less certain of the merits of the new mutation. In contrast, Professor William A. Robson of the London School of Economics and Political Science confidently predicts that this "most important constitutional innovation which has been worked out in Great Britain during the past 50 years" will "play as important a part in the field of nationalized industry in the twentieth century as the privately owned corporation played in the realm of capitalist organization in the nineteenth century."³

No thoughtful Englishman assumed that public ownership automatically guaranteed public accountability. It was taken for granted that something else, something special, needed to be done under socialism to assure sufficient accountability for a democracy so greatly changed in its responsibilities, yet the corporate form of the enterprises interposed special obstacles. Something special, in fact several things special, were done by the Labour government and Parliament—whether successfully or not is, of course, a matter of debate. Parliament is still deeply involved in the search for improvement. Some old controls were unchanged, some readapted; some new controls were added. Electoral and judicial controls remain unchanged. Relations with ministers and Parliament were recast into a new balance. Consumers' councils, joint consultation, and systematic annual reporting were introduced as new devices. These taken together constitute the public accountability mechanism for the new titans of public industry, accorded the freedom of businesses but checked by the control of government—molded neither in the cast of the autonomous government corporation, such as the British Broadcasting Corporation, nor in the cast of the regular government department, such as the Post Office. The BBC plan was too independent in the controversial phase of nationalization and the Post Office plan was too rigid, too subject to day-to-day interference both by minister and by Parliament, for creative business enterprise. Therefore, the nationalized industries were placed in a new in-between relationship with Parliament. Each was made flexible by being created a semi-independent corporation and each was made accountable by being placed under the general surveillance of a minister who could issue directions on general policy without answering to Parliament for day-to-day operations. This, as so often in politics, strikes a necessary but precarious balance, with a constant interplay of forces consciously or unconsciously threatening the equilibrium. The results of the experiment are worthy of the attention of partisans of democracy the world round.

³ Problems of Nationalized Industry, ed. William A. Robson (London, 1952), p. 53.

I. MINISTERIAL CONTROL

Proper responsibility to Parliament is the ultimate key to public accountability itself. But the relation to Parliament, as evolved, was through the minister, who, in addition to his appointive power over the industry boards, alone was given the power to make decisions binding on the industries. He in a real sense picked up the equity interest which passed from the shareholder to the general public.⁴ Ministerial control, therefore, calls for attention first.

The great nationalized industries, in comparison with the prewar public corporations, are of the "public corporations, strong minister type," with less financial independence and more ministerial influence.⁵ They are less free, more controlled. When public ownership was enormously extended, the bonds of accountability were tightened up. In his relations with the industry board, the minister was given several significant powers: appointment of members; issuance of general directions on matters appearing to him to affect the national interest, with its corollary of informal consultation on policy; veto or approval power over specific matters, especially involving finance and development; and solicitation of information.⁶ The purpose is clearly to make the minister statutorily responsible for the general policy of the corporations but to leave the boards responsible for day-to-day administration.

The minister's control over the composition of the directing boards is great, almost complete if he cares to exercise it. He sets the tenure and conditions of appointment, either by private instrument of appointment or by a regulation laid before Parliament. Even the latter, public method ordinarily provides for appointments to be "for such term not exceeding five years as may be determined by the Minister before appointment of such member or, with his consent, at any time."⁷ In other words, the ministers may find, and have found, means of removing board members at will, even without stating reasons, although the statutes clearly contemplate removal for specific reasons, such as ill health, misconduct, or absence from meetings. In practice, however, removals for political or other capricious reasons are rare. The Conservative government made no effort to change boards upon entering office in 1951.

One of the techniques of accountability is found in the basis of representation on the boards. In making appointments, the minister is not confined to any pattern of sectional representation. Even the special qualifications for members ⁴ Frank Milligan, "Ministerial Control of the British Nationalized Industries," The Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science, Vol. 17, pp. 164-83, at p. 164 (May, 1951).

⁵ Ibid.

⁶ Charles Winter, "Parliamentary, Ministerial and Judicial Control of Nationalized Industries in Great Britain," Law and Contemporary Problems, Vol. 16, pp. 670-701, at pp. 684-90 (Autumn, 1951).

⁷ Quoted in Robson, op. cit., p. 36; italics added.

set forth in the laws leave the application of the standards to the minister's judgment. But most important of all, the board member represents the general public; whatever his origins, he may not directly represent labor or management. He may have been chosen precisely because he was a corporation director or a union officer, but, after appointment, he must sell his shares or give up his office. This is in sharp contrast with the French effort to get direct trade-union representation on some boards. The British have deliberately chosen the broadest possible representation, to assure better accountability. Needless to say, theory sometimes breaks down in practice, although even the theory recognizes, and duly considers, that earlier connections may still affect official judgments. A top official in one of Great Britain's largest trade unions, speaking of a union colleague now on one of the national boards, assured the author with obvious relish in 1951: "He can always be depended upon; he knows why he is there!"

The crux of ministerial control, at least in its potentialities, is the power of giving directions of a general character on the performance of the corporations in matters appearing to the minister to affect the national interest. It should be noted that the variables—the generality of the directions and the involvement of the national interest—greatly enhance ministerial discretion. This is a far cry from the clear line of demarcation which the Conservatives originally wanted drawn between the boards and the minister, as indeed the Labour members themselves advocated for the prewar corporations. The Labour government chose for its nationalizing instrument devices which would, in its words, keep the public monopolies from exercising power inimical to the public interest. The minister was given the power—and a most important power it is—to see that national and social policy transcend commercial policy if necessary.⁸

Despite Conservative cries of dictatorial powers, this new weapon has been, chiefly, a stick behind the door. The ministers have the instruments of accountability at hand, but they have exercised them so cautiously that the critics have turned from cries of tyranny to complaints that the ministers are too timid. For the first six years no general directions were given the industries at all. Only one has been issued to date. In actual practice, the ministers deal with the boards on what Herbert Morrison once called the "old boy" basis: through informal relationships, telephone conversations, and unrecorded meetings. They consult and influence; they almost never order.⁹ They have repeatedly resisted Parliamentary pressure to intervene and have avoided the use of general directions, preferring informal influence, even when the minister himself wanted specific action taken.¹⁰ The Labour Minister of Fuel and Power asked the Area Electricity Boards to put into effect the highly controversial Clow Committee plan for seasonal variations in rates, but he did not direct them.¹¹ Indicative of the efficacy of this informal influence, the boards complied with the ministerial preference, against their own judgment, rather than ⁸ Milligan, op. cit., pp. 168-69.

⁹ Acton Society Trust, The Power of the Minister (Claygate, 1951), pp. 6-7.

¹⁰ See cases cited by Winter, op. cit., pp. 684-86.

¹¹ 457 House of Commons Debates, Nov. 4, 1948, written answers, col. 128.

be formally directed. Ministers have often made clear that they are "in constant touch" with corporation officials, that they meet with the board chairmen when necessary, and that correspondence and conversations are strictly confidential.¹² The Conservative government, in the recent railway fares controversy, asked patience for "working out an arrangement harmoniously" with the British Transport Commission to "obviate the necessity of further direction."¹³ This illustrates the informal means to avoid a distasteful end.

As a result of these practices, accountability procedures are gradually being driven underground in a manner not foreseen when the statutes were passed. Even sympathetic critics are beginning to feel that the ministers are finding means of circumventing Parliamentary scrutiny of their actions concerning the nationalized industries. As Ernest Davies, M.P., has said: "They may refuse to answer at the despatch box for the influence they exercise over the dinner table."¹⁴ They answer only for that for which they are responsible. By not using the directional power, they escape having to answer. The boards are willing to collaborate because they want to preserve their independence, and they look upon directions as evidences of failure. Directions must be published in the annual reports; informal influences are recorded nowhere. As a result, "this Damocles sword swings above the Board table and need not fall to be effective."¹⁵ After the boards have yielded to influence in this manner, the minister feels he must defend the board when attacked. Before Parliament, therefore, he may be speaking secretly as judge in his own case. Such informal integration, with formal compulsion reserved for rare occasions, has much to be said for it, however. It places less strain on the minister-board relationships, better preserves board independence, and is likely to lead to more actual policy integration in the long run. The risks do not appear excessive: the minister is, of course, a member of the government in power. Whenever the board thinks the issue is fundamental enough to make the minister face Parliament on the question, it has only to resist informal agreement and force the issuance of a formal order. This struggle for balance between compulsion and persuasion is another manifestation of the central accountability problem—the reconciliation of two apparently inconsistent principles: commercial independence and integration with national policy, social and economic.¹⁶

After six years of demonstration that ministerial guidance, if exercised at all, could be exercised through the mere knowledge of the possible use of the power to issue directions, the Conservative government in April, 1952 dramatically broke the reserve-power, remote-control tradition. The Minister of Transport directed the British Transport Commission to suspend its proposed new ¹² 452 H. C. Deb., June 17, 1948, col. 643.

¹³ 499 H. C. Deb., April 28, 1952, col. 1037.

¹⁴ Ernest Davies, "Ministerial Control and Parliamentary Responsibility of Nationalized Industries," in Problems of Nationalized Industry (cited in n. 3), p. 114.

¹⁵ Ibid., p. 111.

¹⁶ Herbert Morrison, "Public Control of the Socialised Industries," Public Administration, Vol. 28, pp. 3-9, at pp. 4-5 (Spring, 1950).

charges scheme intended to become effective May 1 on railways outside London. This was the first time a minister had used the full power given him by the nationalization statutes. Political bedlam broke loose. The Conservatives defended the use of the weapon they professed so greatly to fear in earlier days. The Labour members attacked the use of the clause they themselves inserted in the statutes. One side hailed the defense of the traveling public as a courageous blow for a stable national economy; the other side called it a cheap political trick, a threat to board autonomy, and a preposterous move to set railway fares in Parliament itself.

When the Passenger Charges Scheme proposed by the British Transport Commission became a volatile subject in Parliament, a month before the jarring direction was issued, the Minister of Transport showed great reluctance to use the powers the Labour members kept calling to his attention. In fact when asked to employ the general directional power under Section 4 of the Transport Act of 1947, he finally said: "I am advised it would not be proper for me to issue directions such as those to which my hon. and gallant Friend refers."¹⁷ But in less than a month he reversed himself and issued the direction. Prime Minister Churchill made a statement to the House of Commons and set aside a full day for debate on this question requiring the "urgent attention of Parliament."¹⁸ The real reason for the reversal of the Minister's judgment is not likely to be known. Herbert Morrison insisted that only the Conservative losses in the county council elections had intervened.¹⁹ The government contended that the Minister's earlier denial of power referred only to the normal operations of the act, not to its "overriding power."²⁰ Still another interpretation arose from the statement of the Parliamentary Secretary, Ministry of Transport, who said the debate showed agreement on something wrong with the Transport Act of 1947, against the consequences of which the government had acted wisely.²¹ This clearly was paving the way for the denationalization battle ahead for road haulage.

But whatever the reasons for the direction, the ensuing debate threw a searchlight on this instrument of public control. Who was now responsible? Clearly not the British Transport Commission, whose charges scheme had been set aside. The former Minister of Transport under the Labour government said the direction meant the "overthrow of one of our greatest public servants, Lord Hurcomb," Chairman of the British Transport Commission.²² Was, then, the Minister of Transport to be responsible for fares hereafter? The Prime Minister said no, the existing powers of the Minister suffice to protect the public. Was the Prime Minister himself to be responsible? Mr. Morrison said: "The Prime Minister himself brusquely overrode the Minister of Transport and ¹⁷ 497 H. C. Deb., March 17, 1952, col. 1916; see also March 10, cols. 1016-19.

¹⁸ 499 H. C. Deb., April 21, 1952, col. 38.

¹⁹ Ibid., col. 39; April 28, 1952, col. 1049.

²⁰ Ibid., April 28, 1952, col. 1035.

²¹ Ibid., cols. 1163-64.

²² Ibid., col. 1080.

ordered him," with or without Cabinet decision, to issue what the Minister "would never have dreamed of issuing."²³

The unhappiness of the Labour members was worsened by this almost ironical demonstration of the two-edged character of the directional power which they themselves gave the minister over the nationalized industries. The Labour party's efforts to show wherein the direction exceeded the letter or spirit of the statutes proved feeble and futile. Yet the party could not oppose the Parliamentary motion to uphold the Minister's direction against the railway fares without being in the untenable position of showing less interest in low fares than the Tories. This prompted Mr. Morrison to observe sagely that competition for public good will on small matters such as fares could create an unwholesome "political Dutch auction" in Parliament, with everyone trying to outdo the others on "I got this, that and the other for you."²⁴ The use of the directional power of the minister to enforce conformity to overriding national policy was also proved a weapon not monopolized by the national planners: at least two Conservatives were jubilant over the Minister's direction because, as they said, "there are certain social considerations" and the boards "are not able to see the whole economic position of the country."²⁵

As could have been predicted, the first exercise of the dormant directional power also prompted someone to advocate going all the way, returning to the Post Office system of direct responsibility.²⁶ What the long-range effects of this precedent will be, no one can foretell: whether the directional power will be more commonly used to keep minister-board relations out in the open, subject to Parliamentary debate, or whether it will be shunned as the cause of avoidable political headaches.

Prediction is clouded by the Conservative government's choice of an unfortunate time and subject for a test case. The proximity to the county council elections raised unnecessary political suspicions. Furthermore, among the decisions of the nationalized industries, the setting of railway fares is least likely to be subject to abuse: they must be approved after extensive hearings by the quasi-judicial Transport Tribunal. The merits of the use of this reserve power are, in some respects, therefore, more uncertain than ever. The power of general direction remains, nonetheless, the chief means by which the minister can exert influence over the boards, choosing his own preferred balance on the scale between persuasion and compulsion.

Another important ministerial power is that of the veto, or approval power, over a variety of specific board actions: the framing of programs of reorganization and development calling for large capital outlay; schemes for training, education, and research; form of accounts; and, with Treasury approval, the issuance of new stock. With Treasury approval, the minister may also give directions on the creation and management of reserve funds, redemption of stock, and disposal of surplus revenue. Other special powers are conferred by ²³ Ibid., col. 1049.

²⁴ Ibid., col. 1056.

²⁵ See remarks of Messrs. McAdden and Harris, ibid., cols. 1103, 1113.

²⁶ Norman Cole, ibid., cols. 1091-92.

statutes for particular industries; for example, he may direct the British Transport Commission to discontinue any of its activities or dispose of any part of its business.²⁷ In these ways the minister may determine the broad lines along which the boards are to proceed in vital matters of internal administration. These powers, for example, enabled the Minister of Supply, pending denationalization, to direct the Iron and Steel Corporation not to alter its financial structure or management.²⁸ Specific directions on financial matters, unlike general directions, have been issued by ministers on many occasions. In other words, the minister does have a great deal of financial control, although it is chiefly of an approval rather than initiatory character.

To implement his other powers, the minister may also require information from the corporations. This may, in general, be designed to serve the minister's own official purposes, to aid Parliament, or to prescribe the form of the annual reports.

II. PARLIAMENTARY CONTROL

The ministers are in turn responsible to Parliament, and it is Parliament to which we must look for ultimate control, next to the people themselves. Yet every political scientist has been saying for decades that Parliament has neither the time for more duties nor the expertness for different duties. Nevertheless, the nationalized industries inevitably load on Parliament more duties and different duties. Inevitably also, Parliament tries laboriously to meet these new obligations with the old techniques of control: with questions directed to ministers under whom the industries operate; with debates; and with inquiries and reports of select committees—yet with full recognition that it must, by its own self-denying ordinance, control with a loose rein and in a different spirit.

Questions. The technique most discussed, most jealously guarded by Parliament, and probably most effective to date, is the question time. This time-honored practice has undergone some change to accommodate the new status of the public corporations. Ministers answer questions, of course, only on matters for which they are responsible. They are not responsible for day-to-day administration of the corporations. Therefore, questions on the nationalized industries are more restricted than those on the regular government departments. Questions asked concerning the Post Office, for example, always number more than those for any of the corporations.²⁹

The overriding consideration is again the balance between the minister's general control and the board's day-to-day management. The question is often asked: How can the House of Commons exercise control over the administration of these industries when the admissible questions extend only to the minister's responsibility, which excludes day-to-day administration?³⁰ Such a question ²⁷ Acton Society Trust, The Power of the Minister (cited in n. 9), Appendix, pp. 16–20.

²⁸ 498 H. C. Deb., April 9, 1952, col. 2731.

²⁹ Acton Society Trust, Accountability to Parliament (Claygate, 1950), p. 6.

³⁰ See Kenneth Bradshaw, "Parliament and the Public Corporation," Cambridge Journal, Vol. 3, pp. 707–26, at p. 713 (Sept., 1950).

refuses to acknowledge the philosophy behind the nationalization statutes. The corporations are deliberately removed from meticulous control. But, even so, the extent of restriction on Parliament depends on what constitutes an acceptable question for ministerial answer. Acceptability is clouded by several factors: uncertainty as to what is a matter of day-to-day administration; uncertainty as to the Speaker's standard of "public importance" in accepting questions; uncertainty as to what the minister can and cannot do, as well as whether he is doing it directly or through influence on others; and, finally, uncertainty as to whether the minister will answer the question put to him, even if eligible on all counts.

Originally, the minister determined eligibility of questions; in case of doubt, the Speaker asked the minister whether he considered himself responsible. Later, the Speaker ruled that once the minister refused to answer a question, none of the same class of questions would be accepted.³¹ This ruling held off the curiosity and legitimate interest of members too much, they thought. Dissatisfaction led to the Speaker's modification of his decision in June, 1948. He agreed to direct acceptance of questions about matters on which information had previously been refused "provided that, in my opinion, the matters are of sufficient public importance to justify this concession."³²

This by no means put an end to the controversy about eligibility of questions. Debates show a spectrum of opinion which knows no party lines. Some members of Parliament apply the test of degree; some the test of number of people affected; some the number of M.P.'s interested; some policy versus administration; some "intrinsic importance." One member thought he would not have an appropriate question if his train were an hour late one morning, but he would if it continued late every day for a month. Another insisted his question on an electricity breakdown should not be refused, because many Sunday dinners were spoiled in a large part of Southern England. Could something affecting millions of people be a detail of day-to-day management? Another did not think consideration of a closed railway station should be ruled out, particularly since he had a petition bearing 800 signatures.³³

What ministers have actually answered and refused to answer is almost as diverse as the opinions expressed by members in the House of Commons. One minister answered many questions on dirty coal; another refused on grounds this was a management problem. A question on cheap fares on the railways was refused at one time but the issue of railway fares later led to the greatest of all controversies about ministerial and Parliamentary control. Questions on industrial disputes are usually refused. Likewise, even matters of information, such as on staffs and salaries, have been refused despite the minister's clear legal power to demand such information.

³¹ History reviewed in 508 H. C. Deb., Dec. 5, 1952, col. 1994.

³² 451 H. C. Deb., June 7, 1948, col. 1636.

³³ Acton Society Trust, Accountability to Parliament, p. 21; see Sir Edward Boyle's standard of "intrinsic importance" and number of interested M.P.'s, 508 H. C. Deb., Dec. 5, 1952, col. 1997.

Petty though these arguments and decisions may seem, they penetrate to the core of the accountability problem because they raise the question of the distribution of power among corporation, minister, and Parliament. The minister's acceptance of a question which calls for his intervention, where no intervention was countenanced before, actually changes the autonomy of the nationalized industry. His acceptance of a question of information calls for more staff, more paper work, and more centralization. The real difficulty has been that time is too short and that most of the questions do not relate to policies determining the success or failure of the industry. Questions on details, on abuses, and on constituents' complaints are most popular.³⁴

That nothing much, short of abandonment of the public corporation idea itself, can be done to improve the question technique is made clear by the first report of the Select Committee on Nationalised Industries, October 29, 1952. After holding seventeen meetings and hearing much testimony from members of the House of Commons and from board chairmen, the Committee made only two minor proposals: (1) that, in the hope of setting a slightly more liberal standard for placing questions on the Order Paper, "in the case of questions which are not obviously matters of repetition or matters of detailed administration the question should be allowed to appear"; and (2) that consideration be given reducing from three to two the number of questions a member may ask for oral reply each day.³⁵

Those critics who wanted to open wide the eligibility of questions, to include inquiries on administrative details, received no solace. On the contrary, the Committee considered the more generous interpretation and firmly rejected it: the nationalized industries are, the report said, "constituted on different lines from the usual civil department" and "it is desirable that they should not be unduly hampered by external interference."³⁶ This conclusion was unanimously supported.³⁷ Philip Noel-Baker, Committee member and former Minister of Transport and Minister of Fuel and Power, said the case made in the testimony against detailed questions "is overwhelming." From his wealth of experience, he drew the conclusion that appropriate questions are "a very powerful instrument of public control."³⁸ The chairmen of the nationalized industry boards vigorously contended that the price of detailed Parliamentary control would be less managerial initiative and more centralization. As Lord Citrine, Chairman of the British Electricity Authority, put it, if Parliament exercises detailed control, "we should get the Civil Service mentality; we would never make any mistakes, but by Jove, what we did would take a devil of a long time."³⁹

Debates. Accountability through debate extends to broader coverage than Parliamentary questions but efficacy is severely hampered by the shortage of ³⁴ Acton Society Trust, Accountability to Parliament, pp. 7-8, 14.

³⁵ Select Committee on Nationalised Industries, Report, Oct. 29, 1952 (House of Commons Papers, 332, 1951-52), p. ix.

³⁶ Ibid., p. viii.

³⁷ 508 H. C. Deb., Dec. 5, 1952, col. 2002.

³⁸ Ibid., col. 2004. ³⁹ H.C. 332, op. cit., p. xxii.

Parliamentary time, the lack of technical competence, and the dominance of the political party in making final decisions. Debate need not be restricted to general policy; it may relate to questions of day-to-day management and local problems, subject to the Speaker's, rather than the minister's, opinion of propriety for discussion. An exhaustive study published by the Acton Society Trust showed that never had more than 31 hours a year been given debate on any nationalized industry; that 12 to 15 hours was more common; and that "it is very unlikely that Parliament could debate all major nationalized industries once a year."⁴⁰

The two most important occasions for debate are the Supply Vote of the minister supervising the nationalized industry and the motions taking note of the annual reports of the industries. For the five-year period ending October, 1950, eleven supply debates, usually lasting about six hours each, were held on the nationalized industries: six on civil aviation, two on coal, one on the fuel and power industries, and two on transport. However, other debates on supply days tend to crowd out the nationalized industries because the opposition has to choose among twenty-five departments and a host of grant-in-aid agencies.⁴¹ Debate on the annual reports is an encouraging accountability trend. Parliament has important information before it, but the discussion is fragmentary, discursive, and long after the event. It is common for the debates to occur a year or more after the closing date covered by the reports.

Other opportunities for general debate can be made by the government in laying down a substantive motion or by the opposition in attempting to amend the Queen's speech.⁴² Occasions for shorter debate are found on the motion for adjournment, granting from a half hour to three hours for discussion of some action taken or failed to be taken; on a motion to approve or annul an order of a minister supervising an industry; on proposed modifications of nationalization laws; and on private bills submitted by the corporations.⁴³

The whole debate technique as an instrument of control would be greatly improved if it could be kept above party controversy, a vain hope at the present stage of socialization. Illustrative of the partisan approach, when the Labour minister in 1949 made a motion worded as innocuously as possible, "That this House take note of the First Annual Report, etc." of the Transport Commission for 1948, merely as a peg on which to hang the debate, the opposition moved at once to amend by adding, "but regrets the loss sustained in 1948, the further marked deterioration disclosed in 1949, the mounting cost and the increase ⁴⁰ Acton Society Trust, Accountability to Parliament, p. 15.

⁴¹ Bradshaw, "Parliament and the Public Corporation" (cited in n. 30), p. 715. Mr. Crookshank, Conservative leader in the House of Commons, cites seven debates in 1950-52. See Select Committee on Nationalised Industries, Report, July 23, 1953 (H.C. 235, 1952-53), p. 115.

⁴² See 457 H. C. Deb., col. 683 et seq.

⁴³ Acton Society Trust, Accountability to Parliament, pp. 18-19; Winter, "Parliamentary, Ministerial and Judicial Control of Nationalized Industries in Great Britain" (cited in n. 6), pp. 679-81, also gives examples.

in fares and rates so detrimental to the public."⁴⁴ It is not hard to imagine the enlightenment which followed. Nationalization will have to gain the respectability of age before accountability in the public interest can replace control in the partisan interest.

Parliamentary Committees. Parliament provides control also through the scrutiny of its existing committees and its power to appoint others to investigate and report. For the nationalized industries, this has been, until the present session of Parliament, more potentiality than reality. The new industries, like the old departments, are placed under the scrutiny of the Committee on Public Accounts. That committee, however, is deprived of expert aid for its new task. It cannot use the Comptroller and Auditor General and his staff because the socialized industries have special commercial auditors named by the minister. Already harnessed with an impossible task and deprived of expert assistance, the Committee on Public Accounts is virtually helpless. The Committee on Estimates is even more ineffectual. It has no opportunity for control unless a subsidy is involved, as in the case only of the three airways corporations. There is no means of control if the same public stake is created in some other way: by a price increase or by a government loan to the industry.⁴⁵

Despite the debates, the questions, and the committees, the accountability of the nationalized industries to Parliament is not thoroughly pleasing to anyone. Techniques differ from those of long-standing use for government departments only in that they are more restricted in application. They are less extensive, therefore less commonly employed, and less susceptible to Parliamentary use of expert assistance. It is not surprising, therefore, that some new remedies have been sought. The most commonly proposed is a select committee especially designed to supervise the nationalized industries. Herbert Morrison, chief architect of nationalization, has objected to this scheme as destructive of initiative and overawing for non-political board members. Instead, he favors a periodic review, at seven-year intervals, somewhat like the reviews of the British Broadcasting Corporation, "not so much of a technical character but broadly, and to make recommendations on policy and structure."⁴⁶ This would provide the needed control and yet not interfere with commercial efficiency. Other proposals range from the use of quasi-judicial bodies, or House of Lords supervision, to the creation of a full-fledged industrial parliament.

Immediately after the Conservative government assumed office in 1951, it named a select committee "to consider the present methods by which the House of Commons is informed of the affairs of the Nationalised Industries, and to report what changes, having regard to the provisions laid down by Parliament in the relevant statutes, might be desirable."⁴⁷ The first report, made a year later, did more, as already noted, to confirm existing methods of accountability than to suggest new ones. The second and final report, July 23, ⁴⁴ 470 H. C. Deb., Dec. 1, 1949, cols. 1343, 1354.

⁴⁵ Bradshaw, op. cit., pp. 718-19.

⁴⁶ 479 H. C. Deb., Oct. 25, 1950, col. 2807.

⁴⁷ H.C. 332, p. iii.

1953, proposed the first major change in accountability devices since the inception of nationalization. It recommended, as so often proposed, the appointment of a Committee on Nationalised Industries in the House of Commons "for examining the reports and accounts of, and for obtaining further information as to the general policy and practice of the nationalised industries."⁴⁸ The objects and limitations were further explained as "that of informing Parliament about the aims, activities and problems of the corporations and not of controlling their work."⁴⁹ The Committee, to consist of not more than twenty-one members nominated at the beginning of each session, will be empowered to appoint subcommittees and "to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time."⁵⁰ Taking over the functions of the Committee on Public Accounts so far as the industries are concerned, the new Committee will have a permanent officer "of the status of the Comptroller and Auditor General," not removable except by an address from each house of Parliament, who will peruse the reports and accounts and call the Committee's attention to matters deserving examination. At least one professional accountant and other needed staff will assist.⁵¹

Whether this proposed mechanism threatens the hoped-for balance between business and governmental methods depends largely on the terms of reference of the Committee. Exactly what they are to be is by no means clear. Some Report authors and witnesses wanted to emphasize information, others investigation; some finance, others policy; some overall aims, others managerial efficiency; some highly restricted terms of reference, others very broad terms. The area of financial accountability illustrates the ambiguity. The analogy to the Comptroller and Auditor General and the Committee on Public Accounts is repeatedly used, yet the machinery proposed falls far short of such powers financially, on the one hand, and extends to an entirely new area, policy, on the other hand. The new Committee's staff is to examine published accounts done by the statutory auditors, not themselves to audit directly in the industries. But while its effective powers of financial investigation are much less than those of the Comptroller and Auditor General's staff, the Committee might usefully, the Report says, extend the field of the auditors' reports "to deal with broad policy issues." Several witnesses warned that accountants should not be turned into policy scrutineers. The Report also cautiously commends—but no more—the suggestion that the corporations might well prepare statements of anticipated revenue and expenditure, so the new Committee could compare plans with actual outcome.⁵² The whole tenor of the Report appears to reaffirm the commitment to avoid Parliamentary interference in day-to-day management, but the practical hazards are graphically presented ⁴⁸ H. C. 235, p. ix.

⁴⁹ Ibid., p. xii. The word "control" here presumably connotes meticulous supervision, contrasting with the use of the term throughout this article as, chiefly, that part of the accountability relationship exercised by the body to which accountability is owed, regardless of degree.

⁵⁰ Ibid., p. x.

⁵¹ Ibid., pp. xi, xii.

⁵² Ibid., p. xi.

in the testimony before the study committee. Repeated illustrations of "policy" turned out to be details of management in the view of others (e.g., wages, prices, manpower, capital development, depreciation, closing branch railway lines, diesel vs. steam power). This gives added weight to the warning of Lord Reith, former head of the BBC, that this is really "a sort of institutionalization of the Parliamentary Question, the very thing Parliament denied itself."⁵³

However this new device may work out in actual practice, if attempted, it answers persistent demands that something more be done to insure accountability. It provides another bit of machinery—to be used in ways yet to be forged by personalities, practical politics, and a bipartisan sense of needed balance. The intention of digging deeply and continuously into the affairs of the corporations is obviously not present. It will be surprising if the independence of the corporations is seriously affected or their day-to-day management interfered with in any significant way. In fact, the passage of time has produced noticeable caution and growing reservations. During a recent six and one-half hour debate on the new plan, Mr. Crookshank, Lord Privy Seal, speaking for the government, embraced the committee idea but asked that existing rights of ministers not be touched; the way be kept open for a joint committee with the House of Lords; the size be reduced, with no subcommittees; complete evidence not be published; attention not extend to future plans and programs; and, most important of all, no steps be taken at the outset to provide a permanent officer, such as the Comptroller and Auditor General.⁵⁴ The chairman of the Select Committee, Mr. Assheton, expressed keen disappointment in this great dilution and frankly said he did not think his committee's proposal would be "worth very much" when compromised at "an absolutely key point"—the naming of a permanent officer.⁵⁵ All this meant, clearly enough, that the government now responsible for the industries did not want to risk too much control. The adjournment debate, inconclusively airing familiar hopes and suspicions, gave some point to Miss Herbison's conclusion: "I am certain that, in the mind of a great many of those who support the idea, there are fears that ultimately the setting up of the committee would not be a good thing."⁵⁶

Whatever is done, a stabilizing influence exists in the fact that all proposals for accountability changes have heretofore failed to polarize party allegiances. The pending scheme has aroused some latent Labour fears and Mr. Morrison has represented his party as generally opposed, but the plan itself bears the unanimous endorsement of the five Labour and six Conservative members of the Select Committee.⁵⁷ Sir Herbert Williams, a Conservative member of the proposing committee, illustrated the customary evolution when he confessed: "I started off on the assumption that we ought to take the lid off, but evidence ⁵³ Ibid., pp. 75ff.

⁵⁴ 523 H. C. Deb., Daily Report, Feb. 8, 1954, cols. 841-44.

⁵⁵ Ibid., cols. 865-66.

⁵⁶ Ibid., col. 918. On the same date, Feb. 8, 1954, The Times (p. 7) editorially advised against strapping on the harness of government departments, which could possibly give accountability and information, but never efficiency.

⁵⁷ Ibid., col. 859.

convinced me that to do so would produce an intolerable situation."⁵⁸ On the other hand, Aneurin Bevan's Tribune has criticized the Labour party for not doing more to guarantee the fullest accountability of the boards to Parliament through the minister.⁵⁹ Some perfection of the techniques of Parliamentary control is guaranteed by bipartisan concern and by common party experience. We are here witnessing the delicate readjustment of an old political mechanism to a challenging new problem.

If Parliamentary control was somewhat weakened when extended to the nationalized industries, it was at least supplemented in an effort to make adequate the total pattern of public controls. The supplementation came in three ways: special representation for consumers, consultation for employees, and special informational sources for everyone involved in public control.

III. CONSUMERS' COUNCILS

As the nationalized industries are great state monopolies, replacing the so-called sovereignty of the consumer, some special check on the new Titans of Government seemed to be in order. Parliament, therefore, created a consumers' council or system of councils in each of the nationalized industries, ranging from the simplicity of a single national council, as originally provided in iron and steel, to the complexity of 15 area consumer councils, with from 70 to 80 local councils, in electricity.⁶⁰ The members come from all walks of life, appointed by the minister for each industry on the basis of representation of the chief consumer interests involved, with from five to thirty persons on each council. Although strictly advisory, the councils have the task of serving as watchdogs of the consumers' interests in all matters of charges and services, with power to make recommendations to the minister. They may act at the urging of a consumer, on their own initiative, or at the request of the minister. Remedial action lies with the minister, who may, as we have seen, give directions to the industry. The councils, therefore, are empowered to raise the right questions, questions of the broadest scope, but their advisory function leaves the finding of the right answers to the amenability of the boards, or to the minister in the final analysis.

Despite some spottily distributed successes in consumer representation and in the settlement of grievances, the consumers' councils do not inspire much confidence among consumers. They have two serious defects: they are not sufficiently independent of the government and they are too little known and used.

They need to be independent of the industry if they are to give the consumer a vigorous voice; but, on the contrary, they are appointed by the minister, occupy offices furnished by him or the industry, use staff similarly supplied, have nationalized industry representatives as members, stand at the mercy of the government for information, and sometimes find themselves being used by the government to give testimonials for some unpopular policy. Worse yet, they have no research or investigating staffs; they cannot employ their own experts for independent study. It is not surprising that many critics have charged that the councils are merely "stooges," securely "in the pocket" of the boards; and that they have taken a strange posture deferring to the industry rather than to the consumer.⁶¹ In the few instances in which the minister has been forced to arbitrate a showdown between a consumers' council and a nationalized industry, he has always taken his stand with the industry.⁶² This is itself a commentary on the weight and independence of the councils.

⁵⁸ 508 H. C. Deb., Dec. 5, 1952, col. 2006.

⁵⁹ The Times (London), June 19, 1953, p. 3.

⁶⁰ For more complete analysis, see Eldon L. Johnson, "Consumer 'Control' in British Nationalized Industries," Journal of Politics, Vol. 15, pp. 88-113 (Feb., 1953).

No one is pleased with the use to which the councils are put by consumers, by ministers, or by the nationalized industries. Despite increasing publicity efforts by the councils, members of Parliament still complain that they get too many letters which should be going to the councils. When Lord Hurcomb, Chairman of the British Transport Commission, answered 1800 Parliamentary inquiries in one year, he surely answered some which should have gone first to the consumers' council for transport.⁶³ Other deterrents to council use are the absence of any satisfactory organization of general consumer interests and, also, plain consumer indifference. To make matters considerably worse, all the councils have placed restrictions on their communication with the press and the public.

One has to say, in summary, that the consumers' council device has enjoyed only modest success.⁶⁴ If, however, one stops trying to make the councils a David against Goliath, which they cannot be, he must conclude that they may supply an alternative test of the public interest, provide suggestions and cautions for policy-making, and capitalize on consumer interests as they become organized. Much of each council's strength lies in the quite undramatic business of keeping the consumers' interest in the forefront of the attention of the nationalized industry or its supervising minister, and in serving as a symbol and a constant reminder of a goal always to be sought.

IV. JOINT CONSULTATION

Internal as well as external control becomes a major type of public accountability in a socialized society, because an increasing number of citizens are state employees. Industrial democracy is a primary goal.⁶⁵ ⁶¹ Editorial, "The Consumer's Voice," The Times (London), July 22, 1950, p. 5.

⁶² See Central Transport Consultative Committee, Annual Report, 1950 (H. C. 126, 1950-51), pp. 5-7; Eastern Electricity Board, Third Report and Accounts, 1950-51 (H. C. 272, 1950-51), p. 17; British Electricity Authority, Fourth Report and Accounts, 1951-52 (H. C. 262, 1951-52), p. 79; The Gas Council, Third Report and Accounts, 1951-52 (H. C. 309, 1951-52), p. 5.

⁶³ British Transport Commission, Report and Accounts, 1950 (H. C. 210, 1950-51), p. 7.

⁶⁴ See suggested reforms through a Central Consumers' Council, armed with a research staff, for all the industries together, P. Sargent Florence and H. Maddick, "Consumers' Councils in the Nationalized Industries," Political Quarterly, Vol. 24, pp. 259-71 (July-Sept., 1953). Other proposed improvements are discussed in Johnson, op. cit., pp. 107-11.

⁶⁵ For more complete treatment see Eldon L. Johnson, "Joint Consultation in British Nationalized Industries," Public Administration Review, Vol. 12, pp. 181-89 (Summer, 1952).

Following this philosophy, the authors of nationalization in Great Britain wrote into their statutes the guarantee of joint machinery, between management and labor, not only for collective bargaining but also for consultation on safety, health, welfare, training, efficiency, and other matters of mutual interest. This is, however, a far cry from worker control; instead, it is merely worker participation in control. How far short this falls of management abdication is shown by the fact that the board of the nationalized industry is left with the initiative in the establishment of a consultation agreement, it is the sole judge of which employee organizations are to be dealt with, and it, not the workers, assumes full executive responsibility.

Does joint consultation concern itself with significant matters? The answer is that it certainly may. The power is there. No matters are barred, not even affairs of finance, as is so often the case in private industry. But while the untrammelled opportunity is there, obstacles to adequate use are numerous and formidable. There are trade-union fears of competing loyalties; worker apathy, as apathy afflicts all democracy; management desire to be secretive rather than sharing; and worker ignorance of technical matters and preoccupation with welfare rather than efficiency. Yet, joint consultation does add to the limitations on socialist instruments, or to public accountability, in two ways: by the power to influence policy and by the power to withhold consent. Consultation cannot make policy in the sense of taking responsibility for it, but it can influence policy. In addition to this influence, joint consultation has an important role in determining what not to do. Management, in all the industries, has the unquestioned power to make the final decision, but no intelligent decision is made in a vacuum. It is made with due regard to alternatives. Joint consultation is an effective means of determining such alternatives and the relative price to be paid for each in human values.

Industrial democracy, like other kinds, calls for a system of representation when the organization is large. That presents another critical problem in the British scheme. Representation on the worker side always, as a matter of fact, comes through the unions, but the unions are often quite unfitted for this task. There are too many of them, and they are neither functionally nor geographically organized to provide effective worker representation. A study recently published reveals that there are more than fifty independent trade unions to be dealt with in the five nationalized industries, with no industry having less than fifteen. Furthermore, most of the unions are chiefly concerned with membership in private industry and only secondarily in public industry.⁶⁶

Even if all problems of representation could be solved, the difficult question of communication would remain—communication between the representative and the represented. This is a great unsolved problem and a serious handicap. No one is made responsible for internal communication of this kind. The constitutions of the joint consultation councils do not bother to provide either the means or the objective of "reporting back" to the employees.⁶⁷

⁶⁶ Acton Society Trust, The Future of the Unions (Claygate, 1951), pp. 2-3.

⁶⁷ Hopeful improvement is described in the 1951-52 Report, British Electricity Authority (cited in n. 62), p. 69.

Despite these difficulties, joint consultation as established in the nationalized industries does provide a wide-open door of opportunity for worker participation, and internal accountability. The real problem is one of utilizing the opportunity afforded. Neither management nor labor is making the most of its possibilities. This weapon of control is still clumsy and crude, but it is taking shape, with a consciously held purpose in mind. It recognizes the creativity of employees.

V. ANNUAL REPORTS

Still another means of assuring public accountability in the nationalized industries is the common requirement of annual reports, made to the minister and referred to both houses of Parliament. Accountability cannot exist without information. The annual reports for each industry are intended to provide much of that information. Each report supplies a veritable storehouse of facts and figures which would have been quite unobtainable in the days of scattered, private ownership. Nevertheless, two careful British studies of the reports conclude that they still leave much to be desired. While informative, with an impressive quantity, they lack quality at many key points, one of the studies concludes. Despite the statistics, accounts, graphs, and descriptive coverage, the reports do not sufficiently deal with the factors which make for success or failure, or with trends and improvements in efficiency. They can hardly be said to be strictly objective. It is not surprising that they put the industry's best foot forward, avoiding failures and deficiencies.⁶⁸

The reports are most cautious, even reticent, about the boards' external relationships. They usually avoid discussing relations with Parliament and with the minister and say only tantalizingly little about the consumers' councils and employee relations.⁶⁹ This has a paradoxical effect: what was intended as a separate accountability device, supplying needed information, limits its own usefulness by avoiding information on the other accountability mechanisms. This self-limitation flows from the boards' desire to avoid outside interference. That is understandable, but the omission raises the question as to whether more information on the vital accountability relationships should not be made generally available through some source independent of the industries.

The second British study of the annual reports harshly concludes that they are badly edited, unattractive to the general public, given to "window-dressing," unclear on major issues and on steps toward improvement, and "neither detailed enough for the specialist nor sufficiently concise and clear for the layman."⁷⁰ These strictures must be judged against the realization that the acts of nationalization do not indicate the function of the reports, uncertainty exists as to whether the proper audience is the general public or the government, and Parliament seems content to go on without the kind of information it most needs.

⁶⁸ A. H. Hanson, "Report on the Reports: The Nationalised Industries, 1950-51," Public Administration, Vol. 30, pp. 111-30, at pp. 177-21 (Summer, 1952).

⁶⁹ Ibid., p. 113.

⁷⁰ Acton Society Trust, Relations with the Public (London, 1953), pp. 13-14, 18.

The release of the annual reports is the occasion for news and editorial comment and for Parliamentary debate on policies and shortcomings. In at least one case the complete and somewhat formidable report has been digested and reproduced for wide citizen appeal. These are the raw materials of accountability. At least, such is the intention—an intention which needs, and can easily have, further implementation. Perhaps, as has been implied, the boards are still too much impressed by their business character and too little aware of their public obligations.⁷¹

CONCLUSIONS

After seven years of experience, all sections of British political opinion are still committed to the public corporation, genuinely removed from meticulous governmental control, as the chosen instrument for operating the giant industries taken over by the public. Confidence that the right general path is being followed is as strong as the conviction that the desired balance has not yet been attained. The British have been hammering out a significant kind of accountability: power to control decisively when need be, but little use of it; power to act at the broad, vital spots rather than on the minutiae; power of accountability made effective by its presence rather than by its exercise. The unused power to block an artery may be more effective than the daily use of pinpricks on the capillaries. This is the theory of ministerial and Parliamentary control: the power to issue general directions and the power to investigate and legislate.

Yet several questions remain. Since the big weapons are rarely used, does accountability, in practice, give control over minor rather than major matters and, therefore, produce the worst of both worlds, instead of the best so confidently expected by the corporation advocates? Or does this indicate major satisfactions and minor irritations, with the general policy merely having no practical meaning except in its specific manifestations? Can business independence and the interjection of social or welfare considerations be reconciled? Yet without such interjection, what is the point to public ownership? If such considerations, irrelevant for commercial purposes, are introduced, isn't the corporation's policy political and, therefore, properly subject to careful Parliamentary scrutiny? Can the development of the confidential relationship between minister and board, with surreptitious ministerial intervention, be permitted without close Parliamentary control? Does the public corporation really force a choice between accountability and efficiency? These difficulties all stem from an attempted merger of the benefits of that which is private and that which is public. To what end is accountability exercised? If exercised to achieve what the public wants, the standard of success is likely to be tentative, shifting, and sometimes contradictory, less simple than the old measure of profit in the private sector. The merger merely recasts the familiar struggle: in this case, for balance between liberty to achieve one desired purpose, business initiative and efficiency, and authority to achieve another, responsibility to the public and conformity to its policies.

⁷¹ Ibid., p. 28.

Although the proposed new Committee on Nationalised Industries could revolutionize accountability relationships, constantly "digging up the roots" and "keeping under the harrow," that prospect is quite unlikely. If established, the committee may complicate minister-board relations by supplying a dual channel of communication with Parliament, to say nothing of confusing responsibility somewhat. It could tempt the minister to delve into board matters, adding to centralization; and it might, worst of all, negate Parliament's self-denying ordinance with respect to day-to-day management of the industries. However, Mr. Crookshank, Conservative leader in the House of Commons, has clearly indicated a strong personal preference for "tight terms of reference" for the new committee, saying, "Obviously it is a question of advancing slowly and seeing where we get to."⁷²

Insistent pressure for fuller accountability is likely to continue to beat upon Parliament. The temptation to move toward more and more control will be great. Even Herbert Morrison recently confessed: "I agree right off, in the case of electricity, there is a strong case to argue that it could be run by a Government Department."⁷³ It also remains to be seen whether the Labour party, in its zeal to nationalize, chose an instrument sufficiently amenable to the policy integration required for national planning. But while British confidence in the public corporation idea remains, the major problem is not machinery for control, but balanced use of it. A great deal of machinery now exists, far more than is effectively utilized.

⁷² H. C. 235, p. 113.

⁷³ Ibid., p. 57.

DEMOCRACY AND THE PROBLEM OF CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE*

DAVID SPITZ

Ohio State University

I.

If Sophocles were alive today to recast the dilemma of Antigone in contemporary, if less sanguine, terms, he might well seize on the problem of the citizen who refuses to answer questions put to him by a congressional investigating committee. Antigone, you will recall, was torn between two loyalties. Her religion commanded her to bury the body of her brother, while her state commanded that his body be left, unburied and unmourned, to be eaten by dogs and vultures on the open plain outside the city walls. As a loyal citizen, Antigone was required to yield her conscience to the state, to guide her conduct not by her rational moral knowledge but by the precepts of the law. As a person bound to her kin by the dictates of her religion, she was required to subordinate the instructions of Creon the king to those of her faith. She chose to obey her conscience and paid the penalty. Socrates, who—according to a traditional interpretation of the *Crito*¹—would doubtless have counseled otherwise, was also executed by the state. Thoreau, who at a critical moment followed what has scornfully been termed “the primitive attitude of Antigone, rather than the

* The substance of this paper was read at the annual meeting of the American Political Science Association in Washington, D. C., in September, 1953.

¹ John Dickinson, “A Working Theory of Sovereignty,” Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 43, pp. 32–63, at p. 50 (Mar., 1928). Taken by itself, the argument of the Crito (50–51) does, I think, support Dickinson’s interpretation. But there are strong grounds for holding a contrary view of what Socrates actually believed. It is clearly the teaching of the Apology (and other Socratic dialogues of Plato) that it is never right to do wrong, regardless of personal consequences. For this reason Socrates refused to obey the command of the Thirty to bring Leon the Salaminian to Athens to be put to death by the oligarchy; and he refused to remain silent when, “as I conceive and imagine, the god orders me to fulfill the philosopher’s mission of searching into myself and other men” (Apology, 32, 28). Plainly, Socrates would disobey a law that required him to do an unjust thing. From this standpoint, the argument in the aforesaid passage of the Crito can be read as no more than a demonstration to Crito that none of his arguments is sufficient to persuade Socrates to flee prison. This leaves open the question whether Socrates might not have been persuaded by other reasons—e.g., by a refutation of his own implicit thesis that death was really preferable to him than exile, in view of all the circumstances. Such a refutation might have been convincing if there were a different set of circumstances surrounding such factors as his age, the suffering he might cause his friends in Athens, the treatment he might expect in the place or places of his exile, and above all the effect that escape would have had upon Socrates’ life-work, his philosophic mission, the thing which was more precious to him than life.

For another argument in support of the thesis that Socrates would have approved Antigone’s action, see R. N. Cross, Socrates: The Man and His Mission (Chicago, no date), pp. 168–72. Aspects of the general problem are discussed in Harry V. Jaffa, Thomism and Aristotelianism (Chicago, 1952), pp. 29–30, 199, and Jerome Hall, Living Law of Democratic Society (Indianapolis, 1949), pp. 21–22.

mature comprehension of Socrates,"² found that refusal to obey a law resulted not in loss of life but in temporary loss of physical freedom. This moderation of punishment from ancient Greece to mid-nineteenth century America, though not a steady historical trend, reveals a greater tolerance on the part of the state toward manifestations of civil disobedience, but the state's adamance still remains, and with it the essential dimensions of the problem.

Governments and people still contend over these old and fundamental problems of political obligation. Now as before, there are those who categorically assert that it is the duty of the citizen always to obey the law, while others insist that a citizen owes his primary obligation to his own conscience. Since it is my general conviction, with Aristotle, that "in all disputes upon government each party says something that is just,"³ I propose to consider here those principles which, in a democratic state at least, appear to me to render valid some claims to the right of civil disobedience.⁴

Of such appeals to the right of civil disobedience I shall restrict myself in this paper to three: (1) the claim that the democratic state has no moral authority to make any demands on the individual because the political system (or the social order maintained by that system) is, in principle, unjust; (2) the claim that the system ideally conceived is just but that the particular state is a perverted form of democracy and is therefore unjust, and that consequently, as in the first instance, it lacks authority; (3) the claim that while the social order and the institutionalized form of democracy that seeks to maintain it are just, the particular law (or laws) is unjust in that it constitutes an attack on and a repudiation of that ideal, and that consequently disobedience to the law in question is, in the particular instance, calculated to achieve a greater good—the preservation of the system itself—than is likely to be achieved by compliance.

Since the resolution of a problem requires first that the problem be understood, it may be well to state at the outset what I conceive to be the underlying questions emerging from the present conflict over the principles of political obligation.

II

When a citizen today is summoned by a congressional investigating committee to answer questions he regards as morally reprehensible—questions, for example, that call upon him to state his political beliefs or to be an informer—he finds himself in a grave dilemma. If he answers the questions, he obeys the law but violates his moral code, and may, in addition, expose himself to certain ² Dickinson, op. cit., p. 50.

³ Aristotle, Politics, trans. William Ellis, Everyman's ed. (London, 1912), 1281a.

⁴ It seems hardly necessary to add that while the analysis of this problem is motivated by certain consequences which have ensued from the intense activities of congressional investigating committees in recent years, I am concerned not with the specific conduct of individuals who have appeared before such committees or with the behavior of the committee members themselves, but with the principles of political obligation that are relevant to such conduct.

non-legal consequences of his legal action—e.g., the loss of his job. If he refuses to answer on moral grounds, he satisfies his conscience but denies his obligation to the law, and thereby, if we are to believe certain conservative thinkers from Socrates' day to our own,⁵ endangers as well the very foundations of the social order. His personal risks in such a course are even greater, entailing possible imprisonment, and his only consolation would be the knowledge that he had displayed the virtue of courage, or, with Thoreau, the thought that "under a government which imprisons any unjustly, the true place for a just man is also a prison."⁶

If, however, he resorts to a legal instrument—e.g., the self-incrimination clause of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution—which will enable him both to satisfy his conscience and by invoking another law to stay out of jail, he invites a further dilemma. For if he invokes the Fifth Amendment knowing that it does not strictly apply to his case—e.g., if he seeks to protect someone else, although under the self-incrimination clause he is not entitled to do so—he does not tell the truth and may thereby dishonor his moral code. Nor can he enjoy the consolation of having been courageous, if he now seeks to escape the consequences of a refusal to answer based solely on moral grounds. On the other hand, if he is convinced that a lie is necessary to achieve a greater good, he may find it difficult to understand why one who acts rightly should be expected to invite wrongful punishment. To one who believes that a lie is always wrong, such conduct is inexcusable. But to men sensitive to the fact that moral dilemmas arise precisely because a particular situation offers no clearcut distinction between right and wrong, and that it is sometimes impossible to do that which is good without doing or suffering something that is bad, the performance of what under other circumstances might be evil is then right, not wrong. Moral rules are often in conflict, and a moral man may have to choose between telling the truth or lying to do good. If the greater good is right, the lie—otherwise bad but now necessary to the good—is also right. It is at least questionable whether an ambassador (or a spy) who lies, when necessary, for the good of his country, merits moral censure.

The gravity of the dilemma is compounded (a) by the failure of law, in general, to protect men from the non-legal consequences of legal action, and (b) by the deliberate use of the law, on occasion, to expose men to non-legal sanctions against actions heretofore beyond the pale of legal penalty.

Appeal to the Fifth Amendment may protect a man from certain legal penalties ensuing from his refusal to answer questions that might tend to incriminate him, but it provides no legal protection against the economic or social consequences of his refusal. Thus a man who invokes the Fifth Amendment may find himself without a job and with little likelihood of obtaining one, at least in his established field of endeavor. He may find himself and his family ostracized as well as impoverished. He may discover that his reputation and good name have been sacrificed on the altar of conscience. He may begin then to understand the element of truth in Machiavelli's cynical advice to one who would win popular approval and support—that it is often better to seem good than to be good. And he may learn, perhaps when it is too late, the awful significance of the words of Sophocles' Chorus:

⁵ For a contemporary view, see the argument by Peter Viereck in Conservatism Revisited (New York, 1949), pp. 10-11; but note his argument for the reverse position, pp. 20-21.

⁶ Henry David Thoreau, "Civil Disobedience," in Walden and Other Writings, ed. Brooks Atkinson, Modern Library ed. (New York, 1937), p. 646.

Tomorrow and for all time to come,
As in the past,
This law is immutable:
For mortals greatly to live is greatly to suffer.⁷

Since it is the rare man who is willing to suffer greatly, the dire non-legal consequences of permissible legal action impose pressures that make difficult a right resolution of the moral dilemma. The citizen may obey the law not because he conceives it right to obey but because he fears the consequences of disobedience. This introduces a new element into the problem, namely, the question of the moral obligation of the state to protect a citizen from social punishment when certain legal authorities or private powers disapprove his act, however unobjectionable it may be on strictly legal grounds. Does the state have an obligation to guarantee to a citizen not merely the constitutional right to refuse to answer questions with an incriminating bias, but also the legal right to protection from non-legal sanctions attendant upon such refusal?

It would be futile to deny that an affirmative answer to this last question leads into patent (and perhaps insuperable) difficulties, not the least of these being the dangers involved in unduly extending the sphere of state intervention. But the question of the state's obligation is not for this reason to be avoided. For if the Constitution is the final legal norm from which all subsidiary law derives its validity, then the protection of the Constitution must be made real and not simply formal. This can be achieved only when (a) the Constitution is applied not merely against de jure governments but against citizens and groups who comprise de facto or private governments that proclaim "laws" and impose sanctions, and (b) the laws of the state and the actions of governmental authorities conform both to the letter and to the spirit of the Constitution, i.e., they avoid so maltreating men as to expose them to non-legal sanctions where no legal punishments are or have been intended.

These principles, especially the former, may appear at first blush to embody a revolutionary proposal. Clearly, they require distinctions which are not likely to admit of mathematically precise application. On the one hand, there are certain social and economic consequences of lawful action which the state cannot prevent or eliminate even if it seeks to do so—e.g., the suspicion in the minds of some people that a man acquitted of a charge of rape or murder is nonetheless guilty.⁸ On the other hand, there are certain cases in which the state should not intervene even if it could do so—e.g., the dismissal from the police force of an officer who refuses, despite the direct and obvious nexus between the information sought and the responsibilities of his position, to testify even before a non-legal but properly constituted tribunal of his superior officers concerning his alleged collaboration with dope-peddlers. But between these two extremes there still remains a vast intermediate range of instances in which governments may properly undertake to protect men from non-legal sanctions which in effect invalidate a constitutional or legal right. In line with this principle—a principle long grasped by some of our more perceptive legal and political thinkers⁹ and incorporated in considerable measure into American constitutional law by the decision of the Supreme Court in *United States v. Classic*¹⁰ more than a decade ago—governments have in fact sponsored legislation which, like the Wagner Act, prevented an employer from dismissing an employee for joining a labor union, or which, like fair employment practices acts, seeks to curb certain discriminatory practices by private powers. And it is in line with this same principle that governments might well prevent a university from dismissing a member of its faculty if his sole offense is that he has invoked the protection of the Constitution in refusing to answer questions put to him by a legislative investigating committee. I do not mean to imply by this that a refusal to testify under protection of the Fifth Amendment is necessarily to be condoned. But it ought not to be automatically condemned; for a decision not to testify may involve profound and complex ethical as well as legal considerations to which automatic condemnation and consequent social punishment are blind, not to mention the fact that they violate the spirit of the constitutional amendment itself.

⁷ "Antigone," in Sophocles, The Theban Plays, trans. E. V. Rieu, Penguin ed. (London, 1947), pp. 142-43.

Similar considerations support the proposition that legal authorities are to be condemned when they circumvent, and indeed violate, the Constitution in employing indirect (non-legal) sanctions to coerce an individual in cases where the law itself does not give them that power. Consider, for example, the not infrequent behavior of a congressional investigating committee. If the primary purpose of—and warrant for—such a committee is to gather information as a basis for recommending legislation, then a private or closed hearing would normally enable it to achieve this end without exposing the citizen to non-legal penalties. If the committee is not only indifferent to this last consideration but, through a second and open hearing that adds nothing but publicity to answers already vouchsafed or refused by the witness, deliberately contrives a situation that brings social and economic sanctions into play, it in effect converts such non-legal sanctions into indirect forms of legal action. This all too common effect of the sustained congressional investigations into the loyalty of university professors and others is a calculated perversion of power that raises serious questions concerning the justice of governmental behavior.

⁸ But if in such an instance the state cannot prevent moral disapprobation, and even perhaps the imposition of social and economic sanctions, by those whose sentiments may have been outraged, it can at least assume the obligation not to leave the acquitted man impoverished if in establishing his innocence he has been compelled to exhaust his funds.

⁹ See, for example, Morris R. Cohen, Law and the Social Order (New York, 1933), especially pp. 41–68, 102–11; Edgar Bodenheimer, "Power and Law: A Study of the Concept of Law," Ethics, Vol. 50, pp. 127–43, at pp. 133–35 (Jan., 1940); Alexander H. Pekelis, Law and Social Action, ed. Milton R. Konvitz (Ithaca, N. Y., 1950), pp. 91–127; and Robert L. Hale, Freedom through Law (New York, 1952). On the mutual dependence of legal and non-legal social controls, there is, of course, a vast literature—e.g., the writings of Ihering and Gierke, Edward A. Ross and Max Weber, Robert M. MacIver and Bertrand Russell. Some of the juristic thinkers are considered in Julius Stone, The Province and Function of Law, 2d printing (Sydney, Australia, 1950), Chs. 11 and 24.

¹⁰ 313 U.S. 299 (1940). See further the cases and discussion in Robert K. Carr, Federal Protection of Civil Rights (Ithaca, N. Y., 1947), Ch. 4.

What is involved, consequently, is not only the obligation of the citizen to the state but also the responsibility of the state—certainly, at least, of a constitutional state—to the citizen.

The dilemma of the citizen, then, may derive not simply from a conflict between the commands of the state and the dictates of his conscience. It may emerge as well from the incompatibility of an enacted law or of the acts of governmental authorities or of private powers with the constitution of the state, understanding by the constitution not simply the written rules that comprise a revered document but the logic or underlying principle of the system which the Constitution (written and unwritten) is supposed to represent. In this circumstance the dilemma of the citizen takes another, and perhaps more aggravated, form than Antigone's moral problem; for the citizen here believes that he is being loyal to the Constitution in rejecting the obligation to obey the law (or the bidding of a legal authority). He is not pitting simply his conscience against the law but also the law against the Constitution. He is asserting that in defending the fundamental law he is being more loyal than those who would compel him to violate it. He invokes not (or not merely) the Fifth but the First Amendment, which, while thus far rejected by the courts in such cases, nevertheless appears to him the proper ground on which to take his stand.¹¹

It is easy to say, and to say rightly, that there are legal mechanisms for the resolution of a conflict between an enacted law (or the bidding of a legal authority) and the Constitution, and that it is not the business of the citizen to displace such mechanisms by self-arrogation. But such mechanisms—e.g., the Supreme Court—do not always restrict social or economic or religious power groups from attaching severe penalties to action that is legally right. What is legally right may be deemed socially or economically or morally wrong. Consequently, the moral question for the citizen remains, all the more so since there is no legal machinery to prevent coercive action by non-legal power groups, by private governments.

¹¹ It is not without interest that even a near-absolutist like Hobbes would in the immediate circumstances seem to sanction a man's refusal to obey. "No man," Hobbes declared, "is tied by any compacts whatsoever to accuse himself, or any other, by whose damage he is like to procure himself a bitter life . . . yet in a public trial he may, by torture, be forced to make answer. But such answers are no testimony of the fact, but helps for the searching out of truth; insomuch that whether the party tortured answer true or false, or whether he answer not at all, whatsoever he doth, he doth it by right." De Cive, II, 19.

III

What, then, is the citizen to do? If he obeys the law, he may violate his conscience. If he obeys his conscience, he may violate the law. If he obeys his conscience and seeks to vindicate his alleged disobedience by invoking the protection of the Constitution, he exposes himself to social or economic sanctions that are sometimes more powerful than the legal penalties that might have been applied had he not claimed that protection. The state, where it is not itself the deliberate provocateur, is indifferent to his fate in this last circumstance. Should he then be indifferent to the state?

The answer of the state, at least, is clear. It is no. There can be no law to which obedience is optional, no command to which the state attaches an "if you please." Consequently, there can be no legal right to disobey the law. Nor will the state, customarily, recognize a moral claim to disobedience. It may be urged that conscientious objectors often escape the prescribed legal punishments by appealing to a higher law. But this is only half true. For they escape such consequences only because a court or a statute admits such a claim as a legal one. The state, so to speak, incorporates the higher law into the positive law; it proclaims that in such cases it is lawful for some men to follow a certain course of action denied to the populace at large.

The state, then, demands obedience to its laws; and while it employs (or can employ) a number of different arguments to vindicate this claim,¹² its primary justification is the ground that such obedience is essential to the maintenance of the social order. Order, it is said, is better than disorder; and if men are free to set aside the laws of the state whenever they find them in conflict with their private interests, particular religion, or individual sense of morality, anarchy will result. Disobedience to the laws, therefore, involves an attack on the state itself. It is an act of rebellion, an attempt to subvert the foundations of the entire system of order which it is the business of the state to secure. This is why Socrates rejected Crito's suggestion that he flee to escape execution. What reply could he make, Socrates asked Crito, if the Athenian government should come to him and say:

Tell us, Socrates, . . . what are you about? are you not going by an act of yours to overturn us—the laws, and the whole state, as far as in you lies? Do you imagine that a state can subsist and not be overthrown, in which the decisions of law have no power, but are set aside and trampled upon by individuals? . . . Tell us,—What complaint have you to make against us which justifies you in attempting to destroy us and the state? . . . And because we think right to destroy you, do you think that you have any right to destroy us in return, and your country as far as in you lies?¹³

¹² Cf. T. H. Green, Lectures on the Principles of Political Obligation (London, 1924 ed.); J. P. Plamenatz, Consent, Freedom and Political Obligation (London, 1938), Chs. 1–4; Max Weber, The Theory of Social and Economic Organization, trans. A. M. Henderson and Talcott Parsons (New York, 1947), pp. 324–73, 382–92; and Ernest Barker, Principles of Social and Political Theory (Oxford, 1951), Bk. V.

¹³ Crito (trans. Benjamin Jowett), 50–51.

He could, Crito admitted, make no answer. Since by his failure to emigrate Socrates had agreed to abide by the laws, he could not now disavow that covenant. He could not through disobedience seek to overthrow the state.¹⁴

Clearly there is merit in this position. Order is a necessary condition to the achievement of larger values; and if order is to be maintained there must be power, and a general readiness on the part of men to abide by the commands of power. But the merit is a relative one. Order in itself is not a sufficient condition for the realization of those values, and a government which merely secures order without, or at the expense of, those larger values, lacks moral vindication. Under such circumstances, it might well be argued that anarchy or disorder is to be preferred—not for its own sake but for the opportunity it provides to recreate the requisite conditions for a better human existence. Thus, while order is good, it is not necessarily the highest good. We must still distinguish the just or the decent order; we must still recognize that order is but a means to some larger end.¹⁵ Epictetus may command our sympathy when he observes: "Did heaven owe me perfect parents?—No; it owed me parents." But, as Aristotle reminded Plato, it is surely a shallow philosophy that ignores the vast difference between a family and a state. And if we are to adhere to the principle of democracy, then not order but a certain kind of order—one based on opinion, on consent—constitutes the necessary framework of justice.

This being so, it is hard to see what absolute moral claim democracy can make on those who withhold their fundamental consent. Anarchists, communists, fascists, and others who deny—not through revolutionary action but through civil disobedience—the authority of the social order which democracy seeks to maintain, appeal instead to some alternative principle of justice. If they obey the laws of democracy, they do so for reasons of expediency, not of principle. It is true that fascists like Lawrence Dennis who affirm fidelity to the notion that might makes right are by this standard logically committed to the acceptance of democracy where it prevails; for democracy by virtue of the fact that it prevails has might and is therefore "right."¹⁶ But democracy is not responsible for the confused arguments of its opponents. Nor can it without denying its very essence stand on any principle other than that of generalized consent. Consequently, democracy must recognize that for men who reject its values and refuse their assent to its system of order the dictates of democratic government appear as the commands of an illegitimate power. And where that power can be defied, especially with some expectation of success, opponents of democracy will claim a moral right to do so. In this regard they claim no more, on purely formalistic grounds, with respect to democratic systems than democrats do with respect to oligarchical systems. Hence the problem for democracy is not that of validating its own claim to their obedience, but that of allowing them that degree of civil disobedience which will balance the need for its own institutional preservation with its ultimate values, especially the provision for maximum free play for the individual conscience. Democracy can, to be sure, offer an opposing value judgment; but it cannot—without invoking intuition or divine or natural sanction or the proposition that might makes right—prove that its value system is truly best. Consequently, while democracy must, in defense of its own values, reject the scheme of justice proposed by the anti-democrats, it must at the same time face the uncomfortable fact that on intrinsic grounds it lacks an absolute moral standard in terms of which it can justly disavow the right of civil disobedience to those who deny the validity of the social order.¹⁷

¹⁴ The fact that Socrates was in prison at the very moment he was thus arguing against Crito's plea that he disobey the law, reinforces the contention in note 1 above that Socrates did not actually accept this position; that he was in fact prepared to yield only a qualified obedience to the laws.

¹⁵ For this reason skeptics have put the argument for social order not in terms of right but in terms of convenience. The difficulty here, of course, is that it then becomes "right" to disobey whenever the social order ceases to be convenient.

¹⁶ I do not mean to imply that Mr. Dennis accepts the logic of his own position. See my Patterns of Anti-Democratic Thought (New York, 1949), Ch. 3. For the absurdity of the "principle" that might makes right see the classic argument in Rousseau, The Social Contract, Book I, Ch. 3. Compare, however, Spinoza, Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, Ch. 16, and Tractatus Politicus, Chs. 2-4.

It may of course be argued that men who reject democracy should leave the state, that if they stay, as Socrates stayed, they assume the obligation to obey its laws.¹⁸ And we have, in point of fact, instances in our time in which the right of egress has been exercised—e.g., T. S. Eliot, George Santayana, and Ezra Pound; even, perhaps, Alexander Berkman and Emma Goldman, who rejoiced when they arrived (albeit after an unintended and involuntary voyage) in Lenin's Russia. But apart from the practical objections that the state does not always grant the right of egress and that there may not be another state which embodies the "right" political system and social order—witness the tragic tale of Emma Goldman's disenchantment with Russia¹⁹—I fail to comprehend the moral character of this solution. I recognize that while on intrinsic grounds democracy affirms that each man's conscience is "right," it must set instrumental limits on this "right"; that, operationally speaking, the notion that each man is entitled to have any conscience he wants does not imply that he has a right to subordinate the laws to his conscience. Nevertheless, if democracy insists that all men are subject to the laws, it must also insist that all men are protected by the laws, that all men have an equal right (say) to life and liberty. A majority under this principle has no absolute moral justification to limit this right except where it has secured the consent of the governed—not, of course, in the sense that consent is given to each particular law, but in the sense that generalized consent or consensus is accorded the system under which that majority has come to power. This being so, what moral principle justifies a democracy in going outside the area of consent to deny the right of civil disobedience to a recalcitrant individual or minority? What principle other than force gives a democratic people the right to exclude those who reject democracy from that portion of the earth possessed by the democrats? Clearly, the argument asserts only that the bulk of the people regard a particular system as just, and that those who do not accept this valuation shall nonetheless be required to submit.²⁰ But if consent is acknowledged to be the ultimate source of authority, the appeal to force leaves unanswered (where it does not negate) the question of justice—whether that system is good or, indeed, best. This is not to deny that even the best system may depend on a measure of force to maintain itself; it is only to affirm that the resort to force, even when successful, cannot of itself establish that a system is best.

¹⁷ Some writers have sought in intuition or in natural law an "objective" criterion in terms of which they could show that democracy is intrinsically and not merely instrumentally best—e.g., Walter T. Stace, The Destiny of Western Man (New York, 1942) and Mortimer J. Adler and Walter Farrell, "The Theory of Democracy," The Thomist, Vols. 3-7 (July, 1941-Jan., 1944)—but all such efforts rest ultimately on certain assumptions which cannot be proved. See further my "Power, Law, and Freedom of Inquiry," in Educational Freedom in an Age of Anxiety, ed. H. Gordon Hullfish (New York, 1953), pp. 52-69, at pp. 59-65.

¹⁸ For a recent (though qualified) restatement of this position, see Gray L. Dorsey, "The Necessity of Authority to Freedom," in Freedom and Authority in Our Time, ed. Lyman Bryson et al. (New York, 1953), pp. 317-33, at pp. 329-31.

¹⁹ See her autobiography, Living My Life, 2 vols. (New York, 1931), Vol. 2, pp. 726-927.

I return, therefore, to the position that where consent is withheld from the entire system of order itself, democracy's claim to obedience with respect to such dissidents rests on power, not on a universal morality. Consequently, democracy cannot insist, without denying its own framework of justice—the principle of consent—that such individuals or groups obey the law. In such cases it can only resort to the rule of expediency referred to above—namely, that of disallowing only that expression of the individual conscience which is incompatible with democracy's own ultimate values and institutional preservation.²¹

²⁰ This was clearly perceived by Justice Holmes, who with typical frankness wrote to Frederick Pollock: "I do think that man at present is a predatory animal. I think that the sacredness of human life is a purely municipal ideal of no validity outside the jurisdiction. I believe that force, mitigated so far as may be by good manners, is the ultima ratio, and between two groups that want to make inconsistent kinds of worlds I see no remedy except force." Holmes-Pollock Letters, ed. Mark DeWolfe Howe, 2 vols. (Cambridge, 1942), Vol. 2, p. 36. And again, in letters to Harold J. Laski: "... all law means I will kill you if necessary to make you conform to my requirements." "... there is no superior arbiter—it is one of taste—but when men differ in taste as to the kind of world they want the only thing to do is to go to work killing." Holmes-Laski Letters, ed. Mark DeWolfe Howe, 2 vols. (Cambridge, 1953), Vol. 1, pp. 16, 116.

²¹ I am not unaware of the objection that the state cannot regard as irrelevant the effects of such disobedience on others. There is an immense difference, it is said, between disobeying the law when it conflicts with my principles or preferences if such disobedience does not injure others, and disobeying the law at the cost of injury to others. This argument has great force, and in general I think it proper that men should obey even unjust laws when disobedience has the effect of worsening, rather than improving, the situation. But the argument seems to me also to beg two of the very questions at issue: whether the law (and more important the system itself) does in fact injure others, and whether the numerical calculus is a proper principle of justice. In disobeying the law under the circum-

IV

Of those who accept democracy as the theoretically or practically best political order, yet contemplate disobedience to the law, two classes of citizens must, I think, be distinguished. One denies the intrinsic merit or rationality of the law itself; the other challenges as well the claim of the particular form of state enacting the law to be called a democracy.

For this latter group, democracy is good but the state is not democratic; hence with respect to the principle of political obligation their attitude toward the political order is not essentially different from that of those who accept the state as democratic but deny that democracy is good. They not only argue, with Aristotle,²² that a government democratic in form may be oligarchical in fact; they insist further that a careful examination of the American political system discloses it to be formally insufficient as well. From their point of view, the American Senate (based on a quota system that does violence to the principle of popular representation), the Supreme Court (with its power of judicial review), the staggered system of elections (which not infrequently prevents a popular majority from becoming a legal or controlling majority), the involved apparatus that separates and checks powers so as to deadlock no less than to balance them, the amending clause (which puts the Constitution itself beyond the reach of normal majorities)—all these and more (e.g., suffrage restrictions, gerrymandering, and the like) are but devices to hinder and at times effectively to block the translation of public opinion into public policy. Even the sacred rules of the game may be changed by the group in power when those rules no longer operate to that group's advantage. This is amply evidenced by the history of the Supreme Court with respect, for example, to the Fourteenth Amendment.

Knowing these things (or feeling this way), a citizen confronted by what he conceives to be a morally reprehensible law (or an action under that law) has difficulty in accepting the argument that he should express his disapproval not through civil disobedience but through the regular legal and political channels available to him. In his view, it is simply not true that these legal and political channels are available to him, that is, available in the way that democracy ideally requires. Such a citizen might agree that all human contrivances are imperfect. He might admit, too, that it is great folly, if not fanaticism, to insist on the perfectibility of political institutions regardless of consequences. Nevertheless, if it is not simply to evoke his blind acquiescence, a democratic system must above all be democratic; it must embody to a major degree elements of that stances cited here, the dissident takes the position that it is the law (and the system of order as well) which inflicts the injury, and that by disobeying the law he is calling the attention of the people to the injustice of the state. Moreover, if justice involves injury to others, then it is "just" that such injury be inflicted upon them. (In this event, of course, the dissident might well contend that the injury is apparent rather than real.) In any case, the objection does little more than return us to the fundamental issue at stake: which of the conflicting value systems is truly best or just?

²² Politics, 1292b.

just political order which it purportedly represents. If it falls so far short of this ideal as to foreclose any real possibility of correcting legislative evils by (say) normal majorities, if the political mechanism obstructs public opinion by institutionalizing various forms of minority control, it is in fact not a democracy at all. It is a perverted form of democratic government and, as such, it is bound to rely on unjust laws.²³

To the extent that there is substance in this view—in the sense that the indictment of institutional arrangements is sound—men committed to democracy are under no moral obligation to obey “undemocratic” laws. Those who place a different weight on the shortcomings of the system may deplore their judgment in this regard, but if the shortcomings are serious and real they cannot in democracy’s name be asked to give absolute obedience to a less-than-democratic (and to this degree undemocratic) system. Like the good churchgoers of Concord who were taken ill when Thoreau asked them also to read the Bible, protagonists of the system might well be discomfited and silenced when confronted, for instance, by a Negro suffering political and educational discrimination in one of our states, or an interned Nisei, who to justify an act of civil disobedience asks but a single question: “Is this the content of democracy?”

V

We come, finally, to those democrats who accept the system as essentially democratic and who are prepared, on the whole, to obey the laws. They understand that government by consent means consent not to each particular law but to the entire system of order itself, and ultimately to the idea of justice which that system represents. For the sake of the greater good secured by that system through its government and its laws, they accept specific enactments which they otherwise disapprove. They obey not necessarily because they think that the law is right, but because they think it right to obey the law.²⁴

For this reason they reject the individualistic ethics of a Protagoras, who would justify disobedience to the law provided you can get away with it, or of a Harold Laski or of a Thoreau, who would demand of each law that it provide “moral adequacy,”²⁵ or of other legal and political theorists who would measure

²³ There is substantial though not complete truth in Aristotle’s dictum that “a well-formed government will have good laws, a bad one, bad ones,” Ibid., 1282b.

²⁴ See R. M. MacIver, The Modern State (London, 1926), p. 154. This is not to argue that reason is the only, or the decisive, factor in leading men to obey laws which they regard as unjust. Habit, indolence, deference, fear, and the like, are in most cases the crucial determinants of obedience. See James Bryce, Studies in History and Jurisprudence (New York, 1901), pp. 467 ff., and R. M. MacIver, The Web of Government (New York, 1947), pp. 73–81.

²⁵ “My problem,” Laski wrote to Holmes, “is to take away from the state the superior morality with which we have invested its activities and give them [sic] back to the individual conscience.” Holmes-Laski Letters (cited in note 20), Vol. 1, p. 23. See further his Authority in the Modern State (New Haven, 1919), Ch. 1, especially pp. 43, 46, 55; A Grammar of Politics, 4th ed. (London, 1938), Part I; and Studies in Law and Politics (New Haven, 1932), Ch. 11. So also Thoreau: “Must the citizen ever for a moment, or in the the obligation of a citizen to the law in terms of the degree to which it serves some other end. If a man's loyalty is to the system, then obedience cannot be determined solely by immediate approbation. He cannot attempt to evaluate the law simply in terms of its expressed content;²⁶ nor can he separate laws from their cumulative total effect on the assumption that disobedience to a particular law leaves unaffected the system of law. Very few laws are accepted unanimously, and if the considerable number of citizens who dislike a law are literally free to disobey it, the state and the social order can hardly be expected to survive. A plea for total disobedience, or for the right of total disobedience, logically entails not a state at all but anarchy.

Does it follow that the citizen who admits his obligation to obey the laws must obey all laws always? Is one who rejects the extreme individualism of a Laski compelled to accept the extreme absolutism of a Hegel,²⁷ or the near-absolutism of a Hobbes²⁸ or of a John Dickinson, who join with Socrates of the Crito in entering an affirmative answer? If a law is disobeyed, they tell us, the social order will collapse. In their view, each law is an integral part of a coherent, corporate body of law, which in turn sustains society. Consequently, disobedience to a law is a challenge to sovereignty itself. As Dickinson put it: "It is not a question of a bare conflict between the individual and the sovereign; the conflict must be regarded as rather between the individual and all that the sovereign stands for." In disobeying the sovereign we bring "dominantly into the foreground the large issue of the desirability of preserving public authority and civil society itself." In disobeying the sovereign we strike at just this essential method of civil society.²⁹

This is a plausible argument. It avoids the individualistic fallacy by emphasizing the need for order and the role of law in maintaining that order. But it is not without fallacies of its own. What holds society together, for example, is not simply law (and perhaps not even law) but the customs and moral codes, the sentiments, of the people. The classic formulation of T. H. Green least degree, resign his conscience to the legislator? Why has every man a conscience, then? I think that we should be men first, and subjects afterward. It is not desirable to cultivate a respect for the law, as much as for the right. The only obligation which I have a right to assume is to do at any time what I think right." Thoreau, "Civil Disobedience" (cited in note 6), pp. 636-37.

²⁶ This is convincingly demonstrated in Felix S. Cohen, Ethical Systems and Legal Ideals (New York, 1933), pp. 62-65.

²⁷ There is, however, a certain ambiguity in Hegel's absolutism, stemming from his apparent insistence that Antigone in refusing to obey the law of the state was both right and wrong. Cf. Georg W. F. Hegel, The Phenomenology of Mind, trans. J. B. Baillie, 2 vols. (New York, 1910), Vol. 2, pp. 453 ff., and Georg W. F. Hegel, Philosophy of Right, trans. T. M. Knox (Oxford, 1942), pp. 3-10, 100, 114-15, 165-73, and the relevant translator's notes on pp. 299, 301, and 351. Hegel's subordination of the state (the highest reality within the realm of right) to philosophical truth (the highest reality within the whole system) is emphasized in Herbert Marcuse, Reason and Revolution (New York, 1941), p. 178.

²⁸ For Hobbes' denial that political obligation requires an absolute obedience to all laws, see for example De Cive, VI, 13; VIII, 1; and XV, 18.

²⁹ "A Working Theory of Sovereignty" (cited in note 1), pp. 50-51.

still applies: it is not the state that produces cohesive will; it is will that creates and sustains the state.³⁰ Political loyalties and political obligations do not exclude other loyalties and other obligations, and it is the meaning of democracy that it does not seek to command a monopoly of man's allegiances. Democracy seeks to root its fundamental unity not in the power of the state but in the sense of common interest that sustains but does not obliterate the vital differences among men.³¹ So long as these differences are admitted, with respect not simply to things that do not matter much but to things that touch the very heart of the existing order as well,³² the democratic state can find its essential solidarity not in the structure of law but in the minds of men.

Nor does the absolutist position rest on solid ground when it assumes that all laws form a coherent unity, so that disobedience to a particular law necessarily involves the destruction of the entire system of law. Evasion of the law is a normal concomitant of all legal systems, and it is doubtful that the existence of jails constitutes sufficient proof of the breakdown of the system. We are all familiar with the propensity of people not in jails to disobey laws that inconvenience them—e.g., traffic regulations, income tax laws, and prohibitions on gambling and on the traffic in liquor and women. Police and other political officials do not enforce all laws equally and at times they conspire with people who seek to disobey them. Governments too evade or disobey the law—witness the oft-cited examples of Southern states that have largely ignored the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the American Constitution; of the many Congresses that have failed to apply the constitutional provision (Sec. 2, Amend. XIV) requiring that the representation of such states in the House of Representatives be reduced; and of the refusal of the Congress in 1920 to carry out the required reapportionment of the House of Representatives. Despite these and other acts of disobedience, the system of law has not, I think, disappeared. Clearly, some laws are not essential to the maintenance of the social order.

If, therefore, the state is not equivalent to the whole of the social order, and if all laws are not integrated into a single coherent unity, disobedience to a particular law need not imply an attempt to overthrow the political system or the social order itself. To Dickinson's charge that the conflict is between the individual and all that the sovereign stands for, we must reply: the conflict is also between the sovereign and all that the individual stands for. It may even, in fact, be between the actual sovereign and all that the ideal sovereign stands for. In these two points, I believe, we can find a sufficient justification for some acts of civil disobedience.

³⁰ See also Elijah Jordan, Theory of Legislation; An Essay on the Dynamics of Public Mind (Chicago, 1952).

³¹ Cf. MacIver, The Modern State, p. 482; Dorothy Fosdick, What is Liberty? (New York, 1939), p. 128; and the writer's Patterns of Anti-Democratic Thought, pp. 204-6, 247-48.

³² As Mr. Justice Jackson so aptly put it in West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 642 (1943). See also the interesting argument of Charles R. Nixon, "Freedom vs. Unity: A Problem in the Theory of Civil Liberty," Political Science Quarterly, Vol. 68, pp. 70-88 (March, 1953).

Consider, first, what is involved when the state demands that an individual obey not his conscience but the law. In a general sense, it appears to ask only that he recognize the necessity of compromise if men are to live together. But when the issue is joined so that men question the justice of the terms on which they are asked to live together, the state requires far more: it demands nothing less than that he submit to a civil theology.³³ For if action contrary to conscience is immoral, the state by insisting that the individual follow not his conscience but a command of the state contrary to his conscience thereby insists that he act immorally. Since the state will not admit that its command is immoral, it must—if it is to vindicate its claim to obedience—argue that the judgment of the individual conscience is wrong, and that by acting instead according to the state's judgment of what is right the individual will realize his true morality, his true freedom. There are many who still take seriously this teaching of Rousseau, Hegel, and Bosanquet. Nevertheless, the notion that the state embodies our real will, our true morality, our true freedom, as against our actual will, which is said to represent a false morality, is incompatible with the democratic principle. For democracy, if I understand it correctly, stands above all else for a method whereby men can resolve peacefully which of competing moralities shall temporarily prevail. It cannot—if it is to remain a democracy—maintain that it has discovered the true morality which shall henceforth bind all men. Yet when the government of a democratic state demands of a citizen that he surrender his conscience to the state—as it demanded of Jehovah's Witnesses that they (or their children) salute the flag—it in effect demands that he submit to the true morality. From this point of view, imprisonment for civil disobedience becomes, paradoxically, a prolonged appeal to the prisoner's conscience, detention being but a means of permitting his conscience time in which to adjust,³⁴ after the state has by putting him in prison already denied the validity of his conscience.

³³ This, indeed, is what Lincoln frankly urged in his address in 1838 on "The Perpetuation of Our Political Institutions": "Let every American, every lover of liberty, every well wisher to his prosperity, swear by the blood of the Revolution, never to violate in the least particular, the laws of the country; and never to tolerate their violation by others. . . . let every man remember that to violate the law, is to trample on the blood of his father, and to tear the character of his own, and his children's liberty. Let reverence for the laws, be breathed by every American mother, to the lisping babe, that prattles on her lap—let it be taught in schools, in seminaries, and in colleges; let it be written in primers, spelling books, and in Almanacs;—let it be preached from the pulpit, proclaimed in legislative halls, and enforced in courts of justice. And, in short, let it become the political religion of the nation; and let the old and the young, the rich and the poor, the grave and the gay, of all sexes and tongues, and colors and conditions, sacrifice unceasingly upon its altars." Abraham Lincoln: His Speeches and Writings, ed. Roy P. Basler (Cleveland, 1946), pp. 80–81.

³⁴ In employing here a modified phrase from Professor Stone, The Province and Function of Law (cited in note 9), p. 228, I do not mean to associate him with the doctrine in the text.

To escape this dilemma democracy must deny the theological sanction. It cannot assume what Eric Voegelin suggests the Oxford political philosophers have assumed: namely, that by the mystery of incarnation the principles of right political order have become historical flesh more perfectly in their country than anywhere else at any time.³⁵ It must recognize that the political order is not perfect and that the laws are not always just. It must affirm no more than that a law is law not because it is absolutely good or right but because a legal majority has decreed it. Democracy would, of course, insist that it is right for the majority to have this power, and that men should respect this right of the majority as a necessary condition of democracy. But if it is true that the majority may act wrongly—i.e., affront on intrinsic or instrumental grounds the notion of justice held by a dissenting individual or minority—such insistence leads to the paradoxical principle that while the system and the laws that institutionalize that system are just, particular laws emanating from the system may be wrong and therefore unjust. A just system may produce unjust laws.

Now the Aristotelian question—whether a good man can always be a good citizen—has traditionally formed the basis for the problem of political obligation. But if there is validity to the conception of citizenship that I have argued here, the mark of the good citizen—at least in a democracy—is not loyalty to the laws but loyalty to the system, to the principle of democracy itself. The good citizen is obligated not to the sovereign but to all that the sovereign stands for.³⁶ Consequently, law can command his allegiance not because it is law but because it serves something that is good, because it respects the system of democracy and the purposes for which the democratic state exists.³⁷ If he obeys simply because it is law, he worships means, not ends; and this is surely a perversion of purpose.

When, therefore, a government holding office and trust under that system so acts—whether directly through its laws or indirectly through non-legal sanctions and the cultivation of a climate of opinion characterized by suspicion and fear—as to deny or to threaten the integrity of the system itself, it creates a situation in which men loyal to democracy may be compelled to defend it against the laws.

It has been urged, not perhaps without reason, that such defense should look ³⁵ Eric Voegelin, "The Oxford Political Philosophers," The Philosophical Quarterly, Vol. 3, pp. 97-114, at p. 100 (April, 1953).

³⁶ This is not, perhaps, inconsistent with Aristotle who, while he defines a citizen as "one who obeys the magistrate" (Politics, 1277a), also affirms that the one care common to all the citizens—that which describes a citizen—is "the safety of the community" (ibid., 1276b).

³⁷ Despite certain phrases in which Professor Barker seems to argue that obedience to the law is the highest political obligation (op. cit., p. 194), I take his general position to be in accord with the proposition affirmed here: that it is the state, not the law, which merits that obedience. Clearly, he concurs with the further judgment that since the state is less than society, obedience to law must be subordinate to obedience to right, the highest moral obligation. Ibid., pp. 193, 221 ff.

first to the democratic processes of persuasion and election.³⁸ But where it is precisely these processes that the laws attack, where the incursions of government are upon freedom of opinion and the elements of democratic procedure, this may well prove a vain hope. Men are not without warrant in saying today what men have all too often had to say before: the times are "out of joint." Once again, this is a moment when the ordinary rules of decency are to some men in power apparently unknown, when some men cloaked in the sanctity of the law seek to exorcise the spirit of free inquiry.³⁹ Under such circumstances, it may well be that obedience to democracy can best, and perhaps only, be served by disobedience to the laws. It may well be that men of moral sensitivity and courage will have to say, with Thoreau: "They are the lovers of law and order who observe the law when the government breaks it."⁴⁰

VI

Whether laws prescribing affirmations of loyalty, or sustaining legislative inquiries into one's past or present beliefs and associations, or proscribing the expression of revolutionary ideas, are of this variety, each man must judge for himself. If he dislikes such laws but does not regard them to be a crucial violation of or threat to democracy, he will obey them. If, however, he views such measures as destructive of the very principles that constitute the system to which he has given his allegiance and which he is pledged to uphold, he may see no moral alternative to disobedience.⁴¹ In the judgment of others, his conscience may be wrong; but if he is to retain his dignity as a man he must act upon it. He may fail by such action to impress the value of his idea on others, but in no other way can he hope to correct the tragic lesson of history which "shows that good causes are more often defeated by negligence in the pursuit of the right than by positive forces of evil."⁴²

So long as a man comes to this decision honestly, in accord with moral prin-

³⁸ So Lincoln in the address cited earlier (note 33, above, Basler, p. 81: "... bad laws, if they exist, should be replaced as soon as possible, still while they continue in force, for the sake of example, they should be religiously observed."

³⁹ It is well to recall the insight of Spinoza: "All men are born ignorant, and before they can learn the right way of life and acquire the habit of virtue, the greater part of their life . . . has passed away." Spinoza, Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, trans. R. H. M. Elwes, Ch. 16.

⁴⁰ "Slavery in Massachusetts," in op. cit., p. 669. Compare the principles and grounds of justifiable disobedience in Franz L. Neumann, "On the Limits of Justifiable Disobedience," in Conflict of Loyalties, ed. R. M. MacIver (New York, 1952), pp. 49-56.

⁴¹ Apart, of course, from the submission that looks to God. So Hobbes argued (De Cive, XVIII, 13): "Must we resist princes, when we cannot obey them? Truly, no; for this is contrary to our civil covenant. What must we do then? Go to Christ by martyrdom. . . ." And so the author of the Vindiciae contra tyrannos (trans. as Hubert Languet, A Defence of Liberty against Tyrants, ed. Harold J. Laski [London, 1924], p. 210), who, in the silence of the magistrates and the failure of men to run away, insisted that "there are no other weapons to be used, but bended knees and humble hearts."

⁴² M. R. Cohen, The Meaning of Human History (La Salle, Ill., 1947), p. 296.

ciples to which he is firmly committed, and so long as his act of disobedience is calculated—taking the whole situation into view—to achieve a greater good than is likely to be achieved by his acquiescence, I cannot believe that he can be said to have denied his fundamental obligation either as a good man or as a good citizen.⁴³

⁴³ To rely on conscience, integrity, and the capacity of man to judge rationally the probable consequences of his act of disobedience is insufficient, perhaps, to meet the objection of those who demand proof both of moral inescapability and of intellectual adequacy. But in the absence of an ethical absolutism and of a determinate aristocracy that embodies this alleged moral and intellectual superiority—and clearly democracy cannot in principle admit either alternative—I see no way to escape this trust.

NATIONALISM IN TROPICAL AFRICA*

JAMES S. COLEMAN

University of California at Los Angeles

Postwar uprisings and nationalist assertions in Tropical Africa—that part of the continent south of the Sahara and north of the Union—have directed increased attention towards the nature and implications of the awakening of the African to political consciousness. Among scholars this neglected area has long been the preserve of the scientific linguist or of the social anthropologist; only recently have American sociologists, economists, and political scientists developed an active interest in its problems.¹ As a consequence, apart from certain efforts by anthropologists to popularize their findings and insights we have been obliged to rely primarily upon the somewhat contradictory accounts of colonial governments seeking to explain imperial connections, or of African nationalists determined to achieve self-government and the good life of which national self-determination has become the symbol.² Thus, we have been placed in the uncomfortable position of having to formulate opinions and policy and to render judgments without sufficient knowledge, or, what could be worse, on the basis of evaluations provided by participants in the nationalist struggle. There is, therefore, a very real need for independent and objective research regarding the character and probable course of African nationalist development.

I. WHAT IS AFRICAN NATIONALISM?

(Not the least burdensome of our tasks is the problem of correlating or distinguishing between the generally accepted political concepts elaborated with specific reference to developments in the Western World (i.e., state, nation, nationality, nationalism) and the conceptual tools developed by the Africanists.) The latter have tended to feel that the traditional concepts and methods of the political scientist are unserviceable in the study of the political structure and life of pre-literate societies.³ Yet notwithstanding the importance of the

* Adapted from a paper discussed at the Conference on Problems of Area Research in Contemporary Africa, held at Princeton University, October 14–16, 1953, sponsored jointly by the National Research Council and the Social Science Research Council under a grant from the Carnegie Corporation.

¹ Two notable prewar exceptions were Professor Raymond Leslie Buell and Dr. Ralph J. Bunche.

² As an excellent example of the application of the insights of anthropology to the problems of political development in this area, see William R. Bascom, "West and Central Africa," in Most of the World, ed. Ralph Linton (New York, 1949), pp. 331–405. For a historian's appraisal, see Vernon McKay, "Nationalism in British West Africa," Foreign Policy Reports, Vol. 24, pp. 2–11 (March 15, 1948).

³ African Political Systems, eds. M. Fortes and E. E. Evans-Pritchard (New York, 1940), pp. 4 ff. Insofar as traditional concepts and methods are concerned, ethnocentrism has been freely confessed by political scientists in recent self-criticism. See David Easton, The Political System (New York, 1953), pp. 33 ff.; also Report of the Inter-University lineage, clan, or tribe; the role of the diviner, the chief, or the age-grade society; or the wide variations in the organization of power within such societies, the concept and the institution of the modern nation-state, towards the creation of which African nationalism tends to be directed, is distinctly Western in its form and content.) It is as exotic to Africa as Professor Toynbee has suggested that it is to the rest of the non-European world.⁴ Nevertheless, just as the Indian National Congress has largely created an Indian nation, so African nationalists are endeavoring to mould new nations in Africa (e.g., "Ghana," "Nigeria," and "Kamerun").)

On the level of abstraction at which the political scientist is accustomed to roam, a nation is not a loose catch-all term denoting a larger grouping of tribes (e.g., Zulus, Basutos, Mende, Buganda, or Hausa); rather it is a post-tribal, post-feudal terminal community which has emerged from the shattering forces of disintegration that characterize modernity. This does not mean that the Hausa peoples of Northern Nigeria cannot become a nation, nor does it mean that the "national" consciousness of the ordinary Hausaman must reach the level of intensity of the average Frenchman before there is a nation. It does suggest, however, that there must be a much greater awareness of a closeness of contact with "national" compatriots as well as with the "national" government.⁵ This closeness of contact on the horizontal and vertical levels has been a distinctly Western phenomenon, for the obvious reason that it is the result of modern technology.

Not only is a political scientist quite precise in his use of the concept "nation," but in poaching on the insights of the Africanists (he also finds it difficult to place under the cover of "nationalism" all forms of past and present discontent and organizational development in Africa.) Thus, it is believed useful at the outset to distinguish the following:

Summer Seminar on Comparative Politics, Social Science Research Council, this REVIEW, Vol. 47, pp. 641-57, at pp. 642-43 (Sept., 1953). Amongst the modernists in political science one finds the argument that the political scientist should not be rejected too readily since he has developed skills and acquired insights that might well shed new light on the political process and pattern of government of pre-literate societies after the anthropologist has exhausted his resources. Another argument, rather different, is that such societies might profitably be regarded as microcosms in which the political scientist can discern with greater clarity the essentials of government that might be obscured in the more complex Western systems. A final argument might be found in the recent psycho-cultural studies, especially in terms of their implications for policy formulation. See Ithiel de Sola Pool, "Who Gets Power and Why," World Politics, Vol. 2, pp. 120-34 (Oct., 1949).

⁴ Arnold Toynbee, The World and the West (New York, 1953), pp. 71 ff. It is difficult to accept without qualification Professor Toynbee's argument that the "national state" was a "spontaneous native growth" in Europe. One could argue that the centrally-minded, nation-building elites of emergent Asia and Africa are but the present-day counterparts of the centralizing monarchs of early modern Europe.

⁵ Royal Institute of International Affairs, Nationalism (London, 1939), pp. 1-7; Karl W. Deutsch, Nationalism and Social Communication (New York, 1953), pp. 1-14.

A. Traditionalist Movements.

- ✓ 1. Spontaneous movements of resistance to the initial European occupation or post-pacification revolts against the imposition of new institutions, or new forms of coercion, referred to herein as "primary resistance."
- ✓ 2. Nativistic, mahdistic, or messianic mass movements—usually of a magico-religious character—which are psychological or emotional outlets for tensions produced by the confusions, frustrations, or socio-economic inequalities of alien rule, referred to herein as "nativism."⁶

B. Syncretistic Movements

- ✓ 1. Separatist religious groups, which have seceded and declared their independence from white European churches either because of the desire for religious independence or because the white clerics were intolerant regarding certain African customs; hereafter referred to as "religious separatism."⁷
- ✓ 2. Kinship associations, organized and led by the Western-educated and urbanized "sons abroad" for the purposes of preserving a sense of identity with the kinfolk in the bush and "brothers" in the impersonal urban center, as well as of providing vehicles for pumping modernity—including the ideas and sentiment of nationalism—into the rural areas.⁸
- ✓ 3. Tribal associations, organized and led by Western-educated elements—usually in collaboration with some traditionalists—who desire to resurrect, or to create for the first time, a tribal sentiment ("tribalism"), for the purpose of establishing large-scale political units, the boundaries of which will be determined by tribal affiliation (i.e., those who accept the assumption of common blood and kinship) and the forms of government by a syncretism of tribal and Western institutions.⁹

⁶ Nativism is here used in its broad and universal sense, as defined by the late Professor Ralph Linton: "Any conscious, organized attempt on the part of a society's members to revive or perpetuate selected aspects of its culture." See his "Nativistic Movements," American Anthropologist, Vol. 45, pp. 230-40, at p. 230 (April-June, 1943). The concept thus includes traditionalist movements in either the European or non-European world. This point is stressed because of the understandable sensitivity of many educated Africans to the root word "native," which as a result of the colonial experience tends to carry with it the connotation of inferiority. See also A. LeGrip, "Aspects Actuels de L'Islam en A.O.F.," L'Afrique et l'Asie, pp. 6-20 (No. 24, 1953); Katesa Schlosser, Propheten in Afrika (Albert Limbach Verlag, 1949).

⁷ Daniel Thwaite, The Seething African Pot (London, 1926), pp. 1-70; George Shepperson, "Ethiopianism and African Nationalism," Phylon, Vol. 14, pp. 9-18 (1st Quarter, 1953); Hilda Kuper, "The Swazi Reaction to Missions," African Studies, Vol. 5, pp. 177-88 (Sept., 1946); Jomo Kenyatta, Facing Mount Kenya (London, 1953), pp. 269-79.

⁸ James S. Coleman, "The Role of Tribal Associations in Nigeria," Proceedings of the Second Annual Conference of the West African Institute of Social and Economic Research, Ibadan, Nigeria, April, 1952. See also East Africa and Rhodesia, October 5, 1951, p. 106: "Nairobi is the happy hunting ground for the organizers of tribal associations, as there are to be found in the city representatives of practically every tribe in East and Central Africa." Also K. A. Busia, Report on a Social Survey of Takoradi-Sekondi (Accra, Government Printer, 1950).

⁹ Most advanced amongst the Yoruba, Ibo, Ibibio, Ewe, Buganda, and Kikuyu peoples.

C. Modernist Movements

- ✓1. Economic-interest groups (labor unions, cooperative societies, professional and middle-class associations) organized and led by Western-educated elements for the purpose of advancing the material welfare and improving the socio-economic status of the members of those groups.
- ✓2. Nationalist movements, organized and led by the Westernized elite which is activated by the Western ideas of democracy, progress, the welfare state, and national self-determination, and which aspires either: (a) to create modern independent African nation-states possessing an internal state apparatus and external sovereignty and all of the trappings of a recognized member state of international society (e.g., Sudan, Gold Coast, Nigeria, and possibly Sierra Leone); or (b) to achieve absolute social and political equality and local autonomy within a broader Eur-African grouping (e.g., French and Portuguese Africa) or within what is manifestly a plural society (e.g., except for Uganda, the territories of British East and Central Africa).¹⁰
- ✓3. Pan-African or trans-territorial movements, organized and led by the Westernized elite, frequently in association with or under the stimulus of American Negroes or West Indians abroad, for the purposes of creating a global racial consciousness and unity, or of agitating for the advancement and welfare of members of the African race wherever they may be, or of devising plans for future nationalist activity in specific regions.¹¹

Once these very arbitrary analytical distinctions are drawn it should be stressed that none of the categories can be treated in isolation. Each of the movements is in one way or another a response to the challenge of alien rule, or of the intrusion of the disintegrating forces—and consequently the insecurity

¹⁰ The difference between the goal orientations of the two categories of movements is partly the result of the objectives of differing colonial policies (i.e., the British policy of self-government and differentiation versus the French, Portuguese, and in a qualified sense the Belgian policies of assimilation and identity) and in part the result of the presence or absence of a settled white population. Confronted with the overwhelming obstacles to the full realization of African self-government, African leaders in the second category tend towards the extreme either of accommodation (Union of South Africa) or of violence (Kenya). In the territories of the Central African Federation the leaders of the African Congress have tended not to define their ultimate objectives, preferring to act empirically. The strength and persistence of the autonomic drive is reflected, however, in their reported attraction to the original Gore-Brown partition plan adopted by the European Confederate party. See David Cole, "How Strong is the African National Congress," New Commonwealth, Vol. 27, pp. 5-10, at p. 9 (Jan. 4, 1954).

- ¹¹ For a variety of reasons these movements have thus far apparently accomplished little more than to dramatize their existence at infrequent ad hoc conferences. Until recently the initiative tended to be taken by Americans or West Indians of African descent (e.g., Marcus Garvey, W. E. B. DuBois, and George Padmore), although in the early 1920's there was a National Congress of British West Africa organized by the late Casely Hayford of the Gold Coast. Also, M. Blaise Diagne, a Senegalese, was President of the first Pan-African Congress in Paris in 1919. For recent pan-African nationalist activity in British West Africa see West Africa, Dec. 12, 1953, p. 1165; and for British Central Africa see Cole, op. cit., p. 9.

—of modernity. (The recent so-called nationalism in Central Africa has been a mixture of "primary resistance" by the chiefs and traditionalists of Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland and the nationalist agitation of the Westernized elite.) Until the project of Federation became an active issue, African movements in this area were confined principally to religious separatist groups, tribal associations, or, in the case of Northern Rhodesia, labor unions.¹² On the West Coast, where nationalism is far more advanced, traditionalist and syncretistic movements have not been and are not absent. In some instances, kinship associations and separatist religious groups have been the antecedents of nationalist organizations; in others they have provided the principal organizational bases of the latter (e.g., the National Council of Nigeria and the Cameroons was first inaugurated as a federation mainly of kinship associations, and the African National Congress of the Rhodesias and Nyasaland was the product of fusion of several African welfare societies). In certain cases unrest or protest of a nativistic flavor has been instigated by nationalists for their modernist ends; in others nationalists have claimed such uncoordinated uprisings, as well as purely economic protest movements, to be manifestations of "nationalism," when in reality the participants were unaware of such implications.

One of the interesting differences between prewar and postwar nationalism on the West Coast of Africa is that in the former period nationalism tended to be—as Lord Lugard insisted—the esoteric pastime of the tiny educated minorities of Lagos, Accra, Freetown, and Dakar; whereas in the latter period these minorities—greatly expanded and dispersed in new urban centers throughout the interior—have made positive efforts to popularize and energize the nationalist crusade in two ways.¹³ The first has been to preach education, welfare, progress, and the ideal of self-government among the masses, largely through the nationalist press, independent African schools, and kinship and tribal associations. The aim here has been, in the words of one of their leading prophets, Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe of Nigeria, to bring about "mental emancipation" from a servile colonial mentality.¹⁴ The second method has been to tap all existing nativistic and religious tensions and economic grievances among the tradition-bound masses, as well as the grievances and aspirations of the urbanized clerks and artisans, and channel the energies thus unleashed into support of the nationalist drive. The technique here has been (1) to make nationalism, and in particular its objective of self-government, an integrating symbol in which even the most disparate goals could find identification, and (2) to politicize—one would like to say nationalize—all existing thought and associations. Until recently, many observers—including colonial administrators—tended to live in the prewar climate of opinion and therefore underestimated the power which had thus been harnessed to the nationalist machine.

In the case of the Mau Mau movement in Kenya we are confronted with a complex mixture of nationalism, with a strong traditional bias on the part of the Westernized leaders, and nativism, manipulated by the leaders, on the part of the masses. Both have been generated to an especially high level of intensity as a consequence of the acute and largely unassuaged sense of frustration on the part of the Westernized elite, growing out of the very bleak outlook arising from the almost total absence, until recently, of meaningful career and prestige opportunities within either the old or the new systems, and of the masses, resulting from the land shortage and the overcrowding on the reservations. The presence of a sizable Asian "third force," which virtually monopolizes the middle-class sector, and which has been and is politically conscious, provides a new variable of no little significance in the total situation. The fact that the pattern of organization and the strategy and tactics of the Mau Mau revolt indicate a higher level of sophistication than sheer nativism would imply suggests that our analytical categories need further refinement or qualification.

¹² See Ian Cunnison, "The Watchtower Assembly in Central Africa," International Review of Missions, Vol. 40, pp. 456-69 (Oct., 1951).

¹³ Sir F. D. Lugard, The Dual Mandate in British Tropical Africa (London, 1923), pp. 83 ff.

¹⁴ Renasant Africa (Lagos, 1937).

A particularly striking feature of African nationalism has been the literary and cultural revival which has attended it. A renewed appreciation of and interest in "African" culture has been manifested, in most instances by the most sophisticated and acculturated Africans (e.g., Mazi Mbono Ojike's My Africa, Dr. J. B. Danquah's studies of the Akan peoples of the Gold Coast, Jomo Kenyatta's Facing Mount Kenya, Fily-Dabo Sissoko's Les Noirs et la Culture, Léopold Sédar Senghor's Anthologie de la Nouvelle Poésie Nègre et Malgache, the French African journal Présence Africaine edited by M. Alioune Diop, and the writings of Antoine Munongo in the Belgian Congolese journal Jeune Afrique).¹⁵ In some cases this cultural renaissance has had a purely tribal emphasis; in others it has taken a "neo-African" form, such as the African dress of Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe, nationalist leader in Nigeria. It has usually been accompanied by a quest for an African history which would in general reflect glory and dignity upon the African race and in particular instill self-confidence in the Western-educated African sensitive to the prejudiced charge that he has no history or culture. In short, there has emerged a new pride in being African. In French areas, the accent until recently has been upon French culture and literature, but there are increasing signs of a shift to African themes amongst the French African literati. The important point is that African nationalism has this cultural content, which renders more difficult any effort to separate rigidly the cultural nationalism of the urban politician from the nativism of the bush peasant.

Yet the differences are important to the student of African nationalism. Primary resistance and nativism tend to be negative and spontaneous revolts or assertions of the unacculturated masses against the disruptive and disorganizing stranger-invader. They are a reflection of a persistent desire of the masses to preserve or recreate the old by protesting against the new. Syncretism is different in that it contains an element of rationality—an urge to recapture those aspects of the old which are compatible with the new, which it recognizes as inevitable and in some respects desirable. Whereas all forms of protest are politically consequential—at least to colonial administrators—only nationalism is primarily political in that it is irrevocably committed to a positive and radical alteration of the power structure. In brief, nationalism is the terminal form of colonial protest.

¹⁵ See Rosey E. Pool, "African Renaissance," Phylon, Vol. 14, pp. 5-8 (First Quarter, 1953); Albert Maurice, "Union Africaine des Arts et des Lettres," African Affairs, Vol. 50, pp. 233-41 (July, 1951); Alioune Diop, "Niam n'goura," Présence Africaine (Nov.-Dec., 1947), pp. 1-3. The cultural revival is the product of four forces: (1) reflection and introspection on the part of educated Africans, frequently those confronted with the stimulating contrasts of a foreign environment while abroad; (2) the American Negro renaissance which commenced in the 1920's; (3) encouragement and sponsorship of European governments and unofficial organizations such as the International African Institute; and (4) support of missionary societies such as the United Society for Christian Literature in the United Kingdom.

Another reason for distinguishing between the various categories of assertion, which are basically differences in goal orientation, is not only to provide some basis for judging the nature of the popular support of a nationalist movement during its buildup, but also to have some means of predicting the stability and viability of the political order established by the nationalists once they achieve self-government. The governments of Pakistan, Burma, India, and Indonesia have each been plagued by internal tensions arising from what are fundamentally South Asian variants of traditionalism and tribalism. If a colonial nationalist movement comes to power atop a wave of mass protest which is primarily or even in part nativistic in character, this would have a direct bearing upon the capacity of the Westernized leaders of that movement, not only to maintain political unity and stability but also to carry out what is at the core of most of their programs—rapid modernization by a centralized bureaucratic machine. Any thorough study of the anatomy of a nationalist movement, therefore, must seek to determine the linkages and compatibilities between the goal orientations of the several forces from which that movement derives its élan and strength.

II. FACTORS CONTRIBUTING TO THE RISE OF NATIONALISM

It is far easier to define and describe nationalism than it is to generalize about the factors which have contributed to its manifestation. Put most briefly, it is the end product of the profound and complex transformation which has occurred in Africa since the European intrusion. It is a commonplace that the imposition of Western technology, socio-political institutions, and ideology upon African societies has been violently disruptive of the old familistic order in that they have created new values and symbols, new techniques for the acquisition of wealth, status, and prestige, and new groups for which the old system had no place. The crucial point here is not that nationalism as a matter of fact happened to appear at a certain point in time after the "Western impact," but rather that the transformation the latter brought about has been an indispensable precondition for the rise of nationalism. Nationalism, as distinguished from primary resistance or nativism, requires considerable gestation. A few of the constituent elements have been:

A. Economic¹⁶

1. Change from a subsistence to a money economy. This change, consciously encouraged by colonial governments and European enterprise in order to increase the export of primary products, introduced the cash nexus and economic individualism, altered the patterns of land tenure and capital accumulation, and, in general, widened the area of both individual prosperity and insecurity.

2. Growth of a wage-labor force. This development has resulted in the proletarianization of substantial numbers of Africans, which has weakened communal or lineage responsibility and rendered those concerned vulnerable to economic exploitation and grievances.)

3. Rise of a new middle class. Laissez-faire economics and African enterprise, coupled with opportunities for university and professional education, have been factors contributing to the growth of a middle class. This class is most advanced in Senegal, the Gold Coast, and Southern Nigeria, where it has developed despite successive displacement or frustration by the intrusion of Levantines and the monopolistic practices of European firms.

B. Sociological¹⁷

1. Urbanization. The concentration of relatively large numbers of Africans in urban centers to meet the labor demands of European enterprise has loosened kinship ties, accelerated social communication between "detrified" ethnic groups, and, in general, contributed to "national" integration.

2. Social mobility. The European-imposed pax coupled with the development of communications and transport has provided the framework for travel, the growth of an internal exchange economy, and socio-political reintegration.

3. Western education. This has provided certain of the inhabitants of a given territory with a common lingua franca; with the knowledge and tools to acquire status and prestige and to fulfill aspirations within the new social structure; and with some of the ideas and values by which alien rule and colonialism could be attacked. It has been through Western education that the African has encountered the scientific method and the idea of progress with their activist implications, namely, an awareness of alternatives and the conviction that man can creatively master and shape his own destiny.

C. Religious and Psychological¹⁸

1. Christian evangelization. The conscious Europeanization pursued by ¹⁶ L. P. Mair, "The Growth of Economic Individualism in African Society," Journal of the Royal African Society, Vol. 33, pp. 261-73 (July, 1934); Allan McPhee, The Economic Revolution in British West Africa (London, 1926); G. Wilson, An Essay on the Economics of Detribalization in Northern Rhodesia, Part I (Rhodes-Livingstone Institute, 1941). Cf. Karl Polanyi, Origins of Our Time (London, 1946); P. C. Lloyd, "New Economic Classes in Western Nigeria," African Affairs, Vol. 52, pp. 327-34 (Oct., 1953).

¹⁷ J. D. Rheinallt Jones, "The Effects of Urbanization in South and Central Africa," African Affairs, Vol. 52, pp. 37-44 (Jan., 1953).

¹⁸ William Bascom, "African Culture and the Missionary," Civilisations, Vol. 3, pp. 491-501 (No. 4, 1953).

Christian missionary societies has been a frontal assault upon traditional religious systems and moral sanctions. Moreover, the Christian doctrine of equality and human brotherhood challenged the ethical assumptions of imperialism.

2. Neglect or frustration of Western-educated elements. Susceptibility to psychological grievance is most acute among the more acculturated Africans. Social and economic discrimination and the stigma of inferiority and backwardness have precipitated a passionate quest for equality and modernity, and latterly self-government. Rankling memories of crude, arrogant, or insulting treatment by a European have frequently been the major wellspring of racial bitterness and uncompromising nationalism.

D. Political

1. Eclipse of traditional authorities. Notwithstanding the British policy of indirect rule, the European superstructure and forces of modernity have tended to weaken the traditional powers of indigenous authorities and thereby to render less meaningful pre-colonial socio-political units as objects of loyalty and attachment. There has been what Professor Daryll Forde calls a "status reversal"; that is, as a result of the acquisition by youth of Western education and a command over Western techniques in all fields, there has been "... an increasing transfer of command over wealth and authority to younger and socially more independent men at the expense of traditional heads. . . ."¹⁹

2. Forging of new "national" symbols. The "territorialization" of Africa by the European powers has been a step in the creation of new nations, not only through the erection of boundaries within which the intensity of social communication and economic interchange has become greater than across territorial borders, but also as a consequence of the imposition of a common administrative superstructure, a common legal system, and in some instances common political institutions which have become symbols of territorial individuality.²⁰

These are a few of the principal factors in the European presence which have contributed to the rise of nationalism. As any casual observer of African developments is aware, however, there have been and are marked areal differences in the overt manifestation of nationalism. Such striking contrasts as the militant Convention People's party of the Gold Coast, the conservative Northern People's Congress of Nigeria, the pro-French orientation of the African editors of Présence Africaine, the cautious African editors of La Voix du Congolais, and the terroristic Mau Mau of Kenya are cases in point.

There are a number of explanations for these areal variations. One relates to the degree of acculturation in an area. This is a reflection of the duration and intensity of contact with European influences. The contrast between the advanced nationalism of the British West Coast and of Senegal and the nascent nationalism of British and French Central Africa is partly explicable on this basis.

¹⁹ Daryll Forde, "The Conditions of Social Development in West Africa," Civilisations, Vol. 3, pp. 471-85 (No. 4, 1953).

²⁰ See R. J. Harrison Church, Modern Colonization (London, 1951), pp. 104 ff.; Robert Montagne, "The 'Modern State' in Africa and Asia," The Cambridge Journal, Vol. 5, pp. 583-602 (July, 1952).

A second explanation lies in the absence or presence of alien settlers. On this score the settler-free British West Coast is unique when contrasted to the rest of Africa. The possibility of a total fulfillment of nationalist objectives (i.e., African self-government) has been a powerful psychological factor which partly explains the confident and buoyant expectancy of West Coast nationalists. On the other hand, as previously noted, the tendencies toward accommodation or terrorism in the white-settler areas is a reflection of the absence of such moderating expectancy.

Certain African groups exposed to the same forces of acculturation and the same provocation have demonstrated radically different reactions. The Kikuyu versus the Masai peoples of Kenya, the Ibo versus the Hausa peoples of Nigeria, and the Creole and Mende of Sierra Leone are cases in point. It is suggested that the dynamism, militancy, and nationalist élan of the Ibo peoples of Nigeria are rooted partly in certain indigenous Ibo culture traits (general absence of chiefs, smallness in scale and the democratic character of indigenous political organization, emphasis upon achieved status, and individualism). Much of the same might be said for the Kikuyu peoples of Kenya.

Differing colonial policies constitute another cause of these areal differences. Nationalism is predominantly a phenomenon of British Africa, and to a lesser extent of French Africa. Apart from the influence of the foregoing historical, sociological, and cultural variables, this fact, in the case of British Africa, is explained by certain unique features of British colonial policy.

It was inevitable that Britain, one of the most liberal colonial powers in Africa, should have reaped the strongest nationalist reaction. A few of the principal features of British policy which have stimulated nationalism deserve mention:

1. Self-government as the goal of policy. Unlike the French and Portuguese who embrace their African territories as indivisible units of the motherland, or the Belgians who until recently have been disinclined to specify the ultimate goals of policy, the British have remained indiscriminately loyal to the Durham formula.²¹ In West Africa, this has enthroned the African nationalists; in Central and East Africa, the white settlers.

2. Emphasis upon territorial individuality. More than any other colonial ²¹ Regarding Belgian policy, see Pierre Wigny, "Methods of Government in the Belgian Congo," African Affairs, Vol. 50, pp. 310-17 (Oct., 1951). Wigny remarks (p. 311) that "... Belgians are reluctant to define their colonial policy. They are proud of their first realisations, and sure of the rightness of their intentions." Since this was written, there have been some very dramatic changes in Belgian policy, especially regarding the educated elite, the potential nationalists. The great debate in Belgian colonial circles on "le statut des Congolais civilisés" was terminated by four decrees of May 17, 1952 according to which educated Congolese are assimilated to Europeans in civil law. Regarding Portuguese policy, see Marcelo Caetano, Colonizing Traditions, Principles and Methods of the Portuguese (Lisbon, 1951). The keynote of the policy is the "spiritual assimilation" of the Africans to a "Portuguese nation dwelling in European, African, Asiatic and Indonesian Provinces." The African civilizado is thus a citizen of Portugal.

power, the British have provided the institutional and conceptual framework for the emergence of nations. Decentralization of power, budgetary autonomy, the institution of territorial legislative councils and other "national" symbols—all have facilitated the conceptualization of a "nation."²²

3. Policy on missionaries and education. The comparative freedom granted missionaries and the laissez-faire attitude toward education, and particularly post-primary education, has distinguished and continues to distinguish British policy sharply from non-British Africa.

4. Neglect, frustration, and antagonism of educated elite. Not only have more British Africans been exposed to higher education, but the British government until recently remained relatively indifferent to the claims and aspirations of this class, which forms the core of the nationalist movements.

5. Freedom of nationalist activity. The comparative freedom of activity (speech, association, press, and travel abroad) which British Africans have enjoyed—within clearly defined limits and varying according to the presence of white settlers—has been of decisive importance. It is doubtful whether such militant nationalists as Wallace-Johnson of Sierra Leone, Prime Minister Kwame Nkrumah of the Gold Coast, Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe of Nigeria, Jomo Kenyatta of Kenya, and Dauti Yamba of the Central African Federation, could have found the same continuous freedom of movement and activity in Belgian, Portuguese, and French Africa as has been their lot in British Africa.²³

All of this suggests that African nationalism is not merely a peasant revolt. In fact, as already noted, nationalism where it is most advanced has been sparked and led by the so-called detribalized, Western-educated, middle-class intellectuals and professional Africans; by those who in terms of improved status and material standards of living have benefitted most from colonialism; in short, by those who have come closest to the Western World but have been denied entry on full terms of equality. From this comparatively affluent—but psychologically aggrieved—group have come the organizers of tribal associations, labor unions, cooperative groups, farmers' organizations, and—more recently—nationalist movements. They are the Africans whom British policy has done most to create and least to satiate.²⁴

²² Partly in response to nationalist pressures, the French Government has recently initiated certain measures of financial devolution to French West Africa. See G. Gayet, "Autonomies financières Française," Civilisations, Vol. 3, pp. 343–47 (No. 3, 1953). These measures may enhance the powers of the territorial assemblies to the point that the latter might ultimately become the foci for territorial nationalisms.

²³ The stringent police measures adopted recently in Kenya and Nyasaland, the special press laws which have long been in effect in British East and Central Africa, and the obstacles to nationalist activity which have existed in the Muslim areas of Northern Nigeria, do not necessarily invalidate this comparative historical generalization.

²⁴ The thesis here is that there are at least four ingredients in the psychology of colonial nationalism, and that British policy in Africa has come closest towards inculcating or providing them: (a) an awareness of the existence or possibility of alternatives to the status quo, a state of mind produced by Western education and particularly by study and travel abroad; (b) an intense desire to change the status quo; (c) a system within which the major alternative to the status quo—self-government—has the status of legitimacy; and (d) an area of relative freedom in which that legitimate alternative may be pursued.

This brief and selective treatment of a few of the factors which have contributed to the African nationalist awakening suggests certain avenues which might be profitably explored and more fully developed by subsequent research. Specifically, what is the relationship between the nature and intensity of nationalism and the degree of urbanization, the degree of commercialization of agriculture, and the size and geographical distribution of the wage-labor force and salariat? In short, what is the causal connection between "detrribalization" and nationalism? Certain aspects of such an inquiry could be subjected to statistical analysis, but the results could only be suggestive, and in some instances might be positively deceptive. In the case of urbanization, for example, the highly urbanized and acculturated Yoruba peoples of Nigeria for nearly a decade lagged far behind the Ibo peoples in nationalist vigor and élan. Ibadan, the largest urban center in tropical Africa, has been until recently one of the most politically inert towns of Nigeria. Again, in terms of the proletarianization of labor and urbanization resulting from European industrialism and commercial activity, the Belgian Congo is one of the most advanced territories, but one in which nationalism is least in evidence.²⁵ Freetown, Sierra Leone, one of the oldest non-traditional urban centers, became a haven of respectability and conservatism, being eclipsed by the less-developed Protectorate in the push towards nationalist objectives. Urbanization has been an important ingredient in the nationalist awakening, but it has been a certain type of urban development—mainly the impersonal and heterogeneous "new towns"—which has occurred in conjunction with other equally decisive factors.

In the case of the relationship between the degree of commercialization of land and labor and the degree of nationalism, the figures set forth for the Gold Coast in Table I suggest either a causal connection or a parallel development. Yet in turning to similar figures for other territories—especially the Belgian Congo and Nigeria—it is clear that the relationship between commercialization and nationalism, important though it may be, must be considered and interpreted in the light of other variables.

Again, the fact that the nationalist movements have been organized and led by intellectuals and the so-called middle class suggests a relationship between nationalism and the number of Africans with higher education, the size of per capita income, the degree of the individualization of land tenure, the size of middle-class and professional groups (i.e., independent traders, produce middlemen, farmers employing labor, druggists, lorry owners, lawyers, doctors, etc.), and the degree of vertical mobility within the emergent socio-economic structure. In any event, the insights of an economist are indispensable for a complete anatomy of African nationalism.

The Christian missionaries have been blamed frequently for their ruthless assault upon native religious systems and the thoroughgoing Europeanization, conscious or implicit, in their evangelization. This has suggested the formula: missionaries = detrribalization = nationalism. Yet the postwar figures shown in ²⁵ The Belgian policy of stabilization of labor in the urban centers of the Congo, in which 83% of the men have their families with them, is one of the several factors which may help to explain this.

TABLE I. COMMERCIALIZATION AND NATIONALISM IN CERTAIN AFRICAN TERRITORIES

Territory	Percentage of Cultivated Land Used by Africans for Commercial Production (1947-1950)*	African Wage Earners as Percentage of Total African Population (1950)†	Degree of Overt Nationalism
Gold Coast	75%	9.0%	Advanced
Belgian Congo	42	7.6	None
Nigeria	41	1.2	Advanced
Uganda	33	3.9	Nascent
Kenya	7	7.6	Nascent

* E. A. Keukjian, "Commercializing Influence of the Development of Exports on Indigenous Agricultural Economics in Tropical Africa," unpub. diss. (Harvard Univ., June, 1953); United Nations, Economic and Social Council (15th session). World Economic Situation. Aspects of Economic Development in Africa. New York, Document E/2377, March 20, 1953.

† United Nations, Department of Economic Affairs. Review of Economic Conditions in Africa (Supplement to World Economic Report, 1949-50). New York, Document E/1910/Add.1 Rev.1-ST/ECA/9/Add.1, April, 1951, p. 76.

Table II do not bear out this assumption.²⁶ Missionaries have been important catalytic agents in the transformation of African societies, but the causal connection between their activities and nationalist assertion cannot be established by mere quantitative analysis. The figures in Table II hint at a possible causal relationship between preponderant Protestant evangelization and advanced nationalism (viz., Gold Coast and Nigeria) and preponderant Catholic evangelization and the absence of nationalism (viz., Portuguese Angola and the Belgian Congo). Yet this connection must be examined in the light of other relevant factors, such as the degree of control and direction extended to missionary societies by colonial governments; the freedom allowed such societies to establish schools—particularly secondary schools—and to determine the curriculum; the tolerance accorded anti-white or anti-colonial sects (e.g., the Jehovah's Witnesses are permitted in most of British Africa but proscribed in non-British

TABLE II. CHRISTIANITY AND NATIONALISM IN CERTAIN AFRICAN TERRITORIES

Territory	Percentage of Christians to Total Population	Percentage of Protestants to All Christians	Percentage of Catholics to All Christians	Degree of Overt Nationalism
Belgian Congo	37%	29%	71%	None
Nyasaland	26	49	51	Nascent
Gold Coast	15	58	42	Advanced
Angola	15	22	78	None
Kenya	10	51	49	Nascent
Nigeria	5	67	33	Advanced

²⁶ World Christian Handbook (London, 1949).

Africa); the latitude allowed African sects of a syncretistic, revivalistic, or puritanical character; the extent to which evangelical bodies have Africanized their church organization, the priesthood, and the propagation of the gospel; and, finally, the strength of Islam.

The corrosive influence of Western education has been a significant ingredient in the rise of nationalism. Yet the Belgian Congo claims a higher percentage of literacy than any other colonial territory in Africa.²⁷ In order to establish a relationship we must move beyond the superficial analysis of literacy statistics and ask the following questions:

1. The nature of the curriculum. Has it been and is it literary and based upon the model of a European grammar school, or is it practical and designed to train the student to be a good farmer, artisan, or clerk in European employ, and incidentally to limit his sophistication and contact with unsettling ideas? Is instruction conducted in the vernacular or in a European language?

2. Opportunities for post-primary education. Are secondary schools (particularly those operated by missionary societies or by enterprising and nationalist-minded Africans such as Eyo Ita in Nigeria or Jomo Kenyatta in Kenya) allowed to mushroom into existence, or are they carefully planned and rigidly controlled by the colonial government as to both number and curriculum? What are the opportunities for study in universities abroad? What is the latitude granted students to determine their own careers? Here we touch upon a crucial factor—in 1945, Freetown, Sierra Leone, and Lagos, Nigeria, each had more Western-type secondary schools than all of the non-British territories in Africa combined. In 1952 over 4,000 Africans from British territories were studying in universities and technical schools abroad and nearly 1,000 in territorial universities in Africa, whereas only a handful had such opportunity or inclination in Belgian and Portuguese Africa. This is in part a reflection of the existence of a larger African middle-class in British Africa, but it is also the result of the unique British attitude regarding the relationship between higher education and emergent African leadership. French policy and practice, despite differing assumptions, most closely approximate those of the British.²⁸

3. Openings of careers for the talented. The stability of any political or social order is determined by this factor. Is there any planned relationship between the output of the schools and opportunities for satisfying employment or ²⁷ United Nations, Non-Self-Governing Territories. Vol. III: Special Study on Education. New York, Document ST/TRI/SER.A./5/Add. 2, January, 1951.

²⁸ By decree of April 16, 1950, the Institut des Hautes Études was established at Dakar; and on January 1, 1952, there were 1,640 scholarship holders in continental France, of whom 572 were pursuing higher education. Civilisations, Vol. 3, pp. 575–83 (No. 4, 1953). On British educational policy in tropical Africa see African Education (Oxford: The Nuffield Foundation and the Colonial Office, 1953). The Belgians within the past few years have dramatically reoriented their policy regarding higher education for the Congolese. Since 1952 Congo students have been admitted to the Albert I College at Leopoldville; the first Negro University of the Congo is scheduled for opening in 1954; and recently the Belgian press has drawn attention to the admission to Louvain University of a Negro student from the Congo. Civilisations, Vol. 3, pp. 599–602 (No. 4, 1953).

careers? In French and Belgian Africa, colonial governments have maintained a stringent control over the supply-demand situation as between post-primary schools and the requirements of government and the developing economy. In British Africa there are hundreds of thousands of unemployed or under-employed "Standard VI" boys clustered in the coastal towns and urban centers of the interior.

The most potent instrument used in the propagation of nationalist ideas and racial consciousness has been the African-owned nationalist press. In Nigeria alone nearly 100 newspapers or periodicals have been published by Africans since the British intrusion, of which 12 dailies and 14 weeklies—all African owned—are currently in circulation. The crucial role performed in the nationalist awakening by African journalistic enterprise on the British West Coast is well known.²⁹ Until the publication of Afrique Noire (organ of the Rassemblement Démocratique Africain of French West Africa) there was nothing in non-British Africa which even closely approximated this development. And even this journal is no match for the pungent criticism and racial consciousness one finds in the pages of Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe's West African Pilot in Nigeria.³⁰ Needless to say, the nationalist press is one of our major sources of data regarding nationalist motivation, objectives, and organization. It is not the number of newspapers published which is significant, but rather the volume of circulation and areal distribution, the news and editorial content and the nature of the appeal, the types of readers, the existence of competitive papers sponsored by colonial governments, the financial stability of the paper, and other factors which would reflect its impact and influence upon the ideas, aspirations, and activities of those literate groups predisposed towards nationalism.

These are but a few of the more important factors in the rise of nationalism which require evaluation and weighting before the student of comparative colonial nationalism can go beyond the mere description of the history and anatomy of a particular nationalist movement. There is great danger in doing a disservice to scholarly research in Africa if one generalizes on the basis of observations made and data assembled in one territory. As has been suggested, there are certain general predisposing and precipitating causes of modern nationalism which are applicable to the whole continent; yet once these are mentioned, it is necessary to examine each area of nationalist activity for that special combination of factors which explains the origin, strength, and orientation of its nationalist movement.

²⁹ Compare with the number of African-owned-and-edited dailies and weeklies (combined total) in the following territories: British Africa: Gold Coast (17), Uganda (8), Sierra Leone (7), Gambia (3); French West Africa (10); and none, insofar as is known, in Belgian, Portuguese, or Spanish Africa; or in Kenya, the territories of the Central African Federation, or in the Union of South Africa.

³⁰ On the other hand, there appears to be no newspaper in British West Africa comparable with the European-owned-and-edited journal of French West Africa entitled Les Echos de l'A.O.F., which "week after week passionately attacks the administration. . . ." See Thomas Hodgkin, "The Metropolitan Axis," West Africa, January 9, 1954, at p. 6.

III. FACTORS CONDITIONING NATIONALIST DEVELOPMENT

Normally, a colonial nationalist movement directs its efforts towards the attainment of two main objectives: (1) the achievement of self-government, and (2) the creation of a cultural or political sense of nationality and unity within the boundaries of the area of the nation to be. Nationalists are obliged to adopt the second objective because imperial powers either did not or could not establish political boundaries which embraced only one self-conscious cultural unit; and certainly those powers made no conscious effort to build nations. The nationalist dilemma is that in most cases pursuit of the primary goal (self-government) lessens the likelihood of achieving the secondary goal (cultural and political unity). Put another way, the drive behind African nationalism in many instances is not the consciousness of belonging to a distinct politico-cultural unit which is seeking to protect or assert itself, but rather it is the movement of racially-conscious modernists seeking to create new political and cultural nationalities out of the heterogeneous peoples living within the artificial boundaries imposed by the European master. Their task is not only to conduct a successful political revolution and capture power, but also the painful job of national political integration. And as Professor Crane Brinton has shown, the lessons of history are that nation-building is the product of both consent and coercion, and usually the latter.³¹ It is the colonial power, of course, which has had a monopoly over the means of coercion.

The major factor conditioning the development of a particular nationalist movement, therefore, is the degree of internal politico-cultural unity, tolerance, or compatibility amongst the peoples of the area moving into its national era. Disunities can exist in a given territory for a variety of reasons:

1. Traditional pre-colonial hostilities and cultural incompatibilities such as exist between the Kikuyu and Masai peoples of Kenya, or the Ibo and the Tiv peoples of Nigeria. In some instances these have been exacerbated as a result of imperial policies; in others as a consequence of the mere fact of lumping them together and endeavoring to impose territorial uniformity.

2. Tensions between groups resulting from unevenness in development, acculturation, and the acquisition of modernity. These can be the product of original cultural differences (i.e., the variations between groups in their receptivity and adaptability to modernity—e.g., the Ibo and Hausa); historical circumstances (i.e., differences in the duration and intensity of the European impact—e.g., the Creoles of Freetown vs. the Mende peoples of the Protectorate of Sierra Leone); or of constitutional reforms pointing towards African self-government. One could argue that Ibo-Yoruba hostility in Nigeria is the product of all three factors. Just as the advance towards independence precipitated a cleavage between Muslims and Hindus in India, so has the development of nationalism and the move towards self-government in Africa brought to light a multitude of disunities. Fear of domination by the more advanced and acculturated groups—European or African—is one obvious explanation.

³¹ Crane Brinton, From Many One (Cambridge, Mass., 1948).

3. Tensions between the Westernized elite—the nationalists—and the traditionalists and the masses. This nationalist disability has tended to be exaggerated in the past, usually by imperial spokesmen endeavoring to repudiate the nationalists or to isolate them from the traditionalists. The intensity of the cleavage varies widely according to circumstances. In several areas such as the Protectorate of Sierra Leone, the Northern Territories of the Gold Coast, Western and Northern Nigeria, amongst the Kikuyu in Kenya, and in Northern Rhodesia and Nyasaland the educated nationalists and some leading traditionalists have cooperated in varying degrees.

4. Differences within the ranks of the Westernized elite. These disagreements—and one is struck by their persistence, strength, and virulence—may arise from several causes, including normal competition for power and prestige or honest differences over aims, timing, or methods to be employed in the nationalist drive. Such differences as separate Messrs. Fily-Dabo Sissoko and Mamadou Konaté in the French Sudan; Lamine Gueye and Léopold Senghor in Senegal; Felix Houphouët-Boigny and Kouame Binzème in the Ivory Coast; Prime Minister Kwame Nkrumah and Dr. J. B. Danquah in the Gold Coast; the Sardauna of Sokoto, Obafemi Awolowo, and Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe in Nigeria; Eliud Mathu and Jomo Kenyatta in Kenya; and Harry Nkumbula and Godwin Lewanika in Central Africa, have very materially affected the course and strength of nationalism in the territories concerned.

These nationalist disabilities are the product of a complex mixture of hard historical and cultural facts, of changes introduced and differentials created by the Western intrusion, as well as of the provocations of the nationalist drive itself. The success of any nationalist movement will in a large measure depend upon the extent to which these internal tensions are softened or dissipated. The latter will depend, in turn, upon the degree of repressive opposition, or unwitting or intentional cooperation, of colonial governments; upon the development of pan-territorial political associations, the membership of which is rooted in all ethnic groups and in which there is free vertical mobility into the "upper crust" which that membership constitutes; upon the emergence of pan-territorial economic-interest groups (e.g., middle-class associations or labor organizations); and upon many other sociological processes (out-group marriages, commonsality, etc.) which Professor Karl W. Deutsch has suggested are essential building blocks of any new national community.³²

It would be naive and unhistorical to argue that a large measure of politico-cultural integration is required—as distinguished from being desirable—in order for a nationalist movement to succeed in wresting self-government from an imperial power. Most successful colonial nationalist movements have been organized and led by small minorities which have been able either to gain the support of the masses or to capitalize upon their inertia and apathy. It would be unrealistic, however, to contemplate the success of a movement which did not have at least a minimum of unity or tolerance within the "upper crust," even though it be of the sort displayed by the unstable truces negotiated from time to time between the Sardauna of Sokoto, Mr. Obafemi Awolowo, and Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe, the regional leaders in Nigeria.

³² "The Growth of Nations," World Politics, Vol. 5, pp. 168-96 (Jan., 1953).

Some of these forces contributing towards integration are measurable and provide rough indices upon which the research scholar can base predictions of the development of a particular nationalist movement. In an interesting new theory regarding the growth of nations, Professor Deutsch has suggested certain criteria which might be profitably employed in seeking to determine the prospects of success of a nationalist movement in its nation-building endeavors.³³ His central thesis is that cases of successful political integration in history show a number of patterns which seem to recur. As he puts it, a nation "is the result of the transformation of people, or of several ethnic elements, in the process of social mobilization." The prospects of success are indicated by the completeness of that transformation and the intensity of social mobilization around the symbols of the new national community. A nation is not only a subjective affirmation of will of zealous nationalists; it is also the product of the operation of powerful objective forces, several of which have been mentioned.

Thus far it has been assumed that the leaders of nationalist movements in Africa will seek to build new national communities out of the diverse human materials located within the artificial boundaries of the existing colonial territories. This was precisely what happened in Latin America (Spanish imperial provinces), in the Middle East (European and Turkish regions), and in South-east Asia (Dutch Indonesia, Burma, and in a qualified way, British India). In the case of British Africa, where nationalism is most advanced, this same tendency for nationalism to follow boundaries established by the imperial power rather than those coincident with pre-colonial socio-political groups is in evidence (e.g., Gold Coast and Nigeria). On the other hand, in many areas the situation is still relatively fluid. Togoland nationalism has been predominantly an Ewe affair, and the Ewes are a trans-territorial group stretching from the Gold Coast to Dahomey. Separatist sentiment in Northern Nigeria is an example, par excellence, of incomplete social mobilization. This, when coupled with growing Yoruba and Ibo self-consciousness, suggests that earlier pan-Nigerian nationalism may be eclipsed and Nigeria may ultimately become three or more states. Until the recent decision to give the Southern Cameroons greater autonomy within the emergent Federation of Nigeria, Cameroonian nationalists were wavering between remaining an integral part of the Eastern Region of Nigeria, or seceding and joining with the nationalists in the French Cameroons in an endeavor to create a Kamerun nation based upon the artificial boundaries of the short-lived German Kamerun.³⁴ In Kenya, Mau Mau and all earlier proto-nationalist movements have been predominantly Kikuyu endeavors, even though the name Kenya has been employed. In Tanganyika, the Chagga Cooperative movement may be the basis for a Chagga separatism; and in Uganda, it is questionable whether pan-Uganda integrative forces can erase the "national" separatism implicit in the Buganda Kingdom. Again, in Central Africa, will the territorial separatism symbolized by the Northern Rhodesian and Nyasaland National Congresses be eclipsed by the common sentiment and institutions growing out of the new Federation?

³³ Ibid. See also Deutsch's Nationalism and Social Communication (cited in note 5), pp. 81 ff.

³⁴ West Africa, January 30, 1954, p. 87.

In the case of French Africa, dissimilarities in colonial policy (i.e., assimilation and direct rule) have tended to produce a somewhat different situation. Yet since the reforms of 1946, as a result of which each of the territories of the two federations of French West Africa and French Equatorial Africa received their own representative assemblies, territorial nationalist movements have tended to eclipse the pan-French African Rassemblement Démocratique Africain in much the same fashion as Nigerian, Gold Coastian, and Sierra Leonian nationalist movements have replaced the earlier National Congress of British West Africa. Thus one finds the Parti Républicain de Dahomey, Parti Progressiste Sudanaise, Union Démocratique du Tchad, and similar organizations in each of the territories. The future "national" orientation of nationalist forces in French Africa would seem to depend upon the extent to which pan-Federation forces and institutions, such as the Grand Conseils, or the assimilationist forces of the French Union, such as the metropolitan parties and labor movements projected overseas, operate to retard the growth of territorial symbols and sentiment. One thing, however, seems certain: French Africa—because of the French policy of assimilation and direct rule—is less likely to encounter such movements as the Egbe Omo Oduduwa of the Nigerian Yorubas, the Kikuyu Central Association in Kenya, and the Bataka movement of Uganda.

In general, it would seem that where nationalism manifests itself in considerable strength it is evidence that disintegration of the old and social mobilization around the symbols of the new order have occurred on a scale sufficient to weaken or destroy attachments and loyalties of the nationalists to pre-colonial socio-political units, either because they have been crushed and are beyond memory or because they are unattractive or manifestly unsuitable as "nations" in a modern world of nation-states. The European presence has done much towards the creation of new nations, the "national" sentiment of the nationalists being a reflection of this.

A few of the many factors which might be observed and evaluated in order to determine the probable success, as well as the territorial implications, of an African nationalist movement or nation-building endeavor are as follows:³⁵ (1) the degree of internal social mobility, economic interchange and interdependence, intermarriage and commonsality, and the intensity and level of social communication among the ethnic groups comprising a given territory; (2) the location of population clusters and "core areas," as well as of "sub-national" regions of more intense economic interchange or of cultural focus; (3) the powers and functions of "sub-national" political institutions (i.e., regional, tribal, etc), and the degree of meaningful participation in them by the Western-educated elements; (4) the rate at which "national" institutions and activities are capable of attracting and absorbing new social strata from all ethnic groups into the "national" life (e.g., the ethnic composition of the central administrative and technical services); (5) the centrality and nationalness of educational institutions, particularly the professional schools and universities; (6) the degree of pan-territorial circulation of nationalist newspapers and literature and the extent to which these play up "national" events and personalities; (7) the differentials in the material development, per capita income and wealth, the acquisition of modern skills and knowledge, and the concentration and capacity for accumulation of capital amongst the different sub-national areas and ethnic groups;³⁶ (8) the ethnic makeup of the Western-educated categories and particularly of the active membership of nationalist or proto-nationalist groups; (9) the development and extent of usage of a trans-tribal pan-territorial language, be it English, French, Portuguese, Swahili, or Hausa; (10) the compatibility of the "detrribalized" basic personality types produced by the indigenous cultures; (11) the extent to which the territory concerned embraces total cultural groups, or, put another way, the degree to which artificial colonial boundaries have bifurcated ethnic groups whose division may be the source of later irredentism; and (12) the rapport between the Western-educated nationalist elements and the traditionalists, including the existence of nativistic tensions or economic grievances which the nationalists could manipulate or exploit in their mobilization of mass support.

³⁵ For several of the concepts used here the author is indebted to the works of Professor Karl W. Deutsch, previously cited. See especially his Nationalism and Social Communication, pp. 15-45.

Results obtained from inquiries along these lines would go far to explain the present orientation of a nationalist movement, as well as possible future trends. And yet an emphatic note of caution should be sounded: objective forces of integration and disintegration are powerful determinants in the nation-building process, but so also are subjective factors.³⁷ By all laws of geography and economics Northern Ireland should belong to Eire, and East Pakistan to the Republic of India; but they do not. By the same laws, the Gambia should belong to Senegal, French Guinea to Sierra Leone and Liberia, Mozambique to the Central African Federation, and so forth; and yet present trends suggest that such will not be the case. The principal forces currently operating to shape Africa's emergent nations are either tribalism or a nationalism following artificial imperial boundaries; and, with few exceptions, neither of these is directed towards the creation of political units which the geographer or economist would classify as ideal. In this respect, of course, Africa is not unique.

³⁶ It could be argued, for example, that apart from historical and cultural factors, the difference in the per capita income of the three regions of Nigeria (£26 for the Western Region, £16 for the Northern Region, and £23 for the Eastern Region) is of no little significance in the recent and current drive for greater regional autonomy. See A. R. Prest and I. G. Stewart, The National Income of Nigeria, abridged ed. (Lagos: Government Printer, 1954), pp. 14-16.

³⁷ Given suitable conditions, including a politically favorable milieu and the proper techniques, there would seem to be no reason why subjective factors such as loyalties, attitudes, and attachments to national or "sub-national" symbols, could not to some extent be measured.

The foregoing raises the crucial question of whether it is possible for the peoples of Africa—in their own interest—to avoid the balkanization implicit in the full application of the national principle to their continent. So long as the rest of the world is organized according to that principle, and so long as the national idea universally embodies aspirations which cannot be satisfied by other forms of human organization, the answer would seem to be in the negative. The quest for racial equality and acceptance is as important an ingredient in the African revolt as is the desire to determine one's own destiny. Rightly or wrongly, self-government within the confines of the sovereign nation-state has become the supreme symbol of the equality of peoples. The only possible alternative would be broader Eur-African political groupings or self-governing plural societies in which emergent African leaders could play what they would feel to be an equal role. In the light of the persistence of national self-determination as a symbol, and particularly in view of the growing strength and contagion of African nationalism, the future of such multi-racial experiments will depend in a large measure upon the rapidity with which European governments and leaders provide for such a role.

IV. SPECIAL PROBLEMS OF RESEARCH INTO AFRICAN NATIONALISM

There is perhaps no other type of research venture capable of evoking stronger feeling than an inquiry into colonial nationalism. The word "nationalism" in a colonial milieu has tended to be treated as the equivalent of sedition, or even treason. And this for good reason: by definition colonial nationalists are seeking to bring about a radical alteration in the power structure; namely, to evict the imperial power and to enthrone themselves. From the moment it makes its presence known, therefore, a nationalist movement is, in effect, engaged in a civil war with the colonial administration, the constitutionality of its methods varying according to the liberality of the colonial regime and the moderation of the nationalist leaders.

As regards colonial officialdom, an American undertaking a study of African nationalism is handicapped by the fact that in a large measure the African nationalist awakening is the product of American influences. Since the turn of the century, American Negro religious sects have contributed no little to religious secessionism, particularly in South and West Africa. The Garveyism of the early 1920's had an influence among sophisticated Africans which has tended to be overlooked or minimized. Since 1919 a growing number of American Negro intellectuals have taken an increasingly militant stand on African colonialism. Anti-imperialist sentiment in the United States, especially during the Second World War, was the source of considerable inspiration and delight to budding African nationalists, as well as the cause of no little acrimony between wartime allies. The Atlantic Charter, the Four Freedoms, and public statements by Mr. Willkie and President Roosevelt have bulked large in postwar African nationalist literature. The most important American contribution, however, has been the impact of our culture upon African students who have studied in America. Many of the important pioneers in the African awakening were profoundly affected by their American experience. Of this group the late Dr. J. E. K. Aggrey and Prime Minister Kwame Nkrumah from the Gold Coast, and Professor Eyo Ita and Dr. Nnamdi Azikiwe from Nigeria are the most prominent and best known. During the Second World War the number of African students in America was less than 25; since 1945 it has increased to over 500. With few exceptions these students have been and are strong nationalists, many of them having become leaders upon their return to Africa. In the eyes of colonial officialdom, therefore, an American inquiry into nationalism tends to raise certain doubts.

There has been a tendency in the past for American visitors making quick tours of Africa to rely mainly upon the white colonial administration for an appraisal of nationalist sentiment and activity. This is unfortunate in many respects. In the first place, it is most likely that any information bearing on nationalism is locked up in classified files. Secondly, most colonial administrators have tended to be anti-nationalists, even though many in British West Africa have adapted themselves to working with nationalists towards a mutually agreed goal of effective self-government. Their evaluation of nationalism is bound to be colored by their preconceptions and vested interests or by their honest fears regarding the welfare of the bush peasant, for whom they tend to have a preference and a strong paternal affection. Thirdly, circumstances have tended to place them too close to events or too far removed from the people. Their growing preoccupation with headquarters administration and development schemes, the social impediments—created frequently by the presence of white wives and families—to effective and continuous contact with the masses, and the almost total lack of rapport or confidence between nationalists and administrators, have given the latter many blind spots. Their past miscalculations of nationalist strength and trends tend to confirm this. In short, instead of being used as informants, a role they are not anxious to perform, they should be objects of study. Their fears, their adjustments, and their efforts to suppress, retard, manipulate, or encourage nationalism are all relevant in a complete study of the many interacting factors present in a nationalist situation.

Unlike the field anthropologist, who consciously seeks to work among the traditionalists, the student of political nationalism is concerned mainly with the attitudes, activities, and status of the nationalist-minded Western-educated élite. Here one is in a world very different from that of officialdom or the traditionalists. It is a world of great idealism, crusading zeal, and high resolve, as well as one of suspicion, hyper-sensitivity, and exaggeration. It has its careerists and opportunists, and its chronic nonconformists; but it also has its emergent statesmen, its enterprising industrialists, and its distinguished scholars. Only here can one get a partial glimpse into the depth of nationalist feeling, the sources of inspiration and ideas, and the key elements in nationalist motivation.

Yet there are distinct limitations to the interview technique, not the least important of which is the possession of a white skin. Moreover, a colonial nationalist movement must have its arcana as well as its propaganda.

In the quest for knowledge regarding African nationalism, the most fruitful as well as unprovocative avenues to explore are those already indicated in earlier sections. African nationalism is something more than the activities of a few disgruntled journalists and frustrated intellectuals to whom Lord Lugard referred in his Dual Mandate. It is the inevitable end product of the impact of Western imperialism and modernity upon African societies; it is also the inevitable assertion by the Africans of their desire to shape their own destiny. Imperial systems are disintegrating, new nation-states are emerging, and new forms of political organization transcending the national state are under experiment. These political aspects of African nationalism, however, are but the surface symptoms of a great ferment about which we know very little. The study and analysis of the many complex factors in this unfolding drama provide not only a stimulating challenge to the social sciences, but also a compelling invitation to greater interdisciplinary cooperation.

WORLD TRENDS IN POLITICAL SCIENCE RESEARCH*

C. B. MACPHERSON

University of Toronto

I. PURPOSE AND LIMITATIONS OF THE REPORT

The purpose of this report is to examine, on an international scale, the current trends in political science research.

The initial intention was to base the survey on the available information about researches being carried on by institutions, but it soon became apparent that such a survey could not give an adequate picture of current work or trends. In the first place, systematic information about research by institutions was, at the time of writing, available on a comparable basis only for a few countries and areas. In the second place, even if information on research by institutions were available for all countries, an analysis of it would give a very one-sided picture of the main trends in political science research. For it would leave out of account all the work being done by individual scholars, and even groups of scholars, in the ordinary course of their academic work. To single out the work being done by research institutes (whether they are attached to universities or established independently) and to call this "research," would be putting a narrow interpretation on the word. It is, of course, tempting to do so. It is possible to canvass institutions and compile a comparative register of their researches; it is much more difficult, if not impossible, to compile a register that would list all the significant thinking being done in political science, including the theoretical work being done by individual academic political scientists in all the universities. Yet at least in countries where political science is a recognized academic discipline, and even in most of the countries where its subject-matter is still divided between university faculties of law, philosophy, history, etc., the work being done by individual scholars (with or without some research assistants) is greater than the volume of work being done by institutions or university units devoted specifically to research. The individual work may also be thought to be of more significance; but on this point opinions will differ.

The fact that opinions will differ on this is itself significant of the trend in the past few years. The research institute has in some countries become the leading hope of political science, as of the social sciences generally. In countries where political science has still to attain the status of an independent discipline, the research institute is often conceived as the most direct and practicable way of promoting the claims of the subject. In countries where political science is already an established academic discipline, the research institute may be a way of breaking through departmental divisions which are thought to have become too rigid, or of opening up new fields for which the existing academic organization does not readily find a place. The desire to establish research organizations for these purposes is itself a symptom of a deeper dissatisfaction.

* A report prepared in April, 1953 for the International Political Science Association, as part of a larger inquiry instituted by the Social Sciences Department of UNESCO.

There is a very general uneasiness among political scientists, not least where the subject is best established and most extensively developed, as to the ability of political science to elucidate the political phenomena which constitute such urgent problems in our day. Where traditional methods of scholarship are thought to have been inadequate, the research institute has a ready-made claim to consideration. This is especially so because the dissatisfaction with established methods and approaches has taken the form of increasing insistence on strictly empirical research. It is in the very nature of the research institute that it should be engaged mainly in empirical research. As the description in the following section will show, the bulk of the research now being done by such institutions is the collection of data about the actual functioning of the political process (or of some part of it, such as the formation of public opinion, the electoral process, the political party as an instrument in forming and transmitting democratic pressure, the functioning of international organizations and international relations, etc.). Where the collection of data is undertaken with a view to testing hypotheses and ultimately to extending, modifying, or replacing the accepted theory, the potential value of such research is undoubted. And since it is a question of inquiring into the political behavior of masses of people, this kind of research is most appropriately done on a scale (and by techniques) beyond the resources of individual scholarship. The rise of the research institute is an obvious reflection of the trend to empirical inquiry into mass political behavior and as such is worth notice. But no examination merely of the research being done in such institutions would give a balanced view of what is being done in political science.

For this reason, an effort has been made to broaden this report by bringing into its scope whatever information was available about research in progress elsewhere than in research organizations. Information on this is both incomplete (being available only for a few countries) and not strictly comparable between countries. For some countries, we have partial records of individual research by established scholars. For some, we have lists of doctoral dissertations in political science. The researches of doctoral candidates are, of course, of uneven quality and in any quantitative survey should not generally be weighted as heavily as the work of established political scientists. But classified lists of doctoral theses may be taken to give some indication of the interests of the professors; and are therefore not to be discarded in a survey of trends, especially since relatively little information is available about the researches of individual professors in many countries. Except insofar as they are taking part in organized group research, professors often do not give any information about their own current, but yet unpublished, work, even though it be at an advanced stage. Work of quite first-rate importance thus escapes any listing until it is actually published.

Some consideration of recently published work therefore seemed to be a desirable supplement to the survey of research in progress. Here again we find large gaps in the available information. Lists of works in political science published during 1952, which have been drawn up by the International Political Science Association in preparation of the forthcoming first volume of the International Bibliography of Political Science, have been put at the disposal of the writer of this report, but these lists are so far available only for some countries. For other countries, reliance has had to be put on various sources of information, including general bibliographies and lists and reviews in national political science journals.

One other source which it was thought might provide an additional indication of the work being done by individual scholars proved not to yield the desired information. Since one of the first fruits of research is often the publication of articles in scholarly journals, it seemed possible that an analysis of all the journal articles in political science published in the last year or two might afford some indication of the kind of work that is currently being done. Information about this is particularly full: a comprehensive record for 1951 and 1952 is provided in the first two volumes of the International Political Science Abstracts / Documentation Politique Internationale, compiled by the International Political Science Association and the International Studies Conference. The two volumes contain abstracts of 2787 articles in political science, from a comprehensive list of periodicals in all parts of the world.

In the hope of throwing some light on the problem with which we are here concerned, several attempts were made to classify this material but in the end it proved impossible to distinguish with a sufficient degree of certainty between those articles which should be considered as instalments of research and those which were primarily designed to be informative (e.g., surveys of political developments in a foreign country) or which were primarily vehicles of the authors' views (not always evidently based on research) as to what should be done about something. The frequency of the latter two sorts of articles might, indeed, be taken as giving a partial measure of the demand in various countries for political enlightenment and guidance, or at least of the proffered supply of these commodities, but it is scarcely indicative of the amount of research. The attempt was therefore abandoned, not before certain broad impressions were gained, but without any statistically useful results.

One further limitation of this report—perhaps the most serious—remains to be pointed out. If the purpose of the report were only to analyze trends in the amounts of research being devoted to different parts of the whole field of political science, the deficiencies in the coverage and comparability of the information would not be too serious. But the report has a further purpose: to consider the progress, shortcomings, and difficulties of current research. There is, of course, no intention of setting up the reporter's judgment on the quality of any or all researches. But it is incumbent on the reporter to indicate the shortcomings which are revealed by the survey, and if this duty is to be performed it requires not merely a statement of lacunae, but an assessment of the stage of theoretical penetration, analytical or synthetical, which has been reached in various branches of the subject in various countries.

This is a formidable requirement. An attempt to meet it is made in the body of the report. But it is proper to say here that it involves a subjective judgment not only of the standards by which such assessment is to be made but also of the information. It is not always apparent from the information given about a research project what conception of it the projectors have, or what questions they are setting themselves. Yet this is what is really important. On this it has often been necessary to make tenuous and unverifiable inferences. That it has been necessary to do so constitutes the major limitation imposed on the report by the information available.

In order to elucidate trends a base is necessary. Fortunately this is provided in large measure by the studies made in 1948 or 1949 for several countries and published in 1950 in the UNESCO volume Contemporary Political Science. The description and analysis of current research which follows is wherever possible related to these studies. The order of description is the same, that is, by countries or groups of countries rather than by divisions of the subject across countries. This order is preferable on its own account, since any analysis of the trends, shortcomings, and possibilities must be related to the intellectual tradition, the national outlook, and even the view of the national interest, which vary from country to country.

II. DESCRIPTION AND ANALYSIS OF CURRENT TENDENCIES IN POLITICAL SCIENCE RESEARCH

1. Political Science Research in the United States

United States political science may appropriately be examined first, partly because it displays a greater quantity of research, and partly because there has recently been a remarkable amount of inquiry there into research, reflecting an unusual degree of concern about the position and prospects of political science in that country.

We may begin by summarizing the picture of political science research in the United States in 1948-1949 which emerges from the ten papers on American political science in Contemporary Political Science (Paris: UNESCO, 1950). In the study of American government in particular, and government in general, a steady shift of emphasis from formal institutions and structures to processes and patterns of behavior had left the latter the predominant approach. As part of this trend, the attention given to political parties and to public opinion had greatly increased. The study of public administration had also expanded, with great attention being given to practical application. The view that public administration was a part of a science of administration, and not rooted in politics, was prevalent, but was being abandoned by some leading scholars in favor of a view of administration as part of politics. In all the studies of government and administration there was increasing emphasis on quantitative research, increasing interest in psychological methods, and a vast amount of collection and clearance of data (statistical, observational, and experimental) by public and private agencies. Apart from the data collected for fairly immediate administrative purposes, there was an intensive effort to collect specialized data which would serve for the testing of hypotheses about particular relations within the process of government or administration. With this went a variety of attempts to define concepts and hypotheses, and construct theories, of political structure, pattern, and action. Underlying much of this activity was a growing concern with the management and manipulation of people, and a hope to contribute to policy formation. The study of international relations was greatly expanded, much of the work being devoted to attempts to understand foreign nations and to disclose the factors determining their policies. There was said to be a renewed interest in political philosophy, but the evidence did not suggest that this had yet shown itself in research or publication. Political theory was almost entirely empirical and intent on avoiding value judgment.

There was indeed considerable criticism of the prevalence of empiricism. Several writers urged that it was hampering the more important work that might be done, and that preoccupation with collecting data deflected attention from the need for, e.g., a consistent theory of democratic responsibility, or criteria of value in public policy and political institutions. In one field, lack of real progress was attributed mainly to the ambivalences and ambiguities in the minds of the political scientists who were devoting themselves to it.

It appeared to be widely assumed that, as one writer put it, political science had responsibilities "for improving and perfecting the operation of government" and that "the research needs of the country could no longer be left to the hazards of chance and individual interest" (Contemporary Political Science, p. 368). The prevalence of these assumptions was taken to explain the growth of research organizations whose purpose is to canalize and correlate research, and which, it was recognized, must thereby influence and guide the directions which research is to take.

Trends since 1948. The American Political Science Association Committee on Research, jointly with the United States Office of Education, has made a survey of research in political science in progress in American universities in the spring of 1950, the results of which were reported, with an admirable analysis, in June, 1952 (C. E. Hawley and L. A. Dexter: "Recent Political Science Research in American Universities", this REVIEW Vol. 46, pp. 470-85). In spite of unavoidable quantitative limitations, this provides a valuable statement of the position in 1950, and forms the main source of information in the field. The survey covers only the research in graduate departments of political science, and only in 75 of the 112 departments to which the questionnaire was sent, the other 37 not having replied. The authors of the report believe that it covers about 75% of the political science research in universities. It includes researches by doctoral candidates and by faculty members. In addition to this report (referred to hereafter as the Hawley-Dexter report), supplementary and more recent information, though not strictly comparable, has been gotten from a variety of reports of research projects (e.g., reports of the Social Science Research Council), from the annual lists of doctoral dissertations in political science published in this REVIEW, and from current bibliographies of published works.

From these sources of information combined, it is possible to draw a picture of the trends since 1948.

The relative number of research projects in the main fields of political science may be noted first. The three sources of information that have been used are not strictly comparable, but a rough picture emerges when parts of some of the categories originally employed in each of them are reclassified. In the following classification Political Theory covers works approaching or contributing to a general or systematic theory of politics, or devoted to a particular theoretical problem, and includes studies in methodology; Political Ideas covers the history of political ideas, and analysis of contemporary doctrines and ideologies; United States Government covers the legislative and representative process, public law and judicial and legal problems, and includes studies in state and local governments as well as the federal government; Foreign Government includes area studies as well as studies of one national government; Public Administration covers United States and foreign public administration; International Relations excludes area studies. The figures in the last column were reached by classifying the books by United States political scientists which were reviewed or noticed in the four most recent issues of this REVIEW (June, September, December, 1952; March, 1953), excluding text-books, manuals, surveys, and collections of documents and of readings.

UNITED STATES RESEARCH IN THE MAIN FIELDS OF POLITICAL SCIENCE

	Hawley-Dexter Report (for Spring 1950)	Doctoral Disserta- tions in Progress Summer 1952	Research Works Published in 1952
Political Theory	44	29	11
Political Ideas	36	73	26
United States Government	270	265	37
Foreign Government	215	113	30
Comparative Government	34	9	4
Public Administration	306	127	20
International Relations	110	251	25
	1,015	867	153

These figures, necessarily resting on somewhat arbitrary classifications, can be taken only as broadly suggestive of the relative amounts of attention being given to the main divisions of the whole field. They afford some notion, too, of the total volume of political science research in the United States. The totals of columns 1 and 2 are, however, not comparable, since in the Hawley-Dexter report (column 1) some studies were counted more than once (when they appeared to be related to more than one of the seven subject divisions). The actual total of the studies classified in column 1 is 797. In column 2 (and column 3) each piece of research is counted only once.

The really significant developments in political science research cannot be shown by any statistical summary, but fortunately the material enables us to give some answer to the more important questions. What conception of their own task have the political scientists? What sort of results do they hope to achieve, and how are they going about it? What level of theoretical penetration has been reached, or is in view, in the different divisions of the whole subject? And has there been, in any of these respects, any significant change in the last few years?

In the study of government, particularly of United States government, the emphasis on empirical research has continued and even increased. So also has the emphasis on the process of government rather than the formal structure. "Process of government" must be understood here in its widest sense, including not only the ways in which governments make decisions and exercise their powers but also the ways in which governments get and keep their power. The current research is concerned more largely with the flow of power to government than with the flow of power from government; more with how governments are authorized than with how they govern. More precisely, the major emphasis of research on government is on the electoral and representative process, by which the people, as electors and as members of interest groups and parties, seek to have their wills represented in and to the bodies they authorize as their government. American political science has, of course, always paid very great attention to pressure groups, parties, and the formation of public opinion, so much so that these instruments have come to be regarded as the determinants of the legislative process. The emphasis on the electoral and representative process (of which parties, pressure groups, and public opinion formation are leading elements) is therefore far from being a new trend, but this whole field is now being subjected to more intensive research. This trend has quite clearly arisen out of an increasing concern, on the part of political scientists, about the adequacy of the democratic process in their own country, although this is seldom avowed.

Yet, paradoxically, American political science is so intent on empirical analysis that for the most part it eschews any inquiry into adequacy, since that would involve "value judgment". The prevailing view, one might almost say, paraphrasing the saying about justice, is that it is necessary not only that political science should be done but also that it should manifestly appear to be done, and here "science" is predominantly taken to mean purely empirical investigation and generalization.

The Hawley-Dexter report endorses the view expressed by Thomas I. Cook in Contemporary Political Science that concern for the techniques of power, opinion formation, etc . . . had turned attention away from the purposes of the political process, the needs of the ruled, and the potentialities for satisfying these needs. The available information about subsequent research on the whole confirms this view. The prevailing focus of attention is the mechanics rather than the purposes or potentialities of the political process. Even on the mechanics of it, the Hawley-Dexter report found no evidence of a search for a new theory of representation; the "pressure politics" theory was so generally accepted that there was no disposition to question the hypotheses. Indeed, that report found little evidence for any such trend, in political science research generally, as was reported by Charles E. Merriam in Contemporary Political Science, towards a "growing effort to interpret data, to use them as a check on assumptions and hypotheses, and in turn to develop new assumptions and hypotheses, examining implicit assumptions more carefully and making them more explicit."

In respect of the level of penetration of empirical research into the political process, there are signs of change since the Hawley-Dexter report. For instance, the elaborate research plan recently evolved by a Social Science Research Council inter-university group, for an extensive program of "Research in Political Behavior" reported in this REVIEW, Vol. 46, pp. 1003-45 (Dec., 1952), is very much concerned with defining and testing hypotheses. The stated aim is to discover uniformities in the empirically observed behavior of persons and groups in the political process, or sets of recurring patterns of behavior involving relationships of leadership and subordination, functional specialization, etc.

It refrains from inquiring how men ought to act. Keeping strictly on an empirical plane, it does emphasize that detailed and precise formulation of concepts and hypotheses must precede empirical research. It insists that the concepts and hypotheses to be formulated must be such as will permit "effective identification of behavioral uniformities" and "ease of replication and validation in successive researches." It does not insist on quantitative methods only but merely on empirical data. It hopes in this way to produce systematic theory, to build "a political science of increasing system, validity and generality of statement."

This ambitious long-term plan of research is typical of others in its emphasis on careful formulation of hypotheses and its desire to reach some systematic general theory. There is some reason to think that the intense preoccupation with "scientific" method may defeat the end ("a political science of increasing system, validity and generality of statement"); the formulation of problems and concepts is to be limited to those which will permit the discovery of uniformities and which will provide uniform specifications for extensive and repeated observations. Sometimes it appears that the cart has run away with the horse; research projects are chosen and are considered valuable because they can employ these careful empirical methods. This, of course, is not the only ground on which research projects are chosen; the underlying ground, though never acknowledged as more than a secondary reason, is the desire to reach generalizations which would help to improve the quality of American democracy. In any case, such research planning as this shows that the need for re-thinking hypotheses and developing a new systematic theory of politics is emphatically recognized in leading research circles.

That is not to say that the bulk of the current research is at this level of questioning or of generality; it appears rather that the greater amount of research is still at the level characterized in the Hawley-Dexter report, while the planning and execution of research at the newer level is mainly confined to research institutes, such as the Hoover Institute with its R.A.D.I.R. (Revolution and the Development of International Relations) project (of which the first published studies have recently appeared: reviewed in this REVIEW, Vol. 46, pp. 867-73 (Sept., 1952)), and to other research groups sponsored by such bodies as the Social Science Research Council and the foundations which are concerned with the promotion of the social sciences. A notable instance of the latter is the Cornell Studies in Civil Liberties, sponsored by the Rockefeller Foundation, analyzing governmental internal security programs purporting to be against disloyalty and subversive activity. Four substantial volumes of the series which appeared in 1951 and 1952 are reviewed in this REVIEW, Vol. 47, pp. 211-15 (March, 1953). The scope of those studies affords one indication that research into the exercise of governmental power and its impact on the citizen, while outweighed by the amount of research on the process of representation, is by no means neglected.

What has been said about the trend in the study of government indicates that work in the direction of systematic political theory is so far rather limited, but that there is increasing awareness of the need for it. The other branch of political theory, the study of the history of political ideas, including contemporary ideologies, has fared rather better, in volume at least. Much of it is designed to disclose the roots of present ideological conflicts, and has an obvious and implicitly recognized relevance to the defense of American values.

Comparative government, in any strict sense, has not developed as much as might have been expected; there is no clear evidence that it has developed much beyond the mainly descriptive level where the Hawley-Dexter report found it. The slowness of studies of government in general to reach a synthetic theoretical level, which we have already noticed, is characteristic of the present stage of comparative government in particular. The contemporary American thirst for information about foreign nations has resulted in a large number of separate studies of foreign governments, or of a particular aspect of them, as well as an extensive development of "area studies." (On the rise of area studies see International Social Science Bulletin, Vol. IV, No. 4, 1952.) Since the thirst for careful and abundant information needs to be satisfied before the thirst for theoretical analysis or synthesis can be extensively indulged, it is not surprising that much of this research is descriptive and historical.

The same may be said of the very large volume of research in international relations. There is little evidence to modify the finding of the Hawley-Dexter report that most of the research in international relations was really providing background material, descriptive and historical; that much of what analysis was being done was primarily legal analysis; and that social, psychological, and economic factors, as they apply to policy problems or to processes of international relations, made up a very minor theme. But, here, as in the study of government, the evidence suggests that, while the bulk of the work may not be conceived theoretically, yet the desirability of aiming at broad empirical generalization, based on massive and meticulously formulated research, is clearly recognized, at least in those centers where research is most intensively organized and supported: the R.A.D.I.R. project, already mentioned, is a leading example of this.

Finally, in the study of public administration, a similar but not quite parallel trend is observable. The bulk of the research now being done appears to concern particular administrative problems in certain states or cities, or in certain departments of a government, and to be designed to describe, to analyze, and to contribute to the solution of the particular problems. The work of the many American bureaus of municipal research and similar bodies, designed to produce immediately operative results for paying clients, will obviously be of that kind, and most of it should not be reckoned as political science research in the sense in which the term is generally used. But the greater part of the academic research in public administration, in which one would expect to find a theoretical approach and aim, does not evidently show a desire to work towards a general theory of public administration or to contribute to synthetic studies. However, some influential individual scholars have moved away from the traditional theories, and are urging a reconsideration of the general theory of public administration. And, as well as individual scholars, organized research groups are moving in the same direction. For instance, one of the projects outlined by the Social Science Research Council group on Political Behavior, mentioned above, is an elaborate long-term research into "Party and Administration Responsibility: Council-Manager Government." This project is designed on a broad theoretical level and is intent on stating hypotheses more precisely and testing them more systematically and extensively than has usually been done. Thus the trend in public administration research is similar to that in other fields of government; the major part of the work is being carried on within the limits of accepted theory and with little questioning of assumptions, but an attempt to break through these limitations, or at least to subject the prevailing views to some searching new questions and extensive empirical testing, has taken definite shape.

2. Political Science Research in Great Britain

When one turns from American to British political science, two differences are immediately striking. One is that among British political scientists there is much less anxiety and perturbation about research aims and methods. The other is that there is less emphasis on purely empirical research and more inclination to examine political institutions and processes from the point of view of purpose—the purposes they serve, and the purpose they ought to serve.

For the first of these characteristics two reasons are apparent. British political scientists are on the whole less troubled about the representative and democratic quality of their own political institutions than are American political scientists about theirs. Hence there is less incentive for the British political scientists to question the established theories of their institutions, and hence less need to search for new techniques by which the accepted interpretations could be subjected to serious revision. Secondly, there is not the financial support for vast research projects in political science in Britain that there is in the United States. Funds go mainly to other kinds of social research where the need is thought to be greater. And since it is chiefly in the planning of large research schemes that the need to question traditional methods and aims of research arises, there has been little incentive or pressure from this quarter to be concerned about them.

The other noticeably different feature of British political science—the lack of insistence on purely empirical research—may be seen simply as a part of the British intellectual tradition, which has always tended to consider politics as a branch of moral philosophy. But why should this tradition have persisted so far into this “scientific age”? It is not that the spirit of empirical inquiry is absent—the spirit of the Webbs lives on, and there is a substantial amount of study of political institutions—but empirical research from which considerations of value and purpose are rigidly excluded is not at all typical. The prevailing spirit is indeed the same as that which guided and impelled the Webbs, whose research was informed by a sense of purpose embodied in a political philosophy. British political scientists are accustomed to refer their analysis of institutions fairly consciously to some overriding ethical political theory, whether it be utilitarian, idealist, or fabian. They are not afraid of value judgments, perhaps because they are fairly sure of their own values. This approach could be justified empirically, if such justification were thought necessary. Political life has been rather more informed by principles in Britain than in the United States; parties have defined and justified themselves by their adherence to one set or another of value principles as well as by their advocacy of different means to common ends. Hence, it might be said, a feeling for value principles is an asset to the political scientist who would analyze this political life. However this may be, the fact that the universities are fairly closely related to the political life of the country (training many of the politicians and civil servants, and enjoying easy relations with them), tends to reinforce on each side an appreciation of value judgments and a perceptible mistrust of purely empirical research. Even the term “political science” has not been fully accepted by its academic practitioners in Great Britain: they have designedly called their recently-formed political science association the Political Studies Association and their journal Political Studies.

Notwithstanding these general and still prevalent characteristics, political science has shared in the considerable growth of planned research in Great Britain in the social sciences generally in the last decade. The Register of Research in the Social Sciences, prepared by the National Institute of Economic and Social Research, lists, for 1951-52, 1425 researches in all the social sciences, of which 230 are classified as political science or international relations. Of these, 137 are researches by doctoral candidates, and 93 are researches by other individuals or groups sponsored by organized research bodies (in or outside of universities). This is far from being a complete list of political science research in progress, since it does not include the work of individual scholars which is not done in connection with a specifically research unit. Much of the most significant academic research done by individual mature scholars is therefore not covered. The Register, however, when supplemented by a consideration of recently published work in political science, is sufficient to provide a picture of the relative weight of attention being given to the different fields of political science, and the relative strength of descriptive, analytical, and synthetic approaches.

The researches listed in the Register, when reclassified as nearly as possible on the same lines as were used above for the United States, show the following distribution: Political Theory, 5; Political Ideas, 22; British Government, 28; Foreign Governments, 25; Comparative Government, 4; Public Administration, 54; International Relations, 61; British Commonwealth and Empire Government, 28.

The only apparent significant development from the position in 1949 as outlined in the sections of Contemporary Political Science devoted to the British scene, is a shift of emphasis in the work being done on British government. W. A. Robson could say in 1949 (Contemporary Political Science, p. 294) that "the study of political or governmental institutions in the widest sense of the term is almost coterminous with public administration," and he was able to survey, under one or another subdivision of public administration, all the work being done on government. That he could do so was, of course, partly because an extremely broad definition of public administration was used, including the structure and functioning not only of administrative bodies but also of all legislative, executive, and judicial bodies, by virtue of the fact that they exercise control over administration. In this way, parliament, cabinet, and courts could all be brought into the purview of "public administration." But what is significant is that there was no problem of fitting into this framework any body of work on the electoral and representative process as distinct from the legislative and administrative process and institutions. There was, as Professor Robson and David Thomson noted (Contemporary Political Science, pp. 301, 538) little work on parties and the party system, the electoral process, or the formation of public opinion. In short, study of the flow of power to the government was relatively neglected, while the exercise of power by the government was subject to research in many of its aspects. Englishmen, it was observed (p. 538) have been accustomed to thinking in terms rather of the sovereignty of parliament than of the sovereignty of the people or the general will; which is perhaps another way of saying that English scholars have been comparatively satisfied with the institutions by which the will of the people is supposed to be brought to bear on the holders of power.

A rapid review of the work being done in the last few years indicates that increasing attention is now being given to parties, interest groups, public opinion, and the electoral process. Of the 28 current researches classified above as British Government, 21 are directly concerned with one or more of these phenomena. A substantial beginning has been made on the study of factors influencing voters, and of the nature and conduct of party organization; and the already lively interest in these matters seems likely to continue to increase. This research is conceived in the empirical way, being based on direct observations, and where possible using quantitative techniques, though the resources available have not so far been sufficient to permit an extensive use of interviews and statistical methods in electoral research. Not enough work has yet been done on elections, parties, public opinion, and interest groups to provide a basis for a new systematic theory of the representative process. So the possibility of a new systematic theory of British government, which would modify what some scholars consider to be the unduly rationalist assumptions of the prevalent theory, is still in the future.

The new interest in the electoral and representative process which has just been described has absorbed an increasing proportion of the energies being devoted to political science research, but it is probably true to say that the greatest proportion is still being devoted to the legislative, executive, and administrative process and institutions. The main lines of the established institutions—parliament, the alternate-party system, the cabinet, the civil service, and the judiciary—are not seriously questioned, but a great deal of thought is being given to the many problems of modifying various parts of this structure to enable it better to perform the tasks laid upon it by the extension of social services and of nationalized industry. This is the main focus of present work in public administration, and it is significant that substantial attention is being given to the many-sided problem of combining efficient administration with democratic responsiveness or control.

3. Political Science Research in the British Commonwealth Countries

Information on political science research in the Commonwealth countries is not inclusive enough to permit any full analysis, but a survey of some 80 researches now in progress there reveals some fairly clear lines of development. In each of these countries, the main concern of political science is with the structure and functioning of the political institutions of its own country, and with its foreign relations. And in most of the Commonwealth countries, political science as an independent academic discipline is a relatively recent development, so that almost the whole energies of the political scientists are absorbed by the work of description and historical analysis of their own countries' institutions.

In Australia, New Zealand, and South Africa, most of the current research having any bearing on political life is either simply political history or is primarily descriptive of institutions or concerned with one particular national problem; it is some way distant yet from theoretical interpretation. In Pakistan the effort to define the structure and the problems of a newly-created state is naturally predominant. A few scholars in each of these countries, however, are working on the history of political ideas.

In Canada, where political science has had a longer development, some theoretical interpretation is now going on. A notable amount of attention is currently being given to the whole structure and process of political life in one region (western Canada) and particularly in one province (Alberta), with emphasis on the relation of the political system to economic life and social movements, and on the electoral and representative process, as well as (or rather more than) on the legislative and administrative system. The main project in this field is expected to produce a series of some ten volumes. Another project, in progress for some time, will result in a series of works, analytical and historical, on the government of the several Canadian provinces.

In India, where political science has been a recognized academic discipline for several decades, there is a longer tradition of theoretical thought than in any of the other Commonwealth countries. Indian scholars, during the period of struggle for national independence, were greatly concerned with the principles of democracy, especially in relation to the social and economic conditions of their country. The Indian contributor to Contemporary Political Science found, nevertheless, that Indian political science had done little to develop the modern theory of the state. He expressed the hope that now that India had won national freedom, its political scientists, enjoying for the first time the conditions for constructive fundamental thinking, might develop a theoretical political science. This hope has not yet apparently been realized, but the achievement of Indian independence has had another effect: the greater part of Indian political science seems now to be devoted to foreign affairs and international relations.

4. Western Europe

In the countries of Western Europe the trends in political science research can only be understood in relation to the position of political science as an academic discipline. Generally speaking (but subject to an important qualification which is stated in the following paragraph) the extent of political science research varies in proportion to the degree of recognition of political science as a subject in its own right in the universities. And since in almost all of these countries this recognition is either entirely lacking, or has only just begun, the amount of political science research is very limited. This, of course, does not mean that the scholars of these countries take no interest in political institutions or ideas, but only that the field has been largely preempted by the philosophers, the legal scholars, and the historians, who generally bring to the study of political institutions and ideas the traditional outlook of their separate disciplines. While this situation prevails, the possibility of developing any systematic theory of politics or government, or of undertaking any extensive empirical research, appears to be remote.

But in several European countries the very impossibility of developing a systematic body of empirical political theory within the traditional academic structure has been a stimulus to the employment of newer methods and goals of research than are found in some countries where the path of political science has been smoother. In other words, while the traditional academic organization and the prevailing intellectual climate of most Western European countries have constituted a formidable obstacle to the development of a political science, the existence of such an obstacle has compelled the postwar generation of scholars to do some fundamental rethinking about the kind of political knowledge that is needed and the possible ways of attaining it. The underlying cause of all this is the heightened perception of the urgency of political problems, especially the problem of the control of political power. This is, naturally, particularly acute in those countries whose political (and academic) life was shattered by the war, or was undermined (even before the war) by the inability of existing democratic institutions to retain their vitality.

The result has been that in some of these countries political science has begun to develop outside the traditional, legal, historical, and philosophical categories, and to set up research on its own. This development is still on a relatively small scale, but it has attained some institutional recognition already. Where such a development is taking place, the tendency is for the scholars involved to take over as far as possible the most advanced methods, approach, and research aims from the political science of those countries where the subject has long had an independent existence and is most extensively developed, and particularly from American political science. Hence, in this still small but growing sector of political studies, the strict empirical approach predominates, and the research is concerned noticeably more with the electoral and representative process than with political structure and institutions. Precise research, quantitative where possible, is the main aim. Research objectives are generally limited to the elucidation of one particular part of the process of government, and are often based on field work in one particular section of the country or of the government. Such limitation is self-imposed because, in the empirical conception that prevails among the new political scientists, the construction of a broad systematic theory of politics must await the outcome of many specific limited researches. What is significant, however, is that the limited researches are increasingly coming to be thought of as contributions to the future construction of general theories of politics and administration. The overriding ultimate concern of most of the research in this advancing sector is to achieve some understanding of the sources and the possible ways of controlling political power.

It must be emphasized that what has been said in the preceding paragraphs about the new tendencies in political science research applies to only a fraction of all the work being done in politics. Law, history, and philosophy still predominate. But against this traditional background, the new developments, though small, are increasingly significant.

Information on the political science research in progress in all the countries of Western Europe is too scanty to permit a useful analysis of the work being done in each country separately. But the development is sufficiently similar as between many of them to permit a useful picture to be given by taking a few as typical.

Scandinavia. Of all the Western European countries, only Sweden has an established tradition of political science as an independent academic discipline, and this fact sets it somewhat apart, in respect of political science research, from the general position outlined above. Finland shares this distinction to some extent; but the position of political science in Norway and Denmark appears to be closer to that of the continental European countries.

In Sweden a substantial amount of work in political science research is being carried on in the universities. As was reported in Contemporary Political Science (p. 151) there is a close interplay between academic political science and active political life, in that it is usual for a large proportion of the academic chairs to be held by men who are also members of the Riksdag or otherwise prominent in political activity. This fact has probably promoted the status of political science in the universities. It may also be thought to have given political science research in the universities a bias in favor of those problems which are of particular interest to the legislature or to the parties. In view of this relationship, and in view of the fact that the continuity of Swedish political life has not been broken, it is not surprising to find that the greater part of the current work in political science is on the structure of Swedish government, Swedish social policy, and developments in foreign countries which are of direct interest to Swedish legislators. For instance, of the five books published in 1952 on foreign and comparative government, three are studies of the referendum in different countries (which studies were undertaken following a request by the Riksdag and are published as state documents); one is on social legislation in the Soviet Union; and one is on democratic socialism in the world today. Interest in political theory and ideology, in public administration, and in international relations continues. The newer trend towards the study of the representative process also has some currency in Sweden and has recently produced some studies of popular movements in relation to democratic government and at least one work on the electorate in a particular region. There does not, however, appear to be any very recent work on parties in the political process or on the formation of public opinion, nor any attempt at systematic empirical research into the electoral and representative process. Swedish political science in general has not yet sought to develop a systematic theory of the political process which would integrate the older constitutional and historical material with the newer material which might be gathered by long-term empirical research into political behavior. But the possibility of some such new ventures in political science is now being given considerable attention in Sweden; recently, in two successive numbers of the Statsvetenskaplig Tidskrift (1952, Nos. 3 and 4), there were five articles dealing respectively with "The Development of Society and the Scope of Political Science," "The Development of Society and the Scope of Jurisprudence," "A General Research Program for Political Science," "Goals and Methods in Political Science," and "The Concept of Social Classes." The widespread stirring of interest in goals and methods and concepts of political science appears to be a quite recent development in Sweden, and suggests that in spite of the continuity of Swedish political science there is now a disposition to take a new direction in political science research.

France. The trend of political science research in France shows some advance from the position of 1948-49 as it was outlined by the French contributors to Contemporary Political Science. The more recent movement is mainly along the same lines as were already discerned there. The growth of political science is still subject to the restricting effects of traditional academic organization, but some of the limits imposed by this factor are now being overcome.

In respect of the obstacles to the development of political science, and hence of political science research, the position in France may be taken as typical of that in most of the continental European countries, while in the effort to surmount the obstacles France appears to be somewhat further ahead. The problem, until very recently, has been not a problem of developing political science, but one of creating a political science against the whole force of the academic and intellectual tradition, in which the study of political institutions has been dominated by the faculties of law, the study of political philosophy by the faculties of philosophy, and the study of political movements by the departments of history. To the extent that this situation has prevailed not only has there been no unified political science; what is more important, there has been no substantial body of scholars who think of themselves as political scientists. And, in these circumstances, certain areas of what is elsewhere considered to be political science are likely to be left unexplored, as not falling within the scope of law, philosophy, or history, notably the whole range of phenomena (parties, public opinion, the democratic control of administration, etc.) which are now regarded as central to the understanding of the political process. Hence the traditional university structure offers no encouragement either to research in these fields or to the development of an approach or method designed to produce a systematic theory of politics.

However, progress towards creating a political science has become increasingly evident in the last few years in France. The faculties of law are still dominant, but within them an increasing place is being given to work in political science. The first university chair in which political science shares the title (the Chair of Constitutional Law and Political Science, at Bordeaux) was created in 1951 and is held by one of the leading exponents of political science. The degree in law (licence en Droit) has just been reformed to permit specialization in one of three fields: private law, public law and political science, or economics. These developments, it will be noticed, have followed by some six or eight years the establishment (in 1945) of the Fondation Nationale des Sciences Politiques, and the Instituts d'Études Politiques in several universities. Both the Fondation and the Instituts, as the use of the plural term "sciences politiques" indicates, are devoted to economic and social as well as political science, but in both organizations political science has been given room to grow and is achieving substantial recognition. The Fondation, for instance, has separate research centers for the study of internal politics, of international relations, and of public administration.

The most significant indication of progress towards the creation of a specifically political science is the establishment of the Association Française de Science Politique in 1949 and the Revue Française de Science Politique in 1951. These constitute, in effect, a declaration of independence on the part of political science as such, and are an impressive evidence of the existence of a body of scholars who think in terms of political science. They provide a means of encouraging and publishing research: the Association not only plans research but also provides some financial support for it.

Indirectly the Association and the Revue may do something even more important towards the creation of a political science, simply because their work is a demonstration that a political science already exists. The French intellectual tradition has long been noted for its desire for orderly, unified systems of thought, and bodies of theoretical principle. This has given law, philosophy, and history their academic tenacity; it also makes the exponents of political science desire above all to produce a systematic body of theoretical principles. The intellectual tradition is thus not only a conservative but also a radical force; once a new discipline can show that it exists, it can attract a surprising number of academic adherents, enthused by the possible adventure of building a new body of principles. It is perhaps for this reason that already some of the French philosophers want to see political philosophy attached to political science rather than continue as a department of philosophy, and some of the jurists wish for an enlargement of the sphere of political science. One may even suggest that, if the desire for intellectual system is strong enough to attract academic members of other disciplines into the camp of political science, the future development of political science will be more rapid than its modest beginnings in the last decade would suggest. For, after a certain point, such attraction is by its very nature apt to be accelerative and to move by jumps; when it is a question of a system, it must be all or nothing.

This possibility must remain, for the time being, mere speculation. But there is solid evidence that the present exponents of political science have a lively consciousness of what needs to be done, and that they are pressing on with researches designed to contribute to a theoretical understanding of the political process. This does not mean that they are all building systems. They are not; indeed, it is a matter of complaint by some philosophically-minded political scientists that no one is attempting a systematic theory. The French political scientists have, on the whole, an empirical conception of their task, a conception which requires a long period of concentrating on specific researches before the material is adequate for a theoretical system.

Apart from the substantial amount of research still being carried on in the faculties of philosophy (which has recently produced notable studies of such political thinkers as Hobbes and Rousseau) and in the faculties of law (which accounts for many studies of institutions) and in history (which provides numerous studies in international relations), the newer work which is conceived as political science is concentrated in a few fields: political parties, the electoral process, public administration (particularly in relation to the economic functions of the government), and foreign politics and international relations.

The Association Française de Science Politique is engaged in research in three main directions: (1) The economic and social functions of government. In this field, two particular things are being studied—social elections (elections to the Social Security organizations and to the Comités d'Entreprise) compared to political elections; and the structure and exercise of power within national enterprises. (2) The basis and determinants of foreign policy. (3) The functioning of political institutions, embracing a group of studies on the functioning of parliament. The Fondation Nationale is conducting researches on the foreign relations of the Soviet Union, on the functioning of democracy in the Federal Republic of Germany, and on the Saar (an area study), as well as some detailed studies in French public administration. The Institut d'Études Politiques of the University of Paris is conducting an extensive research program on the foundations of French foreign policy. This will take the form of a series of researches into the factors which bear on the decisions made by the politicians and diplomats, and will extend to investigations of the recruitment of those who make the decisions, of economic influences, and of the influences of public opinion, religion, and tradition. It is intended to apply not only the historical method of analysis, but also such quantitative methods as are applicable, and direct interview methods. It is evident that in both its approach and its method, this program of research is typical of the new conception of empirical political science, moving from a single problem back into the investigation of many factors—social, economic, political, and organizational—which are assumed to have a direct bearing on the particular political process in question.

The same Institut is also organizing other research on the political process: the influence of parties on the formation of public opinion, social groups and public opinion, and methods of analysis of parties and interest groups. Several researches into problems of foreign politics and international relations are being conducted by the Centre d'Études de Politique Étrangère.

All the research projects mentioned so far are group researches, planned by a research institute and carried out by a research group, often including advanced postgraduate students. To complete the picture, one must add the research being done by individual scholars; indeed, all the group research is in a sense only an adjunct of their work as individuals, and it is largely owing to their initiative that the group work has been developed. Thus the research for which French political science is now best known is that which has been developed by a few leading scholars, such as that on the relation of social classes and structure to the political process by M. Aron, on political parties by M. Duverger, and on the electoral process by M. Goguel.

Other Western European Countries. Information on political science research in progress in institutions in other European countries is, at the time of writing, too fragmentary to permit an adequate description or analysis. It is, however, sufficient to warrant the general assertion that in most Western European countries the position from which political science has to develop, if it is to develop at all, is similar to that outlined for France, and that progress towards a political science independent of law and philosophy is less noticeable elsewhere than in France.

Western Germany and Italy are special cases, in that their scholars were confronted, when scholarship was again possible after 1945, with the task of exploring the possibilities of various institutional forms which might be established for their restored democratic regimes, and of reconsidering the basic values of liberal democracy. Consequently, rather more attention than usual has been given on the one hand to political structure and on the other to ideology and political philosophy. The overriding problem of political life in these countries has been the total reconstruction of democratic government, and early in this process opinions as to how it ought to be done became divided more or less along party lines. Scholars as well as politicians were moved by the urgency of getting their views expressed. Hence much of the writing on political affairs has been as much polemical as scientific.

In Germany, however, there is now a notable development of institutes of political research, employing empirical and often quantitative methods, and mainly investigating aspects of the electoral and representative process. A partial list of the subjects of these researches, all dealing primarily with German phenomena, indicates the trend: the membership structure of German parties; the efficacy of political propaganda; electoral sociology (of specific regions); the influence of parties and social forces on the legislature, the government, the bureaucracy, and the judiciary; the Berlin elections of 1950; the techniques of public opinion formation in the Soviet zone; the composition and functioning of parliamentary groups. There is also some analysis of the scope and method of political science and some critique of postwar German literature in politics and related fields; a valuable work on this, surveying the philosophical and ideological trends of the last two or three years, has been prepared by the German scholar, A.R.L. Gurland, in his capacity as foreign consultant to the (U.S.) Library of Congress (Political Science in Western Germany, Thoughts and Writings 1950-1952, published by the Library of Congress, Washington, 1952).

5. Latin America

The available information about political science research in Latin America is not sufficient to establish any trends since the position outlined in the papers on Argentina, Brazil, Mexico, and Uruguay, in Contemporary Political Science. Of the researches in progress reported from research institutions, three deal with political doctrine or the history of political ideas, two are comparative studies of government and legislation, two are on municipal government and one on federalism, and two deal with political parties.

6. Eastern Europe

Although little information is available on current political science in the Soviet Union and the "new democracies" of Eastern Europe, a brief note on the main characteristics of political science there may be of value by way of contrast to the position in the West.

Because of the post-revolutionary nature of these states, and to the extent that their revolutions were made or consolidated by Marx-Lenin-Stalin theory, the lines of development of political science are strikingly different from those familiar elsewhere. The Marxist principle that theory should be a guide to action, and action the test of theory, is fundamental to the conception of social and political science in those countries. There is room, within the framework of Marxist political theory, for many different tentative interpretations of political phenomena and problems, but there is no room, in the countries of the Marxist revolution, for any basic conception of political science other than the one just stated. The result is that when new political phenomena give rise to new theoretical problems, they are discussed by the academic political scientists with a view to contributing to a decision which it is known will be made, and will be made politically. After a period of academic analysis and argument (which will be longer or shorter depending on the political urgency of the problem), a political lead is given, by the party, and a general theory is established as authoritative. Such were, for instance, the stages by which the present Soviet theory concerning the "people's democracies" was established.

The fundamental difference between this kind of political science and the Western kind follows from the Marxist concept of the role of theory, in conjunction with the fact that the state is able to implement the theory. In the countries of the Marxist revolution, the state (or party) can change any political institution swiftly, and will do so whenever the need is demonstrated and the problem has been more or less fully canvassed theoretically. Theoretical analysis is therefore understood to be a prelude to effective action. This gives it the vigor and consistency which flow from a sense of purpose, and which is possible where fundamental values are no longer in question, while it imposes limits which would be intolerable to those who believe that the individual must be left free to make fundamental value decisions.

III. PROGRESS, SHORTCOMINGS, AND DIFFICULTIES IN THE PRESENT STAGE OF POLITICAL SCIENCE RESEARCH

It is apparent from the foregoing survey and analysis that political science is in a stage of transition and of some uncertainty in most of the countries where it is, or is becoming, a scholarly discipline in its own right. That its practitioners are, in general, aware of this—sometimes acutely aware of it—is, if not an evidence of progress, at least a sine qua non of progress. That much remains to be done will not be disputed by anyone familiar with the field. No attempt need be made here to list the particular lacunae in political science research in the different countries; many are apparent from the analysis just concluded. The more important problem is to discover what shortcomings there are in the main trends in most countries, and what difficulties are inherent in the kind of research revealed in those trends.

The dominant trend, in the political scientists' conception of their task, and in the sort of questions they set themselves, is clear enough. There is an increasing amount of more strictly empirical research, of which much, though not all, is being done with a sense of the need for a systematic general theory. Underlying this development is an uneasiness about the adequacy of existing political knowledge and existing political science methods.

The shortcomings of this trend must be judged by some criterion, and its difficulties (beyond the most superficial ones) must be discovered in confronting the inherent nature of the research with the criterion of the science. What criterion, then, are we to use? A decision can perhaps be reached by elimination.

1. One might say that political science research falls short of what might be expected of a political science, to the extent that it has not yet produced a systematic theory verified by practice. But to say this is to conceive political science too closely in the image of a natural science. Except perhaps for political science in the Marxist countries, where theory and practice are made interdependent, the test of practice is not available for the theories that political science research can produce.

2. Lessening the requirement, one might say that political science research falls short wherever it has not produced a systematic theory which, although not actually able to be tested by practice, does explain, to the general satisfaction of the political scientists, all the most important political phenomena under one or a few principles. But this is no adequate criterion. For such a set of principles may be generally accepted by the scholars of a country for a considerable time and then come to be rejected by them, or be considered unsatisfactory. Such appears to be the case with the "pressure group" interpretation, so well entrenched until now in American political science, and with various juristic theories of the state in Europe. Indeed, in political science (as in the natural sciences) rejection of established general theories, and pursuit of fresh specific researches, may be a sign of greater advancement and scientific penetration than the existence of a generally accepted theory.

In the natural sciences, when a prevailing general theory is rejected it is usually because it is seen not to be able to bring an adequate range of new (or newly discovered) phenomena under its general laws. In the social sciences this may also be the reason sometimes, but here another motive operates and is probably the more important: that is, that the functioning political system, as it is presented by the established theory, is felt by the scholars to be less defensible morally than it was. This appears less often as a conscious judgment than as an underlying worry, but it is perceptible at present among the political scientists of most countries, who are, in this respect, reflecting the attitude of a broader section of opinion. The change results less from any change in prevailing moral standards than from changes in the social structure and social relations which set up new moral demands on democracy.

In other words, the new matter which the accepted political theory cannot accommodate is not simply new factual phenomena, but new moral problems which have been brought into existence by changed social relations. When this is so, the requirement for valid political science research is both fresh empirical inquiry and fresh philosophical thinking. It is scarcely necessary to establish that we are in such a period now.

3. In this view, the criterion by which the progress and shortcomings of political science research ought to be assessed is not whether it has produced a systematic theory, or even whether it aims at producing a systematic positive theory by building up empirical studies. It is, rather, whether either systematic theory or particular inquiries are being pursued with the requisite consciousness of the need to rethink a political philosophy adequate to the new moral problems posed by changes in society.

It is clear from the survey that political science in most countries is in or is approaching a stage of rejecting old principles and seeking new formulations which can be developed by empirical research. The requirements of empirical research are such as to put an emphasis on the mechanics of the phenomena, and on methods and techniques, and to subordinate, if not to extinguish, a conscious consideration of values. The great danger of the widespread efflorescence of empirical research is that it may take its distinction between positive and normative science to be more than a handy rule for preventing empirical research from being confused with value judgments in all its intermediate stages, and may make a fetish of positive political science. It is by no means clear that this danger has been avoided in current research.

The fundamental difficulty, therefore, of political science research in such a stage as the present is to keep a balance between either systematic or particular inquiries, on the one hand, and on the other, a political philosophy thought out in relation to a new set of social relations and problems. This is now becoming, and is likely for some time to be, the besetting difficulty of political science research. In the measure that the need for a new systematic positive theory of politics becomes the main preoccupation of political scientists, this difficulty will replace the hitherto prevailing difficulty which has attended empirical research, namely, the disposition of research to amass information for the sake of amassing information.

Still another difficulty is already evident and is likely to continue and even increase in strength: that research will be directed for thinly-veiled immediate pragmatic purposes. The amount of government-sponsored and government-directed research in political science already being done in some countries suggests that the most serious problem of political science research in liberal-democratic societies, now and in the years ahead, may be to avoid being used by governments for the manipulation of the political process at home or the furtherance of their purposes abroad.

PARTIES, PARTISANSHIP, AND PUBLIC POLICY IN THE PENNSYLVANIA LEGISLATURE

WILLIAM J. KEEFE

Pennsylvania College for Women

A significant result of the report "Toward A More Responsible Two-Party System"¹ has been the marked growth of interest in the American party system. It is nevertheless true that our knowledge about the way in which party systems function is far from complete. An area promising fruitful research and presenting many hypotheses susceptible of systematic inquiry is that of the role of party organizations in the legislative process.

I. THE ROLE OF PARTY IN POLICY FORMATION

It is the purpose of this article to examine the legislative role of political parties in the Pennsylvania General Assembly;² more precisely, to measure their influence in the formation of the state's public policies in one session of the legislature.³ The most recent completed session at the time of this study was that of 1951—the longest session in state history.

In order to evaluate the impact of party upon legislation, the concept of a "party vote" has been used. This is merely an operating definition by which to measure differences in party attitudes on questions subjected to roll-call votes on the floor. The assumption was made that the interests of the parties can be established best by analyzing the voting behavior of their membership. Questions to which partisan significance is attached will find the parties aligned against each other.

To provide a definite standard for measurement, it was decided to call a party-vote one in which at least 80 per cent of one party voted opposite 80 per cent or more of the other party. Thus, for example, a vote would be considered a party vote if 40 (or more) Democrats out of 50 voted "yea" on a question and, say, 80 (or more) out of 100 Republicans voted "nay." To establish the total number of instances in which the parties differed significantly on roll-call votes, a tabulation was also made of the number of votes in which majorities (50 per cent plus one) in both parties voted opposite each other.

¹ Committee on Political Parties of the American Political Science Association, "Toward A More Responsible Two-Party System," this REVIEW, Vol. 44 (Sept., 1950, Supp.).

² The Pennsylvania House of Representatives has 208 members; the Senate has 50. Republicans held large majorities in both houses in the 1951 session: 120 to 87 (one vacancy) in the House and 30 to 20 in the Senate.

³ For a study which considers this in the Illinois legislature, see William J. Keefe, "Party Government and Lawmaking in the Illinois General Assembly," Northwestern University Law Review, Vol. 47, pp. 55-71 (March, 1952). This article also examines the early study of this subject by A. Lawrence Lowell, "The Influence of Party upon Legislation in England and America," American Historical Association, Annual Report, 1901, Vol. I, pp. 321-543. Two other recent studies which examine party politics in Congress are Julius Turner, Party and Constituency: Pressures on Congress (Baltimore, 1951); and V. O. Key, Jr., Southern Politics in State and Nation (New York, 1949).

These standards were applied to all the roll-call votes of the 1951 session of the Pennsylvania legislature. There were 1,285 roll-call votes taken in the Senate and 1,330 in the House of Representatives. Tables I and II show how the

TABLE I. DISTRIBUTION OF 1951 SENATE SESSION ROLL-CALL VOTES ACCORDING TO PARTY VOTING BEHAVIOR

	Number	Percentage
Parties in Disagreement
Party Votes*	60	4.7
Party Majorities on Opposite Sides†	21	1.6
Parties in Agreement
Party Majorities on Same Side	155	12.1
Unanimous Agreement	1049	81.6
Total Roll-Call Votes	1285	100.0

* 80 per cent or more of one party voting opposite 80 per cent or more of other party.

† Majorities in each party opposite but less than 80 per cent cohesion.

votes were distributed in the Senate and the House in terms of the agreement and disagreement registered between the parties. Singularly important in Table I, which contains Senate data, are the two percentages showing the number of party votes and the number of votes in which there was complete agreement between the parties. The first is surprising because it is so small: only 60 (4.7 per cent) of the 1,285 roll-call votes taken in the Senate found as much as 80 per cent of one party opposing 80 per cent of the other party. The second percentage is noteworthy because it is so large: 1,049 (81.6 per cent) of all the roll calls were resolved unanimously.

TABLE II. DISTRIBUTION OF 1951 HOUSE SESSION ROLL-CALL VOTES ACCORDING TO PARTY VOTING BEHAVIOR

	Number	Percentage
Parties in Disagreement
Party Votes*	142	10.7
Party Majorities on Opposite Sides†	33	2.5
Parties in Agreement
Party Majorities on Same Side	228	17.1
Unanimous Agreement	927	69.7
Total Roll-Call Votes	1330	100.0

* 80 per cent or more of one party voting opposite 80 per cent or more of other party.

† Majorities in each party opposite but less than 80 per cent cohesion.

Also shown in Table I are two categories of votes which were neither party votes nor votes in which unanimous decisions resulted: those in which the party majorities either opposed each other or were on the same side. Thus, besides the 60 votes classified as party votes, there were an additional 21 votes in which party majorities opposed each other. Adding this figure to the first, it may be seen that there were only 81 roll-call votes (6.3 per cent) out of 1,285 in the Pennsylvania Senate in which Republican majorities opposed Democratic majorities. Obviously this is not a very significant amount of party conflict. Moreover, majorities in both parties were in agreement on 93.7 per cent of all the roll-call votes.

Table II contains the same type of data for the House of Representatives. There was more party voting in the House than in the Senate, and there were somewhat fewer unanimous roll calls, but the same general distribution is evident. Of 1,330 roll-call votes, 142 (10.7 per cent) were party votes.⁴ On another 33 roll-call votes the majorities of both parties were in opposition. In all, meaningful party divisions occurred on 13.2 per cent of the roll-call votes in the 1951 House. Conversely, the parties were in substantial agreement on the remaining 86.8 per cent, with 69.7 per cent being unanimous and 17.1 per cent having majorities in both parties on the same side.

The general conclusion to be drawn from these data is that in terms of their total number, the policy decisions which confronted the Pennsylvania legislature were mainly nonpartisan. Moreover, the tremendous number of unanimous votes which occurred is good evidence that most questions coming before the legislature not only have no significance for the parties but also have none for other large "interests", e.g., rural-urban or big city-outstate. Much of the job which state legislators set out to do every two years has little connection with the party label under which they were elected. There are, in fact, scores of bills transformed into public law each session which go through the legislative process without controversy of any sort.

However, the existence of this large amount of nonpartisanship in state legislation should not obscure the fact that there are very real interests of both parties in legislative matters and that many of the most important measures of the session are influenced by specific party attitudes and policies. This will be seen in the consideration of the various types of issues which gave rise to the 60 Senate and 142 House party votes.

II. PARTY ISSUES

One of the important characteristics of party voting in this session of the General Assembly was the large number of party votes which occurred on a relatively small number of subjects. The comparative frequency with which ⁴ The amount of party voting in the House, over that of the Senate, is not as great as it appears. Sixty of the 142 House party votes were on Democratic-sponsored resolutions to discharge committees from further consideration of bills. There was practically no debate on these and all were defeated in summary fashion by straight party votes.

party votes involved given subjects may be considered in Table III.⁵ Here it is useful to point out that the primary areas of disagreement between the parties on public policy questions involved matters of taxation, local government, labor relations, workmen's and unemployment compensation, reapportionment, and

TABLE III. THE SUBJECT MATTER OF PARTY ISSUES
IN THE 1951 GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Subject Matter	Senate		House
	No.	Per-centage	No.	Per-centage
Taxation	6	10.0	32	22.6
Local Government	15	25.0	20	14.0
Labor Relations	—	—	22	15.5
Workmen's and Unemployment Com- pensation	6	10.0	14	9.9
Questions of Procedure	9	15.0	4	2.8
Questions of Organization	1	1.7	10	7.0
State Government	2	3.3	8	5.7
Reapportionment	9	15.0	—	—
Aid to Business	1	1.7	4	2.8
Public Utilities	—	—	5	3.5
Public Assistance	—	—	4	2.8
Motions to Discharge Committees*	—	—	4	2.8
Loyalty Oath	—	—	3	2.1
Public Housing	1	1.7	2	1.4
Appointments	2	3.3	—	—
Miscellaneous	8	13.3	10	7.1
Total	60	100.0	142	100.0

* See footnote 5.

the state administration. Nearly 70 per cent of the party votes of both houses related in one way or another to the above subjects.

The subject most contentious for the parties in the 1951 session was that of a tax program. Note in Table III that 32 (22.6 per cent) of the 142 party votes in the House and six (10 per cent) of the the 60 in the Senate involved taxation. Thus, out of a total of 202 party votes in both houses, 38 (18.8 per cent) concerned the revenue policies of the state.

⁵ A problem of classification resulted when party votes might reasonably be placed in more than one category. For example, House Democrats—in the minority—sponsored a large number of resolutions to discharge bills from committee. In debate they contended that the vote to be taken in each instance was actually a vote on the bill itself, for it was only through this parliamentary procedure that it could be brought to the floor. Conversely, Republicans maintained that the vote on a motion to discharge a committee had no relation to the substantive merit of the bill, but rather was a move to circumvent proper committee action. All of these discharge motions were defeated in straight party votes. The question involved in classifying the subject matter of these votes lay in whether to call them party votes on a matter relating to the legislative process—the position of the committee system—or to consider them in terms of the substantive provisions of the bills. The rule used here was to classify them as discharge motions if at a later date they were reported to the floor (indicating approval by Republican committee majorities), but if never reported, to classify them according to the bills' provisions. It need hardly be observed that in all but a few cases the bills were never reported.

The second most controversial subject was legislation involving local governments: 15 (25.0 per cent) of the 60 Senate and 20 (14.0 per cent) of the 142 House party votes. Legislation pertaining to the field of labor relations brought 22 (15.5 per cent) party votes in the House. And bills to change the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act and the Unemployment Compensation Law involved, together, 14 (9.9 per cent) party votes in the House and six (10.0 per cent) in the Senate. There were eight (5.7 per cent) party votes in the House relating to the Administration and two on this subject in the Senate. Disputed in the Senate was the plan for redistricting Pennsylvania's congressional districts, and nine (15.0 per cent) party votes occurred as a result of Republican-Democratic differences on the question.

In evaluating the influence of party upon public policy, more than ordinary attention should be given to the fact that a large number of the party votes in both houses related to either organizational-period decisions—ten in the House and one in the Senate—or questions of legislative procedure—nine in the Senate and four in the House. Most of these had little or no effect upon the public policy decisions taken by the legislature.

Consider, for example, the ten party votes on questions of organization which developed in the House. One was on the election of the Speaker (the one Senate party vote in this category was similarly on the election of the President pro tem); the other nine occurred on Democratic amendments to change the House Rules. All of the proposed changes were concerned with the committee system, their general purpose being to increase the Democratic proportion of the membership on standing committees, to make public committee minutes, to reduce the power of committee chairmen, and to liberalize the rule under which committees may be discharged from consideration of bills referred to them.⁶ And all were defeated in straight party votes.

⁶ One of the proposed amendments took away the right of the chairmen of standing committees to vote except in the case of a tie vote. Under existing rules, the Speaker appoints both a chairman and a vice-chairman for each standing committee. Both have the right to vote, and they are in addition to the regular number of committee members. (Hence the majority party membership is greater than the party ratio in the House as a whole.) Another amendment provided that the committee ratio would have to be the same as the ratio in the House. Still another proposed change would have provided that any two committee members could request a roll-call vote in the committee, and that the minutes showing the vote would be "made available for public examination." To reduce the power of committee chairmen, an amendment provided that a majority of the members of a committee, two-thirds being present, could demand the immediate consideration of any bill or resolution which had been referred to the committee. Another proposed change advanced by the minority party provided that committee members could make public decisions taken in committee (although not what was said). The remaining important amendment would have reduced the number of votes required to discharge a committee from consideration of a bill from 105 to 85. (The Democratic membership was 87.)

The many party votes on questions of legislative procedure similarly had little direct effect on legislative products during the session. There were nine party votes in the Senate classified as relating mainly to procedural matters. All but two concerned motions,⁷ intermittently sponsored by both parties, to either recess or adjourn. For example, soon after the convening of the session, Republicans backed a resolution to adjourn for one month, contending that that amount of time was necessary for the Governor to get his program ready for submission to the legislature. It passed over Democratic opposition. Presumably to embarrass the Administration, Senate Democrats attempted to adjourn the General Assembly in June, although no tax program was even close to being adopted. Other resolutions offered from time to time for the purpose of either recessing or adjourning aroused like party controversy. The four House party votes in this category also were on recess and adjournment motions. Particularly opposed by House Democrats was a motion to recess the General Assembly from early October until after the November elections. Republican strategy, they contended, was to wait until after the elections to pass the tax measures. In nearly all cases, the procedural questions giving rise to party voting were tied up with party strategy, and their direct influence upon public policy was slight.

It will be instructive here to look more closely at the specific legislative areas of interest to (and influenced by) the parties. The number of party votes precludes examination of each one individually, but the more important and those which are representative will be considered.

Of leading importance, both quantitatively and qualitatively, were the party votes occurring on tax legislation. It was estimated at the beginning of the session that the General Assembly would have to raise a minimum of $120,000,000 in new revenue in order to provide for such things as a soldiers' bonus, teacher salary increments, and a civilian defense program; the first of these alone amounted to $60,000,000.⁸ The Governor's plan for raising this revenue centered in two tax measures, a one-half of one per cent personal income tax proposal and a bill to increase the corporate net income tax from four to five per cent. On these bills (chiefly on the flat income tax bill), and on other revenue proposals later offered in a "substitute package," occurred most of the 32 House party votes.

Tax measures which brought about party voting were caught up in many parliamentary maneuvers. Consider, for example, the six party votes in the House which related to Governor Fine's income tax bill. The Democrats first attempted to recommit it to committee for the purpose of holding a public hearing, voted against it on second reading, opposed it unanimously the first time it was up for final passage (and with some Republican assistance defeated it at this time), attempted to amend a reconsideration motion to provide for public hearings on the bill, voted against a motion for reconsideration, and after this motion passed, voted against it on final passage. It passed by a vote of 109-97, with only one Democrat voting for it.⁹ Brought out repeatedly as the chief objection of the Democrats to the income tax bill was the fact that it lacked the graduated features of the federal income tax.¹⁰

⁷ These two both came on challenges by Senate Democrats to rulings from the chair. On a day late in the session when the Senate was working beyond midnight, Senate Democrats attempted to have a "committee of three" appointed for the purpose of calling Western Union to ascertain the correct time. The presiding officer ruled, and was sustained in a party vote, that the legislative day had not changed and that the Senate could therefore continue with that day's calendar. Democrats also appealed the right of the presiding officer to vote on the ruling which he had made. His right to vote was sustained in another party vote.

⁸ Pittsburgh Post Gazette, January 1. 1951.

There was only one party vote in the House on the bill to increase the corporate net income tax. As provided in the original bill, the increase was from four to five per cent. The Democrats attempted to amend it to increase it to six per cent.

Another large group of party votes in the House, 17 altogether, occurred on a series of eight bills introduced late in the session as a "substitute package" of taxes, when it appeared the Senate might not pass the income tax bill. The exact questions involved in the party votes need not be recorded, although most of them came on Democratic attempts to amend the bills or to place them on the postponed calendar. This tax package involved the following: a bill to accelerate tax collection (to provide for collecting the first six months of corporate net income tax for 1953 in 1952);¹¹ a bill to apply a gross receipts tax to public transportation utilities; a bill to apply a gross premium tax to domestic and mutual insurance companies; a bill to tax the dividends received by Pennsylvania corporations having out-of-state subsidiaries; a bill to change the basis on which stock transfers are taxed; a bill to increase inheritance taxes, in most cases, from 10 to 20 per cent; a bill to impose a one per cent tax on real estate transfers; a bill to increase inheritance tax collections by sealing deposit boxes, upon death of boxholders, until their contents could be examined by the state Department of Revenue; and a bill similar to the preceding but relating to joint bank accounts. All of these passed over Democratic opposition. But even at the time of their passage, newspaper reports said that House Republicans hoped that the Senate would table them and pass instead the income tax bill.

⁹ Generally regarded as the strongest interest group in support of the income tax bill was the Pennsylvania State Education Society. According to the Democratic minority leader, Pennsylvania school teachers had been "deluded" by PSEA leadership into actively pressuring for it in the belief that a salary increase hinged on its passage.

¹⁰ An interesting insight into House-Senate relations dealing with the passage of the bill was that, following it, House Republicans moved to recommit the corporate net income tax bill to committee. In making this motion, the Republican majority leader noted that "Any program not including a broad base tax will of necessity involve more than an additional one per cent tax on corporate income." Since Senate Republicans least wanted this, there would be some pressure for them to accept the income tax bill.

¹¹ Most of the Democratic objection to the "package" centered on this bill. They contended that it was much more than a bill to accelerate collection, some of its provisions having the effect of greatly increasing corporation taxes. The Democratic minority leader held the view that it would bring in more revenue than the income tax bill. Generally, estimates were that it would bring in $61,000,000 in corporate net income taxes that would ordinarily be collected in the 1953 biennium. Actually the bill amounted to deferring resolution of the tax issue until the 1953 session. (In that session a sales tax was put through on party-line votes with 100 per cent of the Democrats in both houses opposing it.)

Other party conflicts on tax matters in the House concerned issues of less importance. Several may be briefly noted: a bill to increase the maximum per capita tax rate for school districts; a bill extending the right of certain subdivisions to levy a wage tax; a bill to provide that new residents of a district and those attaining the age of 21 must notify their tax assessors. Democrats opposed these bills, all amendatory, as well. One of the more interesting party controversies on the question of taxation concerned an attempt by the Democratic minority leader to get a resolution adopted to provide that the Assembly would pass appropriations for one year's operation instead of two, with a view to having the Governor call a special session in 1952 for the purpose of considering the budget problem. It failed, of course.

At no stage during its stay in the Senate did the Governor's income tax bill give rise to party voting. The 20 Democrats, as expected, opposed it unanimously, but so did 10 of the 30 Republicans—and this split assured its defeat. There were, however, six floor votes in the Senate in which Republicans and Democrats differed on tax matters. Five of the six were on the "package" of tax measures which the House sent over, namely, the bills to tax public transportation utilities, life insurance companies, and real estate transfers. As in the House, Democrats were consistent in their opposition to tax measures. The other tax party vote in the Senate came on Democratic opposition to a provision in the Civil Defense Act which they said did not place strong enough restrictions on the taxing power of authorities once an emergency had been declared.

Attention may now be given to the local government issues which brought about party voting. Ten of the 20 House party votes classified under "local government" related directly to the city of Philadelphia, as did 11 of the 15 Senate party votes. Specifically, seven of the ten party issues on Philadelphia in the House concerned legislation which transferred the power to appoint the members of Urban Redevelopment Authorities and Housing Authorities in cities of the first class (Philadelphia only) from city officials—principally the Mayor—to the Governor, and which increased the membership of these bodies from five to seven. Party voting on the two bills providing for these changes occurred for the most part on Democratic attempts to recommit the bills for the purpose of holding public hearings and to amend them, and of course on their final passage.¹² The primary argument used by the Democrats against the bills was that they violated home rule and insured Republican control—at the state level—of city functions. In party-line voting both bills passed the House but were lost when they failed to come out of committee in the Senate.

¹² The Democratic amendments which lost were the following: one which restored the power of the Mayor to appoint the members of the Urban Redevelopment Authority and kept the membership at five; one which restored the existing system of appointing the members of the Housing Authority—two members being appointed by the Mayor, two by the City Controller (a Democrat), with the fifth member chosen by the other four; and one which vested the power of appointing Housing Authority members in the Mayor alone (a Republican at that time) and reduced the number of members from seven to five.

In the Senate, nine out of the ten "local government" party votes occurred on one bill, introduced by a Republican Senator from Philadelphia, to abolish Philadelphia county offices and integrate their functions and duties into the city government.¹³ The bill was introduced shortly after the November election in which for the first time in sixty-eight years Democrats had won the city government (and also certain county offices). The specific feature of the consolidation bill which provoked the most controversy was that which affected the office of Sheriff, to which a Democrat had just been elected. The consolidation bill provided that the Sheriff would be appointed by the Philadelphia Board of (Common Pleas) Judges, and thus the newly-elected individual might lose his office. Democratic senators offered a number of amendments to the bill, all of which were defeated. They first attempted to give the City Council the power to provide for the office of Sheriff. When this was defeated, they offered successive amendments to give the power of appointment for this office to the Mayor, the Personnel Director, and the Commissioner of Records. Other similar amendments to the bill also lost. It eventually became acceptable to the Democrats when the sponsor had it amended to provide for a bipartisan commission to study the question and frame a supplement to the Home Rule Charter transferring and merging county offices. The same amendment deleted the provisions in the original bill which provided for immediate consolidation, and provided too that county officers elected in the last election would be permitted to serve out their terms.¹⁴

The other five party votes on local government legislation in the Senate concerned the following, all opposed by the Democrats: a bill to eliminate the eminent domain power of the city of Philadelphia to take land in adjoining counties for water supply purposes; a bill stipulating that one-half of the funds collected from water services by cities of the second class (Pittsburgh) would have to be used solely for maintenance and improvement of such water works; a bill to make it unlawful for cities of the first class (Philadelphia) to impose a wage tax on persons who are not residents of the city; and a bill to permit townships of the first class, by a vote of the township alone, to withdraw from a city within ten years after having been annexed.¹⁵

¹³ Constitutional amendments providing for this had been approved at the election.

¹⁴ Senate Democrats had earlier threatened to block all appropriation bills if the Republicans passed the bill as originally introduced. Appropriation bills require a two-thirds vote (34) of all members elected for passage in the Senate. Since there were only 30 Republicans, Democratic support was essential. This fact, incidentally, probably accounts for the scarcity of party votes on appropriation measures. Bipartisan support will nearly always be needed to pass an appropriation bill and it may be surmised that many bills lacking this simply do not come up for a vote.

¹⁵ A reading of the debate on the bill suggests that it would principally affect Scranton and its annexed 24th ward. The sponsor of the bill at no time advanced any reasons for its introduction. Speculation was that it was introduced at the request of former Democratic Additional party votes on local government bills in the House may be noted. As in the Senate, House Democrats opposed the bill to provide for township re-establishment. Pittsburgh Democrats got party backing in their opposition to a bill which placed detectives in the Pittsburgh police force in the competitive class of the civil service, but the bill passed. A particularly controversial bill was one which provided that no public employees in Pennsylvania, state or local, could be prevented from participating in political activities after working hours. The Philadelphia Inquirer editorially called it "the most cynical political measure attempted in this state in years," saying it might as well have been titled: "An Act to Force the Philadelphia Municipal Court Back Into Politics."¹⁶ The explanation for this is that several months earlier the President Judge of the Municipal Court had issued a directive forbidding political activity by court employees. The bill passed the House over Democratic opposition—and attempted amendments—but failed to get out of a Senate committee. House Democrats also voted against a bill which increased the number of judges of the Philadelphia Municipal Court.

The second most controversial subject for the parties in the House—in terms of the number of party votes—concerned the field of labor relations. Twenty-two party votes developed on legislation relating to this subject. Actually, however, there was comparatively little debate on them and all but one occurred on Democratic motions to discharge the Committee on Labor Relations from Democratic-sponsored labor bills.¹⁷ All of the motions lost on straight party votes.

Similarly, 12 of the 14 party votes in the House on workmen's and unemployment compensation came about on Democratic motions to force committees to report bills. One of the two votes which dealt with bills themselves concerned a Democratic amendment to a Republican-sponsored bill which had the effect of liberalizing the benefit payments under unemployment compensation.¹⁸ The other bill involved was one amending employer liability laws. In partyofficeholders in the township who wanted to get back in power, or that the Republican party in Scranton wanted to see the township withdraw from the city since it had a preponderant Democratic registration. Altogether, there were three party votes on the bill in the Senate. It is interesting that the Governor vetoed it although its passage was due almost entirely to Republican votes in both houses.

¹⁶ Legislative Journal, June 25, 1951, p. 3465.

¹⁷ Representative of these bills are the following: bills to forbid employers from charging prospective employees fees for medical examinations, to amend the Labor Anti-Injunction Act, to require certain factories to employ a physician and a nurse, to eliminate the right of an employer to request an election, to prohibit discrimination in employment on account of age, to permit employees to leave work for a period up to two hours without loss of pay in order to vote, to prohibit the working of women for more than six consecutive days without at least one day of rest, and to provide that one member of the Pennsylvania Public Utility Commission shall be a representative of organized labor.

¹⁸ The effect of the amendment was to place compensation on a day-base plan. More employees who work less than a full week would be eligible for benefits. The major Pennsylvania labor unions had endorsed the amendment.

line voting (with many Republicans not voting), Democrats succeeded in amending the bill to broaden the coverage of the occupational disease provisions of the law.¹⁹ The 12 party votes on motions to discharge committees concerned a variety of subjects.²⁰ Senate Democrats also attempted to broaden the coverage of workmen's and unemployment compensation. In straight party votes they lost on amendments to bills to include civilian defense volunteers under the coverage of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and also on similar House and Senate bills which provided for disability benefits for policemen and firemen contracting heart or respiratory diseases.

The 1950 census reduced Pennsylvania's delegation in Congress from 33 to 30 and made it necessary for the 1951 General Assembly to draw up a reapportionment plan (unless all 30 were to be elected at large). In order to get the most favorable plan, Senate Democrats took the position of not giving the necessary votes to pass House appropriation bills until party differences on the reapportionment bill could be worked out.²¹ The result of this decision was that there were nine party votes in the Senate on House appropriation bills which the Democrats unanimously opposed. When the parties later agreed to the reapportionment bill, the appropriation bills passed without dissent. They had been controversial only because they formed a part of the Democrats' legislative strategy on reapportionment.

Six of the eight party votes in the House on the subject of "state government" were on Democratic motions to require committees to report certain measures.²² The other two occurred on bills which provided for the appointment of legislators to certain administrative commissions. The Democrats attempted to amend the bills to provide that both parties would be represented in the appointments. On another matter of state administration, Senate Democrats lost when they tried to force the Committee on Agriculture to discharge a bill abolishing the Pennsylvania Milk Control Commission.

Some of the other party votes illustrative of the differing interests of the ¹⁹ It made any total disability or death which could be traced to silicosis compensable; prior to the amendment the disability or death had to be due solely to silicosis. A Republican opponent of the amendment contended that this would practically give health insurance to miners. Democrats pointed out that the courts had frequently not upheld claims for compensation because of the "solely" provision.

²⁰ Some of the objectives of these bills may be noted: to increase benefits, to increase the periods in which claims may be made, to further define "unemployment," to increase the compensation paid to illegally employed minors, and to change the law regarding allowance for dependents.

²¹ As stated before, 34 votes are needed in the Senate to pass appropriation bills and there were only 30 Republicans.

²² Among them were the following: a bill to increase the overtime pay of state employees; a resolution providing for the Joint State Government Commission to study the functioning of the administrative departments and make recommendations for reorganizing in order to achieve greater economies; a bill to create a new state agency, the Pennsylvania Consumer Commission; and bills to require that the Workmen's Compensation Board, the State Welfare Commission, and the State Board of Public Assistance each have a representative of organized labor. As in nearly all party votes, the Democrats lost on the resolutions.

parties may be noted. All of the following were Republican sponsored (and opposed by the Democrats): a bill to create a State Apple Board to promote the consumption of Pennsylvania apples; a bill to provide that increased amounts of sulphur dioxide could be used in the preparation of certain canned foods; a bill to help protect the Pennsylvania trout hatchery business by requiring restaurants serving imported trout to label the country of origin on the menu (also a controversial bill in the 83rd Congress); a bill which strengthened the state's right to secure repayment from property left by deceased public assistance recipients; a bill having the effect of decreasing the authority of county boards of assistance and giving more power to the state Department of Public Assistance; a bill to provide that public housing projects could not be started unless approved by the "interested electorate"—voters living near the proposed site; and a bill which provided additional exceptions to compulsory school attendance.

Other party votes of interest occurred on issues such as these: a Democratic-sponsored amendment to increase the appropriation to the Western Psychiatric Institute, operated by the University of Pittsburgh; three amendments offered by House Democrats to the "loyalty oath" bill;²³ a Republican resolution to hold future inaugural ceremonies in the State Farm Show Building, instead of on the Capitol steps (the Democratic minority leader thought that there should continue to be "simplicity" in such ceremonies); and a Republican bill to prohibit individuals from advertising for matrimonial purposes, and outlawing the commercial conduct of matrimonial agencies. The introduction of this last bill followed a "lonely hearts" murder; a reading of the debate which took place fails to disclose why a bill like this should develop into a party issue.

The relative infrequency of party voting and the issues at stake in it have been shown. Although only a comparatively small number of the total number of votes followed party lines, it is nevertheless true that a high proportion of these were on significant questions of public policy. But it should also be pointed out that there were many other important measures, of equal concern to the public, which were settled on lines other than those of party.

Many major legislative proposals passed the 1951 legislature with the support of majorities of both parties. Among them were bills such as these: to increase substantially teachers' salaries; to outlaw the Communist party and other subversive groups; to increase truck weight limits; to authorize the sale of precolored oleomargarine; to provide for annual sessions of the legislature and absentee voting for war veterans through constitutional amendments; to create a "home rule" system of public health administration; and to extend the merit system in certain areas of state administration. And a number of measures such as the "loyalty oath" bill and the civil defense bill, which in their early stages were the object of considerable disagreement between the parties, eventually passed both houses with bipartisan support.

²³ The main effects of these amendments would have been to place public school teachers on the same basis as teachers in state-supported colleges and universities with respect to their meeting the bill's requirements, and to change the oath provision to the same as the one taken by the legislators. On final passage, majorities in both houses supported the bill: 97 per cent of the House Republicans and 79 per cent of the Democrats, 100 per cent of the Senate Republicans and 63 per cent of the Democrats.

Also, many bills of far-reaching significance were lost in the session in actions unrelated to party policies or positions: for example, bills to change the formula under which the state reimburses school districts; to bring public utility employers and employees engaging in urban transportation under the provisions of the Compulsory Arbitration Act (called by opponents an "anti-strike" bill); to strengthen child-adoption laws (one of the most controversial issues in recent legislatures); to provide for local referendums on the question of Sunday evening entertainment (now prohibited); and to provide for the licensing and regulation of chiropractors. The point is made that many proposals of wide concern to the public, and having bearing on many groups within the commonwealth, are either adopted or defeated in votes in which the parties take no stand.

III. THE PARTY AS AN INTEREST GROUP

Consideration has been given in the preceding pages to the types of policy issues which were of concern to the parties. One of their most significant features is that a rather substantial number of them can be traced to the legislative party organizations' acting in the capacity of pressure groups, advancing and opposing legislation and other legislative matters primarily on the basis of their effect upon the party organizations. In this respect, they hardly differ from the National Association of Manufacturers, the CIO, or the American Legion. As in the case of pressure groups, they are desirous of getting legislation favorable to their group and of blocking measures which are counter to the interests of the party organization—both in and out of the legislature. Viewed from another standpoint, many of the decisions taken (on which party votes ensued) affected the Pennsylvania public in only the most indirect fashion, while their primary impact was upon the parties.

This can be illustrated by calling attention to some of the party vote issues in which the chief interest to be served was that of the party (the number of party votes is indicated in parentheses): the bills to transfer the power to appoint members of the Philadelphia Urban Redevelopment Authority and the Housing Authority from city officials (including the Democratic Controller) to the Governor (7); the bill expressly aimed at permitting Philadelphia Municipal Court employees to engage in political activities after working hours (2); the Philadelphia city-county consolidation bill, as originally introduced, in which Republicans and Democrats differed on what should happen with the Sheriff's office—to which a Democrat had just been elected—(9);²⁴ the bill relating to township re-establishment after annexation and aimed particularly at Scranton and its 24th ward (4); the appropriation bills caught up in Democratic strategy on reapportionment (9); Senate Democratic opposition on the Governor's appointments because of a long-standing feud with his Attorney General (2);²⁵ and Democratic attempts to insure that their party, as well as the majority, would be represented in appointments to certain administrative commissions (2). And a good case could be made for classifying the eleven organizational-period party votes as of predominant concern only to the party organizations;²⁶ similarly, the thirteen procedural questions—most of which involved adjournment or recess—were controversial mainly because of party strategy designed in some way to serve party interests. By conservative estimate, at least one-fourth of the party votes of the session may be traced to the "interest" politics of the party organizations.

²⁴ The original Republican version provided for appointment of the Sheriff by the Board of Judges. The Common Pleas Judges later held a meeting and asked to be "taken out of politics." The point is not made here that city-county consolidation would not be in the "public interest," as opposed to the "party interest," but that the original provisions of the consolidation plan, coming after the city election won by the Democrats, were at variance with the best interests of Philadelphia Democrats. This fact appears clearly in the Senate debate. Legislative Journal, December 13, 1951, p. 6202.

CONCLUSION

There would seem to be five major understandings relative to the role of political parties in the Pennsylvania legislature which have been given an empirical validity in this study:

1. Nonpartisanship is much more in evidence than partisanship in the formation of the public policies of the state of Pennsylvania. Most of the decisions taken on the floor in the General Assembly are unanimous.²⁷ In the Senate unanimous roll-call votes amounted to 81.6 per cent of all those taken; in the House the percentage was 69.7.

2. In terms of the influence of party in policy formation, it was found that on only 4.7 per cent of the Senate roll-call votes and 10.7 per cent of the House votes were the parties substantially aligned against each other.²⁸ Moreover, a ²⁵ Undoubtedly the biggest party issue in the first part of the session concerned the Attorney General, who had first received his appointment under the previous Administration. Governor Fine contended that the Attorney General could serve without Senate confirmation until the end of the session. Party voting occurred when Senate Democrats blocked other appointments because they were not allowed to vote on confirmation of the Attorney General. Eventually the stalemate was resolved when he resigned. According to newspaper accounts, Democratic bitterness was traced to 1938 when the same individual, Attorney General under the Democratic Earle Administration, brought about a grand jury investigation of the Administration.

²⁶ Of course, the public is affected too if on the outcome of these particular decisions rested better or worse, more responsible or less responsible state government; but to trace such effects to the proposed rules changes which were the subject of these party votes would be difficult indeed.

²⁷ A partial explanation for this high degree of unanimity is the constitutional provision that no bill can become law or no resolution be adopted without a roll-call vote on final passage. Thus, the great number of bills of minor character (many of them amendatory) which are introduced and passed each session receive at least one floor roll-call vote even though no opposition to them has developed at any stage in the legislative process.

²⁸ It is true, of course, that the role of party in the legislative process extends beyond that which can be shown by the analysis of membership voting behavior on the floor. Certain party operations do not readily lend themselves to statistical measurement; for example, the party contribution to organizing the legislature, formulating its rules of opera-noticeable number of these votes concerned organizational and procedural matters or party strategy—rather than questions of state law—and their chief consequence was for the party organizations, not the public. Pennsylvania's laws are chiefly the result of bipartisan votes in the legislature.

3. There are, notwithstanding, important policy areas in which there are significant differences in the party positions. These are relatively few in number, however, and in the 1951 session were to be found mainly on the subjects of taxation, local government (particularly Philadelphia's), labor relations, workmen's and unemployment compensation, reapportionment, and the state administration. Relatively clear-cut party differences on legislation involving these areas appeared and, on the basis of one session's data, are indicative of the major principles and policies which separate the parties in state politics. Indeed, real differences are apparent, but it is impossible to know, at this point, how much they can be attributed to (a) party principles consistent over a period of time, or (b) in-party—out-party tactics which develop because one party is the majority, and responsible for state policy, and the other is the minority, and not responsible.

4. To the extent that the data of one session permit generalization, it may be said that the questions of public policy of most interest to the parties, and the ones on which they are most likely to divide, are economic in character: taxation, labor relations, workmen's and unemployment compensation, public assistance, and public housing.

5. Suggested in the study—and a concept the importance of which warrants additional investigation—is the belief that one of the strongest interest groups operating in and upon the legislature is the party organization itself. Many legislative decisions have the primary purpose of furthering party ends, and the public interest, while it need not be opposite to that of party, is only of incidental concern.

tion, providing its leadership, assuming responsibility for the conduct of government, and, in the case of the minority party, clarifying policy, suggesting alternatives, and providing a check on the party in power.

It should also be pointed out that voting which took place in the committees of the legislature is not considered in this study. Aside from the task which would be involved in recording and analyzing committee voting, it would be impossible anyway in Pennsylvania, since committee records are not open to public examination. In any event, there is reason to believe that there is no important difference in the amount of party voting which takes place in committee as compared to that on the floor. The chief power residing with the majority party in committee is to refuse to report bills and resolutions which it opposes. However, any bill that is of real importance to the minority party can be made the subject of a discharge motion and a roll-call vote will have to be taken on it on the floor, thus indicating the attitudes of the parties on the bill. The Democrats offered numerous discharge motions in the 1951 session. The point of this is that party attitudes which would go undetected because of committee secrecy are brought to light on the floor through attempts—nearly always unsuccessful—to force committees to report bills.

FLORIDA'S NEW CAMPAIGN EXPENSE LAW AND THE 1952 DEMOCRATIC GUBERNATORIAL PRIMARIES*

ELSTON E. ROADY

Florida State University

Efforts by various states to regulate effectively the use of money in political campaigns have heretofore left ample loopholes for determined politicians. Florida has attempted to plug the loopholes with a revised election code which has become popularly known as "The Who Gave It—Who Got It Law."¹ Informed political observers in the Sunshine State are in agreement that in the 1952 Democratic gubernatorial primaries the new law gave an accurate accounting of monies.

Florida, like other states, has a number of economic interests which in the past have been associated with unreported contributions and expenditures in political campaigns, notably racing (both horse and dog), liquor, and corporations holding public utility franchises.² By early 1951, Floridians, having had more than a fair share of adverse publicity concerning tie-ins between gangsters and politicians, were eager to guard against such tie-ins in the future. The Florida voter felt that the existing law did not effectively regulate campaign financing, and demanded effective regulation.³

Another factor in Florida's desire for a new approach to the regulation of money in elections was the generally accepted belief that the old law simply was not honored. An eminently respectable candidate told a reporter following his defeat in the Democratic nominating primary of 1948: "Rather than lying about it [total expenditures], I just didn't file the final statement [required by the old law]. The only penalty was disqualification from holding the office, and I'd already lost the election."⁴

Aware of the heavy undisclosed contributions during the 1948 Democratic gubernatorial campaign, and of the extensive outlay of money in the United States Democratic senatorial primary race in 1950 (George Smathers vs. Claude Pepper), members of the 1951 Florida General Assembly convened at

* The writer acknowledges the cooperation of Secretary of State R. A. Gray, Mr. W. P. Bevis, Mr. Milton Folds, and Mrs. W. E. Glisson of the Elections and Commissions Division of the Secretary of State's office, and the Statutory Revision Department of the Attorney General's office.

¹ Chapter 26819 (Senate Bill No. 8), Acts of 1951, Laws of Florida.

² Such associations were noted in the hearings before the Kefauver committee at Miami and Tampa.

³ General public knowledge of these "tie-ins" came from the Kefauver hearings at Miami and Tampa and the reaction was one of high indignation. The Florida electorate had also been informed after the 1948 election of large financial contributions made to the successful candidate for governor. In this instance one of the three most widely publicized contributors was a Chicago and Florida race track owner and a long-time associate of the Capone gang.

⁴ Quoted in Freedman, "Two '48 Campaigns Put Spotlight On Excessive Expenditures; 1951 Legislature May Draft Some Curb," St. Petersburg Times pamphlet (1951).

Tallahassee intent on making a thorough-going study and revision of the existing election code.⁵ Representative Charles E. Shepperd of St. Augustine, a veteran member of the State House of Representatives and a member of its Elections Committee which considered the proposed new election campaign expense law, said that it was designed to "help clean up a political stench that rises to high heaven." He also said that the law had been drafted with the intent of "helping to keep elections from being bought by an open-handed, last minute expenditure of money, as has been done in the past."⁶ In an opinion of September 25, 1951, the Florida Attorney General stated: "There may be those who consider that compliance with the provisions of Section 99.161 will be burdensome; nevertheless, it is recognized that the Legislature in enacting the law has sought to cure evils obvious to informed people."

The law as eventually passed in 1951 was a serious effort at preventing corrupt practices in Florida elections, with special emphasis on campaign finances.⁷ The revised Florida election code is the first comprehensive attempt to adjust state regulation of campaign finances to the facts of contemporary political life. It recognizes the impossibility of putting limits on total expenditures for public office but demands adequate publicity of all expenditures and all contributions, including services in lieu of cash contributions.⁸ And, while permitting unlimited expenditures, it limits individual contributions to $1,000.⁹ It also imposes responsibility on each person involved in the financial process—donor, treasurer or deputy treasurer, and candidate.¹⁰ The law requires a type of publicity which keeps before the electorate an up-to-date account of all monies involved in the political race so that before the citizen votes he knows the exact amount received by all candidates, the contributors and amount contributed by each, and the total expenditures and kinds of expenditures made by the candidate.¹¹ It also requires that all monies go through a treasurer's hands, be deposited in a designated bank depository, and be accounted for by the treasurer within twenty-four hours of initial receipt.¹²

The new law, in attempting to prevent contributions from sources which are ⁵ The St. Petersburg Times had conducted a campaign of educating Florida citizens and especially the members of the Legislature on the need for a new approach to the control of money in elections. For the full story of the Times' methods see their publication "Who Gave It—Who Got It?." Special mention must be made of Morty Freedman, one of their political reporters. Mr. Freedman has been most generous in supplying information to the writer.

⁶ Florida Times-Union, Dec. 21, 1951.

⁷ The revised code, termed the Dayton-Andrews bill (Senator Dayton was Chairman of the Elections Committee, while Representative Andrews was a long-time student of the Florida election code), passed the House by a vote of 49-30 and the Senate by a 30-6 margin, after having been defeated on a voice vote.

⁸ Compilation of the Election Laws of the State of Florida (Tallahassee: Secretary of State and Statutory Revision Department of Attorney General's office, 1951, pamphlet), Section 99.161(4)(a)(7).

⁹ Ibid., Section 99.161(2).

¹⁰ Ibid., Section 99.161(1)(a)(b)(c), (3), (4), (7).

¹¹ Ibid., Section 99.161(8).

¹² Ibid., Section 99.161(7).

suspect, prohibits "any contribution of any nature to any political party or to any candidate for nomination for, or election to, political office in the State of Florida," by:

1. Those persons holding a horse or dog racing permit or any persons with a vested economic interest in horse or dog racing.
2. Those persons holding a license for the sale of intoxicating beverages or any persons with a vested economic interest in same; and,
3. Persons operating a public utility subject to grant of franchise or regulation by the state or any persons with a vested economic interest in same; however, persons who are members of non-profit cooperative corporations operating public utilities are exempt from this prohibition.¹³

All candidates, save those running for municipal offices, are subject to the revised law.¹⁴

Efforts to regulate campaign finance are bound to be meaningless unless stringent penalties are attached and enforced.¹⁵ The penalties provided for in the Florida revised election code include the possibility of conviction for commission of a misdemeanor or felony, citation for contempt, revocation of charter or permit, and the loss of commission to office.¹⁶

Although the three leading contenders for the Democratic nomination for governor in 1952 (tantamount to election in Florida) all expressed a desire to follow both the spirit and the letter of the new law and heartily endorsed its general objective,¹⁷ a serious threat to the Florida effort arose in November, 1951, when the "Who Gave It—Who Got It?" section of the code (99.161) was challenged as being a denial of freedom of speech and of the press.

This challenge was initiated by a Tallahassee attorney, J. Kenneth Ballinger, who asked Attorney General Richard W. Ervin, in effect, if it were permissible for a private citizen to purchase newspaper space or radio time for his favorite candidate without that candidate's knowledge. The Attorney General advised that since such expenditures were within the meaning of the revised law "any such expenditures made must be paid in pursuance of the procedure set forth in the law," and that "neither a newspaper nor a broadcasting company may lawfully accept any money from a citizen for the purposes and under the circumstances" described in the question. Mr. Ervin added: "Nothing in this answer is to be construed as limiting the full right of any citizen freely to express himself concerning any candidate, short of the expenditure of funds or incurring of expenses for such purposes."¹⁸

¹³ Ibid., Section 99.161(1)(a)(b)(c).

¹⁴ Ibid., Section 99.161(10).

¹⁵ "The penalty provisions for its [the new election campaign expense law] violation, as set forth in Section 104.27, are so drastic in relation to a person's candidacy that, in the absence of court construction, extreme caution should be observed in arriving at the meaning and intent of its provisions." Opinion of Florida Attorney General, Sept. 25, 1951.

¹⁶ Chapter 26819, Acts of 1951, Laws of Florida, Section 104.27.

¹⁷ J. Wesley Fly (candidate McCarty's campaign treasurer) to R. A. Gray, Oct. 29, 1951; J. Brailey Odham (candidate) to R. A. Gray, Oct. 19, 1951; and Alto Adams (candidate) to R. A. Gray, Nov. 14, 1951.

¹⁸ Opinion of Florida Attorney General, Nov. 30, 1951.

Shortly after this opinion was given, the editor of the Calhoun County Record of Blountstown brought suit in behalf of many Florida weekly newspapers contending that the law restrained him in his free right to publish a newspaper and was therefore a violation of the constitutionally guaranteed freedom of the press. Circuit Judge Ira A. Hutchison of Panama City upheld his contention.¹⁹

In the meantime the owner of radio station WPLA at Plant City brought suit contesting the constitutionality of the law on the grounds that it violated both freedom of the press and freedom of speech. In this case Circuit Judge Henry Tillman of Tampa held that the law did not violate either guarantee.²⁰ An early decision by the Florida Supreme Court to resolve the issue was made impossible when Mr. Ballinger, busily engaged in campaigning for the Florida House of Representatives, asked for and was granted additional time in which to prepare his brief. As a result of this extension it was not until September 30, 1952 that the case was argued before the Supreme Court.

Mr. Ballinger contended that the constitutional rights of his clients were abridged by provisions of the election code which required all advertising and radio time purchases to be cleared through a candidate's campaign treasurer. He said that such a requirement is an "unconstitutional restraint" on the citizen who wants to buy advertising in behalf of a candidate or speak over the radio for his favorite nominee. He further argued that the law would not permit a newspaper owner to mail out extra copies of papers containing an editorial favoring a candidate, print or distribute handbills, hire a hall, rent sound equipment, or "take advantage of the mechanical aids of free speech" without prior authorization from the candidate or his representative. He concluded by insisting that this provision of the law amounted to previous license and censorship, both of which had been repeatedly held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.²¹

The attorneys for the State denied that the law prohibited any citizen from purchasing radio or newspaper advertising space, and contended that it merely required that they do so through the authorized agent of the candidate, the campaign treasurer. They pointed out that there was no "inherent" right of a citizen to buy radio time or newspaper space and that the right of a publisher or broadcaster to reject advertising or talking time had been sustained in the courts. The attorneys insisted that to strike down this section of the new code would defeat the intent of the legislators and make it impossible for the Florida citizen to learn "who gave it and who got it."²² The Court held on March 17, 1953, by a vote of four to two, that the 1951 law requiring all campaign expenditures to clear through a candidate's treasurer and to be strictly accounted for was a constitutional exercise of the police power of the state.²³

Even though the law had been challenged and the case was before the courts, ¹⁹ Finlay v. Ervin, 1 Fla. Supp. 198.

²⁰ Smith v. Ervin, 1 Fla. Supp. 202.

²¹ St. Petersburg Times, Oct. 1, 1952.

²² Ibid.

²³ Smith v. Ervin, 64 So. 2d 166.

the 1952 gubernatorial campaign, in compliance with the revised code, saw more publicity concerning campaign finances than ever before in the state. Each week the Secretary of State's office was flooded with the official reports containing detailed accounts of contributions and expenditures. Of the five Democratic candidates for governor, two together polled only 18,079 of a total of 738,479 votes. An analysis of the official reports of these two candidates would not be useful. Table I shows the total expenditures, vote received, and the cost per vote for the three leading Democratic contenders in Florida's first gubernatorial primary, May 6, 1952. For the first time we learned from official

TABLE I. TOTAL EXPENDITURES, TOTAL VOTE, AND COST PER VOTE OF THE THREE LEADING DEMOCRATIC CONTENDERS IN FLORIDA'S FIRST GUBERNATORIAL PRIMARY, MAY 6, 1952*

Candidate	Expenditures	Total Vote	Cost Per Vote
Adams	$154,401	126,426	$1.22
McCarty†	156,239	361,427	.43
Odham†	72,753	232,565	.31

* Data in all tables were compiled from reports filed in the office of the Florida Secretary of State, Elections and Commissions Division. Expenditure figures are rounded off to the nearest dollar.

† These candidates subsequently opposed each other in the second or "run-off" primary of May 27, 1952.

reports the high cost of running for governor in Florida. The results of this election indicate that there was little or no correlation between money spent and the number of votes received. Adams, who spent more than twice as much as Odham, received less than half as many votes, while McCarty, whose expenditures also totaled more than twice those of Odham, received one and one-half times as many votes.

McCarty, who had been the runnerup in the 1948 gubernatorial race, had strong financial backing in the $100 or more category from all major metropolitan areas of the state, as well as an excellent overall coverage of south, east, west, north, and central Florida. While Adams had backing from the same general areas, only about half as many persons contributed $100 or more to his campaign as did to McCarty's. Odham, on the other hand, received the bulk of his contributions of $100 or more from central and south Florida, with 229 of the 450 contributors in this category residing in Orange, Seminole, Dade, and Hillsborough counties. (See Tables II and III.)

McCarty and Adams received financial backing from the same county areas (primarily urbanized). McCarty, however, had 551 more individual contributors of $100 or more in these areas than Adams. Adams, on the other hand, received more generous contributions from his donors than did McCarty (see Table IV). In Dade, Duval, and Hillsborough counties, where McCarty had two to three times more individual contributors of $100 or more than Adams, he received almost three times the number of votes. Pinellas, one of Florida's

TABLE II. TOTAL NUMBER OF INDIVIDUAL CONTRIBUTIONS OF $100 OR MORE ARRANGED BY CITY IN FLORIDA'S FIRST DEMOCRATIC GUBERNATORIAL PRIMARY, MAY 6, 1952

City	Population	McCarty	Adams	Odham
Miami	249,276	198	76	47
Jacksonville	204,517	121	58	13
Tampa	124,681	92	27	42
Ft. Pierce*	13,502	90	24	2
Tallahassee	35,025	69	73	11
St. Petersburg	96,738	49	34	8
Orlando	52,367	40	21	70
Ft. Lauderdale	36,328	36	9	7
Panama City	25,814	29	27	10
W. Palm Beach	43,162	28	22	3
Pensacola	43,479	25	4	0
Lakeland	30,851	23	1	8
Ocala	11,741	18	1	14
Gainesville	26,861	18	8	6
Clearwater	15,581	17	1	0
Coral Gables	19,837	11	0	0
Sanford†	11,953	6	1	55
Miami Beach	46,282	0	10	15
Daytona Beach	30,187	0	1	13
Bradenton	13,604	2	0	10
All others	—	167	104	116
Total		1,056	505	450

* Home town of McCarty and Adams.

† Home town of Odham.

TABLE III. VOTE OBTAINED BY EACH OF THREE TOP DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATES IN GUBERNATORIAL PRIMARIES IN FLORIDA IN TEN COUNTIES IN WHICH HE RECEIVED LARGEST NUMBER OF CONTRIBUTIONS OF $100 OR MORE

County	Population	No. of Contributions of $100 or more			Vote Received First and Second Primary
					McCarty		Odham		Adams
		McCarty	Odham	Adams	First	Second	First	Second	First
Dade	495,084	209	62	86	68,921	73,941	42,951	63,407	20,389
Duval	304,029	121	13	58	34,883	39,175	28,103	38,497	7,552
Hillsborough	249,894	92	42	27	19,543	23,941	26,688	30,437	7,143
St. Lucie*	20,180	90		24	4,569	5,360			2,330
Leon	51,590	69	11	73	7,519	8,571	2,076	4,692	3,262
Pinellas	159,249	66		34	14,058	15,523			5,140
Orange	114,950	40	70	21	10,517	11,508	10,541	14,939	4,444
Broward	83,933	36		9	14,275	12,409			4,213
Bay	42,689	29	10	27	4,998	5,336	5,737	6,697	2,011
Palm Beach	114,688	28		22	16,570	16,480			5,695
Seminole†	26,883		55				4,252	4,310
Marion	38,187		14				3,904	4,630
Volusia	74,229		13				5,104	9,151
Manatee	34,704		10				4,179	4,389

* Home county of McCarty and Adams.

† Home county of Odham

two Republican counties, gave substantial financial aid to both Adams and McCarty but practically no aid to Odham, who was regarded as the most "liberal" of the candidates. The only county in which Adams received more individual contributions of $100 or more than McCarty was Leon, the site of Tallahassee, the state capital, where Adams had resided during his eleven years as a member of the Florida Supreme Court.

Odham's counties offer a considerable contrast to those of his two opponents. His counties were in central Florida, although he did receive some financial aid in the $100 or more category from two counties in west Florida (Leon and Bay) and one county on Florida's east coast (Volusia). In contrast to Adams' and McCarty's counties, Odham's represent rural or fringe-urban areas. Although an analysis of individual county and city contributions does not demonstrate any significant correlation between the money received and the vote received, it does suggest a positive correlation between the total number of contributors and total vote received—the greater the number of contributors, the larger the vote received.

TABLE IV. RANGE DISTRIBUTIONS OF NUMBER OF CONTRIBUTIONS FROM $100 TO $1000 TO THE CAMPAIGN FUNDS OF MCCARTY, ADAMS, AND ODHAM FIRST AND SECOND FLORIDA DEMOCRATIC GUBERNATORIAL PRIMARIES, 1952

Range	McCarty*	Adams†	Odham*
$100 to 299	956	362	414
300 to 499	31	63	30
500 to 699	39	52	1
700 to 899	3	9	1
900 to 1,000	6	19	4

* Both primaries.

† First primary only.

Relatively speaking, the number of large individual contributions to the Adams campaign offers striking contrast to the distribution in Odham's case, with McCarty assuming an intermediate position. Adams' major contributors came from the upper-middle to upper economic groups, with these two groups donating more heavily to his campaign than to that of any other candidate. McCarty's official reports show that his contributors range from middle to upper economic groups, with a significant number of professional people giving their support. Odham, however, received the bulk of his money from small

TABLE V. TOTAL NUMBER OF INDIVIDUAL CONTRIBUTIONS OF LESS THAN $100 FOR MCCARTY, ADAMS, AND ODHAM IN FLORIDA'S FIRST AND SECOND PRIMARIES, 1952

McCarty*	Odham*	Adams†
3,777	11,253	454

* Both primaries.

† First primary only.

contributions, the majority of which came from the middle economic group.²⁴

The total contributions under $100 reflect the tremendous vitality of Odham's effort to attract financial support. His two rivals were completely outstripped in this category. Odham, employing techniques calculated to attract a large number of small donations, pitched his campaign on the theme "Dollars for Decency"—a plea for the restoration of integrity and honesty to the state government. This appeal produced an avalanche of one-dollar contributions and the bulk of his 11,253 donations under $100 were in one-dollar amounts. Odham also resorted to a comparatively new campaign technique, the radio-talkathon, and this also attracted many small contributions. The official reports show a sharp rise in number of contributions from each area immediately following his radio-talkathon.

TABLE VI. WEEKLY EXPENDITURES OF MCCARTY, ADAMS, AND ODHAM IN THE FIRST DEMOCRATIC GUBERNATORIAL PRIMARY, MAY 6, 1952 BEGINNING WITH THE REPORT DATED FEBRUARY 1, 1952

Adams	Odham	McCarty	Date Filed*
$3,732	$ 868	$1,653	2-1-52
1,705	406	2,843	2-8
3,504	446	4,153	2-15
301	547	4,077	2-22
4,361	1,032	4,969	2-29
1,997	759	4,349	3-7
1,896	3,272	3,959	3-14
8,402	1,223	4,019	3-21
11,715	4,037	7,515	3-28
11,846	5,573	13,377	4-4
12,206	9,940	16,680	4-11
15,866	8,078	17,854	4-18
16,263	10,549	17,770	4-25
42,009	19,047	32,780	5-5
—	—	14,941	5-9
6,230	—	—	5-20

* Expenditures are for the week preceding the date shown, except for the final reports.

Students of American politics have heretofore had to turn to tabulating newspaper and radio advertising and weighing and evaluating campaign literature in attempting to assess the amount of money spent at any given time in the course of a political campaign. Such efforts have demanded an extraordinary expenditure of energy and in many instances have been lacking in accuracy. In contrast, the official reports required by Florida's new election code give an accurate account of weekly expenditures. Adams, Odham, and McCarty followed an identical pattern of expenditures. All three increased their expendi-

²⁴ The official reports require both name and address of each donor. The writer analyzed the lists of donors, using their professional, business, or occupational status as a prime base in determining economic group.

TABLE VII. WEEKLY CONTRIBUTIONS TO MCCARTY, ADAMS, AND ODHAM IN THE FIRST DEMOCRATIC GUBERNATORIAL PRIMARY, MAY 6, 1952

Adams	Odham	McCarty	Date Filed*
$5,325	$ 446	$3,320	2-1-52
1,500	1,099	4,050	2-8
2,245	417	8,190	2-15
3,547	537	5,712	2-22
2,645	1,067	6,956	2-29
1,747	1,760	5,160	3-7
3,075	3,446	4,658	3-14
14,553	1,416	4,859	3-21
11,691	4,723	9,174	3-28
8,748	5,647	10,240	4-4
10,331	10,898	15,527	4-11
15,244	8,133	16,100	4-18
18,026	11,790	22,014	4-25
39,319	31,841	42,999	5-5
—	—	212	5-9
—	20,529	—	5-10
3,738	—	—	5-20

* Contributions are for the week preceding the date shown, except for the final reports.

tures as election day drew nearer and all spent the greatest sums of money in the week immediately preceding the first primary.

Adams, who spent the largest amount in the final week of the campaign, devoted a major portion of his money in the closing days of the campaign to the conventional and traditional devices, i.e., printed literature via mail and handout, with some newspaper and radio advertising. Odham devoted the lion's share of his expenditures to the radio-talkathon. McCarty divided his heavy expenditures almost equally between radio advertising and the printing, mailing, and distributing of literature. The reports of expenditures suggest that since all three candidates followed the same general pattern and at about the same rate of increase, other factors were more important than the expenditure of money in their behalf. The evidence points to the unusual technique used by Odham and the effective statewide organization of McCarty as the other factors. As expenditures mounted during the last eight weeks of the campaign, so also did contributions. Since the new Florida election law restricts expenditures for all candidates to amounts on deposit,²⁵ it was to be expected that contributions and expenditures would be in almost exact ratio.

McCarty and Odham, the top Democrats in the first primary, met again in the second or "runoff" primary on May 27, 1952. They had sixteen days in which to collect money and twenty days in which to campaign actively. As in the first primary, the candidate spending the most per vote was unsuccessful; however, in both instances the candidate who spent the largest total sum of money came out ahead. Odham added 104,151 votes to his first primary total ²⁵ Compilation of the Election Laws of the State of Florida, Section 99.161(6).

TABLE VIII. TOTAL EXPENDITURES, TOTAL VOTE, COST PER VOTE IN FLORIDA'S SECOND DEMOCRATIC GUBERNATORIAL PRIMARY, MAY 27, 1952.

Candidate	Expenditures	Vote	Cost Per Vote
McCarty	$95,721	384,200	$.249
Odham	84,616	336,716	.251

while spending $11,863.66 more than in all the previous weeks combined. McCarty gained 22,773 votes and spent $60,507.99 less than in the previous weeks of his campaign. Perhaps this is an indication that there is merit in going all-out in a very short period of time just prior to an election. An analysis of the election returns to determine whether the Adams vote shifted heavily to Odham is inconclusive, but there is an indication that Odham received Adams' votes in Volusia, Polk, Pinellas, Palm Beach, Hillsborough, Dade, and Duval counties. However, since Odham made serious efforts to attract new votes in these areas, it is impossible to determine whether the increase resulted from his actions in the interim period, from the actions of Adams himself, or from decisions of individuals to support Odham, their preferred candidate having been eliminated in the first primary.

Political scientists have long attempted to ascertain precisely where the campaign dollar goes. The expenditure reports required under the new law give an accurate picture of the distribution of the Florida campaign dollar. The breakdown of the campaign dollar for the leading three Democratic candidates in the Florida gubernatorial primaries of 1952 are shown in large general groupings in Table IX.

TABLE IX. GENERAL BREAKDOWN OF EXPENDITURES OF MCCARTY, ADAMS, AND ODHAM IN FLORIDA'S FIRST AND SECOND GUBERNATORIAL PRIMARIES OF 1952

Item	Candidate	Total Expenditures	Per Cent of Total
Radio and TV	McCarty	$64,481	25.5
	Odham	91,172	57.8
	Adams*	29,499	19.1
Newspaper advertising	McCarty	47,117	18.7
	Odham	9,337	5.9
	Adams*	19,685	12.7
Printing	McCarty	45,688	18.1
	Odham	16,301	10.3
	Adams*	26,090	16.8
All other—salaries, travel, etc.	McCarty	94,673	37.7
	Odham	40,558	26.0
	Adams*	79,125	51.4

* First primary only.

Odham diverted seventy-four per cent of his funds to radio and TV, newspaper advertising, and printing, with the major portion going into his radio talkathons (57.8 per cent). McCarty used slightly over sixty-two per cent of his money for advertising, dividing his total almost evenly among radio-TV, newspapers, and printed materials. The reports show that Adams used the more traditional method of mailing vast quantities of printed campaign materials.²⁶ He also employed more persons on his headquarters' staffs and paid higher salaries than either McCarty or Odham. The evidence suggests that the older approach did not pay dividends and that greater use of radio by Adams might have made a difference in the outcome of the election.

TABLE X. TYPICAL ITEMS ON FLORIDA EXPENDITURE REPORTS: GRAND TOTALS
FOR ODHAM BOTH 1952 DEMOCRATIC PRIMARIES

1. Salaries, including all secretarial and bookkeeping work and labor in all county organizations not donated.....	$ 12,016.00
2. Radio and TV advertising.....	91,172.65
3. Newspaper advertising.....	9,337.67
4. Printing of "Odham Record," signs, bumper strips, etc.....	16,301.65
5. Office supplies.....	3,498.69
6. Postage, freight, express, etc.....	4,363.12
7. Telephone and telegraph.....	7,790.55
8. Rental of county headquarters, halls, parks, and locations for public meetings, including utilities.....	2,288.33
9. Expense in travel.....	18,264.86
10. Miscellaneous expenses, including qualifying fee, sound equipment, rental of chairs, photo services, and other items not otherwise listed..	2,408.41
Total.....	$157,370.08

The underlying premise of the new Florida election law is that if the people are informed as to the exact nature of the financing of a candidate's campaign they are capable of making a sound decision when casting their votes. This premise is based on two assumptions: (1) "too much" money reported by any candidate would contribute to his defeat, and (2) if the names of persons appearing on his contributions lists were obviously "wrong people" in the eyes of the general public, his candidacy would be adversely affected.

One of the best features of the present law is its self-policing effect. The candidates watched each other "like hawks," sending their workers to the Secretary of State's office regularly to copy lists of contributors and amounts for their opponents and then carefully checking these names with the public records to see whether or not they fell within the barred categories or gave over the $1,000 limit. The publicity which was necessary if the law was to be meaningful was provided by a conscientious corps of political reporters, including representatives of both Associated Press and United Press, who eagerly awaited the arrival of the official reports at the Secretary of State's office in order to send an account of the contents to their respective offices for publication.

²⁶ The writer has attempted to adjust the losses the Adams people suffered in a fire during the campaign which almost completely destroyed their Tallahassee headquarters (state headquarters). One large item which went up in smoke consisted of uncounted numbers of both stamped cards and stamped envelopes. A considerable amount of campaign literature was also destroyed.

For the first time in the history of Florida politics, the electorate was given a comprehensive picture of money in a gubernatorial election. Never before in any state have such complete financial reports on a gubernatorial campaign been made available. Mr. W. P. Bevis, chief clerk in the Elections and Commissions Division of the Secretary of State's office since 1931, says that the revised code is "the best we've ever had," and the only one that "tells us the picture."²⁷ Mrs. Hortense K. Wells, long active in Democratic party organizational affairs (eight years the Democratic National Committeewoman from Florida), contends that the 1951 code "kept the election open and above board."²⁸

The 1953 legislature strengthened the election code by clarifying confusing statements, eliminating conflicting provisions, and putting additional teeth in the punitive section.²⁹ In view of the action by the 1953 legislature, the favorable court decision in March, 1953, and the almost unanimous verdict that the revised election code effectively regulates money in Florida elections, it can be concluded that the Florida electorate will continue to be among the best informed on all aspects of campaign finances.

The revised code, especially that part which deals with campaign funds, may not have dried up all undercover financial activity. As Senator W. A. Shands of Gainesville has said, ". . . it is impossible to legislate honesty into anyone," but ". . . if we have the proper safeguards it is usually correct to assume that the dishonest man will go to the well once too often."³⁰ Representative Shepperd voiced the opinion: "It may not be a perfect law, for few laws are perfect. But it represents an honest attempt to help clean up politics. Any candidate who seeks to evade its provisions by subterfuge or by means of some legal loophole or technicality isn't fit to seek a public office in Florida."³¹ The new Florida campaign expense law has proven its effectiveness at the state level; it might well be used as model for regulating money in national campaigns.

²⁷ Interview, Oct. 20, 1953.

²⁸ Interview, Oct. 22, 1953.

²⁹ Compilation of the Election Law of the State of Florida (Tallahassee: Secretary of State and Statutory Revision Department of the Attorney General's office, August 1, 1953), Section 99.021, .061(4), .161(9), .172, .183, and Section 104.051, .27(8), .271, .371, .38, .381, .46.

³⁰ As quoted in Who Gave It—Who Got It?, St. Petersburg Times, pamphlet (1951).

³¹ Florida Times-Union, Dec. 21, 1951.

THE AMERICAN PARTY SYSTEMS*

AUSTIN RANNEY

University of Illinois

AND

WILLMOORE KENDALL

Yale University

I

Distributing "raw" data among types or classes is a necessary and illuminating part of the process of research and discovery in any science, particularly in the early stages of the latter's development. But it produces fruitful results only if the types or classes make sense, which they will just to the extent that, inter alia, the variables we fix upon in defining them are the significant ones (for the purpose in view, of course), and that the classes (a) exhaust the phenomena under consideration, and (b) do not overlap.

One of the most elementary procedures used in dealing with the raw data of political conflict is that which, taking its departure from the notion of "party systems," seeks to assign each observed instance to one or another of three types: the "one-party system," the "two-party system," and the "multiple-party system." All party systems, it is assumed, belong as a matter of course to one of the three, so that one of the researcher's first tasks in studying the phenomena of party conflict in a given political situation is to find out with which one of the three types he is dealing. Until he has done this—so runs the tacit premise—he does not have his problem in manageable shape.

The concern of the present article is to raise and answer, with respect to this familiar table of party categories, such questions as the following: Does it, when used to deal with the phenomena of American politics,¹ produce results that are entirely satisfactory? Does it meet the tests mentioned in our opening paragraph? Is there, perchance, some fairly simple way to change it so as to permit affirmative replies to the two foregoing questions?

In the opinion of the present writers, this table of categories is open to two major criticisms. In the first place, while the variable underlying its types (how many parties in the system) seems clear enough, the dividing-line between two of them—"two-party systems" and "one-party systems"—is extremely difficult to draw, so that it is not clear, if we can imagine a one-party system that is turning into a two-party system (or vice versa), at what point it ceases to be the one and becomes the other. A glance at current usage of the term "one-

* The authors wish to thank Professor Charles S. Hyneman for his many valuable criticisms and suggestions regarding the methodology of this article.

¹ We shall have occasion to mention certain non-American party systems, but shall do so only in terms of what is generally known about them, and thus does not require supporting evidence or documentation. The empirical data with which we shall deal are all American.

party system" will, moreover, show why this is the case. V. O. Key, for example, means by "one-party system" the kind of thing we find in Mississippi.² Professors Merriam, Gosnell, and McKean, on the other hand, mean by it the kind of thing we find in the U.S.S.R.³ Evidently, however, it cannot be maintained that the Mississippi and Soviet party systems are essentially alike. Opposition candidates can (and sometimes do) oppose candidates of the dominant party in Mississippi. They cannot (and do not) in the Soviet Union. So the question arises whether any useful purpose can be served by continuing to call them both "one-party systems."

Even if we exclude the Soviet Union and the "peoples' democracies" from our purview, and confine our attention to "democratic" party systems,⁴ this kind of difficulty does not disappear. One often encounters the statement, for example, that since Republican candidates almost always win in Maine and New Hampshire and Democratic candidates in Mississippi and Georgia, all four are "one-party" states. Surely, however, there are significant differences between the kind of party conflict we find in Maine and that which we find in Mississippi, and surely lumping them together in a single category encourages us to ignore these differences—and thus fail to understand the party system of either state. In Maine, to be sure, it is a rare thing for a Democratic candidate to be elected. But it is not a rare but rather a usual thing for him to win anywhere from 30 to 49 per cent of the vote—enough (in the opinion anyhow of those concerned) to justify the continuance of an organized, working Democratic organization. In Mississippi, by contrast, the lesser party often does not even put up candidates; and the candidates it does put up poll a mere 5 to 20 per cent of the vote. Consequently the Republican party in Mississippi appears to be a mere shadow party, whose major reason for keeping itself alive is to be there to dispense national patronage when the Republican party is in control of the national government.⁵ And while "one party plus one shadow party equals one party" may be good arithmetic, "one regularly victorious party plus one regularly defeated party equals one party" is pretty clearly not good arithmetic.

In short, the present writers feel that the purposes of clarity would be better served if a fourth and a fifth category—one in between "one-party" and "two-party," and the other at one extreme of the spectrum—were added to take care of party systems like those of Maine and the U.S.S.R. We shall suggest such additional categories below.

² V. O. Key, Jr., Politics, Parties and Pressure Groups, 3rd ed. (New York, 1952), pp. 314–22.

³ Cf. Charles E. Merriam and Harold F. Gosnell, The American Party System, 3rd ed. (New York, 1940), p. 8; and Dayton D. McKean, Party and Pressure Politics (Boston, 1949), pp. 17–18. Merriam and Gosnell, to be sure, say later that such a totalitarian party system is not really a "party system," in the usual sense of that term, at all.

⁴ I.e., party systems operating within a total governmental structure that permits organized party opposition. This meaning of "democratic" party systems clearly is the one assumed by Key and other writers, and is one with which the present writers have no quarrel.

⁵ Cf. V. O. Key, Jr., Southern Politics in State and Nation (New York, 1949), Ch. 11.

At this point some readers may argue: "Of course the Mississippi party system is not the same kind as the Soviet party system; nor has anyone ever intended to suggest, by using the same term to apply to both, that it is the same kind of thing. The existing terminology is careless, but so what? It neither reflects nor creates confusion about the realities at stake. So why bother to add more categories, when the present ones do the job perfectly well?" Our answer is this: using the same term to apply to things that are different in the relevant aspect unavoidably tends—as our classroom experience has taught us—to identify these things in the minds of students, whether the users intend this or not. And, in any case, the possibility that it might have this result is reason enough for abandoning such usage in favor of more precise terminology.

The second deficiency of the current widely-accepted classification arises in connection with our general tendency to talk sometimes about the American party system—as if only one party system existed in the United States, namely, the "two-party" system. When, for example, the Committee on Political Parties of the American Political Science Association reports that "the two-party system is so strongly rooted in the political traditions of this country, and public preference for it is so well established that consideration of other possibilities seems entirely academic,"⁶ it is clearly doing just this.

The above usage clearly invites the retort that in Mississippi and Georgia, for example, something other than "the two-party system" is to be found receiving rather more than "academic consideration." The authors of the report can, of course, reply that they were referring to the national party system only, and were leaving out of account for the moment the state party systems. But if so, we should hear sometimes (as we do not) of the American party systems—and expect the broadest generalizations about American parties to have that term, not "the American party system," as their referent. We cannot justify the use of the latter phrase, be it noted, by saying that the national party system is far more "important" than the state party systems, since the literature here in question often reminds us that state and local party organizations are far more powerful than the national organizations,⁷ and that all national elected officials are elected from state constituencies (the President, of course, in a somewhat different fashion than senators and representatives). The correct statement would appear to be that our national "two-party system" is made up of electoral contests within the 48 state party systems, by no means all of which can accurately be called "two-party." And it follows from this statement—far more complex than the statements about the system that we normally hear—that the existing table of categories, because of its lack of precision, has encouraged us in careless habits of thought and description.

⁶ "Toward a More Responsible Two-party System," this REVIEW, Vol. 44 (Sept., 1950, Supplement), p. 18. Cf. Merriam and Gosnell: "One of the outstanding characteristics of the American party system is that it is a two party system . . ." Op. cit., p. 2; or Bone: ". . . a . . . conspicuous feature . . . of the American party system is its biparty nature." Hugh Bone, American Politics and the Party System (New York, 1949), p. 356. Professor Schattschneider speaks somewhat more cautiously of the American two-party system: ". . . American politics is dominated and distinguished by the two-party system. . . . The two-party system is the most conspicuous feature of American political organization." E. E. Schattschneider, Party Government (New York, 1942), pp. 66–67, emphasis added.

⁷ Cf. Schattschneider, pp. 162–65; and Key, Politics, Parties and Pressure Groups, Ch. 11.

The present article has two purposes: First, to propose a method for classifying party systems that avoids some at least of the difficulties the method now used gets us into; and second, by way of illustrating the method's possible usefulness, to place each of the 48 state party systems and the national party system in the category in which it belongs.

II

The present method of classifying a given party system involves deciding whether it is a two-party or multiple-party or one-party system, which in turn is a matter of fixing attention on the past behavior of the voters involved in it. The classifier asks in effect: Have most of these voters voted in the past for one party? If not, which of two things have they done—divided their votes between two parties, or distributed them among several parties? The tacit premise of this method is that the voters continue to behave, i.e., are now behaving, as they have in the past, and will continue to do so for some time at least in the future. The statement that a particular system is a two-party system, that is to say, is a statement both that voters have so behaved in the past that neither party could be said to have a cinch on winning, and that now and in the future either party, other things being equal, has a reasonably good chance to win further elections. In short, our estimate of the chances of any party, major or minor, in any given future election is—again, other things being equal—an extrapolation based on the statistics of its successes and failures in past elections.⁸

These criteria seem both meaningful and useful to the present writers; and we suggest that, on the basis of such data, there appear to be five—not three—possible types of party systems, of which four are democratic or non-totalitarian:

1. The multiple-party type. To this type belongs any system in which at most elections in the fairly recent past (a) three or more parties have shared the bulk of the votes and public offices, and (b) no single party has won a majority of either votes or offices (so that most governments have been coalition or "fusion" governments).

⁸ One of the clearest examples of the dependence of present expectations upon past election results in classifying party systems was given by Professor Lipson in a recent issue of this REVIEW. He stated that the following conditions must be present if a party system is to be called "two-party": "(1) Not more than two parties at any given time have a genuine chance to gain power. (2) One of these is able to win the requisite majority and stay in office without help from a third party. (3) Over a number of decades two parties alternate in power." "The Two-party System in British Politics," this REVIEW, Vol. 47, pp. 337-58, at p. 338 (June, 1953). Clearly, the expectations involved in Lipson's (1) depend upon the observations of past voting behavior which support his (2) and (3). See also the definitions, explicit and implicit, of "the" American two-party system in the works cited in footnotes 3, 4, and 7, above.

2. The two-party type. To this type belongs any system in which at most elections in the fairly recent past (a) two parties have shared the bulk of the votes and public offices between them, (b) the winning party has gained a majority of the votes and offices, and (c) the two dominant parties have alternated in winning majorities.

3. The modified one-party type. To this type belongs any system in which at most elections in the recent past (a) one party has won all or almost all the offices, but (b) the second party, though it has seldom won any offices, has normally received a substantial percentage of the votes and thus constitutes a significant center of organized party opposition.

4. The one-party type. To this type belongs any system in which at most elections in the recent past (a) one party has won all or nearly all of the offices, and (b) the second party has usually received only a small percentage of the popular votes.

5. The totalitarian one-party type. To this type belongs any system in which either (a) only one party has been permitted to participate in elections in the recent past, or (b) any parties other than the dominant single party that have participated are clearly "fronts" for the dominant party.

These criteria are, of course, stated in very general terms. They do not, by themselves, indicate how many times power must change hands between two parties in order that "alternation in power" can be said to have taken place, or how long a period constitutes the "fairly recent past," or how large a percentage of the popular votes may fairly be regarded as "substantial." Thus meaningful application of these necessarily general criteria to any given party situation would require the political scientist to study past election results, see if the various percentages of victories and shares of the popular votes fall into clusters, and, if so, select the dividing-lines between the clusters as the dividing-lines—in that specific situation only—between his categories.⁹ That is what the present writers have attempted to do in their classification of 49 American party systems, the results of which appear below.

III

One familiar kind of data used in classifying the American national party system as a two-party system is the distribution of popular votes in presidential elections.¹⁰ The graphs and tables in which these data are presented show that in the 22 presidential elections since the Civil War, the Republicans have won 13 times and the Democrats nine. They further show that in only three elections have third parties received over 10 per cent of the popular vote,¹¹ and that

⁹ See, for example, the process by which the present writers arrived at the dividing-line between the "two-party" states and the other states in Table I, below. The specific dividing-line employed in that table would very likely be inappropriate for a classification of, say, the provincial party systems of Canada. The process for determining the dividing-line—as opposed to the specific location of the line itself—should be equally applicable to Canadian and American party systems.

¹⁰ See, for example, the graph in Key, Politics, Parties and Pressure Groups, p. 225.

¹¹ 1892—Weaver (Populist), 11 per cent; 1912—Roosevelt (Progressive), 27.5 per cent; and 1924—LaFollette (Progressive), 16.6 per cent.

in only four elections have third-party candidates received any electoral votes.¹²

A less familiar kind of data is the distribution of party strength in Congress. Here the figures reveal that in the 44 Congresses since the Civil War, the Republicans have controlled the Senate 29 times (to the Democrats' 15 times) and the House of Representatives 24 times (to the Democrats' 20 times).¹³ On the basis of both kinds of data, then, the national party system is clearly of the two-party type.

IV

In classifying the 48 state party systems, the first step was to compile the results of all elections since 1914 in each of the states for three offices—President of the United States, United States senator, and governor.¹⁴ Next, the percent-

TABLE I. THE TWO-PARTY STATES

State	Total of All Elections			Per Cent of Second-Party Wins
	Rep. Wins	Dem. Wins	3-P Wins
Arizona	12	32	0	27.2
California	22	11	1	35.3
Colorado	22	21	0	48.8
Connecticut	31	15	0	32.6
Delaware	22	11	0	33.3
Idaho	26	18	0	40.9
Illinois	21	14	0	40.0
Indiana	21	13	0	38.2
Maryland	11	23	0	32.3
Massachusetts	24	19	0	44.2
Michigan	30	13	0	30.2
Minnesota	28	7	8	34.8
Missouri	13	22	0	37.1
Montana	9	24	0	27.2
Nebraska	30	13	1	31.8
Nevada	11	25	0	30.5
New Jersey	24	13	0	35.1
New Mexico	14	29	0	32.5
New York	17	23	0	42.5
Ohio	23	22	0	48.8
Rhode Island	17	26	0	39.5
Utah	13	21	0	38.2
Washington	15	19	0	44.1
West Virginia	12	21	0	36.3
Wisconsin	31	7	6	29.3
Wyoming	15	20	0	42.8

¹² 1892—Weaver (Populist), 22; 1912—Roosevelt (Progressive), 88; 1924—LaFollette (Progressive), 13; 1948—Thurmond (States' Rights), 39.

¹³ Cf. the graphs in Louis Bean, How to Predict Elections (New York, 1948), pp. 15, 19.

¹⁴ The raw data for Table I and the subsequent tables were drawn from the World Almanac (published by the New York World-Telegram and Sun), various issues from 1915 ages of victories in all elections for the second party¹⁵ in each state were determined and placed along a scale from the lowest (0 per cent) to the highest (48.8 per cent). The authors then observed that the longest gap in the scale was that which occurred between 22.8 per cent and 27.2 per cent, and that the 48 percentages appeared to fall into two main groups or "clusters": those from 0 per cent to 22.8 per cent, and those from 27.2 per cent to 48.8 per cent. We therefore fixed 25 per cent as the dividing-line between the "one-party" and "two-party" categories, classifying as "two-party states" all those in which the second party had won more than 25 per cent of the elections studied. The states which met the relevant tests are shown in Table I.

TABLE II. THE MODIFIED ONE-PARTY STATES

State	Total of All Elections			Per Cent of Second- Party Wins	Per Cent of Elections	Per Cent of Elections
	Rep. Wins	Dem. Wins	3-P Wins		with Second- Party Vote Over 30%	with Second- Party Vote Over 40%
Iowa	34	10	0	22.7	88.6	70.4
Kansas	36	7	0	16.2	97.6	67.4
Kentucky	8	27	0	22.8	100.0	94.2
Maine	40	3	0	7.0	90.6	53.4
New Hampshire	37	6	0	14.0	100.0	86.0
North Carolina	1	33	0	3.0	79.4	30.0
North Dakota	36	8	0	18.1	75.0	59.0
Oklahoma	6	27	0	18.1	93.9	75.7
Oregon	26	7	1	23.5	88.1	55.8
Pennsylvania	28	7	0	20.0	91.4	65.7
South Dakota	34	9	0	21.0	97.6	72.0
Tennessee	4	40	0	9.0	72.6	34.0

The next question was: in how many of the 22 states in which the second party has won less than 25 per cent of all elections has the second party nevertheless usually won a "substantial percentage" of the votes? The data indicated that significant breaking-points occur at 30 per cent and at 40 per cent of the popular vote, which made it seem advisable to define "modified one-party to 1953. The period chosen for studying election results is from 1914 to 1952, and was selected for two reasons: It eliminates most of the effects of the 1912 split in the Republican party—an abnormal and temporary situation; and it provides a period of four decades, which, in the opinion of the authors, is a long enough period to indicate trends. The three offices were chosen partly because of the ready availability of statistics about them, and partly because in many states they are the only offices for which all the voters of the state vote.

¹⁵ In those states in which third-party or independent candidates (both listed in the tables as "3-P") won at least one election (Alabama, California, Florida, Louisiana, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, Oregon, South Carolina, and Wisconsin), their victories were added to the second-parties' victories to show "total-opposition" percentages.

TABLE III. THE ONE-PARTY STATES

State	Total of All Elections			Per Cent of Second- Party Wins	Per Cent of Elections with Second- Party Vote Over 30%	Per Cent of Elections with Second- Party Vote Over 40%
	Rep. Wins	Dem. Wins	3-P Wins
Alabama	0	32	1	3.0	18.1	6.0
Arkansas	0	43	0	0.0	13.9	2.3
Florida	2	32	1	8.6	19.9	5.7
Georgia	0	44	0	0.0	4.4	2.2
Louisiana	0	32	1	3.0	6.9	4.6
Mississippi	0	32	1	3.0	6.0	3.0
South Carolina	0	32	1	3.0	6.0	6.0
Texas	2	41	0	4.6	16.2	6.9
Vermont	44	0	0	0.0	54.4	18.1
Virginia	2	34	0	5.5	41.6	11.1

states" as those in which the second party, while winning less than 25 per cent of all elections, has won over 30 per cent of the vote in over 70 per cent of all elections and has won over 40 per cent of the vote in over 30 per cent of all elections. By the same token, "one-party states" are defined as those in which the second party has won less than 25 per cent of all elections, and has also won over 30 per cent of the vote in less than 70 per cent of all elections and has won over 40 per cent of the vote in less than 30 per cent of all elections. The states falling in these two categories are shown in Tables II and III.

Finally, a political map of the American state party systems, based upon the foregoing data and interpretations, is shown in Figure 1.

V

One important question that arises from the foregoing analysis is whether the familiar one-party-two-party table of categories, however sharpened and refined, is a useful tool of analysis. Certainly it is a rough classifying device at best. There are, for example, many and important differences among the party systems of such states as Ohio, Rhode Island, West Virginia, New Mexico, and Washington—yet they are all lumped together in our classification as "two-party" states. If such disparate party systems can all be called "two-party," one may well ask, does locating a party system in such a loose category tell us anything important about the nature of party conflict in that system?

This question can be answered, the present writers believe, only by a detailed examination of each of the state party systems in each of our three categories, and a careful comparison of each system with the others in its particular category. V. O. Key's Southern Politics in State and Nation and Alexander Heard's A Two-Party South? are among the few attempts at such analysis and comparison; and both works suggest that, despite the many differences in party conflict among the various Southern states, there are important similarities among the states we have classified as one-party states on the one hand and among those we have classified as modified one-party states on the other hand.¹⁶ This, in turn, suggests to us that the same kind of careful analysis and comparison of the two-party states might reveal significant similarities among the party systems in those states.

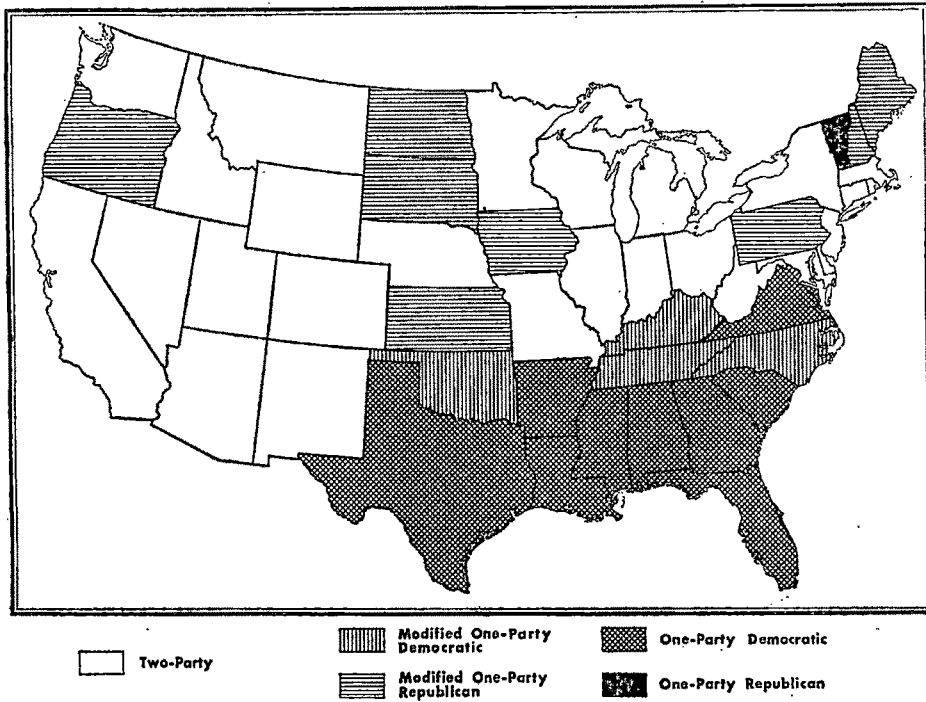

FIG. 1. The State Party Systems.

In any case, the purpose of the present essay has been to suggest improvements in the present, widely-accepted method of organizing and categorizing data about party conflict. A clearer answer to the question, what are "one-party" and "two-party" systems, is not an answer to the further and more important question, what does it matter? It can, however, provide the starting-point for finding a satisfactory answer to the latter question.

¹⁶ Cf. Key, Southern Politics in State and Nation, Chs. 4, 10; and Heard, A Two-Party South? (Chapel Hill, N. C., 1952), p. 98.

AGE AS A FACTOR IN THE RECRUITMENT OF COMMUNIST LEADERSHIP*

ROBERT T. HOLT

One of the keys to an understanding of the Communist movement is a knowledge of the nature of its leadership. The idea of the professional conspiratorial elite is one of the unique Russian contributions to Communist dogma and practice. After the professional revolutionaries in Russia had successfully engineered the Bolshevik Revolution, they became models for the leaders of the new Communist parties that were established in the West. Scholars and statesmen alike have had cause to mention some of their unique qualities—their uncompromising discipline, their complete and intransigent dedication to their cause, their ruthlessness and capacity for self-sacrifice. In this paper an attempt will be made to develop and investigate hypotheses about some of the characteristics of those who have attained positions of high leadership in the Communist parties in Italy and France. Some information on the leaders of the party in the United States has been included for purposes of comparison. It is impossible in this study, of course, to attack the problem from the point of view of the motivations and personality structures that differentiate the Communist leaders from those lower in the hierarchy. Togliatti, Thorez, and their comrades are obviously not available for the sort of probing that would be necessary for this type of analysis. And in addition to the normal hazards involved in using detailed biographical and autobiographical sources for such an analysis, this material is too limited, too unrepresentative, and too propagandistic to be of much value.¹ However, it was felt that a useful analysis could be made and certain hypotheses tested by the use of purely “external” indices constructed from material available to Western researchers.

The Communist party, like other groups that seek supreme allegiance from their adherents, seems to make a special effort to recruit members from among young people. Some hypothetical reasons for this tactic come immediately to mind. The type of loyalty that it demands from its militants is perhaps best obtained from individuals who become associated with it while still young. The process of assimilation, particularly when it involves some negation of the dominant values of the society, can be completed most satisfactorily if it is begun before these values have become firmly entrenched or a whole host of other obligations and duties assumed.

* The research for this paper was done under the direction of Gabriel A. Almond as part of a course in the graduate division of the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs and as one phase of the “Appeals of Communism” project conducted in the Center of International Studies, Princeton University. Some of the hypotheses investigated concerning the characteristics of party leadership were suggested by Theodore Draper, who acted as a project consultant.

¹ For an example of the autobiographical material that does exist, see Maurice Thorez, Fils du Peuple (Paris, 1949). An English translation of an earlier edition appears under the title, Son of the People, trans. Douglas Garman (New York, 1939). Also see Mario Montagnana, Ricordi di un Operaio Torinese, Vol. 1, Sotto La Guida di Gramsci, Vol. II, Sotto La Guida di Togliatti (Rome, 1949).

For two main reasons it seems logical to suppose that the leaders of the party would generally tend to become associated with it at earlier ages than the rank and file. First, the party tends to recruit its leadership internally, i.e., it is a "closed bureaucracy."² Thus, those who join the earliest have the best opportunity to move to the top. The second reason is that the demands the party places upon its leaders are severe, the allegiance required much greater than from the rank and file. It seems likely that this type of devotion is more easily commanded from people who join and become assimilated into the movement while still young.

These considerations led us to formulate two hypotheses about the role of age in the recruitment of the Communist party leadership. The first is that the leaders of the party joined the party or became involved in other radical movements at early ages. The second is that they quickly became functionaries in the party and thus while still young were a part of its militant cadre.

The study is based on a quantitative analysis of the Communist party leadership in Italy, France, and the United States. The samples for Italy and France are made up of all the regular members of the Central Committee of the Communist party.³ Because of the fact that the National Committee (central committee) of the party in the United States has only twelve members, an additional thirty-six leaders have been included in the sample.⁴

The central committees have been chosen as representative of the leadership

² "Closed bureaucracy," as the term is used in this study, refers to a bureaucracy in which the leadership is recruited from the ranks. By and large this type of bureaucracy is found in organizations existing largely for ideological purposes, for example, churches and some political parties. These organizations can be contrasted with business enterprises which at times recruit even top leaders from outside their own ranks.

³ The Italian Central Committee used in this analysis has seventy-two members and was elected at the close of the Seventh Congress of the Italian Communist party held in Rome, April 3-8, 1951. L'Unità (Rome), the official organ of the Italian party, carried the names of the new members of the Committee along with short biographical sketches on April 10, 1951. The Parti Communiste Français elected the Central Committee used in this sample at its Twelfth Congress, which met in Paris during the first week of April, 1950. The Committee consists of thirty-nine members whose names were reported in the party's organ, L'Humanité (Paris), on April 7, 1950. The major change in the composition of the French Central Committee since 1950 has been the removal of André Marty and Charles Tillon.

⁴ The National Committee included in this sample was elected at the National Convention of the Communist Party of the United States held in late December, 1950. The names of the Committee members were obtained from Political Affairs, the theoretical magazine of the party, January, 1951. All but William Z. Foster and Elizabeth G. Flynn were among those tried under the Smith Act for conspiring to overthrow the government by force, found guilty, and given prison terms in 1949 (the so-called "trial of the eleven"). Elizabeth G. Flynn was tried in a later trial. The additional thirty-six included in the sample are among those who have been arrested in various parts of the country for violation of the Smith Act. Nine of this additional thirty-six are alternate members of the National Committee, and many have at one time or another served on it.

for several reasons. They are, formally, the highest governing bodies of the party. They comprise all the top leadership including, of course, the secretary-general, the secretariat, and the whole of the politburo (or its equivalent). The other members, although nominally elected at the party Congresses, are, in effect, chosen by the politburo and thus elevated to the select circle of central committee membership only after careful examination by the highest level leadership of the respective countries. In Italy and France the committee also contains most of the regional leaders of the party, and thus geographical distribution is assured.

The Communist party has been known to attempt to enhance the prestige of its organization by putting into supposedly high positions important men who, although formally party leaders, do not have any significant policy or administrative function and cannot be considered as really part of the top leadership. Certainly, it could be argued that some of the members of the central committees, particularly in Italy, are little more than "window dressing." It is believed, however, that this problem is not serious; it would be worse if the sample had consisted of some other group of high echelon Communists of sufficient size—for instance, the Communist members of the French and Italian parliaments.

Excluded from the sample, of course, are those leaders of the underground, clandestine segments of the party who perhaps are not even known to the party leaders, let alone to Western observers.

The central committees have been chosen, in part, in order to get some kind of qualitative comparability among the men selected from the different countries. But this effort to get qualitative comparability has in itself introduced some bias. The Italian Central Committee included seventy-two members, whereas the French had only thirty-nine; the American sample included forty-eight leaders. Whenever reference is made to total figures, the weight of the Italian sample must be taken into consideration.

Another major difficulty was the lack of accurate information. Perhaps rather surprisingly, information on the Italians was the most accessible.⁵ This is largely due to two factors. First, during the Fascist period in Italy the police kept elaborate dossiers on many of the men who are now on the Central Committee, and some of this information has found its way into print. Secondly, many of the members of the Central Committee are in the Parliament or have run for public office. Information on them is available in the regular biographical sketches of the members of the Chamber of Deputies and in election propaganda booklets put out by the party.

⁵ In addition to the issue of L'Unità cited above, the major sources of information on the Italian Communists were: (1) Albo Biografico dei Deputati e Senatori Comunisti e Socialisti (Rome, 1948); (2) Il Parlamento Della Repubblica Italiana nella Prima Legislatura Costituzione Funzionamento Biografie Dati Statistici, Supplement to Chi E (Rome, n.d.); (3) Chi E (Rome, 1948); (4) a number of propaganda pamphlets put out by the Communists for the general election in 1948. An effort was made to double-check all information, particularly when the prime source was a Communist publication.

As would be expected, detailed information was available on most of the members of the American National Committee. However, little has been found on the early lives of the additional thirty-six that have been included in the sample.⁶

Information on the French leaders was more difficult to obtain.⁷ An aura of myth and mystery surrounds some of the members of the French Central Committee, and as a result it is extremely difficult to separate fact from fantasy, particularly in the early lives and backgrounds of the leaders. And even when fantasy is identified and thrown out, it is sometimes impossible to uncover facts to fill the void. For example, André Marty was billed as the great hero of the Black Sea mutiny in the French fleet and thus as one of the enlightened few who early envisioned the Soviet Union as the leader of the working classes of the world. But there is some doubt as to whether Marty played the role ascribed to him. Some observers assert that he was not even there at the time. However, it seems impossible from this side of the Atlantic to check the Communist propaganda on this matter. In addition to these myths that may distort the material on the French leaders, it was found that for fourteen of the thirty-nine little information is available.

Some comments on the social background of the leaders are also in order here. The members of the central committees have been recruited from all segments of their societies. A study of their careers and of the occupational status of their parents shows, however, that a large plurality—about forty per cent—come from a working-class background. In the Italian and French samples, men with professional backgrounds are represented in greater proportions than might be expected. Almost one-quarter of the European leaders came from professional occupations. In Italy this includes such prominent figures as Terracini and Togliatti. In France Cachin and Casanova fit into this category. It is also significant that certain groups are under-represented. Only a few of these men were ever small businessmen, entrepreneurs, or independent peasants, or were sons of men engaged in these occupations. But while the occupational groups that formed the core of the classical bourgeois middle class are relatively absent, a significant minority come from the middle-class, white-collar groups—the clerks, accountants, draftsmen, etc.—that are the products of an industrial civilization.

An examination of the social background of these individuals raises some questions about an often-assumed characteristic of members of the Communist party. It is commonly believed that the party is composed of disgruntled, downwardly mobile individuals who are suffering from a loss or prospective loss of prestige and are venting the resulting hostility on society by revolutionary activity. If this were true, a comparison of the occupations of the Communist leaders with those of their fathers should tend to show an increase in those occupations which are lacking in social prestige. However, the percentage that could be considered on the basis of occupation as belonging to the lower classes remained constant between generations. On the other hand, there was a noticeable increase in those occupations generally considered to carry with them social prestige. (The latter statements may appear paradoxical; actually the increase mentioned can occur even with the constant percentage of lower-class membership because information on the occupations of fathers was less complete than on the leaders themselves.) Thus, whereas twenty-one per cent of the central committee members had a professional background, only nine per cent of their fathers would fit into this category. The amount of education the leadership had also does not seem to indicate downward mobility. Over one-third has had some university training. As would be expected, more Americans than Europeans have had the benefits of a university education, but twenty-two per cent of the Italians, for example, are college graduates and another six per cent have had some college education.⁸ The data on mobility are fragmentary. But on the basis of a study of the variables of education and occupation, there is reason to investigate new hypotheses on the motivations that are related to joining the Communist party.

⁶ Major sources included: (1) United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, The United States of America, Appellee, v. Eugene Dennis, et al., Defendants-Appellants, Joint Appendix (New York, n.d.); (2) a number of hearings and reports of the House Committee on Un-American Activities, 1938-1951; (3) a series of press releases from the Department of Justice containing biographical information on the Communists arrested in the United States under the Smith Act.

⁷ Major sources included: (1) Dictionnaire Biographique Français Contemporain (Paris, 1950); (2) Conseil de la République, Notice et Portraits (Paris, 1947); (3) numerous issues of L'Humanité and other Communist publications in which biographical notes on individual Communists were found.

The first hypothesis had originally been formulated in terms of early membership in the party. However, since a large minority of the sample were born in the nineteenth century, it would have been impossible for them to have joined while they were still young an organization not formed until 1920 or 1921. The reformulation of the hypothesis to include participation in radical activity at an early age was based on an assumption that the social and psychological implications of association with syndicalist, anarchist, socialist, and communist groups in the first decades of the century were similar.

The first hypothesis stating that the leaders joined the party or participated in radical activity at an early age is supported rather conclusively by the figures in Table I. They indicate that fifty-one per cent were engaged in radical activity by the age of eighteen; seventy-three per cent by the age of twenty-two. It is equally important to note that only nine per cent became involved in radical activity after the age of twenty-two. A breakdown by country reveals that the ⁸ The intellectuals in the party leadership actually show signs of being upwardly mobile. A number of these came from working class backgrounds or from that amorphous border area between the working class and the bourgeoisie which is occupied by what has been appropriately called the "lumpen bourgeoisie." This point is mentioned because it is one way in which the Communist leadership seems to differ significantly from the Nazi leadership. Daniel Lerner concludes that the intellectuals in the Nazi movement were faced with a decline in status when they joined that party and implies that joining the party was one manner of coping with this prospective loss of prestige. See Daniel Lerner, The Nazi Elite (Stanford, 1951), p. 83.

TABLE I. AGE AT TIME OF FIRST RADICAL ACTIVITY

	Italy n = 72	France n = 39	Total n = 111
Before 16	37%	23%	32%
16-18	26	5	19
19-22	21	21	22
23-26	2	5	4
27-30	—	8	3
Over 30	1	2	2
No information	11	36	20

Italian leaders became involved in radical activity at earlier ages than the French—eighty-four per cent by the age of twenty-two years. The table shows that only forty-nine per cent of the French had participated in radical activity by this time, but this relatively low figure is related to the fact that there is no information available on thirty-six per cent of the French leaders. If those on whom there is no information available are dropped from the total and the percentage figure is re-calculated, we find that seventy-six per cent of the French leaders were involved in radical activity by the age of twenty-two.⁹

This hypothesis can also be supported by an examination of the ages at which those central committee members who were born in the twentieth century joined the party. This manner of testing the hypothesis, although based on a limited portion of the sample, has two advantages. First, it provides some data on age of actual adherence to the party and, secondly, it enables us to include the American leaders in the calculations. Two-thirds of the sample were born in the twentieth century. Sixty-two per cent of this group had joined the party by the age of twenty-one. If this figure is adjusted to include only those on whom there is information, it becomes seventy-five per cent. The Italian leaders are the youngest joiners; ninety-two per cent of those born after 1899 had joined the party by the age of twenty-one. The French figures are again distorted by the large number on whom information is not available, but of those born after 1899 on whom there is information, eighty-eight per cent had joined the party by the age of twenty-one. The data on the American Communists show a similar, though not as extreme a pattern as the European. Fifty-six per cent of those born in the twentieth century on whom there is information had entered the party by the age of twenty-one. The figures on the actual members of the National Committee show that of those born after 1899 all but Ben Davis, that is, nine out of ten, had joined the party by the age of twenty-two. A majority joined while still in their teens.

⁹ In a number of cases in the analysis where the "no information" category is particularly large, it was felt that a more accurate interpretation of the data could be given by using percentage figures computed on the basis of those on whom information was available. A manipulation of the figures in this manner assumes that the distribution of the variable among those on whom there is no information is the same as among those on whom information is available. In certain instances this seems to be a reasonable assumption to make, e.g., in regard to age at time of first radical activity. However, at other times it is believed that the very reason information is not available is related to the particular distribution of the variable.

There is an interesting trend among the Europeans who deviate from this predominant pattern of early participation in radical activity. There are twenty-two individuals who could be included in this group. A majority of these come from middle- or upper-class families. Since these are minority characteristics, it might be tentatively concluded that those Communist leaders who participate in radical activity later than is normal typically come from middle- or upper-class backgrounds. This would seem logical on the basis of what is known about the tendency of youth from working-class backgrounds to "mature" earlier than those from groups higher on the social ladder because of earlier separation from families and the necessity to "get along on their own" sooner. However, this is another manner in which the Communist leadership differs from the Nazi. It can be inferred from Lerner's study that Nazi leaders from middle- and upper-class backgrounds tended to join the party at younger ages than others.¹⁰

The above calculations indicate that the leaders joined the party or participated in radical activity at an early age, but one could legitimately raise the question whether the party leadership can be distinguished from the rank and file on the basis of this criterion. That question cannot be answered from the data thus far analyzed, but there is some evidence to suggest that the leadership of the party became members at significantly earlier ages than the rank and file. Table II is adapted from the forthcoming work by Almond and others entitled

TABLE II. AGE AT TIME OF FIRST RADICAL ACTIVITY FOR FORMER PARTY MEMBERS*

	Rank and File n = 97	Low Echelon n = 73	High Echelon n = 51
Before 16	12%	23%	31%
16-18	27	32	29
19-22	28	21	24
23 and over	33	21	16
No information	—	4	—

* The group of former party members includes some 225 cases collected from Italy, France, Great Britain, and the United States.

The Appeals of Communism. It indicates that among a group of former party members interviewed in several Western countries, sixty per cent of those who reached high echelon status in the party and only thirty-nine per cent of the rank and file participated in radical activity before they were nineteen years old. Just as important is the fact that although thirty-three per cent of the rank and file ex-Communists participated in their first radical activity after the age of twenty-three, only sixteen per cent of the high echelon ex-Communists did so after this age. Almond's figures on high echelon ex-Communists are comparable to our figures on members of the central committees. His figures show that eighty per cent of the ex-Communists who reach high echelon status engaged in radical activity before the age of twenty-two. The comparable figure for our sample is eighty-nine per cent.

¹⁰ The Nazi Elite (cited in note 8), pp. 10-12, 16-23.

The second working hypothesis of the study is that the leaders of the party rose quickly out of the rank and file and while they were still young moved into positions in the party that occupied most of their waking hours. Table III gives the time lapse between joining the party and devoting full time or nearly full time to party work.¹¹ It indicates that the party leadership moved up in the

TABLE III. TIME BETWEEN JOINING COMMUNIST PARTY AND BECOMING PARTY FUNCTIONARY

	Italy n = 72	France n = 39	U.S. n = 12	Total n = 123
One year	57%	28%	8%	43%
Two years	11	13	25	13
Three years	4	8	33	8
Four years	3	5	—	3
Five years	4	5	8	5
Six years	4	3	—	3
No information	17	39	33	24

party rapidly and that the leaders became functionaries at early ages. Fifty-six per cent were functionaries within two years of joining. If the unknowns are excluded, the figure is seventy-four per cent. Within three years eighty-five per cent had become functionaries—if the figure is computed on the basis of those on whom there is information. In interpreting these figures, it must be remembered that a number of the leaders joined the party at the ages of fourteen, fifteen, and sixteen. These make up a large majority of those who became functionaries only after five or six years of party membership. For these early joiners, it would be possible to be in the party for six years before becoming a functionary and yet be one at the age of twenty or twenty-one.

The Italians have the largest percentage in the one-year category. This can be explained in part by the fact that a high percentage of the present leaders of the Italian party joined in 1921, the year of its inception. Many were delegates to the Livorno conference in 1921, and although this was not considered prima facie evidence of being a functionary, many did receive official positions at that time.

¹¹ Because of the fact that it is being used as a index of recognition and acceptance of party goals, a loose concept of functionary has been employed, and the unique aspects of the party in the various countries demand that different criteria be established to determine functionary status in the several parties. For instance, in Italy during the period of fascism an exile ordered by the party qualified a man as a functionary. Participation in the Spanish Civil War as a Communist was also included in the definition of functionary.

The French figures show much the same pattern as the Italian. If those on whom there is no information are dropped out of the totals, over forty-five per cent of the French leaders fall into the one-year category. The American figures were computed only on the actual members of the National Committee. The explanation of the greater time lapse between joining the party and becoming a functionary in the case of the Americans is that only two of these men were among the founders of the party, and that most of the others joined the party at very young ages.

The assumption of functionary status can also be interpreted as indicative of relatively total commitment to the Communist party. By total commitment we mean the acceptance of and adherence to the stated and implicit goals of the party, the internalization of its value system, and complete devotion to the party in both thought and action. There was a significant number of instances in the lives of those leaders on whom information is relatively complete of the sudden and irrevocable dropping of a friend, wife, or lover at the momentary notice of the party. This was interpreted as indicative of total commitment, but since such data are accessible for only a few leaders, they are not presented quantitatively. The Communist party does not recognize a division of loyalties. It arrogates complete devotion to itself. Before a man is raised to functionary status, the party feels confident of his undying devotion, and the man himself recognizes at least to some degree the demands of leadership.

There is, however, one very good quantitative index which demonstrates commitment to the goals of the Communist party. It was assumed that one of the most reliable indicators of commitment is willingness to hold to one's beliefs and convictions in face of severe deprivation or threats of deprivation. Tables IV and V give some basis for determining this for the European leaders. Table IV reveals that almost eighty per cent of the members of the central committees in Italy and France have spent some time in prison or exile because of their political beliefs or actions based thereon.¹² The Communist party in Italy grew up in the face of totalitarian fascism, and the high percentage who were in prison or exile is, of course, a reflection of the strong coercive action

TABLE IV. NUMBER OF CENTRAL COMMITTEE MEMBERS WHO HAVE SERVED PRISON TERMS OR BEEN IN EXILE

	Italy n = 72	France n = 39	Total n = 111
Prison or exile	88%	64%	79%
No exile	10	3	7
No information	3	32	13

¹² Because of the fact that arrest for Communist activity was one of the main criteria for selecting the American members, information on them was not included in Tables IV and V.

TABLE V. AGE AT TIME OF FIRST PRISON SENTENCE OR DEPORTATION

	Italy n = 49	France n = 25
Before 21	10%	—%
21-23	28	4
24-26	16	4
27-29	12	—
28-30	5	28
Over 30	28	64

taken by the state to suppress the party, particularly after 1925. Some of the Italian leaders served long prison terms; except for a short interim in 1937, Terracini was in prison from 1926 to 1943; Togliatti lived eighteen years in exile. These figures give some idea of the implications of Communist membership and of the intensity of conviction demanded of the leadership.

The figures on the French leaders have to be interpreted in a slightly different manner. A large majority of those who served prison terms or suffered exile were arrested in 1939 when the Communist party was declared an illegal, subversive organization and was dissolved. Many of the leaders were arrested at that time; some were imprisoned, others exiled, some (e.g., Thorez) sentenced to death. The almost sixty-five per cent who were imprisoned or exiled represents in quantitative terms what adherence to the Nazi-Soviet pact meant to the French Communist leaders.

The data in Table V give us little valuable information on the French leaders; they merely reveal that a majority of the arrests took place in 1939 when most of the leadership was over thirty years old. But for the Italians they do provide another index on age at time of total commitment to the goals of the party. The total of forty-nine includes only those who were imprisoned or confined for at least one year as a result of Communist activity. For many, this occurred only after the second or third arrest; for others, it came after return from voluntary exile which was originally undertaken to escape arrest. It is felt that this indicator of "total commitment" is a very reliable one because there is complete recognition of the severe consequences of Communist activity. It should also be pointed out that it is extremely conservative; the data in Table V show age of "total commitment," but certainly not earliest age of "total commitment." Thirty-nine per cent of the Italians who served prison sentences were sentenced before they were twenty-four years old; fifty-five per cent before they were twenty-seven.¹³

¹³ For empirical data on the Russian revolutionary leaders similar to that presented above, see Jerome Davis, "A Study of 163 Outstanding Communist Leaders," American Sociological Society Papers, Vol. 24, pp. 42-55 (1930) and George K. Schueller, The Politburo (Stanford, 1951). The Russian leaders of the revolution showed many of the characteristics here reported on Western leaders. For instance, Davis reports that over three-quarters of his sample had engaged in radical activity by the age of twenty-one. For information on the Nazi leaders see Lerner, The Nazi Elite (cited in note 8).

On the basis of the information available, it can be shown that the Italian leaders have an amazing record of early commitment to the goals of the Communist party. Some of the cases are almost unbelievable. Giancarlo Pajetta, at the present time a member of the Directorate (Politburo), comes from a middle-class but radical background—his father was a lawyer and both his parents were Communists. At the age of fourteen he joined the young Communists, and soon became a member of the provincial committee of the Communist youth in Turin. Two years later, in 1927, he was expelled from the liceo and denied access to any other school in Italy because of his membership in an anti-fascist organization. At the age of sixteen he became the youngest person ever tried before the Special Tribunals, the Star Chambers of Italian Fascism, and was sentenced to two years' imprisonment. After his release from prison, he immediately began to organize clandestine Communist groups in Turin. By 1931 the police were again hot on his trail and the Directorate of the Italian party ordered him to leave Italy. After working actively in the international Communist youth movement, he was recalled to Italy in 1933. Immediately he was arrested and sent to prison for twenty-one years. This case is exceptional, to be sure, but it does give some kind of indication of the type of men that make up the Communist leadership. Pajetta had served a prison term because of his political beliefs and activity by the time he was sixteen; by the time he was twenty-two he had been forced to leave his native land, had been a member of the executive committee of the Communist youth in Moscow, and had begun to serve a twenty-one year prison sentence for Communist activity.

What conclusions can be drawn and what further hypotheses developed from the data on age at various points in the process of assimilation into the Communist movement? First of all, the two hypotheses are supported by the data. The Communist leadership did participate in radical activity at early ages and also, when possible, joined the party while still young. Most typically, these men engaged in their first radical activity while in their teens or early twenties. They also moved into positions of functionary rank quickly and while still young were what might be called "full-time employees" of the party.

The data indicate that the Communist party is a type of "closed bureaucracy"—that it recruits its leadership internally. Thus it would be natural that those who joined at the earliest ages would have the best chances of moving into positions of leadership. However, it is interesting to speculate about the relationship of early commitment to the party goals to some of the other observed characteristics of the party elite. One of their frequently mentioned characteristics is their total involvement in the party which precludes any meaningful participation in other groups or activities. Most individuals have a plurality of partially competing loyalties—loyalties to family, to church, to state, or to other social groups—no one of which is constantly subordinated to another. The high Communist functionary apparently does not have these conflicting loyalties—at least to the same degree. It seems that his duties and obligations are ordered in a relatively rigid hierarchy. Loyalty to the party is not only at the top of this hierarchy, but also determines the order and importance of whatever secondary loyalties the individual may have.

Late adolescence is the period of life when the plurality of interests and goals that characterize most men are being developed and stabilized. If during this period an individual not only joins but becomes a functionary in the Communist party, which requires that he have few relationships outside of the party, it is unlikely that such interests will ever develop. For the remainder of his life, he may have little alternative to membership in the party. Dedication to the goals of the party may become such an integral part of his personality that another life may be almost inconceivable. The top leaders enjoy what might be called a "chastity of commitment" to the party. They moved into the party before being touched by many of the demands of society—before they had a family or settled career—and after they joined, they quickly surrendered their entire lives to the needs of the organization. It is certainly reasonable to suppose that the unique type of devotion demanded by the party of its leaders is most easily commanded from an individual who became committed to the party goals before becoming encrusted with a whole host of other loyalties and obligations.

In view of the above comments, it might be said that there are two aspects of total commitment to the Communist party: (1) the internalization of the value system of the party by the individual member; (2) the loss of alternatives, once having joined. The internalization of the value system of the party can occur in a variety of social contexts. The child of loyal Communist parents who becomes a "committed" member of the party in a sense has internalized the familial value system which is more or less isomorphic with the value system of the party. The adolescent coming into the party through this avenue is at peace with his family—is not rebellious toward family authority. He is, however, by virtue of his commitment, rebellious toward all of society which is opposed to the goals of the Communist party. The life of Pajetta, reported above, illustrates how an individual can conform to the value system of the primary group, but show extreme rebelliousness toward society. There are other Communist leaders who departed radically from family values and showed rebelliousness toward the primary group. These people found party members with whom to identify and to follow and affiliated with a group outside the family. On the basis of the data available, it can thus be said that some adolescents came into the party having internalized its goals through identification with the family's value system, whereas others came into the party through rebellion against the family's value system. Unfortunately, the data are too limited to provide anything except some context in which speculation can occur about variables which are important in contributing to the different patterns of rebellion-conformity which are observed. The awareness and understanding of the existence of these various patterns in adolescent culture in general provide a problem for the social scientist. In this country there are numerous examples of adolescents who simultaneously show slavish conformity and destructive rebelliousness.

As far as the loss of alternatives is concerned, it should be noted in passing that this loss is so complete and pervading that an individual can never get back to the place where he has a variety of important choices available for him to make. When he becomes a Communist, he closes many doors which can never again be opened—even if he were to leave the party. To be an ex-Communist is very different from never having been a Communist.

There is not enough information available to provide a basis for understanding the psychological motivating forces which promoted early commitment on the part of these individuals. Little is known, for instance, about their early lives. In spite of this, it might be worthwhile to bear in mind some general factors which may shed light on the question and also provide a context for further study. It has been pointed out that the decisions of commitment were made in late adolescence and early adulthood—a time when the strong impulses, conflicts, and rebelliousness that characterize early adolescence are being resolved. It is interesting to note that while commitment to the Communist party meant making peace with one authority (party authority), it made possible continued rebellion against and conflict with extra-party authority.¹⁴ If data were available, a whole new research effort might be devoted to the investigation of the personal needs satisfied by this continued outlet for rebellion.

As mentioned above, the life of a party militant is not an easy one. Not only are the demands of the party severe, but persecution by the larger society may result from membership. This suggests that the motivating forces of the elite are strong—that the needs satisfied by active party membership are deep and pressing.

Although limited data make it inadvisable to carry this discussion much further, it is interesting to speculate on the need systems which might be in operation, the satisfaction of which would be easier and more complete through the Communist party than through the larger society. A person, for example, with a strong dominance-submission need system (i.e., with strong needs both to dominate over others and submit to others) might find more direct satisfaction through the Communist party where he submits to those above him in the organizational hierarchy and dominates those beneath him and where an issue is made of those relationships. A person who, for one reason or another, has a need to be aggressive and fight has more of a rationale for doing so as a member of a militant minority group. The Communist party is one place where these needs may be satisfied.

In summary, then, the process of commitment follows this course: (1) internalization of the party's set of values (either inside or outside of the primary group); (2) affiliation with party members; (3) the loss of alternatives (educational, vocational, social, etc.); (4) consequent reinforcement of the internalization (satisfaction of various needs).

¹⁴ The role of this type of motivation in the Nazi movement has been mentioned. See, for example, Erik H. Erikson, "Hitler's Imagery and German Youth," Psychiatry, Vol. 5, pp. 475-93, esp. pp. 475-80, 486 (Nov., 1942). Erikson characterizes Hitler as "... an adolescent who never gave in."

The previous few paragraphs have hypothesized about the possible personality characteristics of the Communist top leadership. This should not be interpreted to mean that any attempt is being made to "psychologize" the problems of the origins and development of the Communist movement. Even if it were experimentally demonstrated that a majority of the people in the Communist party had similar personality structures and need systems, we would not say that the Communist movement is "caused" by the existence of people with given personality patterns and need systems. The causes of great social movements are always too complex to be "explained" in terms of a single variable. The present knowledge in the social sciences suggests that it is most meaningful to conceptualize the problem of the origins of a movement such as communism in terms of the interaction of social forces and pressures and the need systems of different people in various groups in the society. Further speculation along these lines would not be fruitful because of lack of necessary empirical data.

URUGUAY INTRODUCES GOVERNMENT BY COMMITTEE*

MILTON I. VANGER

Harvard University

Of the ten countries in South America, nine now have presidents who are dictators or who at some time during their careers have exercised dictatorial power. The tenth, Uruguay, with its tradition of working democracy, has resisted this trend towards personalist government. Recently it took an important step in the diffusion of executive power when through orderly constitutional reform the national presidency was replaced by a nine-man executive committee. The nation's stability has been attested to by those most cautious of judges, the international investors, who, fearful of trouble in Europe after the outbreak of war in Korea, moved their capital holdings from Berne to Montevideo. The country's democracy has been even more welcomed by those who have found it an oasis of freedom from Perón's police state across the river. Uruguay has successfully met Latin America's ever basic problem, political stability under democratic procedure.

I

Casual visitors who call Uruguay the Switzerland or Denmark of South America probably have in mind its small size; its location between two large states, Brazil and Argentina; its population of merely two and a half million; its pastoral economy, political liberty, social legislation, and government economic activities; and especially its penchant for a Swiss-style pluripersonal executive. Yet at best this comparison is severely out of context.

The rolling natural pastures of the Uruguayan interior are the real basis of the nation's wealth. From the carefully bred livestock that graze them, come the wool, hides, and beef which make up ninety-seven per cent of the country's exports. But Uruguayan ranchers have been content with fencing and breeding. Continuous grazing impoverishes the unimproved natural pastures, and unchecked animal diseases take their toll. Production costs continually rise while the livestock population remains constant.¹ And the system has social evils. Families take up valuable land, so ranchers insist on a bachelor life for their few permanent peons. At the crossroads and other no-man's lands, pueblos de ratas, or "rat towns," provide gathering places where men, women, and children live in filth and promiscuity.

In contrast, Montevideo, Uruguay's capital and only big city, has the easy-

* A twenty-month stay in Uruguay on a fellowship from the Doherty Foundation, personal acquaintance with the leading figures in the reform, and close following of the Montevideo press constitute the background for this article.

¹ International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations, The Agricultural Development of Uruguay. Report of a Mission Sponsored by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and the Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations at the Request of the Government of Uruguay (Washington, D. C. and Rome, 1951), pp. 2-3.

going atmosphere of a prewar European capital. The apparatus of repression, so apparent in nearby Buenos Aires, is absent. The home of almost one-third (approximately 900,000) of the entire national population, the city performs two prime functions: it handles the country's foreign trade and acts as national administrative center. Government employment takes care of an extraordinarily large though imprecisely known number of its people, perhaps 120,000, most of them old-line bureaucrats. In spite of a policy of protection, industrialization—except for food processing—has made limited headway.

This typically Latin American combination of an underdeveloped monoculture interior and a large and, in a certain sense, parasitic capital hardly resembles Switzerland or Scandinavia. A much closer resemblance, at least to Scandinavia, appears in the area of public administration. Government bulks large in Uruguayan life. Since the country has a centralized and not a federal system, every-day matters like education and public health are under the national administration. Government functions expanded rapidly during the decade of the First World War, when Uruguay became the Western Hemisphere's pioneer in social legislation. The country had an eight-hour day and a social-security program nearly twenty years before the United States. Simultaneously, the government entered the economic field. Today, government corporations are active in or monopolize such important economic activities as transport, banking, insurance, electric power, and the importation of petroleum.² The Great Depression and World War II added to government power in Uruguay as everywhere else. The government now controls the allocation of foreign exchange, so crucial for its export-oriented economy; it subsidizes agriculture; and it participates in collective bargaining.

Democratic politics implies, of course, popular direction of government. Uruguayan politics are democratic. The country's respect for civil liberties is unsurpassed anywhere in the world, political campaigning is free and extensive, elections are honest, and their results are decisive. Yet one party, the Colorado, has been in power since 1865. The explanation of this riddle of democratic politics and indefinite one-party dominance is complex. The Colorado party has changed with the years, allowing new groups to take control. In this century a great and visionary politician, José Batlle y Ordóñez,³ saved it from defeat and gave it the impress of advanced ideas. Those unwilling to follow the new direction broke off to found new Colorado parties; most of the party stayed with Batlle y Ordóñez to form the Colorado-Batllista party. Although the different Colorado parties have separate organizations, they recognize a common tradition and pool votes at election time by means of ingenious election laws which enable them to retain control of the national executive. These techniques are adequate for normal times, but historically the stress of political crisis determines a more heroic procedure; at such times Colorado dominance has been continued only by giving the traditional opposition Blanco (or Nationalist) party participation in government.⁴

² Simon G. Hanson, Utopia in Uruguay; Chapters in the Economic History of Uruguay (New York, 1938), and George Pendle, Uruguay: South America's First Welfare State (London and New York, 1952) deal with government economic activities and social legislation.

³ The best published biography is Roberto B. Guidici and Efraín González Conzi, Batlle y el Batllismo (Montevideo, 1928).

II

President Andrés Martínez Trueba in his inaugural address on March 1, 1951, touched only briefly on the necessity for constitutional reform. Martínez Trueba was a Batllista, so that his listeners were aware of what he had in mind when he spoke—the colegiado. Forty years earlier Batlle y Ordóñez had brought back from Europe plans for a collegiate or pluripersonal executive as his solution for Latin America's ever-present problem of presidential omnipotence. Not until 1917, during the administration of his successor, was he able to get even a modified version of this plan approved by a hostile constituent assembly, and the effort split the Colorado party permanently. From 1919 to 1933 the country was governed by a president who controlled the ministries of war, interior, and foreign affairs, and a nine-man executive which controlled the other agencies. President Terra's coup in 1933 abolished the collegiate executive and restored full powers to the presidency, but the Batllista party survived Terra and won the election of 1946. Its leaders, doubly convinced of the dangers of presidential rule by the hounding they received during Terra's dictatorship, were pledged to institute the plural executive at the earliest opportunity.

While listeners were well aware of what Martínez Trueba meant, the reference to reform in his inaugural address drew little attention. Speculation was centered instead on his surprising victory in the recent November elections, for his candidacy represented the culmination of several years of uncertainty within the Batllista party. Shortly after taking office in 1946, President Tomás Berreta had died; Vice President Luis Batlle Berres, nephew of the late Batlle y Ordóñez, took over. As the new president gathered strength and popularity, he came to challenge his cousins, the three Batlle Pacheco brothers, for leadership of the party. In 1950 the issue came to a head with the nomination of two Batllista presidential candidates. The faction led by President Batlle Berres supported Martínez Trueba; the faction led by the Batlle Pacheco brothers supported the equally respected César Mayo Gutiérrez. The Batlle Berres group considered itself the reforming and advanced sector; it labelled its opposition within the party as old guard. The wing gathered around the Batlle Pacheco brothers rejected any assertion that it was conservative; the brothers themselves were Batlle y Ordóñez's sons; they ran El Día, the newspaper he founded, and were in their own right experienced political strategists. Both tickets appealed to the areas of Batllista strength: Montevideo and the towns, and the farmers—though not the ranchers—of the interior. Batlle Berres had heavy support among the working people; El Día fared better with the commercial classes.

⁴ For the political history of Uruguay see Juan E. Pivel Devoto, Historia de los Partidos Políticos en el Uruguay, 1811-1897, 2 vols. (Montevideo, 1942-1943), and Uruguay Independiente (Barcelona, 1949); Alberto Zum Felde, Evolución Histórica del Uruguay, 3d ed. (Montevideo, 1945); and Eduardo Acevedo, Anales Históricos del Uruguay, 6 vols. (Montevideo, 1933-1936).

In addition to the Batllistas, a third Colorado candidate, Dr. Daniel Blanco Acevedo, was in the field. He united in his support the Independent Colorados, a coalition made up of the remnants of groups that had split with Batlle y Ordóñez and of the political forces growing out of the Terra coup of 1933. Dr. Blanco Acevedo is himself a close relative of the late Dr. Terra, and his supporters ranged from conservative ranchers to moderates of the business and professional classes of Montevideo.

The Colorados had, as usual, agreed to pool votes. The mechanics of vote pooling are relatively simple. The ballot for each party was simply a list headed by the candidate for president and followed by the candidates for the Senate and Chamber of Deputies. The voter would choose the list of his preference and deposit it unmarked in the urn. To determine the presidential candidate, the three Colorado lists would be counted separately, and whichever of the three received the greatest number of votes would have added to its total the votes of the other two. Vote pooling is not used in the legislative elections; here seats are determined by proportional representation among the lists of all parties in the election.⁵

Pitted against the three Colorado candidates was the seventy-seven year old caudillo, Dr. Luis Alberto de Herrera, perennial candidate and unquestioned leader of the Nationalist party. Herrera had the caudillo's wide-ranging appeal, not only to ranchers but to working people in Montevideo as well. He was handicapped in that the Independent Nationalists did not pool votes with him. This group, mostly Montevideo moderates, had broken with Herrera in 1933 when he supported Terra, and their dissatisfaction with him heightened when he began flirting with Perón. The small parties—Catholic, Socialist, and Communist—stood no chance of winning the election.

Martínez Trueba's victory capped an exciting campaign and came somewhat as a surprise. Batllistas did not usually vote against El Día. Martínez Trueba's list received 161,264 votes, that of Mayo Gutiérrez 150,951 votes, and Blanco Acevedo's 120,949 votes. These pooled came to 433,164 votes, enough to defeat Herrera's 254,835 votes, although the caudillo as usual was the single candidate with the most votes. The Batllista split was so nearly equal that ultimate control of the party by any one faction was in doubt, and it was this implication that intrigued politicians as they listened to Martínez Trueba's inaugural address.

Whatever others were thinking, the new president rapidly activated his own desire for immediate reform. This too surprised many, since such willingness to give up power is unusual in politicians. Since Martínez Trueba's own party lacked the votes to carry the colegiado through alone, he sounded out Herrera.

⁵ Julio T. Fabregat, Los Partidos Políticos en la Legislación Uruguaya (Montevideo, 1949), is a compilation of the pertinent laws.

The caudillo agreed, as did Batllista leaders. Closed-door negotiations then took place between an Herrerista committee and a Batllista committee (formed from both wings of the party) in May and June of 1951.

The different political groups negotiated for different reasons. For the Batlle Pachecos of El Día, this was a wonderful opportunity. They sincerely believed in the colegiado, as had their father before them. All their experience pointed to the danger of presidential government, and the personal power and possible second presidency of Luis Batlle Berres, who very likely would try to succeed Martínez Trueba, made immediate change greatly to their benefit. The Batlle Berres wing could not be enthusiastic. They had plans for this and the next presidency; there was time enough for change later on. But the colegiado was the core of the party program; they could not cross Martínez Trueba so soon after election, so they too sat in.

Herrera's motives were even more subtle. A one-time member of the old plural executive, he had turned against it in 1933; his party had been against the colegiado ever since. But political consistency on the theoretical level had never been his forte. His own future electoral chances were dubious and he badly needed the support of the Independent Nationalists. He too looked with disfavor upon another term for Batlle Berres. Within his own party there were pullings and haulings for the position of his political heir, and the right constitutional reform could ease this unpleasant problem. It could also give the Nationalist party its time-honored goal: co-participation.

The dispute between co-participation and one-party government is almost as old as Uruguay itself. On the lowest level, it involves simply the apportionment of government employment. On another level, it asserts the necessity of control and supervision of the majority party by the minority party through representation in the government. At different times Colorados have been able to reconcile this kind of minority participation with one-party government, but they insist that policy be made by the majority party. They hold that political parties represent views reflected in distinctive party programs and that only policy makers who are in the majority party and believe in its program can meet the mandate of the voters. The assumption underlying co-participation asserts, contrariwise, that government policy concerns the whole nation; therefore representatives of important minority positions should help formulate it. Since, in fact, co-participation is the political philosophy of the "outs" and one-party government that of the "ins," party rotation in office would reduce the struggle to academic dimensions.

The parties to the secret negotiations finally made public, on August 1, a twelve-page pact to be presented for approval, first to their respective party conventions, and then jointly to the national legislature.⁶ The proposals really amounted to drastic amendments to the existing constitution, rather than general reform.⁷ The principal innovation abolished the presidency and substituted the National Government Council (Consejo Nacional de Gobierno), whose nine members would be elected concurrently for four-year terms. Six seats on the council would go to the most-voted list of the most-voted party or party pool (lema)—the same system used for the presidential election—and three to the most-voted list of the lema which followed it. The presidency of the council, a purely honorary position, would rotate annually among members of the majority list. No single councilor could issue any orders. Ministers would be appointed by the majority vote of the councilors. An analogous system of plural executives would go into effect in the local governments. Local ballots, which had previously been separate from national ones, would now be combined. This meant that the voter had to vote the straight party ticket for all elective officials.

⁶ Directorio del Partido Nacional, El Partido Nacional y la Reforma de la Constitución (Montevideo, 1952), pp. 35-47. This publication contains the discussion of the pact by the Herrerista directorate. The only other important public disclosure of the pact-making process was in a speech by Andrés Martínez Trueba, El Día (Montevideo), November 4, 1953.

Very important, because of its political implications, was the proposed system of nomination of the directors of government corporations and similar government organizations. The councilors representing the majority party would name four members of a seven-member board of directors, and the councilors representing the minority party would name three; if the board had only five members, the parties would split three and two. Similar arrangements were proposed for the Supreme Court, the important general accounting tribunal, and the new and potentially powerful administrative tribunal. Budgetary procedure was revised so that the executive would present only one budget for its four-year period. No new government jobs could be created and government wages could not be increased during the twelve months preceding general elections. These last provisions, designed to cut electoral use of the public payroll, were incorporated at the suggestion of President Martínez Trueba.

The negotiators proposed that the new government take office March 1, 1952, to fill out the last three years of Martínez Trueba's term. In the future the council would be elected by popular vote; the first council, however, would be elected by the national legislature, with the majority party members nominating six councilors, and the minority party three. This transitory measure was more important than at first appears, since it meant carrying over the result of the presidential election without re-appeal to the voters. Similarly, of the methods available for constitutional reform, the negotiators chose the one most likely to allow their pact to go through unscathed by what might be unadvantageous revisions: a constitutional law approved by two-thirds majorities of both houses of the legislature, followed by ratification in a public referendum.

Public curiosity was now excited. Just what had the major parties gotten out of the pact? The Batllistas had the colegiado; though their ultimate goal was a plural executive with all nine seats going to the majority party, they compromised, as Batlle y Ordóñez had done in 1917, by giving three seats to the minority. The Herreristas got what they considered co-participation: three seats on the council and extension of the existing practice of giving them representation on government boards of directors. These well-paying jobs and keys to important patronage represented a sizable gain. Both groups profited from provisions limiting vote pools to factions of the "historic parties," thereby denying the benefit of pooling to coalitions of the smaller parties. The single ballot for national and local elections was important to the Batllistas, who were worried about ticket-splitting in Montevideo. There was a similar give and take on other party problems of an immediate nature. To protests that this was an immoral split of political loot, the negotiating parties replied that once approved by the party conventions the pact would be submitted to the legislature where reasonable changes could be made.

⁷ Russell H. Fitzgibbon, "Adoption of a Collegiate Executive in Uruguay," Journal of Politics, Vol. 14, pp. 616-42 (Nov., 1952), considers that the modifications were sufficiently basic to constitute a new constitution. This article also compares the Swiss and Uruguayan constitutions.

It was at this stage that ex-President Luis Batlle Berres, who had remained silent throughout the negotiations, chose to complicate matters. Speaking at a party meeting in the river town of Paysandú, he first reaffirmed his faith in the colegiado and then expressed his dissatisfaction with the particular reform in progress. He called instead for the popular election of a constituent assembly. Such an assembly would serve a twofold purpose: it would test Herrera's loyalty in carrying out the pact—a loyalty which the speaker doubted—and it would stir up the public enthusiasm necessary for the colegiado's successful existence. The proposed political reforms were inadequate; social and economic reforms would have to be added.⁸

The speech created a furore. If he persisted in this attitude, Batlle Berres would break with Martínez Trueba, repudiate those of his supporters who had helped negotiate the pact, and lay himself open within the party to charges of duplicity. Such a position was politically unfeasible.

When the Batllista convention opened later in August, those who expected fireworks were disappointed. The pact's negotiators explained its provisions. The proposed colegiado was, they insisted, an improvement over the earlier one, since it would not have to divide power with a president. They denied that the new government would mean co-participation; one party would have the absolute majority and this majority would name all the ministers and make all decisions, thereby preserving one-party government. The presence of the minority on the council and on boards of directors would merely assure that no illegal acts took place. They reminded the convention that the late Batlle y Ordóñez himself had accepted the same arrangement in the old colegiado and had considered it one-party government. Only second-line leaders of the Batlle Berres wing spoke in opposition to the pact and even they came around to its support, although with reservations. César Batlle Pacheco, chief strategist of the El Día faction, in a strong speech defending the pact, dismissed the argument for a constituent assembly: "A general would be very imprudent if he moved his army through the most dangerous roads when he could conduct it through safer ones."⁹ There were roars of approval and the pact was ratified.

⁸ Acción (Montevideo), August 16, 1951.

The Nationalist convention which met shortly afterwards was a smaller affair. Herrera's followers long since had adopted the line, "follow the caudillo in whatever he does." The caudillo now wanted the pact confirmed; the convention responded by unanimously approving it. Even those whose political futures were being darkened by the reform toed the line.

The project now went to the legislature, where promised modifications were forthcoming. Complicated revisions were introduced into the electoral law designed to give one of the majority's seats on the council to the Independent Colorados and one of the minority seats to the Independent Nationalists and so secure the support of these groups for the reform. Sensitive to complaints that the dignity of justice would be impaired by provisions concerning the judiciary, the contracting parties revised the methods for nomination of members of the Supreme Court and other tribunals, but the practical effects on party division of posts were slight. Another change gave the Senate a nominal right of rejection over nominees to the boards of directors of government corporations.

These alterations attracted votes, but the fundamentals of the reform remained. Revisions were decided upon in committee; debate on the floor was for the record. Within two months easy approval was secured.¹⁰ Only one more step, approval by the voters, remained.

The parties now opposing the reform represented a very small part of the electorate; in the presidential elections of 1951 their combined vote was only one-seventh of the total vote. The colegiado itself was not a major issue. Within the opposition, the Civic Union (Catholic) and Socialist parties sympathized with certain types of plural executives, the Communists were indifferent to the question, and only old-guard Independent Colorados detested it. They had broken with Batlle y Ordóñez in 1913 over the issue; they now repudiated Dr. Blanco Acevedo, whose support the reform had won. Theirs was the traditional argument: the colegiado was slow, cumbersome, inefficient, costly, anarchic; furthermore, it gave one-third of the government to the opposition.

The anti-reform forces united behind the slogan, "Vote No Against This Abomination." Claiming that the voters who had elected a president for four years were being victimized by spoils-minded politicians, they asserted that the unspoken motives behind the pact were to resolve the Batlle family struggle and settle Herrera's internal feuds. How could Batllistas and Herreristas, at each other's throats for years, now embrace? The anti-reform forces sneered at what they called the new golden rule of Uruguayan politics: divide the jobs three and two.¹¹ The entrenched political organizations were, they maintained, ⁹ El Día, August 23, 1951.

¹⁰ República Oriental del Uruguay, Ley Constitucional sancionada el 26 de octubre de 1951, que será sometida a plebiscito de ratificación el 16 de diciembre de 1951 (Montevideo, 1951), pp. 3-94.

¹¹ El Diario (Montevideo), December 15, 1951.

trying to write their present predominance into the Constitution against the future. The opposition concluded its attack on the pact by calling on the good sense and common decency of the voters to reject what it considered a colossal affront.

Unity among the parties favoring reform was at best only apparent. Luis Batlle Berres was in Europe leading Uruguay's delegation to the United Nations; his followers made no great effort to hide their distaste for what was transpiring. They attacked Herrera daily. Within the party they repeated their pre-convention strategy: on the basis of their majority in the presidential election, they demanded all five seats available on the coming National Government Council; yet once more they retreated. At nominating time they settled for two seats for their faction, two for El Día, and one for Martínez Trueba as a neutral. Dr. Blanco Acevedo had been promised the remaining majority seat, and his contribution to the campaign was a simple and direct, "Vote Yes so that Blanco Acevedo can go to the council." The campaign of the Batlle Berres group was far less direct; it was really designed to encourage abstention or worse. In fact, shortly before election day, they felt compelled to deny publicly that they were working against reform.¹² The El Día group worked hard; they called on the faithful to pay their debt to the late Batlle y Ordóñez, end presidential power, and help achieve the Batllista dream, the colegiado. Herrerista leaders were equally anxious to win. This was, for them, the best deal their party and their country had been offered in years. On the stump neither Batllista nor Herrerista speakers were anxious to defend the embarrassing pact; they preferred to call the opposition names.

It was apparent that the pro-reform campaign had not caught fire in Montevideo. The unions were afraid that the new government would weaken their friend Luis Batlle Berres and result in a less sympathetic policy toward organized labor. Students feared that the reform would introduce politics into the national university; formal disavowal by the negotiating parties of any such intent did not fully satisfy their doubts. A sharp drop in wool prices dampened economic activity and produced general discontent. Yet that seven-to-one vote majority of the parties favoring reform made even a close vote seem unlikely.

December 16, the day set for the referendum, was a pleasant summer Sunday. As expected, the vote was light and orderly. That night alarming results began to come over the radio. For those who listened at El Día it brought back memories of the colegiado's first defeat, thirty-five years before. Montevideo was voting against the reform. Several hours later bulletins from the interior showed that ratification would squeak through. Tension slacked off, El Día's siren announced victory—but in the back of many minds was a vision of dark and evil things narrowly averted.

Montevideo had voted "No" by 32,645 votes; the interior "Yes" by 60,157. Preliminary national totals were 196,025 votes "Yes," 168,513 "No." When challenged votes were added, a total of 429,760 had voted and the final favorable majority was 34,392.¹³ Only half as many had voted as in the last presidential election.

¹² Acción, December 15, 1951.

El Día put on the best possible face and interpreted the result as another victory of reason over obscurantism. Herreristas attributed victory to the Nationalist votes from the interior. The joy of Luis Batlle Berres' followers was open: the electorate had heeded their warnings, and their leader's political fortunes were redeemed. The opponents of ratification were surprised and delighted by the closeness of the outcome. Some even made half-hearted suggestions that the Constitution be disregarded and new general elections held. But such talk died quickly and agreement to respect the vote was general.

It was not clear what the unusual vote implied. Hard times, union and student discontent, and other transient causes had something to do with the outcome. Many attributed all the credit or blame to the equivocal maneuverings of the Batlle Berres group. But the major reason why Montevideo voted "No" was the pact itself. The opposition made skillful use of its less savory features, and its sponsors were hesitant in its defense.

A significant fact coming out of the referendum was that the currents which agitate Montevideo do not carry to the interior. Montevideo is the country's political center where overall decisions are made; the interior's role is largely passive. In the capital the neighborhood political club moves the voters; in the interior it is the local caudillo. Interior politics still center on the traditional party symbols, while Montevideo's are more complex. The capital's voters demonstrated independence and a willingness to decide on particular issues. This great loosening of party discipline can develop into a large floating vote and seriously prejudice the supremacy of the traditional parties which the constitutional reform attempts to perpetuate.

III

On March 1, 1952, government by committee was installed. The new government faced a difficult if not crucial situation. Martínez Trueba's year in the presidency had been devoted to seeing the reform through. He had been inactive on other fronts. The post-Korea bonanza wool prices, which capped the Batlle Berres era, had disappeared. The treasury was left with deficits from these free-spending years while current revenues plummeted.

There was some uncertainty whether the national council could successfully confront its problems. Public vote had given it only shaky approval. Its composition, a by-product of the pact, presented possible difficulties. Could the cohesive majority necessary for its functioning be fashioned from one neutral Batllista (Martínez Trueba), two Batllistas from El Día, two Batllistas from the Batlle Berres wing, and Blanco Acevedo, an Independent Colorado? Luis Batlle Berres' return from Europe in April heightened the possibility of dissension, especially when he began a campaign of criticism against Martínez ¹³ Acción, December 17, 1951; Directorio del Partido Nacional (cited in note 6), p. 14.

Trueba. This development was not surprising, since the Batlle Berres group now had only two-ninths of an executive which they believed belonged to them totally.

Forebodings of serious dissension have not yet materialized; on the whole the council has acted firmly and smoothly. It met its biggest test when it took extraordinary measures and ended a general Montevideo transport strike in September, 1952, acting with more firmness than Martínez Trueba had shown under like circumstances during his term of office. Later, in the face of considerable vocal opposition, it ratified a defense treaty with the United States, and the legislature after some delay concurred.

The council's principal preoccupation throughout its first two years has been meeting the continuing economic difficulties brought on by the wool crisis. It saw through the legislature a budget as austere as political conditions would permit, one of whose provisions limited the filling of vacancies in government employment. It has severely regulated foreign trade by cutting imports and has resisted a more favorable dollar exchange rate for wool exports, with the result that the 1953 commercial balance was favorable after two years of deficit.¹⁴ In addition to retrenchment, the council has attempted a positive economic policy. It has approved and the legislature is considering large-scale electrification expansion and long-range economic development plans in cooperation with the World Bank. A six-year public works program frankly designed to provide needed employment has also been submitted.

The council's economic policy has been both realistic and foresighted, but in the absence of a higher world wool price its immediate results have not been to bring back good times. Hard times lose votes and the election approaches. The council has already felt obliged to approve a rise in old-age pensions and has refused to raise the retail milk price in Montevideo. Similar steps will undoubtedly be taken before 1954 ends.

One definite result of the new government has been to increase the strength of party organization. Since neither the Batllista nor the Herrerista councilors have any large personal followings, they need party support and approval for their acts; this gives the party caucus increased importance. Coincidentally, executive influence over the legislature has been weakened. Political pressure on legislators comes from the party caucus rather than from the councilors. This weakening of the political power of the executive and strengthening of the political party was precisely the intended result of the reform, but it is not an inherent characteristic of the collegiate institution. To win elections the parties will have to put up strong popular candidates who, when elected, may be far less amenable to party discipline than are the members of the present council.

From the very start all of this council's deliberations have been influenced by the coming 1954 elections, when party strength under the new system will be measured for the first time. It was almost inevitable that the old co-participation controversy would become a central issue. Colorado majority cohesion has conserved one-party government in large part. The favorable vote on the defense treaty with the United States was six to three along party lines. In the trying days of the transport strike, and at other times, unanimity and minority assent were sought. This is minority participation in policy making—real co-participation. The increasing political pressures which the election brings make any serious Batllista-Herrerista cooperation difficult. Although the councilors of the Batlle Berres faction have generally voted with their El Día brethren, outside the council the Batlle Berres group is already campaigning against a presumed El Día-Herrerista control of the government.

¹⁴ Speech by Eduardo Acevedo Alvarez, Minister of Finance, El Día, November 7, 1953.

IV

Subordinate political considerations play a large role in Uruguay. Such concerns are not unique to that country, of course, but some of them are of a special sort. In the United States the development of social security and the merit system have cut much of the vote-delivering power of political organizations. Uruguay has an older social security system and a relatively larger bureaucracy, but these have enhanced the vote-delivering power of political organizations. If an eligible applicant for an old-age pension waits for normal processing, years elapse; presentation of a politician's calling card speeds the pension through. Similarly, political influence is the safest and surest means of advancement in government service. In other countries the social-service state is markedly impersonal, here it is markedly personal. The price Uruguay has to pay for this condition is high: the large and lazy bureaucracy taxes resources, and overstaffing with political appointees has wrecked the earnings and service capacities of once successful government corporations. The price is high in another way: the situation imposes on political leaders a base and discouraging tutelage, and on the voters a reciprocal skepticism—as was so apparent in the process of constitutional reform.

The unusual nature of the recent change is in contrast with the quietness of current politics. Although the country has moved with the times, it is no longer Latin America's social and economic innovator. Actually the Batllista party program has not been revised in almost thirty years; party leadership is divided between the sons and the nephew of the founder. Herrera, seventy-eight years old, has dominated his party for three decades. Even in the smaller parties the pattern is repeated. Uruguayan politics today is dominated by old men and the sons who have inherited their fathers' authority and political views.

The colegiado itself is not exotic to Uruguayans. The idea has been before them for forty years. They have experienced fifteen years of mixed pluripersonal and presidential government. And certainly in the present reform lofty aims have been confused with practical political considerations.

Can government by committee survive? The usual objections are that it is slow, cumbersome, and ineffectual. Not necessarily: a collegiate executive can be firm, as the present government has shown in its decisive handling of the transport strike, while a president can be vacillating. It is true that under the pressure of economic crisis, President Terra overthrew the existing colegiado in 1933 in Uruguay's only twentieth-century deviation from constitutional government. Yet the important cause then was not the council's policy in the face of difficulty, but control of the different branches of government by antagonistic political groups. The current reform fills the needs of the existing political situation. Political shifts in the future are much more likely to produce difficulties for the plural executive than is its own possible ineptness.

A threat to the colegiado could quite likely endanger Uruguay's most compelling success—political stability under democratic procedure. It bears repeating that the country's respect for civil liberties is unsurpassed anywhere in the world, that Uruguayan political campaigning is free and extensive, that elections are honest, and that election results are decisive. Even the devious maneuverings of politicians are the offshoots of democratic politics, since they spring from the necessity of securing ultimate public approval. Among the complex bases of Uruguay's political stability, one seems cardinal: there is not so great a difference between the political parties that they cannot abide by the results of an election. This fact must be properly appreciated. It does not mean identity of interests or merely personal politics. These last years have been heavily political so that personal differences have come to the forefront. In addition, however, certain general ideological tendencies can be discerned. Batllistas are sympathetic to government intervention, Herreristas tend to defend ranchers' interests; Batllistas favor freethinking, Herreristas do not; Batllistas, and indeed all Colorados, are pro-American, Herreristas are pro-Argentine; Batllistas emphasize comprehensive party organization, Herreristas have a much looser organizational framework. These are discernible tendencies; they are not always formalized in campaign platforms. Americans sometimes seem to expect politics in other countries to be highly rigid both ideologically and socially, forgetting the essential ambiguousness of the American party system. Uruguayan political parties resemble their American counterparts in that they try to make the broadest possible appeal without neglecting the interests of their long-time supporters.

Latent threats to Uruguay's stability can always be suggested. Some say that a demagogue could gather strength with the unions and emulate Perón. But Montevideo's limited industry provides too small a proletariat to support such a movement, even if the unions so desired. It is true that rural workers are exploited, but so far they are content with the old parties. If Montevideo's floating independent vote should solidify into new political molds, it would pose a problem for the existing electoral system. But such a new force would more likely be a stabilizing and democratic element whose demands could be met through constitutional reform. Serious realignments within the traditional parties would pose the greatest threat, but there is much precedent for compromise and solution. There is every chance that the country's orderly development will continue.

For the short run all eyes are on this November's election. Within the Bat- lista party, jockeying for this crucial vote has long been underway. The Batlle Berres faction wants separate lists for its candidates and those of El Día, in a win-or-lose struggle for all the council seats available. It refuses to take responsibility for the acts of the present government and is attempting to rally the Independent Colorados to its side by calling for an eventual all-Colorado colegiado. El Día is quite satisfied with the present collegiate arrangement and demands that the Batlle Berres group either support or leave the government. It calls on all Batllistas to unite around the true principles of the party in opposition to the personalist leadership of Luis Batlle Berres.¹⁵ It therefore resists separate lists in favor of a joint list including both factions and neutrals. Either separate lists, a joint list, or some form of proportional representation can be reconciled with the electoral system. On the basis of the past, some compromise whereby both factions are represented on the council would be the most likely outcome. Among the Herreristas, agitation is even greater, if possible. The struggle over succession which the caudillo hoped had been submerged by the reform has broken loose. There will be two Herrerista lists, one with and one without the blessing of Herrera.

The campaign promises to be intense and bitter, with a Batllista victory its generally expected outcome. Because of the struggle for votes within the parties, it appears likely that Herrera, César Batlle Pacheco, and Luis Batlle Berres will head electoral lists and have places in the next government. If so, this will present the colegiado with its greatest challenge and its greatest opportunity. It will be challenged to produce a working government with the country's three most powerful political leaders daily facing each other across the table. It will be an opportunity for the best and most experienced leadership the country can offer to transcend squabbles and to continue political stability under democratic procedure; and, through revitalizing the country's bureaucracy, increasing basic production, extending social justice to the rural poor, and extending production and social justice in the capital as well, to progress toward a richer life for all Uruguayans.

¹⁵ El Día, February 2, 1954.

BOOK REVIEWS, NOTES, AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL ARTICLE.....	515
Notes on Literature Available for the Study of Comparative Public Administration. FRED W. RIGGS.....
	515
REVIEWS OF BOOKS.....	538
Strauss , Natural Right and History. JOHN H. HALLOWELL.....
	538
Fainsod , How Russia is Ruled; Rostow , The Dynamics of Soviet Society; Hazard , Law and Social Change in the U.S.S.R. W. W. KULSKI.....
	541
Osgood , Ideals and Self-Interest in America's Foreign Relations: The Great Transformation of the Twentieth Century. NORMAN J. PADEL-FORD.....
	544
North , Moscow and the Chinese Communists. LINDSAY OF BIRKER...
	546
Brown and Opie , American Foreign Assistance; Mack , Raising the World's Standard of Living: The Coordination and Effectiveness of Point Four, United Nations Technical Assistance, and Related Programs. WALTER R. SHARP.....
	548
Macmahon , Administration in Foreign Affairs. JOHN A. VIEG.....
	551
Harris , The Advice and Consent of the Senate: A Study of the Confirmation of Appointments by the United States Senate. V. O. KEY, JR..
	553
Deutsch , Nationalism and Social Communication: An Inquiry into the Foundations of Nationality. HAROLD D. LASSWELL.....
	554
Pfeffer , Church, State, and Freedom. MULFORD Q. SIBLEY.....
	556
Dahl and Lindblom , Politics, Economics, and Welfare. BERTRAM M. GROSS.....
	558
Leuchtenberg , Flood Control Politics: The Connecticut River Valley Problem, 1927-1950. CHARLES D. CURRAN.....
	560
Friedrich and Galbraith (eds.) , Public Policy: A Yearbook of the Graduate School of Public Administration, Harvard University, 1953. C. HERMAN PRITCHETT.....
	562
Wheeler-Bennett , The Nemesis of Power: The German Army in Politics, 1918-1945. HENRY L. BRETTON.....
	563
BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY.....	565
AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS.....
	565
FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT.....
	576
INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS.....
	586
POLITICAL THEORY, RESEARCH, AND METHODOLOGY.....
	598

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL ARTICLE

NOTES ON LITERATURE AVAILABLE FOR THE STUDY OF COMPARATIVE PUBLIC ADMINISTRATION

I. COMPARATIVE ADMINISTRATION—AN EMERGENT FIELD

American interest in public administration abroad began with a concern for improving American administration. This resulted in comparisons between American and foreign practice, usually in favor of the latter, and in recommendations for the importation of this or that institution from abroad. Dorman B. Eaton's Civil Service in Great Britain: A History of Abuses and Reforms and Their Bearing upon American Politics (New York, Harper, 1880) is a classic of this literature. Abounding in value judgments, it mixes exhortation and prescription with descriptive material. Administrative institutions were viewed as discrete objects which could be imported upon demand, little attention being paid to the environmental factors which conditioned the development of an institution in its original home or to the limitations upon and possible effects of its introduction into a new environment.

At a later stage, students of comparative administration devoted themselves largely to describing the various systems—generally European, or at least Western—and to noting similarities and differences in respect to institutions and behavior.

The responsibilities and aspirations of occupation government in Germany, Japan, and elsewhere, the follow-through on economic and military foreign aid, and the development of technical assistance programs—especially in public administration—have all brought to the fore the problem of which ideas or institutions derived from American administrative experience may appropriately be transferred to other countries. Thus William C. Colman, in his "Civil Service Reform in Greece," Public Personnel Review, Vol. 10, pp. 86-93 (April, 1949), discusses some of the difficulties in this connection encountered by American advisers in Greece. The interdependence of administrative institutions and behavior with their cultural, economic, and political context has become apparent and has necessitated a revision of old working assumptions.

The contemporary outlook on comparative administration is also influenced by the injection of the new insights of the behavioral sciences into administrative theory. The question is raised whether "principles" of administration developed in the American context have any general validity or whether they merely describe administrative institutions and practices in one country. At the same time the separation of the study of administration from that of political processes has been challenged, decision making in the executive branch of our government has been subjected to intensive scrutiny, and many traditional conclusions of administrative theory have been questioned. All this has led to the notion that comparative analysis can be used to check the ideas and hypotheses derived from study of American public administration, furnish new insights into the nature of administrative behavior, and assist in overcoming the ethnocentrism of much of the existing literature in this field.

Three recent studies give some idea of how much progress has been made and what needs to be done next. A subcommittee of the Committee on Public Administration of the American Political Science Association, under the chairmanship of Professor Walter Sharp of Yale University, gave some attention to this problem. The subcommittee's unpublished report to the Association in September, 1953 included a preliminary checklist of research areas and priorities, an outline of a suggested method of study of comparative administration, a discussion of a possible conceptual framework, and proposals for a pilot research project to initiate more intensive study in this field.

Another document showing current interests in comparative administration research is the report of a Conference on Comparative Administration convened by Public Administration Clearing House, Princeton, N.J., Sept. 12-14, 1952 (published as Report of a Conference on Comparative Administration). Annex VI of this report, a 10-page memorandum entitled "Samples of Foreign Publications on Comparative Administration," illustrates some of the main categories of material available for comparative study. Annex IX is a reprint of a "Report on Non-Government Research on Comparative Administration," by the Department of State, External Research Staff. This includes, in addition to an analysis of current research in the field, a list of research projects underway on administrative subjects in countries receiving Point Four aid.

A parallel line of inquiry is reflected in the article "Research in Comparative Politics," this REVIEW, Vol. 43, pp. 641-75 (Sept., 1953), which reports the findings of the Social Science Research Council Interuniversity Research Seminar on Comparative Politics held at Northwestern University in the summer of 1952. This report discusses some of the conceptual problems of conducting comparative studies of the whole range of political problems, including those of administration.

II. COMPARATIVE MATERIALS

In this review of the literature on comparative and foreign materials, the major bibliographical sources are listed, together with a number of individual works selected, for the most part, because they use a comparative approach or are not included in existing bibliographies. The sources cited relate mainly to administration at the national or central government level. Limitations of space dictate omission of references to the substantial body of comparative literature on local government and municipal administration. The listing of materials in English is more complete than that of materials in other languages, but samples of the foreign language material have been cited to give some idea of its extent and character.

Bibliographies. There are a few bibliographies on the literature available for the study of comparative administration. A Short International Bibliography of Public Administration (UN, Sales No. 1953. II. H.1) brings together titles on public administration from 24 countries in 8 languages and suggests the subject matter of public administration through selective listing of representative current materials. A mimeographed 50-page list by Professor Lynton K. Caldwell entitled Comparative Public Administration: An Outline of Topics and Readings (Albany, New York, Graduate Program in Public Administration, 1953) lists literature, largely in English, on a variety of public service systems outside the United States. (This bibliography is now out of print.)

The U.S. Technical Cooperation Administration issued, in July, 1953, a mimeographed Selected Bibliography for Public Administration Representatives which, while it lists mainly American works on public administration, includes a section on "Comparative Administration and Public Administration in Individual Countries" and a valuable listing of materials under the heading "Technical Assistance in Public Administration." The latter may be supplemented by Standards and Techniques of Public Administration with Special Reference to Technical Assistance for Underdeveloped Countries (UN, TAA, Special Committee on Public Administration Problems, N.Y., 1951. Sales No. 1951. II. B.7). This is intended as a tool for practitioners in underdeveloped countries, but it includes some conceptual analysis based upon the thinking of an international team.

Bibliographical notes appear in many journals of political science and public administration, as in the section on Book Notes and Bibliography, "Foreign and Comparative Government," in this REVIEW. The Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives [RISA] (Brussels, International Institute of Administrative Sciences, 1928-date) is a quarterly journal of international scope that has included bibliographical listings and comment. Its coverage is best on Western Europe and the United Kingdom, although other parts of the world are not completely neglected. Major categories include administrative law and organization, public service and fiscal administration, and program fields such as police administration, public health, social security, labor, and transport and communications. In the first years of publication materials were classified by country under each major subject heading. Later the subarrangement by country was abandoned, and since 1950 the comprehensive current bibliographies have been dropped from the RISA, although reviews and annotations of selected titles have been retained.

The International Institute commenced in 1953, on behalf of the United Nations and the U.S. Foreign Operations Administration, the publication of a bi-monthly bulletin called Progress in Public Administration, dealing especially with administration in the economically less-developed countries. It gives current bibliographical information. Useful also are International Political Science Abstracts, issued quarterly by the International Political Science Association with support from UNESCO (N.Y., Columbia University Press).

The Statesman's Year-Book (New York, St. Martin's Press, 1934-date) contains not only information about the government of every country in the world, but also a selected bibliography for each country section. These bibliographies generally include major public documents and reference works, and often cite other bibliographies concerning the country.

Some international bibliographies dealing with special subject fields are useful for comparative studies. An example is the Selected List of Books, Pamphlets and Periodicals in English on Community Organization and Development (UN, Doc. No. ST/SOA/Ser.0/5, March 1953). This bibliography includes descriptions of development and planning projects in non-Western as well as Western countries. The Revue de l'Institut International de Statistique (The Hague, 1933-, quarterly) includes a "Bibliographie statistique internationale" in each issue. Materials in the housing and planning field may be located through the News Sheet of the International Federation of Housing and Town Planning (The Hague). A list of works on federalism is given in E. Monpied and E. Zaleski, Bibliographie fédéraliste (Paris, l'Union, 1950). Information about other such specialized bibliographies may be obtained from Constance M. Winchell, Guide to Reference Books (Chicago, American Library Association, 1951).

American publications dealing with specialized fields frequently list works on foreign countries. For example, the U. S. Civil Service Commission Library issues a monthly annotated bibliography entitled Personnel Literature which includes a section on "Foreign Civil Service." Similar listings may be found in the journals and periodicals in many specialized fields.

Bibliographies listing works on administration in specific regions or countries are mentioned below in the sections dealing with the various geographic areas.

General Studies. The use of an analytical comparative method for public administration studies is still limited. There are some books of readings and collections of essays which treat administrative institutions in several countries. Often the introduction, and some comments in the body of the text, draw attention to similarities and differences among the administrative arrangements of the countries concerned, but the mere collection in one volume of descriptive essays about different systems cannot be considered a comparative method, although it provides a foundation for comparisons. A book such as Administration: The Art and Science of Organization and Management, ed. Albert Lepawsky (New York, Knopf, 1949), drawing as it does on a wide variety of sources, provides good material for comparative study.

Some of the books on politics and government have made use of a comparative method, and have included sections dealing with administrative problems. Examples are Herman Finer, The Theory and Practice of Modern Government with Special Reference to Great Britain, France, Germany and the U.S.A. (N.Y., Holt, 1949) and C. J. Friedrich, Constitutional Government and Democracy (Boston, Ginn, rev. ed., 1950).

An essay that illustrates some of the possible fruits of comparative study is S. E. Finer, "Patronage and the Public Service; Jeffersonian Bureaucracy and the British Tradition," Public Administration [London], Vol. 30, pp. 329-60 (Winter, 1950). This article, stimulated by a reading of Leonard D. White's The Federalists and The Jeffersonians, makes some provocative comparisons of the evolution of the patronage system in nineteenth-century Britain and in the United States.

Aspects of Administration. In the literature on the various aspects of administration, such as public personnel, finance and budgeting, and program planning and coordination, there are works which deal with the subject in different countries and at different times. Thus considerable descriptive material about foreign public personnel administration is available. A classic example of this approach is the book by Leonard D. White and others, Civil Service Abroad: Great Britain, Canada, France, Germany (New York, McGraw-Hill, 1935) and the earlier collection of public documents from 15 countries, edited by White, The Civil Service in the Modern State (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1930). Reader in Bureaucracy, ed. Robert K. Merton (Glencoe, Ill., Free Press, 1952), contains a collection of materials on different aspects of the civil service drawn from a variety of countries.

Historical accounts of civil service systems also provide background for comparative analysis, as for example Ernest Barker, The Development of Public Services in Western Europe, 1660-1930 (London, Oxford, 1944); M. Cary, "The Civil Service in Ancient Civilizations," in The Development of the Civil Service (London, King, 1922); and J. H. Hofmeyer, "Civil Service in Ancient Times," Public Administration [London], Vol. 5, pp. 76-93 (Jan., 1927). In some general histories the civil service is given considerable attention, as for example in the Cambridge Ancient History (Cambridge, Cambridge University Press, 1923, 12 vols.).

Several contemporary civil service systems are discussed in Report on the UN Seminar on Public Personnel Management (UN, Doc. ST/TAA/Conf. 1/1, 31 Jan. 1952). This 236-page document contains statements by practicing administrators about the civil service in Pakistan, the Philippines, Israel, Denmark, Norway, and France in addition to general discussion by participants on various problems raised in papers by American experts. Much of the material prepared for this seminar, somewhat revised, appears in the July, 1951 issue of Personnel Administration (Washington, D.C., Society for Personnel Administration). Among essays comparing aspects of public service administration in two countries may be mentioned Leon D. Epstein, "Political Sterilization of Civil Servants: The United States and Great Britain," Public Administration Review, Vol. 10, pp. 281-90 (Autumn, 1950).

In the organization and management field, a series published by the International Institute of Administrative Sciences for the United Nations includes a survey of problems encountered by different governments in attempting to improve organization and management prepared by Thomas D. Kingdom, Improvement of Organization and Management in Public Administration (Brussels, 1951); and a study of the organizational setting of O & M offices by Arnold Miles, Central O & M Offices; What They Do and Where They Are (Brussels, 1951).

A study of the development of planning in European and American governments, sponsored by the Public Administration Clearing House, is Sir Henry N. Bunbury, Governmental Planning Machinery: A Comparative Study (Chicago, Public Administration Service, 1938). On regional plans, a comparative study carried out by the International Geographic Union, Commission for the Study of Regional Planning, has been published as L'aménagement de l'espace; planification régionale et géographique (en Italie, Belgique, Grande-Bretagne, Venezuela) (Paris, Colin, 1952).

Public finance and budget and fiscal administration are the subjects of recent comparative studies. For example, Budgetary Structure and Classification of Government Accounts (UN, Doc. no. 1951, XVI.3, 1951), prepared by the U.N. Department of Economic Affairs, sets forth general ideas on "good practice" and adds an appendix in which the budget systems of four countries—Italy, Sweden, the U.S., and the U.S.S.R.—are described. A similar method is followed in Government Accounting and Budget Execution (UN, Doc. no. ST/ECA/16, 1952). There is also a useful report of an international conference, with materials on some ten countries, in the U.N. Fiscal Commission, Report on the Technical Assistance Conference on Comparative Fiscal Administration (UN, N.Y., Doc. no. E/CN.8/67, 5 Dec. 1952).

A comparative study by an international non-governmental organization is Institut International de Finances Publiques, Le budget dans le cadre de l'économie nationale; L'évolution de la structure et de la technique budgétaire dans les différents pays (Paris, Sirey, 1950). Other private studies are: Emanuele MorSELLI, "On the Historiography of Thought on Public Finance," Public Finance, Vol. 6, pp. 53–80 (1951); and F. Neumark, "National Types of Public Finance," Öppnåre Financien [Public Finance], Vol. 2, pp. 18–38 (1947). A study prepared for the New York State Tax Commission is J. Wilner Sundelson, Budgetary Methods in National and State Governments (Albany, 1938).

Substantive Fields. Though studies in substantive fields are generally concerned largely with technical problems, some deal with common aspects of administration. For social welfare administration, for example, the United Nations has conducted an extensive inquiry resulting in the publication of Methods of Social Welfare Administration (UN, Doc. no. 1950. IV.10, 1950). This document gives the replies from 30 countries to a questionnaire. The replies are followed by a brief summary. Subsequent studies dealing with special aspects of this subject are found in a series on Social Services: Planning, Organization and Administration for Social Welfare. These include In-Service Training in Social Welfare (UN, Doc. E/CN.5/261, 1952) and Methods of Administering Assistance to the Needy (UN, Doc. CE/CN.5/273, 1952).

In the educational field an older study by the International Bureau of Education is entitled L'organisation de l'instruction publique dans 53 pays (Geneva, 1931). A recent comparative study on the administration of economic development, an IIAS document, by Donald C. Stone and others, is entitled National Organization for the Conduct of Economic Development Programs (Brussels, IIAS, 1954). The material is arranged topically and the experience of different countries is used in the presentation.

The administration of foreign affairs and relations with international organizations has been of interest to UNESCO which, with the help of the International Institute of Administrative Sciences and the guidance of Walter R. Sharp, prepared a document entitled National Administration and International Organization: A Comparative Study of Fourteen Countries (Brussels, IIAS, 1951). A similar study on the administrative problems of "newly independent countries" in the international field is now being conducted by UNESCO.

III. STUDIES OF ADMINISTRATION IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES

If comparative studies in public administration are to advance, much information about different administrative systems will be needed. The accumulation of such information is not in itself comparative research, but it provides the foundation for comparison. It may well be that before much significant comparative work can be done, many gaps in our knowledge of administrative systems will have to be filled. To discover what is already known and what the gaps are it is necessary to survey the available literature. The remainder of this article, therefore, seeks to provide keys to this literature. Where the literature is adequately covered in available bibliographies, these only are cited, and no effort is made to cover individual works. This applies to Europe, Latin America, and the English-speaking countries of the Commonwealth of Nations. For other areas (Asia, Africa, the Pacific and the Caribbean), a more complete listing is given. Available bibliographies are mentioned, however, and the listing of individual works is necessarily selective.

United Kingdom. The literature on public administration in the United Kingdom is perhaps the most highly developed outside the United States, and is certainly the most accessible to American students. The journal of the Institute of Public Administration, Public Administration (London, 1923-) is widely available in the United States. Its regular book notes provide a convenient index to British publications in this field. The English materials are particularly strong on certain topics—the civil service, local government, administration of nationalized industries, various substantive fields, administrative law, and the machinery of government in a parliamentary system; the English have not, however, developed certain types of literature that are popular here, notably the general textbook on public administration.

A general bibliography, entitled Public Administration (London, H.M.S.O., 1950), has been prepared by the Organization and Methods Division of the Treasury. Another list is M. Plan, "Public Administration: A Guide to British Publications" (British Book News, Feb., 1951, No. 126, pp. 83-90). A guide to research on public administration in progress in the United Kingdom is provided in the Institute of Public Administration's Survey of Research in Progress in the Universities into Public Administration and Allied Fields (London, I.P.A., 1951-). The major works on public administration in the United Kingdom are listed in the UN's Short International Bibliography (cited above) under the various topical headings. Caldwell's bibliography, Comparative Public Administration (cited above) gives an extensive list of works on the British Civil Service. A first-rate journal in the organization and methods field is the monthly O&M Bulletin published in London by H. M. Treasury, O&M Division.

Dominions, English-speaking. In the dominions, the Canadians have produced the most extensive literature on public administration. The Institute of Public Administration of Canada (Philip T. Clark, Secretary, 256 Roxborough St., Toronto 5, Ontario) issues a Newsletter and has published the proceedings of its annual conferences since 1949. These volumes provide an introduction to the major personalities interested in public administration in Canada and afford glimpses of different aspects of Canadian administration. The Institute has also mimeographed a Bibliography of Public Administration for Canadian Students, prepared by Rodney Grey. This is a selective list but it includes the main works on Canadian administration. Useful also is Caldwell's bibliography (pp. 22-24). Another source is the Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science (Toronto, Canadian Political Science Assn., 1935-).

The Australian regional groups of the Institute of Public Administration publish a journal, Public Administration (Sydney, 1938-), which should be consulted first by anyone studying Australian administration. Unfortunately this journal fails to give much bibliographical data and its book notes usually deal with foreign, especially British, rather than Australian materials. The Australian Public Service Commission also publishes a journal called Public Service.

The New Zealand Journal of Public Administration (Wellington, New Zealand Institute of Public Administration, 1938-), is the best source of bibliographic information for the study of this dominion's administration. The New Zealand Public Service Commission has also published since 1948 a monthly magazine, Staff Training, which has recently been combined with the New Zealand O & M Review to form a new publication, called Public Service.

For the Union of South Africa, the Public Servant, organ of the Public Servants' Association, Pretoria, is a convenient guide to the relatively sparse literature on public administration in the Union.

Western Europe: General. No general bibliography for Western Europe is available, although lists for individual countries have been published. The Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives provides general documentation for the area. It is particularly strong for France, Germany, and Belgium, with fewer listings for other countries of the continent. The study of administrative law has been pursued with notable success and there is a large body of literature in this field. Works on public finance are particularly strong in Italy. The study of administrative practices, on a rather technical scientific management level, has resulted in a substantial body of literature. There is also a great deal of writing on constitutional systems and general governmental problems.

Two European journals of special value as guides to current literature are the Bulletin d'Information Bibliographique et Documentaire Recherches (Strasbourg, France, Council of Europe, Documentation Centre,) and the Cahiers de Bruges, published by the College of Europe at Bruges, Belgium.

Many of the works on comparative government give convenient bibliographic notes. One of the latest, European Political Systems, ed. Taylor Cole (New York, Knopf, 1953), includes unusually full bibliographies, often annotated, for the countries covered.

France. A comprehensive view of French literature in public administration may be obtained through the files of La Revue Administrative (Paris, Sirey), a bimonthly independent journal which contains full bibliographical notes and substantive articles. This journal carries a regular column on foreign administration which sometimes has materials useful for comparative study. The major works on French administration are listed in the UN Short International Bibliography (cited above).

The French literature on the civil service is listed in H. Puget, Bibliographie de la fonction publique et du personnel civil des administrations publiques (Paris, Domat-Montchrestien, 1948). More recent studies are listed by Caldwell.

Germany. Since the Hitlerian and World War II interregnum, interest in public administration has revived. Among the journals that have reappeared since the war and which may be looked to for guidance in the German literature are: Öffentliche Verwaltung (Stuttgart, Kohlhammer, 1948-); Der Städtetag (Stuttgart, Kohlhammer, 1948-); and Deutsches Verwaltungsblatt (Berlin-Charlottenburg, Heymanns). Several German societies and institutes are now concerned with administrative problems. An example is the Deutsche Gesellschaft für Personalwesen, with headquarters in Frankfurt, organized in 1949. It has issued several monographs on various aspects of personnel administration in Germany, is publishing a series of studies of the public service in different countries, including France, Great Britain, Switzerland, Sweden, Norway, and the United States, and puts out a monthly newsletter called DGP Informationen. Caldwell and the UN list should also be consulted for German titles.

Scandinavia and Benelux. The Scandinavian Association for Public Administration's journal, Nordisk Administrativ Tidsskrift (Copenhagen), gives bibliographic information about current Scandinavian publications, emphasizing administrative law materials.

The Belgian and Dutch literature, also strongest on administrative law, is largely covered by the Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. A selective bibliography is included in Paul de Visscher, "The Study of Governmental Institutions in Belgium," International Social Science Bulletin, Vol. 2, pp. 40-46 (Spring, 1950). A recent mimeographed list of civil service materials by Edmond-Pierre Seeldrayers, editor of the Revue Internationale and a professor at the University of Brussels, is entitled "Bibliographie sur la fonction publique en Belgique" (Brussels, n.d.). A Belgian journal is the Revue de l'Administration et du Droit Administratif de la Belgique (Brussels, Dioncre).

Spain. An ambitious undertaking, begun in 1950, is the Revista de Administración Pública, published by the Institute de Estudios Políticos in Madrid. In addition to articles about Spanish administration, heavily weighted with legal materials, this journal includes bibliographic information about Spanish and Portuguese publications, as well as some references to Latin American materials.

U.S.S.R. The study of administrative institutions and behavior in the Soviet Union and countries under Communist party control presents peculiar difficulties. No effort is made to cover this field here. Professor John Hazard at Columbia University, who offers a course on Soviet administration in the program of the Russian Institute, has compiled bibliographic data on both Russian and English language materials which he has included in syllabi and in published writings. "L'enseignement du Droit Administratif en U.R.S.S.," Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives, Vol. 17, pp. 80-86 (1951), gives information about Soviet works on administrative law. The major text used in Russia appears to be I. I. Jewtichiew and W. A. Wlasow, Administrative Law of the U.S.S.R. [trans. title] (Moscow, 1946). A general discussion of the subject is contained in Merle Fainsod, "Recent Developments in Soviet Public Administration," Journal of Politics, Vol. 11, pp. 679-714 (Nov., 1949). Attention is called also to Fainsod's recent book, How Russia is Ruled (Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press, 1953), reviewed in this issue of this REVIEW (pp. 541-44). Part III, especially ch. 12, is important for Soviet administration.

Latin America. Three selected bibliographies on public administration in Latin America were mimeographed in 1953. One of them, UN Library, Selected References in Public Administration in Latin America (1952, 7 pp.) covers materials—particularly on administrative law—in Spanish, Portuguese, and English arranged by country. The other two lists were prepared by the Pan-American Union and by the Division of O & M of Puerto Rico, and were published by the Institute of Inter-American Affairs, Dept. of State, Washington D.C. Both have the title Selected References on Public Administration in Latin America and were issued in 1953. The administrative law materials are omitted from the Puerto Rican list, which is arranged topically. The PAU list gives Spanish works first, then Portuguese, both parts being subdivided by subject.

In Brazil the Departamento Administrativo do Serviço Público (DASP) publishes a monthly journal called Revista do Serviço Público. DASP is a prolific publisher of reports and monographs dealing with various aspects of Brazilian administration and the Revista usually includes, besides substantive articles, some bibliographical information, especially about Brazilian publications. Another Brazilian journal is the Revista de Administração, published by the Institute of Administration of the University of São Paulo.

It is expected that the new Brazilian Institute of Administration of the Gétúlio Vargas Foundation will shortly produce important contributions to the Latin American literature. A comprehensive program of publications intended as teaching aids and covering all major aspects of administration has been announced.

The Islamic World. No bibliography of public administration materials for any Islamic country yet exists. The Committee on Near Eastern Studies of the American Council of Learned Societies, however, has recently compiled a Selected and Annotated Bibliography of Books and Periodicals in Western Languages dealing with the Near and Middle East. . . (Washington, D.C., Middle East Institute, 1952). This includes references to some studies that provide background information on government and law.

The analysis of administrative institutions in classical and medieval times in the Middle East should illuminate by contrast contemporary administrative institutions. It is an ironic reversal of roles that when the Ottoman Empire was at its height a European diplomatist, Ogier Ghiselin de Busbecq, after an extended tour of duty in the Sublime Porte, wrote a series of letters advocating that the merit system and training for public service, as practiced by the Turks, be substituted for the ineffective patronage systems which prevailed in Western Europe in his day. De Busbecq's Turkish Letters have appeared in many texts, the latest being the Oxford edition, 1927, with a translation by Edward S. Forster.

Some glimpses of Ottoman administration may be gleaned from Sari Mehmed Pasha, Ottoman Statecraft: the Book of Counsel for Veziers and Governors (English and Turkish texts, with an introduction by W. L. Wright, Jr., Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1935). A general view of the Ottoman system is presented in Albert H. Lybyer, The Government of the Ottoman Empire in the Time of Suleiman the Magnificent (Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press, 1913). More detailed information about the training system for Ottoman administrators is contained in Barnette Miller, The Palace School of Muhammad the Conqueror (Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press, 1941).

Details about the administration of other Islamic countries are less available. Information about Persian administration under the Safavids in the 18th century, however, may be found in the Tadhkirat al-Muluk, trans. V. Minorsky (London, Luzac and Co., 1943), a manual for administrators of the day.

On the contemporary scene, the School of Political Science in Ankara has published a series of monographs in Turkish dealing with various political problems. It also issues a review entitled Siyasal Bilgiler Fakultesi Dergisi. More recently the Public Administration Institute has been set up in Ankara with assistance from the United Nations. This Institute is establishing a research section which plans to prepare and publish studies of public administration in Turkey. The Report of the Working Group on the Institute for Public Administration for Turkey and the Middle East (UN, N.Y. Doc. no. ST/TAA/M.2, 10 June 1953) is of interest not only because of the specific plans proposed but also because of its analysis of Turkish training needs.

A Department of Public Administration has been established at the American University of Beirut, with aid from the U.S. Point Four program. It is expected that this Department will also sponsor the publication of studies of administration in the Middle East.

The literature in Western languages on administration in Arab countries is extremely sparse. Majid Khadduri published a pamphlet in Baghdad in 1944 entitled Government in Iraq. This material is now included in his book, Independent Iraq (London, Oxford University Press, 1951). A substantial work on Lebanese constitutional organization is Pierre Rondot, Les Institutions Politiques du Liban (Paris, Meisssonneuve 1947, published by the Institut d'étude de l'orient contemporain). For Egypt, an administrative law study is G. Watrin, Le Conseil d'État Égyptien (Paris, Conseil d'État, Études et Documents, 1948).

Two recent articles that shed some light on the problems of teaching public administration in the Middle East are Paul Beckett and Frederick Bent, "Letters from Beirut," Public Administration Review, Vol. 13, pp. 1-11 (Winter, 1953), and R. Montagne, "The Teaching of Democracy in Islamic Countries," Journal of African Administration, Vol. 4, pp. 58-62 (April, 1952).

A discussion of administrative problems in the context of economic development is included, generally, in the reports of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. Two Islamic countries are included in this series: The Economy of Turkey (Baltimore, Johns Hopkins, 1951) and The Economic Development of Iraq (Baltimore, Johns Hopkins, 1952). In this connection see also James W. Martin and Frank C. E. Cush, Administration of the Turkish Ministry of Finance (Ankara, Ministry of Finance, 1951). Material on financial administration in some other Islamic countries may be found in U. N. Fiscal Division, Public Finance Information Papers, Egypt (UN, Sales No. 1951. XVI. 7), Iran (UN, Sales No. 1951. XVI. 4), and Iraq (UN, Sales No. 1951. XVI. 6).

Israel. A quarterly journal in Hebrew dealing with public administration is Haminhal, published by the Israel Institute of Public Administration in Tel Aviv and edited by The Hon. Edwin Samuel. Much of this journal deals with principles of administration based on foreign experience, but a few articles deal with administrative problems in Israel.

An annual Government Yearbook in English (Jerusalem, Government Printers) gives information about the activities of all official agencies, as well as material relevant for administrative analysis, such as statistics on government employees. A general evaluation of the work of the government, including appraisals of organization and methods, is contained in the Annual Report of the Comptroller General (in Hebrew). Parts of Vol. 3 (Jerusalem, Tevet, 5713, December, 1952), dealing particularly with questions of control, audit, local government, corporations, and the O & M Unit in the Comptroller's office, have been translated into English. The first two volumes have not been made available for public sale. The annual reports of the Civil Service Commission, in Hebrew, give information on problems of personnel.

A general description of the Israeli government, in Hebrew, with much attention to constitutional problems, is Yehoshua Freudenheim, Hashilton Bimedinat Israel [Government in the State of Israel] (Jerusalem, Rubin Mass, 1953). The first discussion of administrative law in Israel is a lecture by Z. Silbiger in a volume of papers published by the Training Division of the Civil Service Commission, Sidrei Shilton Umishpat Be-Israel [Government and Law in Israel] (Jerusalem, 1953). The first Hebrew textbook in public administration, by Benjamin Akzin, Dean of the Law School and Chairman of the Department of Government of the Hebrew University, is called Ikkarei Haminhal Hatziburi [Principles of Public Administration] (Tel Aviv, Dirr, 1952). This work outlines the traditional principles of administration, and gives a few examples from Israeli experience. Another general work is Edwin Samuel's The Theory of Administration (Jerusalem, Rubin Mass, 1947).

A few short articles have appeared dealing with specific phases of administration. Edwin Samuel is the author of "The Administrative Problems of a New State—Israel, 1948-51," Public Administration Review, Vol. 11, pp. 229-32 (Autumn, 1951) and "Israel's Administrative Problems," Zionist Quarterly, Vol. 1 (Winter, 1952). Another article, by Sidney Mailik, is "Organization for Personnel Management in Israel," Public Personnel Review, Vol. 13, pp. 28-35 (Jan., 1952). A description of the work of the Institute of Public Administration in Israel by M. Hacohen appears in the report of the UN Seminar on Personnel Administration, pp. 187-90, and is expanded in "The Institute of Public Administration in Israel," Personnel Administration, July, 1951, pp. 31-37. A recent advisory report, under F.O.A. auspices, is John Corcoran, A Program for Strengthening Public Administration in Israel (Chicago, Public Administration Service, 1953). A Report on Training of the Civil Service of Israel (UN, Sales No. 1953.II.H.&.) was prepared by O. E. Ault of the Canadian Civil Service Commission, who visited Israel as an adviser on civil service problems under the auspices of the UN Technical Assistance Administration.

India. The study of Indian administration in ancient and medieval times should bring into sharp relief some of the variations in public administration that may be attributed to cultural differences. An ancient Indian work, about the third century, B.C., is Kautilya's Arthashastra, trans. R. Shamasastry (Mysore, Raghuvier, 4th ed., 1951). This volume of advice to kings covers a wide range of topics, such as appointment of officials, establishment of espionage, taxation, arbitration of boundary disputes, city planning, methods of diplomacy and war, treatment of conquered territories, and feudatory relationships. A modern Indian commentary is Pramathanath Banerjea, Public Administration in Ancient India (London, Macmillan, 1916).

I. H. Qureshi, The Administration of the Sultanate of Delhi (Lahore, Sh. Muhammad Ashraf, 1942) describes administration in a pre-Mogul dynasty (about the 15th century). A detailed study of Mogul policy (16th-18th centuries) is given by Sir Jadunath Sarkar, Mughal Administration, 3d ed. (Calcutta, M.C. Sarkar and Sons, Ltd., 1935 [London, 1942]).

A comprehensive view of the British administrative system in India, with special attention to the development and effect of the Indian Civil Service, is Sir Percival Griffiths, The British Impact on India (London, McDonald, 1952). This work also includes an historical retrospect of Hindu and Mogul administration, with bibliographic notes. A great deal of useful background information is found in various books on Indian history, perhaps the most complete being the Cambridge History of India (New York, Macmillan, 6 vols., 1922, especially Vol. 6, Chs. 11-22). An account of the operations of the East India Company is contained in Holden Furber, John Company at Work (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1948). A. N. Keith's Constitutional History of India (London, Methuen, 1936) describes Indian governmental institutions under British rule.

An Indian view of administration in the British period is M. Ruthnaswamy's Some Influences That Made the British Administrative System in India (London, Luzac, 1939). A highly regarded account dealing with the British period, by an influential Indian political scientist, is Angadipuram Appadorai, Dyarchy in Practice (London, Longmans Green, 1937).

There are several "standard" books on the civil service, notably Sir Edward Arthur Blunt, The Indian Civil Service (London, Faber and Faber, 1937) and L. S. S. O'Malley, The Indian Civil Service, 1601-1930 (London, J. Murray, 1931). To balance these British interpretations, one might consult H. W. Kunzru, The Public Services in India (Allahabad, Servants of India Society, 1917).

For contemporary India there are several texts which survey the whole field of public law and government and include some information about administration. One of the best of these is R. C. Jain, Indian Administration (Delhi, Chand, 1951). This work contains less constitutional narrative than most of these books and includes chapters on such topics as "Village Government and its Organization," "District Administration," "Local Self-Government," "Public Finance—Central and States," and "Administrative, Defense and Foreign Services." Other books in this category include M. R. Palande, Introduction to Indian Administration (Bombay, Oxford University Press, 5th ed., 1951); G. N. Joshi, The Constitution of India (London, Macmillan, 1950) and Indian Administration (London, Macmillan, 1937); and Akshyal Ghose's older work, Public Administration in India (Calcutta, University of Calcutta Press, 1930).

More specific discussion of administrative problems is provided in Government of India, Planning Commission, "Administration and Public Cooperation," Part II of The First Five Year Plan (Delhi, Government of India, 1952). This public document is of major importance as a reflection of serious governmental thinking about administrative problems. Among the preparatory documents for the Planning Commission is a report by A. D. Gorwala, I.C.S., ret., entitled Report on Public Administration (Delhi, Manager of Publications, 1951), which makes various recommendations concerning ways to strengthen Indian administration. A more comprehensive study by Gorwala entitled Public Administration in India has been prepared for publication by the Indian Council of World Affairs. Gorwala is also the author of an insightful pamphlet for the Gokhale Institute of Politics and Economics entitled The Role of the Administrator; Past, Present and Future (Poona, 1952). An American interpretation of the Indian administrative scene is Paul Appleby's Public Administration in India; Report of a Survey (Delhi, Manager of Publications, 1953).

Several administrative inquiry commissions at the provincial level have turned in reports of interest to the student of comparative administration. One of these was by the Bengal Administration Enquiry Committee in 1944, known as the Rowlands Report. This report is now almost impossible to obtain, but a summary of it was published in O & M Bulletin (London, Treasury, Vol. 3, June, Aug., and Oct., 1948). Other provincial reports include Madras, Outline of Administration (Madras, Government of Madras, 1949), and the report of the Bombay Administrative Committee Inquiry.

The work of the Indian Planning Commission has stimulated Indian interest in problems of economic development administration. Among the documents of the Planning Commission is a report by K. T. Shah, National Planning, Principles and Administration (Bombay, Vora, 1948), which contains a section (pp. 119-52) on "Administrative Organization of the Plan" and, as Appendix I, a "Schematic Chart of the Administrative Machinery."

Administrative problems have also been considered within the framework of other development plans. An example is the Indian proposals for the Colombo Plan conference, India, Ministry of Finance, Six Year Development Plan of the Union of India, 1951-57, as Submitted to the Commonwealth Consultative Committee at the London Conference (Delhi, Government Printing Department, 1950), which contains, as Chapter IV, an essay on "Administrative Machinery for Planning." An Indian commentary on the general problems of development planning is N. V. Sovani, Planning of Post-war Economic Development in India (Poona, Gokhale Institute, 1951). Gorwala has also published a Report on the Efficient Conduct of State Enterprises for the Planning Commission (Delhi, Manager of Publications, 1951). An American commentary is contained in three lectures by Merrill R. Goodall, Administration and Planning for Economic Development (Delhi, Ranjit, 1952).

Other studies of development problems which give some attention to administration are C. N. Vakil and P. R. Brahmananda, Planning for a Shortage Economy: The Indian Experiment (Bombay, Vora, 1952), and B. Singh, Federal Finance and Underdeveloped Economy (Bombay, Hind Kitabs, 1952). The Community Projects Administration of the Government of India publishes a journal, Kurekshetra, containing information and exhortation for Development Officers, which indirectly reveals the Administration's plans and its view of its function.

Representative of the literature on administrative problems in river valley development is S. C. Bose, The Damodar Valley Project (Calcutta, Phoenix Press, 1948). Sudhir Sen, Secretary of the Damodar Valley Corporation, has written several articles about the work of the D.V.C., in which comparisons with the T.V.A. are frequent. Recently he has launched a series of articles on the subject, "We Need More River Valley Authorities in India" the first of which, on the topic "TVA Shows the Way," appeared in the 1953 annual number of the Indian Journal of Power and River Valley Development (Calcutta, 6, Waterloo Street).

Some information on finance administration may be obtained from UN, Fiscal Division, Public Finance Survey, India (UN, Sales No. 1952, XVI, 1).

Sukumar Basu in "The Public Service Commission in India," Public Administration [London], Vol. 31, pp. 81-84 (Spring, 1953), describes one of the important programs to deal with civil service problems. The Union Public Service Commission, all of the Part "A" State Commissions, and some of the Part "B" State Commissions publish annual reports. Information on a training program for new recruits to the Administrative Service is given in M. J. Desai, Indian Administrative Service Training School (Delhi, Ministry of Home Affairs, 1948); and information about instruction and research in public administration in the universities is contained in S. V. Kogekar and A. Appadorai, The Teaching of Political Science in India (New Delhi, Indian Council on World Affairs, 1953).

Among current Indian periodicals particular mention should be made of the Indian Journal of Political Science, published by the Indian Political Science Association. The May-June, 1953 issue contains an essay by Professor Kogekar on administrative problems in India, and the July-September number contains several articles on this subject, including A. K. Ghosal's "Some Administrative Problems under Planning," and M. Venkatarangaiya's "The Pattern of Public Administration in the Five-Year Plan." The India Quarterly, published by the Indian Council on World Affairs, runs occasional articles on administration and has a book review section. Among other periodicals, special mention should be made of The Eastern Economist, published in New Delhi and edited by Eric da Costa, which often comments on administrative developments. Its "Special Independence Number," published in August, 1953, contains a section on "Public Administration since Independence" (pp. 263-68). On economic administration see also the monthly Reserve Bank Chronicle (Bombay).

Pakistan, Ceylon, and Burma. Relatively little is available on public administration in Pakistan, Ceylon, and Burma. Richard Symond, The Making of Pakistan (London, Faber and Faber, 1950), contains some information about administration. S. Osman Ali presented some "Notes on the Civil Service of Pakistan," to the UN Public Personnel Seminar (St/TAA/conf. 1/1, pp. 191-96). Two public documents that provide some useful background information are O & M in Pakistan (Karachi, Cabinet Secretariat, 1952, 18 pp.) and Administrative Directory of the Government of Pakistan (Karachi, 1951), a compendium of information about the various departments of government and their work.

In Ceylon a regional group of the Institute of Public Administration has been formed and has published an annual Journal of Public Administration since 1950. Public Administration in Ceylon, by Sir Charles Collins (London, Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1951), is a history of constitutional arrangements in Ceylon during the period of British rule, but also provides an introduction for anyone making a study of administration in Ceylon. One of the International Bank reports deals with Ceylon and should be consulted for information about problems of economic development administration: The Economic Development of Ceylon (Baltimore, Johns Hopkins, 1953). A Ceylonese public document is the Report of the Commission on the Organization, Staffing and Operative Methods of Government Departments (Colombo, Government Press, 1948).

For Burma, a useful, although scarce, document is the Interim Report of the Administration Reorganization Committee (Rangoon, 1949). The Committee has submitted a final report, not yet published. F. S. V. Donnison has contributed a volume to the Royal Institute series entitled Public Administration in Burma (London, 1953), which lays a foundation for subsequent study of Burmese administration. Keen analyses of colonial administration and policy in Burma under British rule are provided in the books of J. S. Furnivall. His Colonial Policy and Practice (Cambridge, Eng., Cambridge University Press, 1948) is probably the best place to begin.

Southeast Asia. Southeast Asia; An Annotated Bibliography of Selected Reference Sources (Washington, D.C., Library of Congress, 1952), compiled by Cecil Hobbs, provides a convenient index to the literature on Southeast Asia, including available material on government and general political background. Little has been produced, however, dealing specifically with public administration.

The Royal Institute series on public administration provide a useful beginning point for certain countries, although these works give more attention to general governmental organization and public law than to public administration as the term is used in the United States. They include W. D. Reeve, Public Administration in Siam (London, R.I.I.A., 1951); S. Jones, Public Administration in Malaya (London, R.I.I.A., 1953); and Sir Charles Collins, Public Administration in Hong Kong (London, R.I.I.A., 1953). J. S. Furnivall's Colonial Policy and Practice (cited above) covers—in addition to Burma—the Dutch East Indies; and his Netherlands India: a Study of Plural Economy (Cambridge, Eng., Cambridge University Press, 1939), provides more detailed information on Indonesia under Dutch administration. Also of interest for the student of Dutch Indonesian administration are the works of Hubertus J. van Mook, former Lt. Governor of the Dutch East Indies and currently Director of the Public Administration Division of the UN's Technical Assistance Administration. Especially valuable are his Indonesia and the World (Amsterdam, Bezige Bij, 1949) and Mistakes of Democracy in Southeast Asia (New York, W. W. Norton, 1950).

Some observations on administrative problems in Thailand are contained in a mimeographed report by two technical assistance experts: Lyman S. Moore and Edmond F. Ricketts, A Program for Strengthening Public Administration in the Kingdom of Thailand (Washington, M.S.A., 1952). A comprehensive study of colonial administration in Malaya and Indonesia is provided by Rupert Emerson in Malaysia, a Study in Direct and Indirect Rule (N.Y., Macmillan, 1937). Additional information about Malayan government is contained in an article by Charles Gamba, "Government in Malaya," Public Administration [Australia], Vol. 12, pp. 27-41 (March, 1953). The administration of Singapore is reviewed in K. J. O'Dell, "Municipal Administration in Singapore," Public Administration [England], Vol. 24, pp. 22-30 (Spring, 1946). A survey of the city's government with recommendations for improvement is given in the report by L. C. Hill entitled Report on the Reform of Local Government in Singapore (Singapore, Government Publications Bureau, 1952).

For the Philippines, a guide to the available literature on public administration is available in the form of a 53-page mimeographed document prepared by Araceli Andaya for the Institute of Public Administration, University of the Philippines, entitled An Annotated Bibliography on Philippine Public Administration (Manila, 1953). Since copies of this document may be obtained by writing to the Institute, it is unnecessary to list Philippine materials in this space.

Two ECAFE studies on the region are Statistical Organization and Activities in Countries of Asia and the Far East (ECAFE, Doc. E/CN.11/322, 1951) and Structure of Industrial Organization in the Public Sector (ECAFE, doc. E/CN.11/I&T/51, 1951).

China. Chinese language materials provide a vast storehouse of information about administration. E. A. Kracke, Jr., Civil Service in Early Sung China, 960-1067 (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1953) is an example of what can be accomplished by analysis of these materials. S. Y. Teng and Knight Big-gerstaff, An Annotated Bibliography of Selected Chinese Reference Works (Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press, rev. ed., 1950), describes many Chinese classical materials that might be used for this kind of research.

Some modern Chinese authors have already attempted to describe the administrative systems of classical times. These works are in Chinese, but the titles are given here in translation: Chen Ku-yuan, A History of Chinese Administrative Systems (Shanghai, Commercial Press); Ting Yuan-Pu, A History of Chinese Administrative Systems (Shanghai, Commercial Press); Kao Yi-Han, A Brief History of the Chinese Cabinet System (Shanghai, Commercial Press); Kao Yi-Han, A Brief History of the Chinese Impeachment System (Shanghai, Commercial Press); and Teng Ting-Jen, A Study of the Chinese Examination System (Shanghai, Ming-tze Press).

A few ancient Chinese writers have been recognized through English translations. Notable among these is the 11th century statesman whose works are translated by H. R. Williamson in Wang An-Shih, A Chinese Statesman and Educationalist of the Sung Dynasty (London, Probsthain, 1935). Wang An-Shih was an advocate of administrative regularization, civil service reform, and improved fiscal procedures. His administrative theories are reported to have influenced Henry Wallace when he was Secretary of Agriculture. A biography of Wang An-Shih's rival, Su Tung-Po, is contained in Lin Yu-Tang, The Gay Genius (New York, John Day Co., 1947). The Complete Works of Han Fei-Tzu; A Classic of Chinese Legalism (3rd century B.C.), translated from the Chinese by W. K. Liao (London, Probsthain, 1939), and the later (3rd century, A.D.) Jen wu chih of Liu Shao, translated by J. K. Shryock as The Study of Human Abilities (New Haven, American Oriental Society, 1937), contain advice to rulers on administration and the conduct of public affairs.

During the period of Nationalist Government rule in China a substantial volume of literature on modern public administration began to appear. Some of the main works in Chinese (again listed by English translation of their titles) are Chang Chin-Chien, Theories and Practices of Public Administration (Shanghai, Commercial Press, 1935); Pai Peng-fei, A Study of Administrative Law (Shanghai, Commercial Press, 1937); and a compilation of materials by the Ta-Tung Press, Shanghai, entitled A History of the Development of the Chinese Administrative System (1943).

In the field of personnel administration there is another book by Chang Chin-Chien, Public Personnel Administration (Shanghai, Commercial Press, 1939), and a more recent book by Wang Shih-Hsien, Personnel Administration (Shanghai, Commercial Press, 1943). A comparative study by Hsueh Po-Kang is Chinese and American Public Personnel Administration (Shanghai, Commercial Press, 1937). In the field of financial administration, a pioneer work is Tan Pin, A Study of the State Treasury System (Shanghai, Min-Tze Press, 1929), followed by Wu Kwan-Yin, Chinese Budget System (Chien-Hwa Press, 1932), Hu Shan-Hen, Financial Administration (Shanghai, Commercial Press, 1935), and, most recently, Ma Ta-Yin, Chinese Financial Administration (Cheng-Chung Press, 1947). On provincial administration there is Shih Yang-Cheng, Chinese Provincial Administrative System (Shanghai, Commercial Press, 1947).

A Chinese Association of Personnel Administration published a monthly journal in Shanghai before the war, and a revived society in this field now issues a quarterly in Taipei. The Department of the Interior in Nanking formerly issued a Journal of Administrative Efficiency, and the Executive Yuan published a Journal of Public Administration in Nanking.

Apart from the works dealing specifically with public administration, there is a large storehouse of Chinese materials from the study of which a great deal of information about Chinese administration could be obtained. Many of these works are listed in John K. Fairbank and Liu Kwang-Ching, Modern China: A Bibliographical Guide to Chinese Works, 1898-1937 (Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press, 1950). A few examples, cited here by code number from the Fairbank bibliography, illustrate the kinds of Chinese language material available. The National Government Year Book (No. 1.4.5, Chungking, 1944) gives detailed information about the structure of executive agencies. One third of the book describes city and provincial governments. Ch'en Chih-mai, The Chinese Government (Doc. 3.1.1, Chungking, 1944), by a professor who had worked in the Executive Yuan, describes the organization and functioning of the Kuomintang and of each of the five Yuan. A forerunner of modern exchange of persons programs is described in the Diary of a Diplomatic Mission to Nine Countries, by Tsai Hung-tz'u (Doc. 4.2.8, Peking, 1907). In this volume the author, President of the Board of Ceremonies, records his trip "to investigate the governments of various countries." He concludes that there are some good points in Western administration, and carefully lists the agencies visited, including the "Yamen of the Board of Revenue" in Washington, D.C. Huang Hsu-wan, A General Survey of the Maritime Customs Service (Doc. 6.12.1, Peking, 1917) is a comprehensive description of the history and work of the Customs Service and its internal organization. It is worthy of study as an early example of the injection of Western administrative ideas into Chinese administration. Chang Chi-hsin, Outline of Chinese Educational Administration (Doc. 7.6.7, Shanghai, 1934) is an extended history, comparing Chinese and Western theories and practices and reviewing changes in central and local educational administration since the late Manchu period. Descriptions of Financial Administration, published by the Ministry of Finance, Peking (Doc. 6.11.2), is a series of volumes, each one covering one province and giving detailed information about the operation of the fiscal system in the late Manchu period, including many details about corruption and irregularities.

Turning to the very recent period, since the evacuation of the Nationalist Government to Taiwan, one finds that already several works on public administration have been published in Taipei in the Chinese language. These include Chang Chin-Chien, Public Administration (Cheng-Chung Press, 1952); Tso Lu-Sheng, Public Administration (First Press, 1953); and Lin Chi-Tung, A Study of Chinese Administrative Law (Cheng-Chung Press, 1952).

It is striking that despite this extensive output of Chinese materials relatively little has been written in Western languages on Chinese administration. Chien Tuan-Cheng's The Government and Politics of China (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1950) provides the best general introduction to Chinese governmental institutions and problems during the period of Nationalist rule; with introductory chapters on the history of traditional Chinese administration.

Although not dealing with administration as such, the monthly mimeographed journal of the U. S. Mutual Security Agency mission to China, Chinese-American Economic Cooperation (Taipei, 1952-) contains, inter alia, some interesting sidelights on Chinese administration.

Japan. Basic bibliographic information is supplied by Robert E. Ward, A Guide to Japanese Reference and Research Materials in the Field of Political Science (Ann Arbor, University of Michigan, Center for Japanese Studies, 1950). Sections XV and XXII deal with "Administrative Law" and "Public Servants," respectively. His "A Survey of Political Science Literature on Japan," this REVIEW, Vol. 46, pp. 201-13 (March, 1952) contains a brief section on public administration.

A convenient guide in English to the literature on public administration in Japan is provided by Kiyooki Tsuji, "The Science of Public Administration," in The Japan Science Review, "Law and Politics," No. 1, pp. 79-83 (1950). Among the recent studies in Japanese mentioned in this article are Shigeo Yoshitomi, Principles of Administrative Organization (1939), Reform of Administrative Organization (1941), and The Practical Character of Politics (1948); Masatoshi Nagahama, Problems in the Public Election of Local Governors (1947); Royama, Nagahama, Yanase, Sugai, and Tsuji, Studies of the Civil Service System in Several States (1948); and Kiyooki Tsuji, The Bureaucracy in the Japanese Government (1952).

In 1952, a Public Service Training Council was established to help training centers in government agencies, both national and local, improve their work. The Council has organized conferences at which papers on various aspects of administration were delivered. It publishes a monthly Newsletter and has announced plans for publication of a quarterly journal.

A Japanese Society for Public Administration, the Nihon Gyosei Gakkai, was formed in 1950 under the leadership of Professor Masamichi Royama, but has not yet commenced publication of a journal. The journal of the Political Science Association in Tokyo University, Kokka Gakkai Zasshi [Journal of the Society for the Science of the State], established in 1948, is probably the best general source for information on current public administration.

In the personnel field the National Personnel Authority has issued annual reports in English. Other English language materials are Shirven and Speicher, "Reform of Japanese Administration," Personnel Administration, July, 1951; Hugh H. MacDonald and Milton J. Esman, "The Japanese Civil Service," Public Personnel Review, Vol. 7, pp. 213-24 (Oct., 1946); Foster B. Roser, "Establishing a Modern Merit System in Japan," Public Personnel Review, Vol. 11, pp. 199-206 (Oct., 1950); and Earle A. Cleveland, "Civil Service in Okinawa," Pub- lic Personnel Review, Vol. 11, pp. 69-77 (April, 1950). An older review of the Japanese civil service is S. T. Takeuchi, "The Japanese Civil Service," in The Civil Service in the Modern State (cited above), pp. 513-55.

In the field of administrative organization, the Japanese "Hoover Commission" Report on Reform of the Administrative System [in Japanese](Tokyo, 1951) proposed changes to accompany the transition from occupation status to full independence. An English-language survey of the reorganization carried out in accord with this report's recommendations, together with bibliographical information, is given by Ardath W. Burks in "A Note on the Emerging Administrative Structure of the Post-treaty Japanese National Government," Occasional Papers, Center for Japanese Studies, no. 3, pp. 47-58 (Ann Arbor, Mich., University of Mich. Press, 1952).

For earlier comment see also Milton J. Esman, "Japanese Administration—A Comparative View," Public Administration Review, Vol. 7, pp. 100-12 (1947); and Richard G. Brown, Recent Developments in Japanese Civil Service (Evanston, Ill., The Author, 1950).

Korea. Information about literature dealing with Korean administration is not now available. However, the Institute of East Asiatic Studies at the University of California is preparing A Guide to Korean Studies which may be expected to include a comprehensive listing of existing materials relating to Korean government and administration.

Africa. The most convenient key to available literature on Africa is Introduction to Africa: A Selective Guide to Background Reading, prepared by the Library of Congress (Washington, D.C., University Press, 1952). Anyone planning to study administrative problems in the continent ought also to make use of Continuing Sources for Research on Africa (Washington, D.C., Library of Congress, 1952), a list of societies and institutes, and official agencies with the titles of their journals, reports, etc. For East Africa some useful sources can be found listed in Roland Young and J. Gus Liebenow, Jr., "Survey of Background Material for the Study of the Government of East Africa," this REVIEW, Vol. 48, pp. 187-203 (March, 1954).

In the periodical field the Journal of African Administration (London, Colonial Office, 1949-) is an invaluable source of information and bibliographic references for British Africa. Margery F. Perham, Colonial Government: Annotated Reading List on British Colonial Government, with Some General and Comparative Material on Foreign Empires (London, Oxford University Press, 1950) is a good supplement to the Library of Congress bibliography. The quarterly Colonial Review (University of London, Colonial Dept.) contains abstracts and summaries of the best current literature on colonial problems.

For French Africa a general guide is the Encyclopedie coloniale et maritime (Paris, Guieysse), which issues monthly supplements on all aspects of colonial life. For Belgian Africa the leading journal is Zaire, revue congolaise (Brussels, Editions Universitaires), which gives extensive bibliographical information.

The literature on colonial administration is extensive. Caldwell lists the main works on pp. 42-44. Principles and Methods of Colonial Administration, ed.

C. M. MacInnes (London, Colston Papers, Butterworths Scientific Publications, 1950), provides a convenient introduction to the policies of the different colonial powers. Another general study is J. de Almada, Colonial Administration by European Powers (London, Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1947).

For background information the student should make use of Lord Hailey's An African Survey (London, Oxford University Press, 1938) and, for more specific material on British Africa, his Native Administration in the British African Territories (London, H.M.S.O., 1950). A series of portraits of African administrative institutions may be found in the anthropological case studies in African Political Systems, eds. Meyer Fortes and E. E. Evans-Pritchard (London, Oxford, 1940).

There are several studies of civil service problems in Africa, especially relating to the development of native personnel. The Report of the Commission on the Civil Service of the Gold Coast, 1950-51 (Accra, Government Printing Dept., 1951) is a comprehensive survey, with recommendations to strengthen personnel administration and the Africanization program. W. J. Haimes, Report on Whitley Councils (Nairobi, Government Printer, 1950), gives attention to another aspect of public service administration, taking into account the problems of an interracial society. Another study is L. C. Hill, Report on the Civil Service in Kenya (Nairobi, the Secretariat, 1945). A survey of educational problems and administration—an important factor in the development of native personnel—is African Education: A Study of Educational Policy and Practice in British Tropical Africa (Oxford, Nuffield Foundation and the Colonial Office, 1953).

The French and Belgian materials on Africa give more attention to general organizational and legal problems. Two studies are M. Merlo, L'Organisation Administrative de l'Algerie (Algiers, Ferraris, 1951); and Georges Surdon, La France en Afrique du Nord (Algiers, 1946). The latter is a comprehensive treatment of Islamic theories on the organization of government, and a description of the structure and functioning of government in North Africa under French rule. A scholarly survey of the legal and administrative organization of the French regime in North Africa is Herbert Liebesny, The Government of French North Africa (Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1943). A Belgian work is R. Delvaux, L'Organisation Administrative du Congo Belge (Antwerp, Edition Zaire, 1945).

Little work has been done on Ethiopian administration, but a recent technical assistance advisory report is G. M. Morris, Report on the Organization and Administration of the Ministry of Education and Fine Arts, Imperial Ethiopian Government (Washington, D.C., F.A.O., 1953).

Pacific Islands. A bibliography that includes some references of value for the study of Pacific Islands administration is Non-Self-Governing Areas with Special Emphasis on Mandates and Trusteeships, comp. Helen F. Conover (Washington, Library of Congress, 1947). A notable contribution to this field is made by South Pacific, the bimonthly journal of the Australian School of Pacific Administration.

A monograph covering government and reconstruction in New Caledonia, the New Hebrides, and the British Solomon Islands is Cyril S. Belshaw, Island Administration in the South West Pacific (London, Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1950). J. W. Davidson gives some general observations on Pacific Islands administration in "The Changing Political Role of Pacific Islands Peoples," Journal of Public Administration [N.Z.], Vol. 14, pp. 46-57 (Sept., 1951) and "The Administrative Consequences of Modern Colonial Policies," Ibid., Vol. 15, pp. 32-36 (Sept., 1952). Another study is the Report of the Commission to Inquire into and Report upon the Organization of District and Village Government in Western Samoa (Wellington, 1951).

Problems of administration in the American Pacific territories are discussed in the management surveys conducted by the Department of the Interior preparatory to assumption of civilian control. The studies of the Trust Territory, in two volumes, and of American Samoa, in one volume, were published in 1951. On the same subject, see also Emil J. Sady, "Department of the Interior and Pacific Island Administration," Public Administration Review, Vol. 10, pp. 13-19 (Winter, 1950). For general background see Rupert Emerson and others, America's Pacific Dependencies (New York, Institute of Pacific Relations, 1949).

Valuable information on administrative conditions in the Trust Territories will be found in the reports of the Visiting Missions of the UN Trusteeship Council, as well as in the reports of the Administering Powers. The reports on non-self-governing territories under Article 73 (e) of the UN Charter do not contain "political" information in most cases; hence they are of limited use for administrative study, though they do contain important background information on economic, social, and educational matters.

The Caribbean. Information about administration in the non-Spanish speaking Caribbean is quite scarce. The Caribbean Commission: Monthly Information Bulletin (Kent House, Port-of-Spain, Trinidad) gives occasional bits of information on administrative subjects, and some bibliographical notes.

Mission to Haiti: the Report of the UN Mission of Technical Assistance to the Republic of Haiti (UN, doc. 1949. 11B.2, 1949) provides, in the setting of an overall survey, some information about administrative problems, especially in the field of public finance.

Data about problems of economic development administration in two countries of the area may be found in the I.B.R.D.'s Report on Surinam (Baltimore, Johns Hopkins, 1952) and The Economic Development of Jamaica (Baltimore, Johns Hopkins, 1952).

FRED W. RIGGS.

Public Administration Clearing House.

BOOK REVIEWS

Natural Right and History. BY LEO STRAUSS. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1953. Pp. x, 327. $5.00.)

Is there any foundation in reality for the distinction between right and wrong in ethics and politics? Professor Strauss believes that there is and in presenting his case makes a significant contribution towards an understanding of the intellectual crisis in which we find ourselves. Based upon a series of lectures which Professor Strauss delivered at the University of Chicago in 1949 under the auspices of the Charles R. Walgreen Foundation, this book presents a formidable challenge to a positivistically oriented social science.

Modern social science not only admits its inability to help us in discriminating between legitimate and illegitimate, just and unjust objectives but denies that any rational method exists by which such judgments can objectively be made. As a consequence, Professor Strauss points out, "we can be or become wise in all matters of secondary importance, but we have to be resigned to utter ignorance in the most important respect: we cannot have any knowledge regarding the ultimate principles of our choices, i.e. regarding their soundness or unsoundness; our ultimate principles have no other support than our arbitrary and blind preferences. We are then in the position of beings who are sane and sober when engaged in trivial business and who gamble like madmen when confronted with serious issues—retail sanity and wholesale madness." Such a conception of social science, Professor Strauss declares, not only leads to nihilism but, in fact, "is identical with nihilism." Modern social scientists not only deny that "men can know what is good" but insist that that denial is required by the demands of tolerance and the cultivation of individuality.

The modern rejection of natural right, i.e. the rejection of the belief that there is a foundation in reality for the distinction between right and wrong in ethics and politics, takes place in the name of history or in the name of the distinction between so-called facts and values. The first two lectures examine each of these critically, with the second being devoted to a brilliant analysis of the meaning and limitations of the methodology of Max Weber. Underlying Weber's methodology, Professor Strauss points out, is the view that "reality is an infinite and meaningless sequence, or a chaos, of unique and infinitely divisible events, which in themselves are meaningless"—all meaning originating in the activity of the knowing subject. Not only is this a view of reality with which few people today would be satisfied, says Strauss, but it is also a view to which Weber himself was unable to adhere consistently. For he "could not deny that there is an articulation of reality that precedes all scientific articulation." The subsequent lectures discuss the origin of the idea of natural right, the classical doctrine of natural right, the modern idea of natural right especially as conceived by Hobbes and Locke, and the crisis of modern natural right in Rousseau and Burke.

The rejection of natural right in the name of history is historicism, and it is with the rise of historicism and its limitations that the bulk of this book is concerned. Briefly stated, historicism is the doctrine that all thought is historically conditioned and hence relative. There is not, because there cannot be, any knowledge of an eternal, transhistorical order such as is presupposed by the theory of natural right. But historicism is open to the objection that it professes to be a truth of just such an eternal and transhistorical nature. It states that all truths are radically dependent upon the societies in which they emerge and so are relative to those societies; but this most fundamental truth is asserted as valid everywhere and always. Historicism attempts to meet this objection by the assumption of an absolute moment in history. At one moment in history it is given to men to realize the complete dependence of all their thinking upon history. In that moment men perceive that all their ideas of natural right were a delusion.

Professor Strauss suggests that the answer to historicism is to show how it came about. Historicism, he says, is the outcome of the crisis of the specifically modern interpretation of natural right. If this can be shown, then historicism's claim to have arrived at the absolute moment in history will collapse.

The origin of the idea of natural right has its roots, Professor Strauss argues, in the classical philosophers' discovery of the distinction between nature and convention. The discovery of this distinction gives birth to philosophy, or the quest for "the first things." "In brief, then, it can be said," Professor Strauss declares, "that the discovery of nature is identical with the actualization of a human possibility which, at least according to its own interpretation, is transhistorical, trans-social, trans-moral and trans-religious." The philosophic quest for the first things is embodied in metaphysics as the science of being and it is now seen that political institutions have their ultimate explanation in metaphysical presuppositions. Hence the classical philosophers, and notably Aristotle, taught that there is an objective order of human wants determined ultimately by the structure of human nature. The end of man is the perfection of his nature. But since man is by nature a social being he cannot reach his perfection except in society, or more precisely, in civil society. Civil society is thus natural, because demanded by human nature, and can be said to be prior to the individual inasmuch as nature intends not mere human existence but human perfection. Moreover, in order to reach his highest stature, man must live in the best kind of society; hence the preoccupation of classical natural right philosophy with discovering the theoretically ideal order of society based on nature and transcending the flux of history.

The break with this tradition of natural right, Professor Strauss argues, was first made by Hobbes, whose intention was to put natural right on a scientific basis. Civil society, as Hobbes conceives it, is not natural; it is merely an artificial construction designed to preserve the individual's original right to his own existence. Whereas in Aristotle's philosophy society is prior to the individual, in Hobbes' philosophy the individual is in every sense prior to society. Professor Strauss goes on to show how John Locke accepted Hobbes' shift in emphasis from natural duties to natural rights and carried it even further.

But it is in Rousseau's theory that "the modern natural right teaching reaches its critical stage. By thinking through that teaching, Rousseau was brought face to face with the necessity of abandoning it completely. If the state of nature is subhuman, it is absurd to go back to the state of nature in order to find in it the norm for man. Hobbes had denied that man has a natural end. He had believed that he could find a natural or nonarbitrary basis of right in man's beginnings. Rousseau showed that man's beginnings lack all human traits. On the basis of Hobbes' premise, therefore, it became necessary to abandon altogether the attempt to find the basis for right in nature, in human nature. And Rousseau seemed to have shown an alternative. For he had shown that what is characteristically human is not the gift of nature, but is the outcome of what man did, or was forced to do, in order to overcome, or to change nature; man's humanity is the product of the historical process. For a moment—the moment lasted longer than a century—it seemed possible to seek the standard of human action in the historical process." Professor Strauss's thesis then, is briefly this: by abandoning metaphysics and a teleological view of human nature, the modern interpretation of natural right brought upon itself a crisis which issued in historicism. Historicism's claim to have arrived at the absolute moment in history therefore falls, because the genesis of historicism can be traced to an intellectual crisis which adequately explains it.

Professor Strauss brings to his task an admirable scholarship and a brilliant, incisive mind. His style reflects the lucidity of his thinking and as a consequence his book deserves a wide audience, not only among political theorists, for whom it is indispensable, but among political scientists generally.

Any reservations I have about the book would refer to the author's initial presuppositions rather than to the details of his analysis. Professor Strauss approaches the problem of natural right from the perspective of classical paganism; he interprets the modern revolt against the tradition of natural right, not primarily as a revolt against the Christian tradition, but as a revolt against the classical tradition. And it is not to the Christian tradition but rather to the classical tradition that he would have us return. The natural law doctrines of the Middle Ages appear to him to be a distortion of the classical tradition caused by the introduction of beliefs imported from revelation. One may contrast with this view the study of natural law by A. P. D'Entreves and Erich Voegelin's New Science of Politics, to mention but two recent works that would challenge that interpretation. It seems to me that Professor Strauss dismisses with insufficient evidence and argument the contention so ably defended by Etienne Gilson that Christian philosophy is not only possible but that St. Thomas Aquinas went a long way towards achieving the harmony between reason and revelation that Professor Strauss would deny is possible. To interpret the crisis of our times primarily as a revolt against the classical tradition is to interpret that crisis as being primarily the result of an intellectual mistake. And it is suggested, by implication at least, that intellectual conversion to Aristotle would effect the cure. That intellectual mistakes may well have been made and need correction, and that we can learn much from Aristotle can be conceded; but intellectual mistakes themselves have a cause and to some of us it would seem that St. Paul had a more profound understanding of man's predicament and need than did Aristotle. Which is not to deny the wisdom of the Greeks but only to say that it is insufficient.

JOHN H. HALLOWELL.

Duke University.

How Russia is Ruled. BY MERLE FAINSDOD. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1953. Pp. xi, 575. $7.50.)

The Dynamics of Soviet Society. BY W. W. ROSTOW IN COLLABORATION WITH ALFRED LEVIN. (New York: W. W. Norton and Co. 1953. Pp. xvi, 282. $3.95.)

Law and Social Change in the U.S.S.R. BY JOHN N. HAZARD. (Toronto: The Carswell Co. 1953. PUBLISHED under the Auspices of the London Institute of World Affairs. Pp. xxiv, 310. $4.50.)

There is need not only for specialized studies of particular aspects of Soviet practice but also for syntheses based on reliable research. This is why one must greet with satisfaction the book of Professor Fainsod, who has achieved a great work of synthesis. His book appeared at almost the same time as Mr. Rostow's, which also purports to provide the reader with a global picture, but which does so in a much less satisfactory manner. Mr. Rostow forewarns in the preface that he is not a specialist in the Soviet field. It is not easy, however, to write about the Soviet regime without an intimate knowledge of Russian history and of the Russian language. The image of the Soviet society which emerges from Professor Fainsod's book is warranted by his skillful use of the Soviet publications and enlivened by the comments extracted by the author from his interviews with Soviet escapees. Mr. Rostow used only publications in English; however, he includes by way of compensation a very useful bibliography of American and English books on the Soviet Union.

Both books use basically the same method: an historical survey of the factors which compose the present Soviet reality and an analysis of the contemporary Soviet regime. Professor Fainsod's historical survey is remarkable for its penetrating insight and well-balanced comment. He rejects any deterministic interpretation of Russian history and refuses to see a fatalistic trend towards autocracy in Russia. There were, indeed, developments in the Russia of the past which could eventually have produced a representative government, and there were many Russians in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries who did their best to transplant the Western democratic ideas to their native soil. The most one may say is that autocratic government has so far been victorious. Yet the rejection of the deterministic interpretation does not warrant high hopes for a sudden succession of the Soviet regime by a true democracy. As Professor Fainsod observes: "Autocracy generates its own authoritarian antibodies and endows them with its own peculiar contour." When the end of the present totalitarianism in Russia does come, one may hope at the most for a slow and progressive transition to forms of government which are familiar to the West.

Professor Fainsod wisely refrains from prophesying about the future and cautions against unwarranted expectations of a sudden collapse of the present Soviet structure. He enumerates the factors of cohesion, including the political interest of the Soviet rulers in using the totalitarian machinery forged in Stalin's lifetime; the vested interests of the higher bureaucracy; the indoctrination of minds coupled with isolation from outside sources of information; and the patriotic feelings which are stimulated by the regime. He discusses also the opposing factors of tension, such as the insecurity of even the bureaucratic elite; the low standards of living of average citizens; the dissatisfaction among the unskilled and semi-skilled workers and collective farmers, who are reduced to bare subsistence; and discontent among the Soviet non-Russian nationalities faced with the present policy of Russianization. He does not believe in the possibility of successful mass uprisings because "Soviet totalitarianism breeds a sense of aloofness, of isolation, and of suspiciousness in the individual. It is not a milieu congenial to the large-scale conspiracies." The conclusion seems to be that the regime may be threatened in peacetime only by an open struggle among the top leaders or by a revolt of its own bureaucracy (including Army officers), possibilities which are not necessarily probabilities.

There is no analogy between the dissatisfaction in Tsarist Russia and the repressed discontent in the Soviet Union. Professor Fainsod observes that "Literature [in the nineteenth century] was the laboratory of society," while Soviet novels, dramas, or poems must follow strictly the party line and must not stir doubt in the minds of readers.

Professor Fainsod is correct in stressing the importance of the peasant problem in the Soviet Union. The party was successful in replacing one intelligentsia by another and in regimenting industrial workers, but in its long struggle with the peasants it has suffered one setback after another. Although the party is armed with all the weapons of state coercion, it had to acknowledge in 1953 a new defeat at the hands of the collective farmers whose only defense, passive resistance, resulted in a serious shortage of agricultural products.

Professor Fainsod describes the elitist and hierarchical structure of Soviet society, in which the peasant, the unskilled and semi-skilled worker, and the lower stratum of the intelligentsia have to pay the costs of industrialization and of material benefits for the upper bureaucracy. This strictly hierarchical society is founded on an institutionalized inequality and is a perversion of the Utopian dreams of pre-Marxist and Marxist socialists of the nineteenth century. Professor Fainsod explodes a myth which still survives in some minds that Stalin alone was responsible for the present situation. He says: "The elitism which was so deeply ingrained in Lenin . . . , the tradition of highly centralized leadership, the tightening regimen of the party discipline, the absolutism of the party line, the intolerance of disagreement and compromise, the manipulatory attitude towards mass organization, the subordination of means to ends, and the drive for total power—all these patterns of behaviour which crystallized in the early years were destined to exercise a continuing influence on the code by which the party lived and the course of action which it pursued." A short sentence tells the whole story of the effects of the many purges: "The laws of survival in the totalitarian party favor the tough and the adaptive; the tender-hearted and the independent-minded tend to fall by the way and disappear."

This volume will be a lasting contribution, even if one or another chapter becomes progressively obsolete because of changes in the structure of the Soviet Union. The basic anatomy and physiology of the regime as presented in the book is there to stay, although the day may come when events will vindicate the following statement by a Soviet writer purged long ago: "There is no such thing as the last revolution; the number of revolutions is infinite."

While Mr. Rostow's picture of the Soviet regime frequently coincides with Professor Fainsod's, some of his opinions are controversial. For example, it is difficult to agree with the author when he says that Stalin maintained only a verbal loyalty to the ideal of world revolution. His appeal to the foreign Communist parties at the Congress in October, 1952 was certainly more than an expression of verbal loyalty, for he promised publicly the support of the party and consequently of the Soviet state. The sovietization of Eastern Europe and the support given to Communist China and Northern Korea prove that he was willing to grant more than mere verbal assistance whenever he could do it without endangering the U.S.S.R. itself. At other points the author's interpretation of Russian history shows a lack of familiarity with the subject, as, for instance, in the references to the Zemskii Sobor, the Imperial Senate, and the alleged absence of aggressiveness in Russian history.

Again, one can hardly agree that the Soviet offensive policy began only in 1945. Should one qualify as defensive such Soviet moves as the annexations of the Baltic States and of half of Poland, the war against Finland, or the imperialist plans of further expansion laid before the Nazi leaders by Molotov in November, 1940? And while the author is right in saying that there is no evidence that the discontent of the non-Russian nationalities is identified with aspirations for national independence, neither is there any evidence to the contrary; the absence of free elections precludes the possibility of extracting any such evidence.

Mr. Rostow is unduly optimistic in his hope that the Soviet trade unions may emerge as a working-class movement directed against the regime; the Soviet trade unions are nothing but an arm of the party which controls them from top to bottom. One may also doubt whether historians will really look back, as the author believes, to the Pravda editorial of April 7, 1953, with its criticism of the then defunct Ministry of State Security, and on the publication in the Soviet press of President Eisenhower's speech of April 16th, as first symptoms of the liberalization of the regime. Yagoda and Beria were not only criticized but shot, but this did not bring about any change in the oppressive policy of the regime. However, Mr. Rostow's speculations concerning the future, even if not shared, have the merit of stimulating the reader's own guessing.

Professor Hazard's book provides another useful guide to the understanding of the regime. The author has used Soviet legislation as an effective tool for the reconstruction of the regime in action. Soviet law makes one understand the nature of the Soviet system, because a totalitarian state is compelled by its very nature to regulate every detail of social life, and because Soviet leaders act on the strength of Lenin's view that "law is politics" and mould legislation according to the current needs and goals of the Communist party.

This short history and survey of Soviet law reviews each branch of Soviet legislation in its development since the Revolution and in its present stage. It contains a wealth of information and a skillful analysis, documented by frequent references to Soviet judicial cases which help one understand the impact of the legislation upon the life of Soviet citizens. The limpid style makes it easy even for a person who has had no legal training to follow the author's interesting analysis. The legal materials adduced by Professor Hazard support the image of the regime found in Professor Fainsod's book. A lawyer accustomed to Western standards will be struck by certain features of Soviet law: its stern nature, the denial of civil rights, the collective responsibility of the family of a soldier who has deserted abroad, the punishment by analogy for acts which are not forbidden expressly by the Soviet codes, strict labor discipline enforced by law, and the flexible interpretation of international law to suit the political expediency of the Soviet Union.

W. W. KULSKI.

Syracuse University.

Ideals and Self-Interest in America's Foreign Relations: The Great Transformation of the Twentieth Century. By ROBERT ENDICOTT OSGOOD. (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. 1953. Pp. xii, 491. $6.50.)

This book addresses itself to the debate on the extent to which foreign policy should be guided by considerations of national self-interest and of ideals. Butressed by careful historical study covering the period from 1898 to 1942, and characterized by thoughtful reflection throughout, Dr. Osgood's volume is a sober, constructive guide to statesmanship and public enlightenment. Eschewing the extremities of the overzealous Realists on the one hand and of the selfless Utopians on the other, the author does not hesitate to affirm that idealism and self-interest are compatible, within rational limits, or that idealism is a driving force which can impel men toward constructive goals and new ways of tackling old problems. He also believes that it is the only impulse which can sustain the popular sacrifice necessary for survival—a fundamental in the scale of values embodied in national interest.

A good deal of the ground material used by the author has been dealt with before by diplomatic and political historians. Nowhere has its total meaning been more thoughtfully appraised in terms of the conflicting emotions, changing policies, and bewildered reactions of Americans in their search for a foreign policy responsive on the one hand to their native idealism yet viable on the other hand in a world of tensions, struggles, and wars.

Within the pages of this book are re-enacted the succession of Great Debates which have stirred, and torn, the American body politic since 1898—expansionism versus anti-imperialism; internationalism versus nationalism; neutrality versus intervention in war; adherence to the League versus noninvolvement; disarmament, outlawry of war, isolation versus participation in global struggles. The author generally follows Walter Lippmann's thesis that Americans often found themselves in untenable positions during this period of fluctuating stands because they tended to regard struggle and conflict between nations as unnatural and wrong and rejected constructive use in time of peace of their own elements of strength for political ends. Because the American people held an unrealistic view of the true nature of world politics and of "the conditions under which they might reconcile their ideals with their national self interest, their foreign relations from the turn of the century to the 1930's were marked by impulsiveness, instability, and ineffectiveness." And because their ideal expectations could not be fulfilled, and because they persisted in making and adhering to commitments they would not back up with force when challenged, bewilderment and disillusionment swept the nation. Only when the public became aware, through the crucial events of 1940-1941 and the unfolding of Axis war ambitions, that a close relationship existed between their own security and survival and that of others does the author feel that they at length began to appreciate that realism and enlightened self-interest could be reconciled with ideals.

While accepting the validity of the Christian-liberal-humanitarian ideals, and while acknowledging their implications for personal living, the author concedes that in practical international politics the dictates of security and of survival are not always strictly compatible with supra-national ideals. This being so, the task of the statesman—and of the public also, it might be added—is to reconcile ideals and national self-interest, insofar as possible, on a case by case basis through selection of means and ends according to a consistent scale of values. Only by identifying the points of coincidence of the two can narrow egoism be modified. And only as political, economic, and military realities are soberly weighed in terms of national interests and of security can ideal values be maximized in the actualities of international struggle. For the extent to which the nation can approximate its ideals and its national goals depends upon an accurate appraisal of the forces at work within the world, the elements of power involved, and a wise choice of instruments and patterns of policy. Sheer impulse or selflessness cannot gain it these ends. For the first time in its modern history, the United States has actually been confronted since 1940 with a realization that its own survival and the values and interests which are vital to it are at stake in world politics and that the preservation of security is in itself a cardinal value.

Despite the transformation which has occurred in the American outlook, the author fears that old predilections to act by impulse may arise yet again to occasion new pitfalls as the United States becomes still more involved in the complexities of international politics. This has been evidenced already since 1945 in the blind faith Americans reposed for some time in the United Nations, in their continued disposition to think that solutions can be found to all international problems, in their search for scapegoats when events turn out to their disliking or when conferences become stalemated over presently insoluble issues, and in the appearance of urgings to try to escape it all.

The heart of the author's reasoning is found in his belief that "ideal goals are not obtained in the real world of conflicting national purposes by moral fervor alone but only by a pragmatic calculation of the means to an end, by a rational anticipation of the actual consequences of a given action." Self-interest without ideals is unrealistic and can become self-defeating. Power for survival and for the attainment of national objectives must be measured by ideal standards and a consistent scale of values. Whether one subscribes fully to the author's premises and conclusions or not, the views which he has set down on the respective roles of ideals and of national self-interest, and their interconnection, merit reflective thought by all concerned with the security and well-being of the nation.

NORMAN J. PADEFORD.

Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Moscow and the Chinese Communists. BY ROBERT C. NORTH. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1954. Pp. 306. $5.00.)

This book covers the whole period from 1920 to 1953 and treats relations with Moscow within the framework of developments within China and the Chinese Communist party. It is especially interesting for the period up to 1937, for which it uses many sources that are new or not readily accessible. There is a very good discussion of the rather obscure developments which led to Mao Tse-tung's rise to leadership and complete confirmation of the falsity of official Communist history which tries to defend Stalin's policy during this period.

The period from 1937 to 1949, which saw the growth of Communist control from a small, remote, and backward area round Yen-an to the whole of mainland China, receives much less adequate and much shorter treatment (only 60 pages). Great reliance is placed on the Army Intelligence report published in the McCarran Hearings, but this is not an altogether satisfactory source. When it was produced, U. S. Intelligence had not been able to fill out the gap in information from Communist areas between 1940 and the summer of 1944 caused by refusal to short-circuit the Kuomintang news blockade. For instance, when the U. S. Army Observers' Section reached Yen-an, the reviewer learned that his attempt to make contact with British or U. S. Intelligence from West Hopei in 1943 had failed because the U. S. authorities had used a radio station with operators from Tai Li's organization, the very organization responsible for preventing any contacts with the Communist areas.

To the non-American reader it seems that the interpretation of this period has been inhibited by reluctance to make too open a challenge to current popular beliefs in America. In the concluding chapter it is cogently argued that "The West . . . and especially the United States, needs to strengthen public confidence in its own democratic revolutionary heritage . . . and demonstrate to the world that we are a bold, imaginative, and constructively revolutionary people" (p. 285). But previous chapters do not apply this standard to American policy. It is said: "Even in retrospect, it is difficult to formulate an American course which, if followed, would necessarily have stopped or even seriously frustrated the Communists" (p. 202). But as early as 1941 P. A. M. Linebarger had written that "the base of Communism is peasant revolt. If the conditions of peasant revolt are eliminated, Communism will not be much more of a threat to China than it is to the advanced countries of Europe" (The China of Chiang Kai-shek, p. 174). A very obvious course for America was indicated by the evidence that the Communists were gaining because they met opposition from the Kuomintang but never competition—that they were winning support, not through the specifically Communist elements in their policies, but through their readiness to give the peasants what they wanted, which made people ready to accept or overlook the specifically Communist elements. The situation is seriously misrepresented by the statement that "many Americans—largely ignorant of what went on among the Chinese Communists—were doubtful whether the Nationalist need for increased efficiency and effectiveness in the war effort justified the undemocratic measures which Kuomintang leaders were taking" (p. 203), because many of the Kuomintang measures were directly incompatible with efficiency or an effective war effort and made sense only as directed to preserving the traditional Confucian social structure. For instance, it is recognized that the failure of Kuomintang units in North China to hold their own against the Japanese was due to faulty strategy (p. 189). But this faulty strategy was related to the fear of the Kuomintang authorities of allowing the type of organization essential for effective guerilla warfare. By following correct but, by Kuomintang standards, highly irregular methods, Wang Yu-min in East Shantung was able to resist both Japanese and Communists until 1945.

If, instead of backing a party with Leninist organization and a leader with Confucian ideals, American policy had followed the course which Mr. North recommends in his final chapter, China might have been offered some acceptable alternative to Communism and it is possible that important sections of the Communist movement might have been won over to something like Titoism.

Acceptance of the current American view of Communism as motivated by nothing but a drive for power leads to an analysis which almost certainly exaggerates the consistency and cunning of Communist policy. While the drive for power may be especially prominent in Communist motivation there is evidence that Communists, like other people, often act from mixed motives. For instance, opinion in Yen-an towards the end of 1945 saw a fight with the Kuomintang not so much in terms of a long-range plan to establish undisputed Communist power (cf. p. 228) as in terms of self-preservation. From 1927 to 1937 the Kuomintang had usually killed any Communists it could catch and there was some real justification for a fear that only Communist armed strength prevented a resumption of this policy. Mr. North may be right in arguing that the Marshall Mission was bound to fail because the Communists were determined to seize power. But he rather slurs over the evidence indicating that it was also bound to fail because American policy never provided the Communists with any guarantee of security except through victory in a civil war. It is, for example, rather disingenuous to say that "Chinese Communist papers and radio accused the United States of intervening on the side of Nationalist forces . . . but Washington insisted that the American purpose was to secure the full surrender of Japanese forces throughout China. . . ." (p. 224) without admitting that the final surrender of Japanese forces was secured only by the Communist capture of T'aiyuan in 1949 and that, even near the main American bases, Japanese troops continued for months to hold sections of the Kuomintang front.

This criticism has concentrated on what seems the weakest section of the book and should be qualified by saying that even for this period it provides a lot of interesting information. Chapter XIV provides a good summary of developments under the Peking Government. If space permitted, the reviewer would like to challenge the phrase "totalitarian efficiency" and argue that the regime has been efficient in spite of, and not because of its totalitarianism. But this is a large and controversial question.

LINDSAY OF BIRKER.

The Australian National University.

American Foreign Assistance. BY WILLIAM ADAMS BROWN AND REDVERS OPIE. (Washington: The Brookings Institution. 1953. Pp. xii, 615. $6.00.)

Raising the World's Standard of Living: The Coordination and Effectiveness of Point Four, United Nations Technical Assistance, and Related Programs. BY ROBERT T. MACK, JR. (New York: The Citadel Press. 1953. Pp. xviii, 285. $4.00.)

In these days, when the new slogan "trade, not aid" is being gingerly bandied back and forth across the Atlantic, the appearance of a thorough and judicious analysis of American foreign aid programs since Pearl Harbor is particularly timely. As such, American Foreign Assistance, the product of several years of painstaking research by two distinguished economists under the auspices of The Brookings Institution, should be warmly welcomed alike by government officials and by students of recent American foreign policy.

The Brown-Opie study is a solidly documented volume which traces in detail the evolution of American foreign aid through five overlapping phases: (1) wartime lend-lease and reciprocal aid to our allies; (2) early postwar relief and rehabilitation assistance—both through UNRRA and by subsequent unilateral loans and grants; (3) economic aid for European, and in a limited and somewhat sporadic fashion Far Eastern, recovery—largely through the Marshall Plan; (4) the Point Four program for underdeveloped areas; and (5) the emergence of the Mutual Security program since NATO and Korea. During these twelve fateful years, according to the authors' calculations, "the United States made available approximately $94 billion for programs of assistance to foreign countries in pursuit of the political, military, and economic objectives of its foreign policy" (p. 8). Subtracting loans, the net total of direct grants exceeds $80 billion, roughly half of which represents aid given since the end of World War II. It is with the motivation, administration, impact, and limitations of postwar aid activities that the study is primarily concerned. The final section of the book presents a general appraisal of aid policies and operations, including a number of concrete recommendations for the guidance of future US foreign economic policy.

While maintaining a generally sympathetic point of view toward foreign aid goals throughout their study, the authors do not hesitate to intersperse critical evaluations. They note, for example, that except for Point Four all US aid programs were intended as emergency measures, and even Point Four has not been regarded by many members of Congress as a long-range instrument of policy. The observation is made that Washington's wartime estimates of postwar recovery needs proved to be grossly inadequate; also, that the notion that reconstruction could be achieved by loans, without resorting to outright grants, only gradually came to be regarded as unrealistic. With reference to the Marshall Plan, the test of need was mainly dollar deficits which, in the authors' opinion, turned out to be an unsatisfactory criterion since it failed to provide sufficient amounts of assistance to achieve complete recovery, or to supply "proper incentives" to the Europeans to put their own economic house in order. To some readers, among them the present reviewer, this latter judgment, made with the advantage of hindsight, may seem unjustifiably severe. Indeed, the authors themselves in a later passage question "the propriety of . . . efforts by the United States to persuade, press, or coerce its allies to accept objectives that are presumably in the interest of all" (p. 568); and they look upon the Benton amendment to the Economic Recovery Act (designed to promote "free enterprise" in Europe) as an unwise attempt to influence the internal policies of the aid-receiving countries.

Most economists, on the other hand, would agree fully with Brown and Opie's condemnation of the tying of economic aid to the disposal of American agricultural surpluses, not to mention the provision that at least half of the American goods supplied to overseas nations must be transported in American ships. Both of these conditions, it is convincingly shown, had the effect of reducing the capacity of such nations to earn and save dollars and thereby ran counter to the avowed purposes of the Marshall Plan.

The authors of American Foreign Assistance are equally critical of the recent tendency to subordinate economic aid to security considerations. The earmarking of counterpart funds for military purposes by the Mutual Security Act of 1951 is singled out for castigation as "undue interference" in the domestic affairs of other countries. In milder vein, the Battle Act (restricting Western trade with Communist-dominated areas) is characterized "as an uneasy compromise between the American and the European views of the effect of such trade on the security of the free world" (p. 233), although the authors admit that the Act was applied by the Administration with marked restraint.

In their overall appraisal of American aid policy, Messrs. Brown and Opie properly emphasize the impressive results it has achieved in overcoming the economic and military weaknesses of the free world community—despite the necessarily improvised and often poorly coordinated administration of much of the policy. Looking ahead, however, they fear that the need for further non-military assistance may be underestimated. Point Four, in their judgment, should be continued on a long-term basis and along with it effective arrangements for the provision of capital for economic development will somehow have to be devised. But at best they see little hope that private lending will be sufficient and they are convinced that any substantial renewal of international investment will require intergovernmental action—presumably through the United Nations. The United States, they believe, must lead the way toward a world-wide liberalization of commercial policy and toward general currency convertibility. This is a large order and there are at present few signs that it is likely to be viewed sympathetically in congressional circles.

Raising the World's Standard of Living, by Robert T. Mack, Jr., is of a decidedly lower order of scholarship. Originally submitted as a doctoral dissertation at the University of Chicago, Mr. Mack's study consists largely of a descriptive account of the machinery through which various types of economic and technical assistance have been provided by international agencies (chiefly the United Nations system) and by the United States government. Since most of the research for the study was completed by the middle of 1950, such attention as the author gives to the "expanded" UN program and to US Point Four operations is fragmentary, frequently out-of-date, and not always accurate. The volume contains a mass of documentary information on the legislative history of the UN and US programs and undoubtedly will be useful for background reference purposes. A case study on the handling of foreign aid in Iran, although apparently based entirely on materials available in this country, is perhaps the most valuable feature of the study.

In general, however, it does not really do what its subtitle would lead one to expect, namely, provide a critical appraisal of the "coordination and effectiveness" of current multilateral and bilateral aid programs. Coordination is the recurring theme of each successive chapter—indeed, the term itself is employed almost ad nauseam—but one is never quite sure whether the author fully understands its connotation as an overall administrative problem. There is much cursory comment about coordination (though little or nothing on "effectiveness"), yet the reader does not get much insight into the informal dynamics or human aspects of the process.

Unfortunately, Mr. Mack's survey is marred by a verbose and rather pedestrian style, as well as by numerous factual errors. To cite only two: the Hot Springs Conference of 1943 did not, as the author implies, draw up the Constitution of FAO (p. 32); nor is it accurate to claim that the UN Technical Assistance Board "coordinates not only its own members, but also other international, intergovernmental, and regional organizations operating in this field" (p. 113). In noting the role of the Organization for European Economic Cooperation, no reference is made to its "productivity" program—probably the most significant of its endeavors from the point of view of Mr. Mack's study, while the economic aid activities of the US Economic Cooperation Administration in Southeast Asia and the Pacific appear to have been completely overlooked.

In this reviewer's opinion, the author would have been well advised to mature his judgments, many of which seem to lack substantive foundation, by further inquiry and reflection following his Ph.D. thesis operations. In its present form, the printed volume impresses the reader with having been hurriedly put together in order to expedite publication. This may be an unfair characterization, but the grandiose title of the study, at any rate, is scarcely warranted. It is regrettable that what might have been an outstanding contribution should treat so important a subject in such a disappointing manner.

WALTER R. SHARP.

Yale University.

Administration in Foreign Affairs. BY ARTHUR W. MACMAHON. (University, Alabama: University of Alabama Press. 1953. Pp. v, 275. $3.50.)

How much do intelligent laymen, including political scientists not specializing in international relations, need to know about the technical problem of administrative organization for the conduct of foreign affairs? In this instructive treatise, which began as a series of lectures for the Southern Regional Training Program in Public Administration, Professor Macmahon holds that perhaps their first need is to realize that here as elsewhere a little knowledge may be a dangerous thing. "For in foreign affairs especially," he observes, "things never go quite right and there is a constant temptation to seek a scapegoat. If the scapegoat is [alleged to be] the structure, we may bedevil ourselves to the end of time by cherishing the illusion that there is somehow a simple, decisive, frictionless way of arranging the organization. . . . The sickening frequency and now apparently automatic newspaperman's use of the word streamlining are signs enough of the muddy middle ground that must be crossed in achieving a mature sympathy for organization as one of the great resources of a people."

From the standpoint of administration—questions of substantive policy fall outside the scope of the book—the conduct of foreign relations poses a dual problem: how to achieve what Macmahon calls a "concert of judgment" in decision-making in Washington and how to match it by a concert in action on the part of all governmental agencies having responsibilities abroad. Neither of these is easily accomplished. For one thing the United States has yet to become accustomed to participation in foreign affairs on so vast a scale, to providing so much of the necessary initiative and leadership, and (though this confronts all nations more or less alike) to using the methods and working through the machinery of council or parliamentary diplomacy; for another there is the tremendous size of its own establishment. In 1951, for example, there were 167,315 civilians working outside our continental limits. Some 45 per cent were employed in U. S. territories and possessions, yet 91,234 were in foreign countries.

Most of these, to be sure, were aliens performing largely manual services, but 32,475 were American citizens. Among them 20,768 were employed by the Armed Services, 8,390 by the Department of State, and 1,537 by the Mutual Security Agency, which has since been reorganized as the Foreign Operations Administration. A dozen other departments and agencies had smaller though in some cases fairly sizeable numbers.

With regard to improving the concert of judgment at home, Macmahon shows that emphasis on refining administrative adjustments has already produced substantial dividends and concludes that this, rather than the search for some grand new scheme of organization, represents the true line of advance. Let the huge Department of Defense keep plugging away at real unification and thus reduce, for instance, the danger that U.S. officers in N.A.T.O. may find it more difficult to check and clear projects within the Defense establishment than with the Department of State or the Foreign Operations Administration. Let the staff of the Bureau of the Budget go on serving as the "prime institutional catalytic of decision." Let Americans be reconciled to the unlikelihood that the Cabinet will ever become an effective instrument of coordination but note meanwhile that the National Security Council, "in essence a Cabinet Committee," gives promise of being "decisively fruitful." Finally, let no one assume that the President could easily lighten his own enormous burden in this field by the simple expedient of formalizing the position of a high assistant for foreign affairs with which Truman and Harriman experimented. The sounder way, in Macmahon's view, is to "seek the magic of free minds by equipping for creative thinking men rooted in responsibility, especially the Secretary of State himself."

Intelligence studies, cultural exchange, information and economic programs are here to stay, and the proper way for them to be organized is probably "within the framework of a single though suitably decentralized department of foreign affairs." All of them are vital phases of the conduct of foreign affairs and all are manageable within the State Department provided there be no rigid insistence on scalar streamlining. Intelligence is basic but the process involved is "far more patient than mysterious." Though economic operations are often held to pose problems insoluble except by the establishment of an independent agency, the early record of State's Technical Cooperation Administration was so good that it could well have become "the nucleus of an economic operating branch in a composite department."

In view of the near erasure that has been made of the distinction between domestic and foreign affairs in recent years, the need for interdepartmental coordination will continue at a premium. Since the War there have never been less than thirty major interdepartmental committees dealing with foreign policy and this general arrangement may be expected to continue. Incidentally, some evidence of the reality of interdepartmental cooperation can be found in the fact that "in a sample of two post-war years only about one-fourth of the United States representatives at nearly four hundred international meetings were from the State Department."

With regard to the integration of the efforts of U. S. agencies and officials abroad, William H. Draper's success as Special Representative in Europe for the Secretaries of State, Treasury, and Defense and the Mutual Security Administrator indicates that it may from time to time and place to place be possible to employ a device of this kind for regional coordination. Yet there can be no doubt that the main responsibility for the unification of our activities abroad must continue to be organized on a country-by-country basis and be vested in the chief diplomatic officer accredited to its government. Lastly, with regard to personnel, Macmahon quotes with approval the view of the advisory committee appointed by Secretary Acheson in 1949: the United States should have "a single personnel system applicable to all people under direct administrative control of the Secretary of State."

JOHN A. VIEG.

Pomona College.

The Advice and Consent of the Senate: A Study of the Confirmation of Appointments by the United States Senate. BY JOSEPH P. HARRIS. (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 1953. Pp. xii, 457. $5.00.)

The constitutional decisions of the courts usually find their way quickly into the accounts and analyses prepared by those whose business it is to discern the meaning of judicial thought in both its current and historical aspects. Less systematic and less voluminous commentary is the rule with respect to practice in the interpretation of those parts of the Constitution whose content rests on decisions by the political organs of government. One of the resulting gaps in the literature is plugged by Professor Harris' book. He directs his attention to the brief clause empowering the President to nominate, "and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," appoint "ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments" are not otherwise provided for. So generously has the Senate, on which Professor Harris focuses his treatment, interpreted its authority under this succinct mandate that about 400 pages are required for a rather compressed analysis of practice under the clause.

In the organization of the mass of data on the subject Professor Harris chose to devote about one-half his space to an historical account of actions of the Senate in giving or withholding its advice and consent and the other half to topical analyses. A selective report on practice before this century emphasizes those incidents and cases most significant in the formation and development of senatorial custom. As the story approaches the present day, the account becomes more comprehensive and several spectacular cases are the subjects of notable chapters, such as those on the Brandeis and Olds cases.

The topical chapters both rest on the historical data presented in the first half of the book and report additional relevant materials. Individual chapters are devoted to a codification of Senate precedent and practice in relation to nominations to different categories of offices: cabinet officers and heads of independent agencies, diplomatic officers, judges, and administrative and military officers. One chapter copes with the identification of the exact usages comprised within the rule of senatorial courtesy and another deals with Senate procedure in its "advice and consent."

Long reflection on its record does not necessarily generate an admiration for the Senate. Professor Harris concludes that "on the whole, the requirement of senatorial confirmation has not elevated the standards of appointment to federal offices." Senatorial confirmation has not provided the salutary safeguard "against unfit appointments that Hamilton expected, but has rather confirmed the judgments of Madison and John Adams, who expressed doubts concerning the wisdom of the provision." Professor Harris takes the view that appointments by the President with senatorial confirmation should be so few that both the President and the Senate could know what they are about. He contends, however, not for a substitution of presidential patronage for senatorial patronage but for an extension of the career service.

While Professor Harris is concerned about the proper place of the Senate in the appointing process, he devotes his efforts principally to analysis of practice. The book bears throughout the marks of careful workmanship and will doubtless remain for some time the standard treatment of a question of very considerable significance in the American constitutional system.

V. O. KEY, JR.

Harvard University.

Nationalism and Social Communication: An Inquiry into the Foundations of Nationality. BY KARL W. DEUTSCH. (Cambridge: The Technology Press, Massachusetts Institute of Technology; and New York: John Wiley & Sons, Inc. Pp. x, 292. $5.00.)

Professor Deutsch has several objects in view: giving aid and comfort to a converging assault by specialists in many disciplines upon the scientific understanding of nationalism; stimulating the growth of a body of research knowledge composed of operationally pertinent data; and adding something to the subject on his own account. The first part of the monograph explores a wide range of contributions to the topic of nationalism by historians, political scientists, economists, sociologists, social geographers, social psychologists, linguists, ethnologists, and others. The spirit of the treatment is tolerant and constructive, aiming at translation and fusion rather than separatism. As a means of demonstrating the fruitfulness of his research Professor Deutsch presents four case studies of the languages used in Finland, Bohemia, India and Scotland, which he utilizes to provide an index of assimilation to the ultimate nationality.

The theoretical discussion lays particular emphasis upon some of the conceptions developed in certain branches of communication theory. Engineers concerned with studying telephone and other networks of communication have examined the efficiency with which patterns fed into the nets are reproduced at terminal points. Although the term "information" has crept into the vocabulary of the engineers, the word does not have the connotation of a "meaning." It is restricted to the patterns of sound waves, dots and dashes, and electromagnetic phenomena familiar to physicists. Whatever interferes with the duplication at the output point of the physical pattern fed into the network at the input point is "noise." The term "memory" is borrowed to refer to the storing of past inputs so they may be available at some later point in time than usual. It has been brilliantly shown that communication traffic conforms to fundamental laws of physics, notably entropy (the tendency of order to give way to disorder). Mathematicians working with neurologists have proposed to apply the same mode of analysis to the operation of the brain and the nervous system.

Unfortunately the connection between theories of this kind and nationalism is not demonstrated in Professor Deutsch's study. The potential significance of the diffusion of language patterns is no novelty in the history of the subject. If the author's interest in the study of assimilation was stimulated by communication theory, this was largely a personal accident, since the pertinent hypotheses are readily derivable from standard theories of the phenomena. It is significant that the term "information" as employed by the engineers does not figure in the analysis when Professor Deutsch comes to grips with his topic. He wisely reverts to a more differentiated vocabulary, and undertakes to provide operational specifications for "will," "consciousness," and the like. Similarly the term "memory" is measured by no new indexes. It is postulated rather than demonstrated that "memory" (plus many other meaningful predispositions) is linked with language.

Perhaps the most serious limitation on Professor Deutsch's work comes from disproportionate reliance upon categories that he does not apply, with a resulting deflection of attention from the most promising core of theories of human behavior, namely, those on valuation. If we postulate that human beings act to maximize their net value realizations, the task of theory is to formulate guides to inquiry in which such a phenomenon as nationalism is shown to rise and fall according to a fluctuating pattern of expectation. The perspectives, in turn, need to be related to the attention structures that arise in stated circumstances. The most fruitful formulation of nationalism will connect it with the theory of choice, and especially with the category of choices that concerns politics most directly, namely, the sanctioned choice (decision). In terms of dynamic equilibrium theory, we need a model capable of empirical verification in which nationalism is a changing magnitude in reference to rival "ism" magnitudes (such as localism, regionalism, transnationalism, universalism), and varies as a function of specified systems of change in expectations relating to values incorporated within the self-systems of human beings under specified environmental circumstances (acting upon specified systems of predisposition). Similar specifications are needed for situations involving other values, such as respect and enlightenment (social class; and access to news and interpretative comment).

The point of these remarks is not that Professor Deutsch does not allude at some point to what is at stake, but rather that the lack of emphasis upon the value process leads to a scattered and disproportionate theory. This may help to explain the feebleness of the projections into the future made in the final chapters, and the dogmatism that occasionally intrudes, such as the view on page 51 that a worldwide body politic is impossible.

The affirmative contributions of the book should not be cast in the shadow. Perhaps Professor Deutsch's eclecticism and infectious enthusiasm for research will draw into the circle of productive scholars specialists who would otherwise devote themselves to less important topics. The numerous indications of the kinds of operational indexes pertinent to the study of social and political processes may encourage needed research work. (An excellent example is the enumeration at the beginning of Chapter 5 of some of the indexes suggested by communication studies.) The four cases summarized in Chapter 6 are presented with care and imagination, and are eligible take-off points for many promising inquiries.

HAROLD D. LASSWELL.

Yale University.

Church, State, and Freedom. BY LEO PFEFFER. (Boston: Beacon Press. 1953. Pp. xvi, 675. $10.00.)

The explosive issue of church-state relations—which many in the United States had apparently and somewhat naively thought was dead or at least soundly slumbering—has come more and more to the forefront in the politics, law, and thought of the past two decades. The many legal cases involving Jehovah's Witnesses, controversies turning on the relation of education to religion, such works as the monumental three-volume study of Anson Phelps Stokes, and the several polemics of Paul Blanshard and his critics have served to remind us that the relationship of spirituals to temporals is indeed a perennial and often ubiquitous problem in political and legal theory and in practical politics.

As a scholarly discussion of the whole problem, mainly in the context of American conditions, Leo Pfeffer's study will take high rank. Written by a lawyer and emphasizing the legal issues involved, it is also characterized by a serious interest in problems of political theory and sociology.

The volume is divided into three parts. In the first, the author considers the evolution of what he conceives to be the uniquely American principle of church-state relations and religious freedom. There is a good summary of theory and practice from ancient times to the Reformation; an analysis of the problem and its "solution" in countries other than the United States; and an excellent account of the slow development of the "American principle" from colonial times to the adoption of the First Amendment.

Part Two considers the "establishment of religion" clause of the First Amendment as it has been interpreted in American thought, law, and political practice. With great erudition, the author examines the issues of state aid to religion, church intervention in state affairs, state intervention in church affairs, the public school and religious education, the "released time" experiment, religious practices in the public schools, state aid to religious education, and "indirect" and federal assistance to education. Pfeffer endeavors to state every point of view as persuasively as possible, usually in the words of the respective advocates themselves. At the same time, he frankly avows his own position, which is that the prohibition of laws "respecting an establishment of religion" was intended to bar, and ought to bar, not only preferential aid to one religion but also state assistance to religion in general. This was the position taken by those most closely associated with the passage of the First Amendment, he maintains, and is also the interpretation which will in the long run permit both state and church to perform their respective functions best.

The text for Part Three is the "religious freedom" clause of the First Amendment, as differentiated from the "establishment of religion" prohibition. Here the author considers the relation of religious freedom to national defense, including the problem of conscientious objection to war; the bearing of the "freedom" guarantee on the protection of public morals; the legal definition of blasphemy and sacrilege; religious freedom and regulation of property; and liberty in relation to marriage and the family, welfare of children, protection against financial insecurity, and the raising of revenue.

At the conclusion of the study Pfeffer offers several "theses" which he believes find "reasonable support" in his researches. Briefly, they include the following: church and state in history have ever tended to compete for the control of human destiny, and while at times church has dominated state, more frequently state has controlled church and used the ecclesiastical organization for its purposes. Before the American experiment "separation of church and state" and "religious freedom" were virtually unknown. While the two notions are sometimes in conflict, on the whole "separation" guarantees freedom and freedom requires "separation." The idea of separation and freedom "was conceived to be as absolute, as possible within the limitation of communal society" and the framers of the First Amendment imposed a "moral obligation" on future generations to preserve the experiment. Historical impairments of the principle (which are due to man's imperfections) should not be used to "whittle away" at the "absoluteness" of the First Amendment and, as a matter of fact, to the extent that historical deviations (for example, religious education in the schools) have developed, the evils against which the "fathers" warned have materialized. Basically, however, the American people have been "faithful" to the principle and under its aegis "religion has achieved in the United States a high estate unequalled anywhere else in the world."

On the whole, Pfeffer makes out a good case for most of these propositions. One wonders, though, under what theory the "fathers" could impose on their descendants a "moral obligation" to carry out the ideas of the First Amendment. One might wish, also, that Pfeffer had emphasized more strongly the great difficulties of separating "spiritual" from "temporal" concerns. Then, too, his reading of history seems at some points to be overly simplified.

By and large, however, students of political theory and law, as well as the general reader, will find this a well-written and skilfully organized volume which illuminates what is becoming once more an increasingly acute issue in American politics and thought.

MULFORD Q. SIBLEY.

University of Minnesota.

Politics, Economics, and Welfare. By ROBERT A. DAHL AND CHARLES E. LINDBLOM. (New York: Harper & Bros. 1953. Pp. 526. $5.00.)

This is an important book, in part because it represents a far-flung, pioneering venture in the joint use of the tools of political science and economics, and in part because it applies the tools of these two disciplines to the concept of economic planning, which is defined as "an attempt at rational calculation and control in the use of scarce resources."

The keystone of the book is the cogently-argued thesis that the great issues of socialism versus capitalism, planning versus nonplanning, and welfare state versus laissez faire simply do not exist. The possibilities for rational social action depend not upon our choice among mythical grand alternatives but largely upon choice among particular social techniques. In fact, the central core of both classic liberalism and classic socialism is the belief "in the possibility of achieving progress in extending freedom and equality through man's capacity for rational calculation and control."

The authors attempt a systematic analysis of rational calculation and control. They discuss aids to calculation, mechanisms for setting goals, and basic control techniques and processes. They devote the bulk of the book to four central socio-political processes required for economizing: price system (control of and by leaders); hierarchy (control by leaders); polyarchy (control of leaders); and bargaining (control among leaders). "Any complete society intelligently bent on using its resources efficiently must, unavoidably, make some use of all forms of them . . ."

Among the most useful aspects of the book is a detailed comparison of the advantages of the price system and hierarchy. The values of a price system are many. It makes rational calculation easier by providing a common denominator of values and by "delegating" decisions to a large number of persons. It also facilitates various forms of control. It is "a mechanism by which leaders can through payment of wages, rents, interest, and other money rewards, induce workers and other holders of resources to submit to hierarchical control within the enterprise . . . [and] through which leaders control consumers so that they do not attempt to consume more production than is available." At the same time, businessmen can be controlled by consumer and occupational choice, by competition (particularly through substitution), by bargaining, and by the hierarchical controls of government. These controls operate to an important extent even under conditions of monopoly and group efforts to set prices and divide markets. In fact, the customary pricing routines of business are "sometimes an intelligent approach to marginalism in the face of uncertainty." There is even a role for the price system in socialist societies and in nationalized industries.

The greatest limitation of the price system is that it is "a highly specialized process and adaptable to a much narrower range of problems than is the case for the other processes." In the case of such sharable services as education and national defense, "high cost to individuals makes choice through the price system wholly inefficient." Price system rewards cannot be used for some ends, such as attracting men into the armed services. When private system rewards can be used effectively, they may have too explosive an effect upon the distribution of national income. Or else the existing distribution of income will require collective allocation or subsidization. Third party damages from market transactions may be both widespread and serious. Also, people often wish to escape market choice because it takes too much time or leads to a breakdown of standards they would like to see enforced. "Price system choice and allocation may operate at an extremely low level of rationality." In all real world price systems, control over entrepreneurs is always imperfect. The effectiveness of a price system for choice and allocation is sharply reduced by either inflation or depression.

Bureaucratic organization, on the other hand, is "often the indispensable means by which a small number of individuals can coordinate the actions of a large number." Its use is essential when the desired amount of coordination cannot be achieved through face-to-face contact, a free confederacy, reciprocal or spontaneous controls, or the price system. It is needed to handle complex operations and to obtain the maximum advantage from the division of labor. It also comes into being because of "the desire for status and control as ends" and "a cultural bias in favor of deliberate, conscious efforts at an apparently rational adaptation of means to ends."

But bureaucracy has three major weaknesses. First, bureaucracies are often wasteful of resources. Yet "in a wide variety of situations the internal economies of business bureaucracies are more than offset by the external costs they create, and the internal wastes of government bureaucracies are more than offset by the external social gains." Second, hierarchy is likely to produce serious inequalities in human dignity and political power. Third, it is likely to escape both internal and external controls. In addition, it suffers from such minor weaknesses as red tape, passing the buck, rigidity, impersonality, and over-centralization.

These weaknesses of bureaucracy cannot be overcome merely by replacing business hierarchies with government hierarchies (or vice versa), or by new rules (which usually mean more red tape). The more important prerequisites for the successful use of hierarchy are social acceptance of it, more political controls, some degree of decentralization to small groups, and above all supplementation through the price system. Both hierarchy and the price system, in turn, must be supplemented by polyarchic and bargaining processes.

The authors' treatment of these subjects will raise many questions. To this reviewer a central question is whether rational social action should not be viewed as an aspect of the general social process of group organization and conflict. Another is whether it is not essential to study the divergent objectives of different groups and the sources and uses of whatever power they are able to wield. If the answer to both these questions is affirmative, then much of the book's systematic framework diminishes in importance and many of the valuable analyses and insights in the book can become truly fruitful only when seen in a new and broader perspective.

Yet the many questions which the book suggests can be of tremendous value to the future development of the social sciences and—as this reviewer has already discovered by putting the book to use in a graduate seminar—to the promotion of creative thinking among advanced students. With a sense of historical perspective the authors write in their preface that “one way to measure the progress of a science of political economy is by the degree to which a book of this kind becomes obsolete.” Without suggesting undue optimism concerning the pace of progress, this reviewer suggests that political scientists and economists tap this rich vein of ore as quickly and thoroughly as possible.

BERTRAM M. GROSS.

Jerusalem, Israel.

Flood Control Politics: The Connecticut River Valley Problem, 1927-1950. By WILLIAM EDWARD LEUCHTENBERG. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1953. Pp. vi, 339. $5.00.)

This case study of floods, flood control, and politics in the Connecticut River Valley over a twenty-three year period closes with a three-fold answer to the question: “Why in a region which prides itself on its attention to public issues, in a region where river valley development has been a controversial question for more than two decades, is the record so poor? Why has so little been done? Why has so much that has been done been done so badly?” The author concludes:

Much of the explanation lies in the practice of assigning responsibility for water resources to a number of federal agencies, each isolated from the rest, often working at cross purposes, with no fixed responsibility for developing a coordinated program. . . .

A second reason for the poor record of the Connecticut Valley during this period stems from the inadequacy of individual state action and the limitations of the compact device. . . .

A final reason for the failure to develop the Connecticut River Valley stems from the inclination of economic interests and political parties to turn every water resources problem into an ideological dispute, to view every question, no matter how technical, as a moral issue.

In arriving at this assessment, the author has documented his statements meticulously. A total of 745 notes and a 33-page bibliography support the twelve chapters tracing the history of the Valley. The book constitutes a detailed examination of what has gone on during the past quarter-century, and will be a definite source of interest to all students of water resources development and its politics, whether they agree with the conclusions or not. Throughout the book, the documentation seems to support the theses that the investor-financed public utilities frequently exercised a controlling influence on the actions of state governments; that the Army Engineers were both inept and expedient in their handling of problems entrusted to them; that the interstate compact device is not satisfactory for handling the problems of development of an interstate stream; and that full federal control of water resource development is the only sound answer.

Early in the book it is stated that when Franklin Roosevelt took office in 1933 there was no national water policy. The author could well have pointed out that today there is equally no explicit national water policy.

Many of the weaknesses of the 1936 Flood Control Act are set forth, with the statement that President Roosevelt's advisers were well aware of them and that the President must bear much of the responsibility for the 1936 Act. Another writer has recently indicated that the Administration does not appear to have been alerted to the important policy implications of that Act until late in April of 1936, less than two months before the bill was passed and signed.

While the author does not pretend to competence in the field of engineering, he appears to assume that control of floods in the Connecticut Valley necessitates the construction of reservoirs. At one point, a definite question is raised as to engineering:

Yet the Army Engineers must bear the burden either of having advocated a plan of flood control that would needlessly have flooded one of the loveliest valleys in New England, when a perfectly feasible alternative proposal existed, or having agreed to a final, "compromise" plan which failed to provide adequate flood protection for the lower valley. The War Department first asserted that it was impossible to go up the feeder brooks and build dams that would give adequate protection and then agreed to a proposal that did just that. Moreover, if a high flood control dam was required on the West River, then hydro-electric power could have been developed, and the final compromise sacrificed power as well.

No question is raised or discussed in the book as to whether all the flood protection that is economically sound for the Valley might not be provided by the construction of levees, flood walls, and other local protective works at the seven major urban damage centers in Massachusetts and Connecticut. Perhaps an exploration of this question would show that, notwithstanding the great dramatic impact of a serious flood or hurricane, the economics of flood damage reduction (not flood control) would not warrant the kind of program that the high dam (and public power) advocates support. It is possible that such consideration has affected state participation in the federal proposals.

It is particularly timely that this extensive and detailed study should become available while a proposal for adoption of the interstate compact device as an approach to solution of the Missouri River problems is actively under consideration, and when a Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government has assigned one of its task forces to examine the whole federal activity concerned with water resources and power.

There probably will be many who will not agree with the author's conclusion when he says: "In the last analysis, the President was correct when he wrote Cross in 1937 that water resources were not properly the subject of interstate compacts but of federal legislation."

Nevertheless, the book should bring to mind a warning in the task force report on natural resources made for the first Hoover Commission: "If the consolidations recommended by the Committee . . . are not carried into action, and if present competition among federal resources agencies continues, it will in all probability be necessary to establish regional authorities."

And, there is another prediction that was made in December, 1952 by a subcommittee of the Committee on Public Works of the United States House of Representatives: "If conflicts among the agencies cannot be resolved with the existing distribution of functional responsibilities, the subcommittee believes it probably will invite the consideration of a new approach for the resolution of the many conflicts."

In any event, the experience of the quarter-century described by the author should provide lessons that must be heeded if water resource development is to be successfully prosecuted and, particularly, if the states and local governments are to bear a larger share of the work.

CHARLES D. CURRAN.

Washington, D. C.

Public Policy: A Yearbook of the Graduate School of Public Administration, Harvard University, 1953. EDITED BY C. J. FRIEDRICH AND J. K. GALBRAITH. (Cambridge: Graduate School of Public Administration, Harvard. 1953. Pp. xi, 292. $4.75.)

This is the fourth volume in a series which was begun in 1940, and is now being resumed after interruption by the war. The first volume stated that its purpose was to make available studies growing out of the Littauer seminar program, and this is still the major idea, though the 1953 volume invites "critical studies of limited areas of policy" from any members of the profession for future issues.

The reviewer has the problem that always arises in dealing with a symposium, complicated here by the absence of any unifying theme. To be sure, the first four essays are on subsidy problems, the next four are on problems of the bureaucracy, and the final four are grouped as studies in comparative government and civil rights. But the essays in each group are related only in a very episodic fashion, so that one is reduced to talking about the individual contributions or about the general questions raised by such a publication. This review will try to do a little of both.

The group of essays on bureaucracy is headed by Arthur Maass' brilliant discussion of the weakness of the Budget Bureau as a policy staff for the President. The Bureau's dilemma results from the fact that operating agencies look to it for indications as to whether their proposals are "in accord with the program of the President," whereas in many cases no definite policy line has been laid down. Recognizing the impossibility of going to the President on each "day-to-day problem that arises, the Bureau tends, Maass says, to "muddle through," to try to mediate differences so that there will be no policy conflict which has to go to the President. Lacking in both authority and professional knowledge as to substantive policy questions, the Bureau tends to interest itself in the institutional manifestations of problems, leaving basic program conflicts unresolved. Maass goes on to indicate why the Bureau, characterized by the parochialism and caution of a career bureaucracy, cannot possibly function as a top policy staff, and concludes with some suggestions as to how such a staff might be organized.

The outstanding essay in the third section is Robert G. McCloskey's brief but incisive analysis of three governmental areas, all appropriately exploited by the McCarran Act, where current constitutional doctrines permit exercise of "arbitrary power"—control of the mails, of public employees, and of aliens. McCloskey discusses the reasons given for judicial self-limitation in these areas, and concludes that arbitrary power is so much the exception in the American governmental system that a re-thinking of the judicial policy is justified.

These two essays, plus several others on which space is lacking for comment, far outweigh a few meaningless pieces in the volume, but do they justify the claim of the work to the status of a yearbook in the field of public policy? Obviously it would not be feasible to attempt to make the issues discussed representative of the policy issues faced by the United States during the year in question. But on whatever ground the policy issues covered are selected, the purpose of the volume, considering its auspices, should certainly be to advance the systematic study of public policy. It is difficult to believe that such a purpose has been served here. Before long it would seem appropriate for the editors to vary their pattern by including some analysis of the lessons learned by the Harvard seminars and the most fruitful methods discovered for tackling public policy problems. The kind of hard thinking which Harold Stein and his Committee on Public Administration Cases put into the development of the case concept might be equally effective here.

C. HERMAN PRITCHETT.

University of Chicago.

The Nemesis of Power: The German Army in Politics, 1918-1945. BY JOHN W. WHEELER-BENNETT. (London: Macmillan & Co.; and New York: St. Martin's Press. 1953. Pp. xvi, 829. $12.00.)

A monumental work in which the author of Hindenburg: The Wooden Titan, Brest-Litovsk: The Forgotten Peace, and Munich: Prologue to Tragedy has finally come to grips with the central fact in German politics, the German Army—state within the state. Here the student of history and politics finds an encyclopedic coverage of events in the German arena based on painstaking research as well as personal contacts and observations by the author. The copious footnotes and appended biographical data contain an exhaustive "who's who" in German politics and as such represent an invaluable commentary on the events and the literature of the times. With his noted literary skill, the author has woven into the story of the Army a history of the Weimar Republic, a description of the rise and fall of National Socialism, an excellent account of the German resistance movement, and a discussion of major phases of World War II. He has been able to utilize many important documents hitherto available only in widely separated archives, collections of personal papers, memoirs, periodical literature of several countries, and the records of the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials. It is regrettable that he was not in a position to make use of the von Seeckt and Stresemann papers, which are now available to the public in the United States.

The study commences with an examination of the position held by the Army at the end of World War I and finds that already in 1918 an "umbilical cord" existed "which bound the infant Weimar Republic to its progenitor and protector, the German Army." Soon the Army, under von Seeckt's leadership, assumed a role of supreme arbiter in the state. The magic formula which so consistently enabled the generals to wield political power with impunity was the simple pronouncement: "The Government does not have the confidence of the Army." The generals believed that the same formula could be employed with equal facility once their creation, Hitler, had outlived his usefulness. They discovered, to their everlasting regret, that in Hitler they had met their Nemesis. Once power had slipped from their grasp, some generals and a larger number of officers of lesser rank attempted to turn back the clock by joining in conspiracies against the totalitarian regime. Their attempts, valiant but quixotic and disorganized, terminated in the bloodbaths of July and August, 1944.

As a work on the German Army, and as a study of armed forces in politics, the book is indispensable reading. It is, in addition, a real literary achievement. This reviewer has but one major criticism: throughout the book, the "Army" is equated with "the Generals." This may be methodologically sound in view of the extraordinary discipline which prevailed in the old German Army. However, it seems to be debatable whether it is sound to equate certain officers of the old guard with the Army of post-1938 days. It is especially debatable whether from 1939 on the Army command was as preoccupied with the contemplation of attempts on Hitler's life as the author's preoccupation with the resistance element seems to imply. Could it be that Wheeler-Bennett succumbed to a literary temptation to emphasize the exceptional doings of exceptional men over the relatively drab routine of an Army at war?

HENRY L. BRETTON.

University of Michigan.

BOOK NOTES AND BIBLIOGRAPHY

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

Henry Cabot Lodge: A Biography. BY JOHN A. GARRATY. (New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 1953. Pp. xxiv, 433. $6.00.)

This is a successful biography. The author had access to the Lodge papers and set out to recreate Lodge's point of view, realizing that the Senator was a controversial figure and that as an author he should avoid "the twin perils of the whitewash and the tar barrel." The gentleman from Massachusetts, known as "the scholar in politics," was elected six times to the Senate and so might qualify under Tom Reed's definition of a statesman as "a successful politician who is dead"; but this revealing record fails to prove the rating. Henry Cabot Lodge was a diligent and expert partisan, a highly trained and intelligent worker with the raw material of politics, and an effective operator of legislative techniques.

A third of this book is devoted to "one of the great rivalries of American history." The Lodge-Wilson conflict over the Versailles Treaty and League of Nations Covenant is intimately, accurately, and comprehensively told in these pages, largely in Lodge's words. There was a mutual antipathy between Wilson and Lodge, not so much personal on Lodge's side as political, for in Mr. Garraty's words—which I can confirm from Lodge himself—he regarded Democrats in power as "incompetent to transact the nation's business in a responsible way" (p. 127). In his Republican conscience Lodge knew the Democrats were going to fight the war and win the peace in the wrong way, and they largely met his expectations. He was too serious and "patriotic" not to agree or even commend when they acted right (according to his ideas). He cooled on the league of peace idea, which could easily be overdone, and he found that Wilson overdid it. Tactically, as Republican leader, Lodge's partisan task was to impose Republican coloration on a treaty and League of Nations negotiated by a Democrat. As a broker of votes in the Senate's factions he assembled the specifications, and in the end was able to point to votes which indicated that Wilson's stubbornness prevented his having a treaty made safe for the United States by the persistent efforts of Republicans. It was a very competent major operation of the parliamentary order which disregarded the merits of the patient. Lodge's maneuvering to a successful issue is narrated with very few omissions, though the biographer, like his subject, pays very minor attention to the substance of the reservations which would or would not yield the majorities Lodge required. It is ironical, though a tribute to the inherent integrity of America, that Lodge's success in defeating an irrepressible idea marked a progressive decline in his party prestige.

Lodge was a politician the like of whom is in short supply. A well-bred, educated intellectual of independent means, he deliberately embarked on a career of public service in which there was never "a private interest which in the remotest way conflicted with or affected my performance of my public duties" (p. 282). He was in politics for 45 of his 74 years, 37 in Congress, of which 31 were in the Senate. He learned party loyalty and "practical" politics under the lash of opposition and defeat provoked by men of his own ilk, Charles W. Eliot among them. He was married to a remarkable woman, and his contemporaries divided his career into two parts marked by her death in 1915; he grew in stature with her and was less sure of himself without her.

Mr. Garraty, in using the Lodge papers, had the benefit of the memories and criticism of the Senator's grandsons. The Senator's namesake contributed some footnotes on the League fight, including one (pp. 379-82) to vindicate his grandfather's views. Senator Lodge, who sought no higher office, had his name on no legislation, but he helped mold much of the enactments of a generation in which he was a leader of his party. For all the doings of the scholar, the politician, or the man, Mr. Garraty has diligently dug out of the Lodge papers a first-hand account, seasoning the record with observations with which the normal reader will invariably agree. Seldom has the political scientist had so complete a revelation of a public man's devotion to his country as controlled by the demands of a party which he helped to formulate.—DENYS P. MYERS, Washington, D. C.

Federal Examiners and the Conflict of Law and Administration. BY LLOYD D. MUSOLF. (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins Press. 1953. Pp. xii, 203. $3.00.)

The increasing use of the hearing officer in federal regulatory activities, and the controversy about administrative justice culminating in the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946, provide the context of this study of federal examiners. Nearly a score of federal agencies have hearing officers who come within the term "examiner" as used in the Act. Perhaps the most controversial of these have been the NLRB trial examiners, although examiners play a significant role in the procedures of the FTC, CAB, FCC, FPC, SEC, ICC, and Department of the Interior, as well as several other agencies.

What makes the study of the examiner's office of more than ordinary interest to the student of law and administration is that it relates directly and dramatically to the whole controversy over the nature and scope of administrative justice. The familiar complaint that administrative justice tends to unite in one agency the functions of judge, jury, and prosecutor—and the fact that the complaint sometimes has considerable substance—has tended to focus attention on the few hundred federal examiners who find themselves at the center of this whirlwind. It is precisely in the role of the examiner and his relationship to the other officers in the agency that the practical application of the "separation of functions" drive tends to center. Is the function of the examiner properly analogous to that of a trial judge, in that he is a professionally disinterested man chosen for his judge-like qualities who is to make an initial decision on the law and the facts? This the author calls the "court tradition." Or is his role properly that of furnishing one element in a continuous and institutional process through which the agency as a whole arrives at an administrative determination required to carry out established policy? This the author calls the "agency tradition." If it is the first, he must be given a considerable degree of independence from influence by agency heads, he must be virtually isolated from other staff members in preparing his recommendations, and he must be precluded from having any part in the framing of final agency decisions. If it is the second, consultation with other staff members is proper and desirable, and participation in the final decision-making is useful.

A review of experience in the various agencies shows a wide variety of actual practice with respect to the central questions regarding the examiner's role, particularly those having to do with his isolation and his independence.

The impact of the Administrative Procedure Act on this rather unstandardized situation is summarized as follows: (1) it tends to enhance the examiner's powers in the direction of giving his report the finality of a trial judge's decision; (2) it exalts the examiner's decision through requiring that it be in writing, be accompanied by reasons, be served on the parties for comment, and be made a part of the formal record of the case. One result has been that the Supreme Court and other federal courts have increasingly been willing to reverse agency findings on the basis of examiners' reports, and in effect to uphold the examiner against the agency as though he were a trial court and the agency an intermediate appellate court. The author rightly regards this as an undesirable tendency which endangers the responsibilities of the regulatory agency.

Today, the conception of the examiner's function is "in turmoil." This has perhaps arisen out of a justifiable drive to strengthen the examiner to assure adequate performance. But in doing this, "adherents of the court tradition have either inadequately perceived or deliberately ignored the consequences for the system of agency responsibility for regulation" (p. 137). The danger is that recent judicial decisions (notably the Universal Camera Case in 1951) will place excessive emphasis on the examiners as trial courts and will encourage them to "go it on their own" in disregard of the importance of agency policy-making. This, in the opinion of the author, is not required by a moderate interpretation of the Administrative Procedure Act, within the framework of which it will be possible to secure a proper balance in the examiner's office. Such a development awaits an understanding of all the factors involved and "the exercise of restraint by all concerned."—VINCENT M. BARNETT, Jr., Williams College.

The Legislative Process in Congress. By GEORGE B. GALLOWAY. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell Co. 1953. Pp. xii, 689. $6.00.)

This book is "a successor to, rather than a revision of," the writer's earlier work—Congress at the Crossroads, published in 1946, which consisted of 374 pages in contrast to the present 689 pages. Extensive new material is added taking into account the operation of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946. Twenty-five chapters take the place of the original eleven, and there has been a thorough rearrangement of the subject matter. Some new chapters greatly expand a number of subjects dealt with briefly in the earlier work, such as the committee system and its operation, the organization and procedure of the Senate and the House of Representatives, and the party organization within Congress. Other new chapters on control of expenditures and foreign relations, Congress and public opinion, the role of the individual congressman, Congress and the courts, and pressure politics take up matters not previously given much if any consideration. Part Four contains three chapters entitled: "The Operation of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946"; "Proposed Reforms in Congressional Investigations"; and "New Steps in Congressional Reform." Without doubt, the author's long and close relationship with Congress has placed him in a unique position to produce what is the most comprehensive, up-to-date, and useful single volume on the national lawmaking body. The book is indispensable for all students of American government and of the American legislative process.—O. DOUGLAS WEEKS, The University of Texas.

Civil Rights in Immigration. BY MILTON R. KONVITZ. (Ithaca: Cornell University Press. 1953. Pp. xii, 216. $3.50.)

The Cornell Studies in Civil Liberty were initiated in 1946 with the publication of Konvitz's The Alien and the Asiatic in American Law. The most recent addition to this series is by the same author and, in part at least, on the same subject. Instead of revising his earlier book following the passage of the McCarran-Walter Immigration and Nationality Act in 1952, he decided to write a new one on the subject of discrimination in American legislation relating to the alien. This he does in three chapters dealing with admission and exclusion, deportation, and naturalization.

In these three chapters the author briefly reviews the historical development of the American policy of discrimination against the alien on account of race, color, creed, opinion, and national origin, with particular reference to the post-World War II period. The result is a critical evaluation of present policy as embodied in recent congressional legislation. The national origins formula is "most offensive" from the standpoint of both civil liberties and human rights. Aliens are sent back to their native country like "parcel post." A ten-year ineligibility for naturalization for former members of the Communist party "is too far-reaching a sword." From these and other criticisms there can be little dissent.

On the constructive side the author makes a number of recommendations, some of which go further than those of the President's Commission on Immigration and Naturalization (1953). He suggests, for example, application of the Administrative Procedure Act to entry and exclusion, as well as deportation, cases; expulsion of aliens only where entry was fraudulent or illegal; and elimination of all but constitutional distinctions between native-born and naturalized citizens.

For the political scientist this little volume is a useful addition to the literature of civil rights in the United States. It may not be as objective or neutral as some persons would like, but perhaps, as the author points out in his preface, it may be more desirable to aim at strengthening the reader's power of conviction and his sense of social responsibility.—L. V. HOWARD, Tulane University.

American Constitutional Custom: A Forgotten Factor in the Founding. BY BURLEIGH CUSHING RODICK. (New York: Philosophical Library. 1953. Pp. xx, 244. $4.75.)

It is the purpose of this study to show that "there is scarcely a single important feature of our American political system that does not bear the imprint of an earlier European tradition" (p. 1). While this debt to tradition is generally accepted as a fact, it is accepted uncritically and without sufficient appreciation of its extent. Professor Rodick, therefore, makes no small contribution in his extensive documentation of what is, if not entirely "a forgotten factor," one too seldom given its proper weight. It is not until the Jeffersonian revolution of 1800 and the subsequent western expansion that definitely indigenous political habits and customs have any appreciable development (p. 101). Prior to this beginning in the early nineteenth century of a definitely American constitutional tradition, there is practically no feature of our constitutional system without its English precedent. The electoral college was one of the very few exceptions, and to Professor Rodick it is significant that this exceptional feature was one of the first to fall into disuse (pp. 86-87).

Some of the analogies which the author draws between English history and our own would seem, however, to be somewhat accidental. It is one thing to point out that our political theory, at least directly, is almost wholly English in origin. It is something else to draw a parallel between the Uxbridge Conference in 1644 and the Staten Island Conference in 1776 or to brand the defection of Charles Lee as the American counterpart of the plot of Edmund Waller (p. 49). The similarity of these events would seem to be entirely the result of historical accident and while the drawing of such parallels or similarities may add to the interest of the study, it contributes very little to the support of the central thesis.

In the concluding chapter Professor Rodick raises the question of why tradition was the cardinal element in our founding, why the Fathers were motivated as they were. His conclusion is that adherence to habit, custom, and tradition is one aspect of the general problem of emotional drives, and that this adherence is inseparable from such drives as acquisitiveness, gregariousness, fear, ego, religion, the procreative impulse, desire for the good life, etc. It is further concluded that changes in habit, custom, and tradition are occasioned, at least in part, by the operation of such political forces as "the stake in society principle, the iron law of oligarchy, the abuse of political power and the swing of the political pendulum" (pp. 126-28). With reference to this discussion the reviewer is in agreement with the statement of Henry Adams, quoted at the beginning of the chapter: "politics cannot stop to study psychology." It would seem sufficient that it appreciate what Professor Rodick makes so abundantly clear—that the forces of continuity and change are in constant conflict, and that while we are capable to a degree of breaking the bonds of our experience, we should do so with great caution. What is always to be sought is such a balance of these two forces as will serve the general welfare (p. 132). The problem remains of how, at any one time and place, this balance is to be effected. Here again tradition is possibly our best guide, and to the understanding of that tradition the present study is a significant contribution. It discharges quite adequately the duty which it assigns the student of political traditions: it traces "the elements of continuity in those customs that appear to be new, and the elements of change beneath the appearance of their continuity" (p. 132).—FRANK GRACE, University of Michigan.

The Decline of Agrarian Democracy. By GRANT McCONNELL. (Berkeley: University of California Press. 1953. Pp. 226. $3.75.)

Agrarian democracy, in the author's view, existed in America in the 19th century, when the farmers were in the majority or nearly so. It found political expression in mass movements like the Populist party whose programs were broadly conceived in the general interest and had as their goal the limitation or fragmentation of power. The decline of agrarian democracy is equated with the growth of a power structure within agriculture itself, beginning with the county agent and the extension services of the land grant colleges and reaching its apex in the American Farm Bureau Federation. This, then, is a critical history and analysis of the Farm Bureau movement.

What is most impressive about the story, which is told with economy of detail but thorough documentation, is the sure political instinct of the Farm Bureau leadership which has understood the sources of its own strength and known how to protect them. Mr. McConnell sees the A.F.B.F. as a federation of federations of local farm elites, which despite the diversity of their regional and commodity interests have been unified by the national organization on a class basis (they are "superior farmers," in the Farm Bureau's words). Their power is consolidated through control of the publicly-subsidized county agents and extension services. Protection of this "decentralized" machinery for serving and controlling the farmers thus has been the central concern of the Farm Bureau; new farm programs must be administered through it or be destroyed. The account of the battles waged to this end sheds much light on the current farm controversies which rack the Congress and the Administration.

The book really has no conclusion. The author laments the passing of "agrarian democracy," which he knows is final. He sees cause for alarm in "the fact that the conditions of power exclude so large a part of the farm population from the benefits of the political process," and in this he is surely right. But this is by no means exclusively a farm problem. None of the great power groups in our pluralistic society represent more than a fraction of the people for whom they purport to speak. The problem of how to get adequate representation for the unorganized promises to worry us for a long time.—RALPH K. HUITT, University of Wisconsin.

Texas Presidential Politics in 1952. By O. DOUGLAS WEEKS. (Austin: Institute of Public Affairs, The University of Texas.

1953. Pp. x, 116. Paper, $1.25; cloth, $2.00.)

O. Douglas Weeks was chief Texas correspondent for the A.P.S.A.'s Cooperative Research Project on Convention Delegations in 1952. Bravely addressing himself to the staggering task of reporting on the nominating process for both parties in the state's 254 counties, he set up a clipping service on the 16 principal newspapers of the state and enlisted the cooperation of political scientists throughout the state as observers of various conventions. Countless interviews provided the rest of the data.

The book begins with a summary of Texas politics in the preceding eight years and an explanation of the convention system through which the delegates to the presidential conventions are chosen. There follows the account of the struggle from precinct to county to state conventions. The system in both parties creaked under the strain of a great rush of new voters, but the confusion was greater on the Republican side. Until 1952 the party had been a small, exclusive club; now several hundred thousand voters wanted to make it a part of the electoral process. The book's most entertaining reading deals with the unblushing fraud with which Taft-oriented leaders threw out the Eisenhower majorities from the county and state conventions.

Other chapters cover Texas in the national conventions, the campaign in the state, and an analysis of the election results. The author concludes with some penetrating skepticism about the likelihood of the election foreshadowing a real two-party system with Republican candidates for county treasurer and sheriff. When the Eisenhower Administration appointed bolting Texas Democrats to cabinet and sub-cabinet posts (Hobby and Anderson), it did not encourage the growth of the party in Texas. Many parts of the Texas election law are serious obstacles to the party. Finally, so long as Texas conservatives retain a firm grip on the state Democratic party, it is not necessary for them to organize a second conservative party.—DONALD S. STRONG, University of Alabama.

Renewing Our Cities. By MILES L. COLEAN. (New York: The Twentieth Century Fund. 1953. Pp. x, 181. $2.50.)

Miles Colean draws on his long experience with municipal planning and housing to take a broad view of the problem of forestalling and eliminating urban blight. His book is packed with revealing insights and practical suggestions for action in an area where only the valiant presume to see light.

The basic assumption is that a city resembles an organism in having a "natural" course of development which, if not interrupted, will result in constant renewal of its physical and economic structure. When blight occurs, some obstacle to this renewal has, perforce, intervened. The problem of renewal is, then, simply the identification and elimination of the obstacle to new investment. He summarizes typical obstacles, including lack of sanitary and occupancy laws, air pollution, noise, low quality of municipal services, high level of taxes, traffic congestion, strangulation of cities through archaic municipal boundaries, multiplicity of independent political jurisdictions, dispersed ownership, false values, fallacious zoning, resistance to changes in established social relations, shortage of adequate housing, racial prejudice, improper building codes, low yield on new property as compared with other types of investment, poor potentialities for reuse, and high cost of renewal operations. Such substantial causes, surely, are quite sufficient to discourage new investment where the conditions suggested occur. It may be questioned, however, whether these may not be more or less omnipresent outgrowths of the pace of technology beyond social enlightenment at the present point in the history of American society. To think of them as unnatural obstacles to an otherwise smoothly running economic mechanism reflects a theory which has long since lost most of its adherents.

Colean concludes with a nine-point program designed to insure the removal of the roadblocks noted. Despite its uncertain theoretical basis, those interested in improving urban living could hardly fail to profit by a reading of this little book.—ROBERT T. DALAND, University of Alabama.

Congressional Quarterly: Almanac, 83rd Congress, 1st Session—1953. Vol. IX. (Washington: Congressional Quarterly News Features. 1954. Pp. 663. $17.50.)

For the first time the CQ Almanac is made available for separate purchase to those who do not subscribe to the CQ weekly service. It contains a concise summary of the year on Capitol Hill, including all legislative steps, individual voting records, lobby registrations, election percentages, costs of electing the Congress, reorganization orders, box score on the President's program, and many other matters, making it altogether a complete reference manual for the first year of the 83rd Congress.

The Forging of American Socialism: Origins of the Modern Movement. By HOWARD H. QUINT. (Columbia, S. C.: University of South Carolina Press. 1953. Pp. ix, 409. $6.00.)

This is a detailed account of conflicting and cooperating groups and ideologies which, in 1901, were forged into the American Socialist party. The reader becomes acquainted with persons who have been, if in memory at all, merely names. Issues of doctrine and program between the many "radical" groups which attempted to get a foothold in United States politics, in the organized labor movement, or among "people of good will" are clearly pointed. The author refuses to be tempted into lateral trails from which interest in socialism emerged. Setting the story of social questioning in the environment in which it was nourished might have made the socialist movements seem less isolated from the main stream of American history than they appear to be. The volume well repays reading by anyone interested in increasing his comprehension of the rich variegation of our national past.

Farm Policies of the United States, 1790-1950: A Study of Their Origins and Development. By MURRAY R. BENEDICT. (New York: Twentieth Century Fund. 1953. Pp. xv, 548. $5.00.)

A detailed and interpretive analysis of the evolution of the varied policies of government affecting agriculture and of farmer participation in politics. Although earlier policies as to land, money, tariffs, and internal improvements are adequately summarized, over half of the volume deals with the last 25 years and a closing chapter points up the issues for the future.

Resource Conservation: Economics and Policies. By S. V. CIRIACY-WANTRUP. (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 1952. Pp. xi, 395. $6.50.)

An analysis of the problem of conservation; of forces affecting depletion or conservation, such as tenancy, tax and credit systems; of the objectives and criteria of conservation policy; and of the techniques for implementing policy.

American Life: Dream and Reality. By W. LLOYD WARNER. (Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. 1953. Pp. xv, 268. $3.75.)

As a summary for the general reader of twenty years of research on community studies, by the author of the Yankee City series, this book is disappointing. Some aspects of the American scene (Reality) are analyzed from a social-status or class-structure point of view, but "our hopes for a realizable future" (p. vii, Dream) are ignored. The promise is enticing, but the product is weak.

The Political Liberalism of the New York Nation: 1865-1932. By ALAN PENDLETON GRIMES. (Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press. 1953. Pp. ix, 133.)

A review of the contribution to American political thought of the New York Nation over a period of nearly seventy years. The writer believes that because of a sufficient continuity of editorial policy, this periodical reflects at least one rather definite evolving segment of liberal political thought in the United States.

Olson's New Deal for California. By ROBERT E. BURKE. (Berkeley: University of California Press. 1953. Pp. xi, 279. $4.00.)

The story of the only Democratic state administration in California during the twentieth century, that of Culbert L. Olson from 1938 to 1942, which, while unable to put through its principal reform policies, helped to give the Democratic party a new importance in California politics.

Impatient Crusader: Florence Kelley's Life Story. By JOSEPHINE GOLDMARK. (Urbana: University of Illinois Press. 1953. Pp. xii, 217. $3.50.)

An account of the career of an indefatigable social reformer, Florence Kelley (1871-1932), who worked as Chief Inspector of Factories for Illinois, in Hull House and the Henry Street Settlement, and as General Secretary of the National Consumer's League, and had a part in founding the U. S. Children's Bureau, the National Woman Suffrage Association, and the National Child Labor Committee. She also rendered valuable assistance to Louis D. Brandeis.

Propaganda Handbook. By D. LINCOLN HARTER AND JOHN SULLIVAN. (Philadelphia: Twentieth Century Publishing Co. 1953. Pp. 440. $5.00.)

A manual of the art of propaganda which devotes considerable space to the techniques and media of the propagandist and embodies in part a case study approach.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS

FRANKLIN L. BURDETTE

University of Maryland

ARTICLES AND BOOKLETS

National Government

Horack, Frank E., Jr. Congressional Investigations: A Plan for Legislative Review. American Bar Association Journal. March, 1954.

Humphrey, Hubert H., Jr. The Stranger at Our Gate—America's Immigration Policy. Public Affairs Pamphlet No. 202. 1954.

Newman, Frank C., and Harry J. Keaton. Congress and the Faithful Execution of Laws—Should Legislators Supervise Administrators? California Law Review. Winter, 1953–1954.

Riddick, Floyd M. The Eighty-Third Congress: First Session. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1953.

Snee, Joseph M. One for the Money, Two for the Show: The Case Against Televising Congressional Hearings. Georgetown Law Journal. November, 1953.

1953 Annual Survey of American Law. Part I—Public Law: In General. New York University Law Review. January, 1954. Part II—Government Regulation and Taxation. Ibid. February, 1954.

State Government

MacRae, Duncan, Jr. The Role of the State Legislator in Massachusetts. American Sociological Review. April, 1954.

Oberst, Paul, and Thomas Lewis. Claims Against the State of Kentucky—Reverse Eminent Domain. Kentucky Law Journal. January, 1954.

Trends in State Government—1954, as Indicated by the Governors' Messages. State Government. March, 1954.

Westmeyer, Troy R. The Proposed Revision of State Aid in Massachusetts. Boston University Law Review. January, 1954.

Local Government

Citizens Research Council of Michigan. Tax Rates of American Cities. National Municipal Review. January, 1954.

Friedelbaum, Stanley H. Municipal Government in New Jersey. Rutgers University Press. 1954.

Georgia Municipal Police. Bureau of Public Administration, University of Georgia. 1953.

James, Charles S. The Integration of Fire and Police Services. Public Management. February, 1954.

Metropolitan Planning in the Chicago Area. Northwestern University Law Review. November–December, 1953.

Pfretzschner, Paul A. Urban Redevelopment: A New Approach to Urban Reconstruction. Social Research. Winter, 1953.

Richland, W. Bernard. Constitutional City Home Rule in New York. Columbia Law Review. March, 1954.

Study Kit on Michigan Local Government. Bureau of Government, Institute of Public Administration, University of Michigan. 1954.

Wall, Hugo. Changing Concepts of Managerial Leadership. Public Management. March, 1954.

Intergovernmental Relations

Handbook on Federal Grants-in-Aid. American Parents Committee, Inc. 1953.

Mills, Charles K. Interstate Recognition of Alimony Decrees. California Law Review. Winter, 1953–1954.

Oliver, Covey T. The Nature of the Compulsive Effect of State Law in Federal Tax Proceedings. California Law Review. Winter, 1953–1954.

State Taxation and Interstate Commerce. Columbia Law Review. February, 1954.

Constitutional Law and Civil Liberties

Bartholomew, Paul C. The Supreme Court of the United States, 1952–1953. Social Science. January, 1954.

Berns, Walter. Buck v. Bell: Due Process of Law? Western Political Quarterly. December, 1953.

Beth, Loren P. The Wall of Separation and the Supreme Court. Minnesota Law Review. February, 1954.

Brown, Walter L. A Substitute for the Bricker Amendment. Virginia Law Review. February, 1954.

Deyrup, Thorold J. Executive Agreements under the Bricker Amendment. Social Research. Winter, 1953.

Dixon, Robert G., Jr. The Fifth Amendment and Federal Immunity Statutes. George Washington Law Review. March, 1954.

Fleming, D. F. Are We Moving Toward Fascism? Journal of Politics. February, 1954.

Frank, John P. Fred Vinson and the Chief Justiceship. University of Chicago Law Review. Winter, 1954.

Garrison, Lloyd K. Congressional Investigations: Are They a Threat to Civil Liberties? American Bar Association Journal. February, 1954.

Gorfinkel, John A. The Fourteenth Amendment and State Criminal Proceedings—"Ordered Liberty" or "Just Deserts." California Law Review. Winter, 1953-1954.

Mendelson, Wallace. Dred Scott's Case—Reconsidered. Minnesota Law Review. December, 1953.

Pogue, Richard W. Wiretapping and the Congress. Michigan Law Review. January, 1954.

Trimble, E. G. Search and Seizure under the Fourth Amendment as Interpreted by the United States Supreme Court. Kentucky Law Journal. January, 1954.

Wilkinson, Donald M., Jr. Censorship of Obscene Literature. Michigan Law Review. February, 1954.

Judicial Administration and Law Enforcement

Conrad, Edwin. Magnetic Recordings in the Courts. Virginia Law Review. January, 1954.

Ernst, Morris L. The Policeman and Due Process. Journal of Public Law. Fall, 1953.

Harper, Fowler V., and Arnold Leibowitz. What the Supreme Court Did Not Do During the 1952 Term. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. February, 1954.

Hogan, John C. The Court of Appeals in Cases of Capture (1780 to 1787). Oregon Law Review. February, 1954.

Hudgins, Edward W. The Judicial Council and Judicial Conference in Virginia. State Government. January, 1954.

An Informer's Tale: Its Use in Judicial and Administrative Proceedings. Yale Law Journal. December, 1953.

King, Archibald. The Proposed Abolition of United States Commissioners. Journal of the American Judicature Society. December, 1953.

Kochery, David R. The Enforcement of Arbitration Agreements in the Federal Courts: Erie v. Tompkins. Cornell Law Quarterly. Fall, 1953.

Louisell, David W., and Maynard E. Pirsig. The Significance of Verbatim Recording of Proceedings in American Adjudication. Minnesota Law Review. December, 1953.

Mars, David. The Public Defender System in Connecticut. State Government. February, 1954.

Pound, Roscoe. The Task of the American Lawyer. Mississippi Law Journal. March, 1954.

The Rosenberg Case: Some Reflections on Federal Criminal Law. Columbia Law Review. February, 1954.

Ryan, Stanley M., and John C. Wickhem. Pre-Trial Practice in Wisconsin Courts. Wisconsin Law Review. January, 1954.

Schwerdtfeger, Wm. The Burden of Proof in the Tax Court. Kentucky Law Journal. January, 1954.

Smith, Bruce, ed. New Goals in Police Management. [Symposium.] The Annals. January, 1954.

Wright, J. Skelly. Pre-Trial on Trial. Louisiana Law Review. February, 1954.

Public Administration and Administrative Law

Baldwin, Raymond P., and Livingston Hall. Using Government Lawyers to Animate Bureaucracy. Yale Law Journal. December, 1953.

Benson, George C. S. The Personnel Man and the Management Team. Public Personnel Review. January, 1954.

Charlesworth, James C., ed. Bureaucracy and Democratic Government. [Symposium.] The Annals. March, 1954.

Emmerich, Herbert, and G. Lyle Belsley. The Federal Career Service—What Next? Public Administration Review. Winter, 1954.

Hall, John C. Federal Injunctive Relief Against State Administrative Orders. Michigan Law Review. February, 1954.

Long, Norton E. Public Policy and Administration: The Goals of Rationality and Responsibility. Public Administration Review. Winter, 1954.

Mitchell, James M. Building a Productive Civilian Work Force in the Department of Defense. Public Personnel Review. January, 1954.

Schwartz, Bernard. Administrative Law and the Sixth Amendment: "Malaise in the Administrative Scheme." American Bar Association Journal. February, 1954.

Sherwood, Foster H. Judicial Control of Administrative Discretion 1932-1952. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1953.

Spann, R. N. Civil Servants in Washington. Political Studies. October, 1953.

Spiegel, William R., and Joseph K. Bailey. The Use of Committees in Management. Public Management. March, 1954.

State Administrative Practice: An Illustrative Survey of the Procedure of the Massachusetts Department of Public Utilities. Harvard Law Review. March, 1954.

Stays of Federal Administrative Action. Harvard Law Review. March, 1954.

Storm, William B., and Frank P. Sherwood. Technical Assistance in Public Administration: The Domestic Role. Public Administration Review. Winter, 1954.

Willbern, York. Professionalization in the Public Service: Too Little or Too Much? Public Administration Review. Winter, 1954.

Political Parties, Elections, and Public Opinion

Abraham, Henry J. Reduce the Voting Age to 18? National Municipal Review. January, 1954.

Hamilton, Charles Granville. Lincoln and the Know Nothing Movement. Public Affairs Press. 1954.

Hennessy, Bernard. A Case Study of Intra-Pressure Group Conflicts: The United World Federalists. Journal of Politics. February, 1954.

Higbie, Charles E. Wisconsin Dailies in the 1952 Campaign: Space vs. Display. Journalism Quarterly. Winter, 1954.

Holcombe, Arthur N. Presidential Leadership and the Party System. Yale Review. March, 1954.

Lumsdaine, Arthur A., and Irving L. Janis. Resistance to "Counterpropaganda" Produced by One-Sided and Two-Sided "Propaganda" Presentations. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1953.

Mayo, Louis H. The Free Forum: Development of a Democratic Forum in the Limited Media of Mass Communication. George Washington Law Review. March, 1954.

———. The Limited Forum: An Analysis of Restrictions on the Discussion of Public Issues in the Channels of Mass Communication. George Washington Law Review. January, 1954.

Nixon, Raymond B. Trends in Daily Newspaper Ownership since 1945. Journalism Quarterly. Winter, 1954.

The Question of Lowering the Voting Age to 18. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. March, 1954.

Scott, William Abbott. Attitudes Toward Participation in Civil Defense. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1953.

Wiebe, G. D. Some Implications of Separating Opinions from Attitudes. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1953.

Yankwich, Leon R. Recent Developments in the Law of Creation, Expression, and Communication of Ideas. Northwestern University Law Review. November-December, 1953.

Economic and Social Functions

National Economy

Christopher, Warren M. The Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act: Key to a New Frontier. Stanford Law Review. December, 1953.

Weintraub, Sidney. The New Monetary Policy. Social Research. Winter, 1953.

Business and Labor

Adams, Walter. The "Rule of Reason": Workable Competition or Workable Monopoly? Yale Law Journal. January, 1954.

Adelman, M. A. The Consistency of the Robinson-Patman Act. Stanford Law Review. December, 1953.

The Anthracite Coal Production Control Plan. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. January, 1954.

Brown, Allison W., Jr. Employee Protection and the Regulation of Public Utilities: Mergers, Consolidations, and Abandonment of Facilities in the Transportation Industry. Yale Law Journal. February, 1954.

Clark, Homer. The Treble Damage Bonanza: New Doctrines of Damages in Private Antitrust Suits. Michigan Law Review. January, 1954.

Cox, Archibald. Grievance Arbitration in the Federal Courts. Harvard Law Review. February, 1954.

Daykin, Walter L. Back Pay under the National Labor Relations Act. Iowa Law Review. Fall, 1953.

Farber, David J. Reversion to Individualism: The Back-Pay Doctrines of the NLRB. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. January, 1954.

Feldman, Edward S. The Garden of Live Flowers: Terminating the Trade Dispute Disqualification under the California Unemployment Insurance Act. Southern California Law Review. December, 1953.

Gilbert, Robert W. Union Publications and the Unlawful Purpose Doctrine. Labor Law Journal. March, 1954.

Hall, Robert H. Removal of a Federal Question in Labor Disputes. Journal of Public Law. Fall, 1953.

Henn, Henry G. The Quest for International Copyright Protection. Cornell Law Quarterly. Fall, 1953.

Howrey, Edward F. The Federal Trade Commission: A Revaluation of Its Responsibilities. American Bar Association Journal. February, 1954.

Intra-Enterprise Conspiracy under the Sherman Act. Yale Law Journal. January, 1954.

Kahn, Alfred E. A Legal and Economic Appraisal of the "New" Sherman and Clayton Acts. Yale Law Journal. January, 1954.

The Loan Shark Problem Today. [Symposium.] Law and Contemporary Problems. Winter, 1954.

Malick, Clay P. Some Reflections on Labor, the Economy and the Public Interest. Labor Law Journal. February, 1954.

McKenna, William F. Control and Management of Federal Savings and Loan Associations. Southern California Law Review. December, 1953.

Mittenthal, Richard. Employer Speech—A Life Cycle. Labor Law Journal. February, 1954.

Norris, Martin J. The Seaman as Ward of the Admiralty. Michigan Law Review. February, 1954.

Riesenfeld, Stefan A. The New United States Patent Act in the Light of Comparative Law: I. University of Pennsylvania Law Review. January, 1954.

Rose, Joseph R. The Hope Case and Public Utility Valuation in the States. Columbia Law Review. February, 1954.

Rosenthal, Robert J. The National Labor Relations Act and Compulsory Unionism. Wisconsin Law Review. January, 1954.

Schilz, Harold L. Voluntary Industry Agreements and Their Exemption from the Antitrust Laws. Virginia Law Review. January, 1954.

Schwartz, Louis B. Legal Restriction of Competition in the Regulated Industries: An Abdication of Judicial Responsibility. Harvard Law Review. January, 1954.

The Specific Enforcement of Collective Bargaining Agreements under Section 301(A) of the Taft-Hartley Act. University of Chicago Law Review. Winter, 1954.

Tower, Charles H. Secondary Boycotts: An Outline. Labor Law Journal. March, 1954.

Wage Policies of the WSB: A Symposium. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. January, 1954.

Agriculture

Crop Dusting: Legal Problems in a New Industry. Stanford Law Review. December, 1953.

Health, Education, and Welfare

Congress Considers Social Security Revision. [Symposium.] Congressional Digest. February, 1954.

Developments in the Law: The Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act. Harvard Law Review. February, 1954.

Estep, Samuel D. Federal Control of Health and Safety Standards in Peacetime Private Atomic Energy Activities. Michigan Law Review. January, 1954.

Fisher, Marguerite J. The Supreme Court and Negro Education. Social Science. January, 1954.

Kelley, Stanley, and Kenneth E. Miller. Politics and Pedagogy. Journal of Politics. February, 1954.

Leflar, Robert A., and Wylie H. Davis. Segregation in the Public Schools—1953. Harvard Law Review. January, 1954.

Mabley, Jack. What Educational TV Offers You. Public Affairs Pamphlet No. 203. 1954.

Somers, Herman M., and Anne R. Somers. Rehabilitation and Workmen's Compensation. Labor Law Journal. March, 1954.

State Regulation of Drugs: Who May Sell "Patent and Proprietary" Medicines. Yale Law Journal. February, 1954.

Thompson, Carey C. Financing Employment Insurance in the United States. Political Science Quarterly. March, 1954.

Military Affairs and National Security

Aycock, William B. The Court of Military Appeals: The Second Year. Journal of Public Law. Fall, 1953.

Hannah, John A. Manpower for Defense. State Government. January, 1954.

Military Jurisdiction over Discharged Servicemen: Constitutionality and Judicial Protection. Harvard Law Review. January, 1954.

GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS

Congress

House. Committee on Agriculture. Disposition of Moneys from National Forests. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1954.

———. Mexican Farm Labor. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Plan of Self-Help for the American Dairy Farmers. Hearing before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Appropriations. Commodity Credit Corporation, Department of Agriculture. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. School Construction, 1954. Hearings before Subcommittees. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. Housing Act of 1954. Hearing. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Education and Labor. Investigation of Welfare Funds and Racketeering. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong. 1954.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Federal Catalog Program. Hearings before Subcommittee. Also House Report No. 1216. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Port of Seattle Transportation Difficulties. House Report No. 1458. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Public Health Service Act (Hospital Survey and Construction Amendments of 1954). Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Review of Finality Clauses in Government Contracts. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong. 1954.

———. Committee on Un-American Activities. Investigation of Communist Activities in the San Francisco Area. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Veterans' Affairs. Federal Aid to State Soldiers' Homes. Hearing. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. 1954 Legislative Programs of the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Disabled American Veterans, and American Veterans of World War II. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

Senate. Commission on Judicial and Congressional Salaries. Reports of the Task Forces. Senate Doc. No. 97. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. Administration of the National Forests. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Agricultural Outlook and the President's Farm Program. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Borrowing Power of the Commodity Credit Corporation. Hearing. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Cooperative Soil Conservation and Flood Prevention Projects. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Wool Program. Hearing. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Banking and Currency. Federal Savings and Loan Branches. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Securities Exchange Acts Amendments. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Finance. Excise Tax Reduction Act of 1954. Hearing. Also Senate Report No. 1085. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Extension of Renegotiation Board. Hearing. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Government Operations. Army Signal Corps—Subversion and Espionage. Hearing before Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations. 83rd Cong., 1st Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. Alaska Statehood. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Statehood for Hawaii. Hearings. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on the Judiciary. Congressional Power of Investigation. Study Prepared by Legislative Reference Service. Senate Doc. No. 99. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Proposing an Amendment to the Constitution of the United States to Grant to Citizens of the United States Who Have Attained the Age of 18 the Right to Vote. Senate Report No. 1075. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Transportation of Fireworks in Interstate Commerce. Hearing before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. Railroad Retirement Act. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

———. Committee on Public Works. Amending the Public Buildings Act of 1949. Hearings before Subcommittee. 83rd Cong., 2nd Sess. 1954.

Other Federal

Civil Service Commission. Junior Management Assistant Programs in the Federal Civil Service. 1954.

Commission on Foreign Economic Report. Report to the President and the Congress. Also Minority Report; Staff Papers. 1954.

Department of Commerce. Bureau of the Census. Governments Division. Local Government Structure in the United States. 1954.

———. State Payments to Local Governments in 1952. 1954.

Department of State. Public Services Division. The Refugee Relief Act of 1953: What It Is—How It Works, 1954.

Office of Defense Mobilization. Committee on Manpower Resources for National Security. Report. 1954.

FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

Governmental Liability: A Comparative Study.

By H. STREET. (Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press. 1953. Pp. iv, 223. $5.00.)

In the field of political responsibility, the maxim "The King can do no wrong" has long been paralleled (and nullified) by the fact that all the king's acts of government are performed by his ministers, who can be held to account for their actions. In the legal sphere, however, the same maxim, in the form of the doctrine of sovereign immunity, has not yielded so easily; while individual responsibility of agents of the government in this field is notoriously inadequate, even democratic governments have clung tenaciously to immunity from suit and have only slowly, and still by no means completely, assumed legal liability in a fashion comparable to that imposed upon private citizens.

Professor Street has given us a comparative study, somewhat historical but primarily analytical, of the law of government liability in Great Britain, the British Commonwealth, the United States, and France. Separate chapters deal with "Tort," "Contract," "Expropriation, Quasi-Contract and Trusts," "Remedies against the State," "Substantive Limitations on Liability of the State," and "Procedural Limitations on Liability of the State." The present situation in each of the countries discussed is far from satisfactory. Although he has kind things to say about French droit administratif, the author is unable to accept its frequent panegyrics at face value. "French legal administration," he declares, "is hamstrung by a blind unreasoning adherence to a 200-year old doctrine of political conduct, the separation of powers" (p. 76). Among the bad results of this doctrine are an "excessive respect for the political branch" and "too much uncertainty about the principles of liability" (p. 77).

The realm of torts has for long been the area in which government liability in Britain and the United States has been most lacking. Each country has recently moved to improve this situation—Great Britain by the Crown Proceedings Act (1947) and the United States by the Federal Tort Claims Act (1946). Professor Street shows, however, that both acts leave a great deal to be desired. They are shot through with ambiguities and exceptions. How true this is of the United States statute has been illustrated by a Supreme Court decision announced since Professor Street's monograph came from the press. This 4-3 decision, in Dalehite v. United States, 346 U.S. 15 (1953), dismissed claims growing out of the devastating explosion of two ships being loaded with explosive chemicals at Texas City, Texas, in 1947. Mr. Justice Jackson, dissenting, was moved to remark: "Surely a statute so long debated was meant to embrace more than traffic accidents. If not, the ancient and discredited doctrine that 'The King can do no wrong' has not been uprooted; it has merely been amended to read, 'The King can do only little wrongs'" (p. 60).

In addition to painstaking analysis of existing law, the author provides suggestions for reform. This book is a valuable contribution to the study of comparative law and should be of great use to all who would help continue the process of subjecting governments to the rule of law.—J. ROLAND PENNOCK, Swarthmore College.

The Administrative Reforms of Frederick William I of Prussia. BY REINHOLD AUGUST

DORWART. (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press. 1953. Pp. xvii, 250. $4.00.)

This work is an historical study by an historian. The reviewer lacks both the language skill and the historical knowledge to comment critically upon it as a study in eighteenth-century Prussian history. Judged impressionistically, however, it meets the tests of thorough, careful scholarship. The narrative is presented in a competent, no-nonsense style; the footnotes are impeccable and informative; and charts, appendix, and a critical bibliography increase the usefulness of the work. The title, moreover, is over-modest: the administrative reforms of Frederick William I (highlighted by the creation of the General Directory in 1723) are skillfully presented in the perspective of previous and subsequent events in Prussian administrative development. Students of administration will welcome the work to the small and slowly growing list of competent administrative histories.

To this reviewer, a peculiar feature of the work is the absence of any direct use of—or even reference to—either recent literature of a general nature in the field of public administration or the various conceptualizations of “bureaucracy” by the sociologists. While use of contemporary “professional” administrative terminology in the narrative might be criticized on the grounds that it would distort the facts, giving a “sharpness” that was in fact not present, it is puzzling why there was no explicit use of the Weberian conceptualization of bureaucracy: here was a case study that (apparently) fitted precisely the pattern described. It is puzzling also why there is no reference to Ernest Barker’s The Development of Public Services in Western Europe, 1660–1930—though there are frequent and competent references to and comparisons with administrative developments in other Western European countries.

To say the least of it, however, the author had the right to choose his own idiom and frame of reference, and had no obligation to scratch the reviewer’s particular intellectual itches more sharply than he does. As it stands, though his book is not addressed to students of administration, he has still succeeded in putting them in his debt.—DWIGHT WALDO, University of California (Berkeley).

Courts, Lawyers and Trials under the Last Three Tsars. By SAMUEL KUCHEROV. (New York:

Frederick A. Praeger. 1953. Pp. xii, 339. $6.00.)

The reform of the judiciary (1864) and that of the army (1874) were the two immediately successful ones of the so-called “great reforms” of Alexander II. Curiously, the emancipation of the serfs (1861), which provided the foundation for all subsequent reforms, made at first no appreciable change in the economic and social (as distinct from legal) status of the peasantry.

The administration of justice, however, was revolutionized by the Statutes of 1864. Samuel Kucherov, a former member of the Russian bar, has written a solid, informative, well-documented, and at times highly moving account of the evolution of the Russian judicial system from the pre-reform days to the advent of the Soviet government. A jurist of erudition and vision, the author illuminates his narrative by drawing enlightening parallels between the Russian and the Western European and American judicial institutions and practices. He emphasizes the virtues of the law courts created by the Statutes of 1864, and he makes clear the inevitable conflict resulting from the incompatibility of an independent judiciary with the traditional omnipotence of an absolutist bureaucratic government. It is this conflict that gave the Russian courts their social significance as the only agencies where, in periods of reaction, freedom of speech was tolerated and protest against political and social inequities could be heard. Hence the enhanced prestige and responsibility of the Russian bar, the organization, complexion, and functions of which Mr. Kucherov discusses in detail.

The lay reader will find particularly interesting Mr. Kucherov’s extensive summaries of the more important political trials held under the empire. While the perorations of the defense counsels, which are quoted at length, may appear at times a trifle rhetorical and over-emotional, the latitude allowed by the court to the defense was truly admirable, and inescapably invites invidious comparisons with the dreary routine of Soviet political trials.

Mr. Kucherov has successfully performed an exacting and important task. Judicious literary editing, however, would have greatly added to the readability of his excellent volume.—MICHAEL T. FLORINSKY, Columbia University.

European Political Systems. EDITED BY TAYLOR

COLE. (New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 1953. Pp. xxxiii, 699. $6.00.)

A new comparative government text by an extremely able group of scholars. It is organized in the traditional country-by-country manner and includes sections on Russia, the satellites, Germany, Italy, Britain, and France. Adequate materials on constitutions and political institutions are included, but the authors have worked on the assumption that these can be made meaningful only by prior investigation of the economic, cultural, and historical determinants within the society. Much more attention than is customary is given to matters of ideology and political theory and the analyses of the systems of government are made deeper and richer in consequence.

Etat des périodiques officiels français. Liste des revues, journaux et bulletins statistiques des assemblées parlementaires et des administrations centrales à la date du 1^{er} janvier 1952. (Paris: Bibliothèque Nationale. 1953. Pp. 39.)

For the first time there is available in a single place a full list of the official periodical publications of the French government, 171 in number. The list begins with the Journal officiel, the parliamentary assemblies, the Présidence du Conseil, and follows with the Ministries in alphabetical order. For each title is given so far as possible the date of the first issue, frequency, the editing and distributing agencies, the cost when available on subscription, and a brief note as to the content. The list was reprinted from the Bibliographie de la France, Sept. 11-25, 1953. There is promise of further lists for the annual and other serial publications of the central government, all the periodicals and serials of the local authorities, of the French Union overseas, and of "établissements publics."—J.B.C.

Villes et Campagnes: Civilisation urbaine et Civilisation rurale en France. ASSEMBLED BY GEORGES FRIEDMANN. (Paris: Librairie Armand Colin. 1953. Pp. xxiv, 480. 1200 fr.)

A series of round-table discussions on urban and rural civilization in France by French sociologists and other scholars interested in sociology held during "Sociological Week" (organized by the Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique) in Paris in March, 1951.

Canadian Government Publications Consolidated Annual Catalogue 1953. BY OFFICE OF SUPERVISOR OF GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS. (Ottawa: Queen's Printer. 1954. Pp. xvi, 578. $1.00.)

The first annual catalog is actually only a cumulation for the English language documents of the Monthly Catalogue from January to September, 1953, with the addition of all other Canadian official publications in English, in print as of September, 1953. The Supervisor of Government Publications also issues a Daily Checklist, which appears every day except Saturdays, Sundays, and holidays. On pages 37-41 is a very useful list of the royal commission reports so far as these are available in print. For the French language official publications a separate annual catalog is being prepared.—J.B.C.

Interdepartment Committee on Social and Economic Research. Guides to Official Sources, No. 3: Local Government Statistics. (London: H. M. Stationery Office. 1953. Pp. v, 34. 1s. 6d.)

The Guide emphasizes the general and financial statistics of local government in the United Kingdom, and gives a well-balanced picture of the material available, unpublished as well as published. There is an historical sketch. Currently, the main reliance is on the statistics collected and published by the Ministry of Housing and Local Government. There is also a summary of the statistics collected by other departments as well as a statement of the nongovernmental returns prepared by the Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants, Society of County Treasurers, Rural District Councils' Association, etc. The first of the Guides to Official Sources dealt with labour statistics, and the second with census reports of Great Britain, 1801-1931.—J.B.C.

Le Parti Libéral dans le Système Constitutionnel Britannique. BY ALBERT MABILEAU. (Paris: Librairie Armand Colin. 1953. Pp. vii, 349. 1100 fr.)

The study of the Liberal party in the twentieth century is representative of the growing interest among French scholars in the analysis of party politics; it is issued by the Fondation Nationale des Sciences Politiques. Attention is devoted to the activities of the parliamentary party, to the decline of the party's electoral support, to the relation of the party to Labour, and—most important—to the recent ideological dilemma of the Liberals.

The Passing of Parliament. By G. W. KEETON. (New York: Ernest Benn, Ltd. John de Graff, Inc., Distributor. 1952. Pp. vii. 208. $4.50.)

The theme of this book is that the basic principles of parliamentary sovereignty and rule of law have been undercut by "continual and relentless encroachments of the executive" which resulted from the expansion of the suffrage, the trend to collectivism, and the planned society—and that this rise of the executive threatens personal freedom and security and brings England to "the threshold of tyranny." It thus follows the line of Lord Hewart's argument but adds later court cases and legislation and much reference to a possibility that England could move down "The Road to Moscow" (the title of Ch. 2).

The Machinery of Justice in England. By R. M. JACKSON. (New York: Cambridge University Press. 1953. Pp. ix, 372. $8.50.)

This volume seeks to explain both for lawyer and layman the principles and organization of the English legal system. The second edition has been wholly rewritten to take account of important developments since the first issue in 1940.

The Government of the Swiss Republic. By RAMESH CHANDRA GHOSH. (Calcutta: The World Press, Ltd. 1953. Pp. ix, 192. 10s. 6d. net.)

A well-rounded discussion of the structure and operation of Swiss political institutions by a lecturer at the University of Calcutta. Unfortunately, his almost uncritical admiration for everything Swiss, coupled with his obvious dislike of the American presidential system (which he denounces as "suffering from bitter party rivalry, sudden change in home and foreign policy, too much concentration of power in the hands of a single individual, noisy conventions, corrupt patronage, undemocratic rings, bosses and caucuses"), leads at times to exaggeration of the merits of the Swiss system.

Constitutions, Electoral Laws, Treaties of States in the Near and Middle East. By HELEN MILLER DAVIS. (Durham: Duke University Press. 1953. Pp. xxii, 541. $7.50.)

A useful reference book on the legal basis of political institutions and relations of the states from Egypt eastward through Afghanistan.

Deutschland Heute. Mit einem Geleitwort von Bundeskanzler Dr. Konrad Adenauer. Herausgegeben vom Presse- und Informationsamt der Bundesregierung. (Wiesbaden: Wiesbadener Graphische Betriebe. 1953. Pp. 416. DM 12.50.)

The official report on the Federal German Republic of today and developments since May, 1945 embraces the political, economic, social, and cultural aspects, as well as the international aspects such as are treated in the chapter on the European Coal and Steel Community (pp. 305–313).—J.B.C.

Amtliches Behördenverzeichnis. Stand Juni 1953. Herausgegeben vom Statistischen Amt des Saarlandes. (Saarbrücken: Einzelschriften zur Statistik des Saarlandes, No. 8. 1953. Pp. 54. 200 fr.)

Although the Saar has had its own government for more than five years, the above is the first official directory showing the organization of the administration with the ministries and their subordinate agencies, local government bodies, "Körperschaften des öffentlichen Rechts," non-Saar offices located in the Saar, and church bodies. Street addresses and telephone numbers are given, but not the names of officials. A folded chart shows the organization of the ministries. There is an index by name of agency and catchword.—J.B.C.

Central European Democracy and Its Background: Economic and Political Group Organization. By RUDOLF SCHLESINGER. (New York: Grove Press. 1953. Pp. xiv, 402. $5.00.)

A study of political developments in Germany and Austria from 1862 to 1938 (and to a lesser extent in Czechoslovakia after 1918) with emphasis on interconnections between political and economic group organizations. The "lesson" the author seems to derive from his study is that "the sectional mass movement, unless it gives birth to something which outgrows its limitations, is incapable of creating the setting in which its inherent potentialities can develop."

The Rebirth of Austria. By RICHARD HISCOCKS. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1953. Pp. ix, 263. $3.50.)

A general account of political, economic, social, and cultural developments in Austria from 1945 to early 1953, with only slight attention to political institutions.

Federal Government Gazette, Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland. Vol. 1, No. 1, 4th September, 1953. (Salisbury: Government Printer.)

The first issue of the Federation gazette publishes the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland (Constitution) Order in Council, August 1, 1953, the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland (Commencement) Order in Council, and the Royal Instructions. The Constitution provides that the Federation consisting of Southern Rhodesia, Northern Rhodesia, and Nyasaland "shall be known as the Federation of Rhodesia and Nyasaland" until and unless the Federal legislature otherwise enacts. —J.B.C.

Current Soviet Policies: The Documentary Record of the Nineteenth Communist Party Congress and the Reorganization after Stalin's

Death. EDITED BY LEO GRULIOW. (New York: Frederick R. Praeger. 1953. Pp. xiv, 269. $6.00.)

An English translation of Stalin's "Economic Problems of Socialism in the USSR," of the proceedings of the Nineteenth Communist Party Congress, and of related documents as well as of selected materials on early post-Stalin developments (up to April 7, 1953). The volume includes an explanatory introduction by the editor and a glossary of some Soviet terms.

The Peoples of the Soviet Far East. BY WALTER KOLARZ. (New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1954. Pp. xii, 194. $4.50.)

Based on necessity almost entirely on Russian sources, this is, nevertheless, an excellent brief report of the ways in which the Soviet government has spread its control over Asian Russia, and has destroyed or bent to its purposes the various ethnic groups that, almost without exception, have been unable to withstand the political power and economic pressure of the new "colonizers."

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON FOREIGN AND COMPARATIVE GOVERNMENT

WILLIAM H. ROBERTS

Catholic University of America

General

Appleby, P. H. Bureaucracy and the Future. Annals of the Academy of Political and Social Science. March, 1954.

Arendt, H. Ideology and Terror: A Novel Form of Government. Review of Politics. July, 1953.

Aron, R. Philosophie et Tactique du Fédéralisme. Fédération. November, 1953.

Barland, T. H. Comparative Law—Common v. Civil Law—Illegal and Immoral Contracts. Wisconsin Law Review. January, 1954.

Biscaretti di Ruffia, P. Le Tre "Forme di Stato" dell' Età Contemporanea. Politico. July, 1953.

Cameron, J. M. The Decline and Rise of the Communist International. Dublin Review. Fourth Quarter, 1953.

Crabbe, V. Notes Conjointes sur le Fait Constitutionnel et le Phénomène Constitutionnel. Revue de l'Institut de Sociologie. No. 1, 1953.

Delmas, C. Les Partis Politiques, Problèmes et Méthodes. Critique. October, 1953.

Elia, L. Funzioni e Ordinamento dello Stato Moderno. Civitas. January, 1954.

Laun, R. Voraussetzungen für Demokratische Wahlrechtssysteme. Wirtschaftsdienst. June, 1953.

Lavau, G. E. Partis Politiques et Réalités Sociales. Paris, Cahiers de la Fondation Nationale de Sciences Politiques, 1953.

Leclercq, J. Interclassismo Cristiano e Solidarietà di Classe. Civitas. December, 1953.

Loewenstein, K. Political Systems, Ideologies and Institutions: the Problem of Their Circulation. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1953.

Long, N. E. Public Policy and Administration: the Goals of Rationality and Responsibility. Public Administration Review. Winter, 1954.

Maranini, G. Mythes et Réalités de la Démocratie. Synthèses. July, 1953.

Moulin, L. Les Origines Religieuses des Techniques Électorales et Délibératives Modernes. Revue Internationale d'Histoire Politique et Constitutionnelle. April-June, 1953.

Nakamura, M. Der Zivilprozess und seine Theorie—Beider Zusammenhang im Laufe ihrer Entwicklung. Japan Annual of Law and Politics. No. 2, 1953.

Pennati, E. Forme di Transmissione e Conquista del Potere. Politico. July, 1953.

Rietzler, K. Political Decisions in Modern Society. Ethics. January, 1954.

Rivero, J. Fédéralisme et Décentralisation: Harmonie ou Contradiction? Fédération. November, 1953.

Rothfels, H. Zur Krise des Nationalstaates. Vierteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte. April, 1953.

Sarfatti, M. Roman Law and Common Law: Forerunners of Unification. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. January, 1954.

Specific Areas

United Kingdom

Chorley, Lord. Capital Punishment. Political Quarterly. January-March, 1954.

Drucker, A. Foreign Property Legislation. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. July, 1953.

Gaudenet, P.-M. Le Civil Service Britannique. Paris, Cahiers de la Fondation Nationale de Sciences Politiques, 1953.

Great Britain. Advisory Council on Scientific Policy. Sixth Annual Report, 1952-1953. London, H. M. Stat. Off., 1953 (Cmd. 8874).

Great Britain. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. The Police Service in Britain. London, 1953.

Great Britain. Lord Chancellor's Office. Final Report of the Committee on Supreme Court Practice and Procedure. London, H. M. Stat. Off., 1953 (Cmd. 8878).

Great Britain. Royal Commission on Capital Punishment. Memoranda and Replies to a Questionnaire Received from Foreign and Commonwealth Countries, III—Europe. London, H. M. Stat. Off., 1953 (Cmd. 8932).

Great Britain. University Grants Committee. University Development: Report on the Years 1947-1952. London, H.M. Stat. Off., 1953 (Cmd. 8875).

Griffith, W. The British Civil Service 1854-1954. London, H.M. Stat. Off., 1954.

Grunfeld, C. The Transport Act, 1953. Political Quarterly. January-March, 1954.

Health Services Conference. Public Administration. Winter, 1953.

Hinchingsbrooke, Viscount. A Plan for Lords Reform. National and English Review. December, 1953.

Hobsbawm, E. J. The British Communist Party. Political Quarterly. January-March, 1954.

Jay, K. E. B. Britain's Atomic Factories. London, H.M. Stat. Off., 1954.

Klebes, H. Die Britischen Gewerkschaften als Politische Organisationen. Europa Archiv. January 20, 1954.

Labour Party. Challenge to Britain; a Programme of Action for the Next Labour Government. London, 1953.

Liberalising the Tories. Banker. December, 1953.

Miyasawa, T. Les Types Anglais et Français du Régime Parlementaire—Étude de Droit Comparé. Japan Annual of Law and Politics. No. 3, 1953.

New Look in Defence. Economist. February 27, 1954.

Pollins, H. The Significance of the Campaign in General Elections. Political Studies. October, 1953.

State Trading and Parliament: Public Control of Nationalised Industries. Round Table. December, 1953.

Vandyk, N. D. The Minister of National Insurance as a Judicial Authority. Public Administration. Winter, 1953.

Voigt, F. A. Das Ende des Englischen Sozialismus. Deutsche Rundschau. September, 1953.

Webbe, H. The Second Year of Conservative Government. Quarterly Review. January, 1954.

Wheare, K. C. The Civil Service in the Constitution. London, Athlone Press, 1954.

Colonial Areas.

Davison, R. B. The Volta River Aluminium Scheme. Political Quarterly. January-March, 1954.

Gamba, C. Trade Unionism in Malaya. Far Eastern Survey. February, 1954.

Ganzert, F. British West Indies Federation. World Affairs. Winter, 1953.

Great Britain. Central Office of Information. Reference Division. Constitutional Progress in British Honduras. London, 1953.

———. High Commissioner's Review of Progress in Malaya. London, 1954.

Hance, W. A. Economic Potentialities of the Central African Federation. Political Science Quarterly. March, 1954.

Stace, W. T. British Colonialism. Yale Review. Spring, 1954.

Ward, B. The Gold Coast as a Dominion. New Commonwealth. December 21, 1953.

Commonwealth of Nations.

Appleby, P. H. Public Administration in India. Delhi, Manager of Publications, 1953.

Australia: Labour Moves Right. Round Table. March, 1954.

Bowles, C. The Odds on Communism in India. Harper's Magazine. January, 1954.

Chandrasekhar, S. The Prospect for Planned Parenthood in India. Pacific Affairs. December, 1953.

Chaudhuri, N. C. Subhas Chandra Bose—His Legacy and Legend. Pacific Affairs. December, 1953.

Commonwealth Civil Services: Some Proposals for Reconstruction. Round Table. March, 1954.

Corry, J. A. Adaptation of Parliamentary Processes. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. February, 1954.

Crane, R. I. Aspects of Economic Development in South Asia. New York, Institute of Pacific Relations, 1954.

Dean, V. M. New Patterns of Democracy in India. Yale Review. Winter, 1954.

E. H. Pakistan. British Survey. January, 1954.

Ghosal, A. K. Federalism in the Indian Constitution. Indian Journal of Political Science. October–December, 1953.

H.W.A. The Australian Scene. World Today. February, 1954.

Hamidullah, M. Die Rezeption des Europäischen Rechts in Haiderabad. Zeitschrift für Vergleichende Rechtswissenschaft. No. 1, 1953.

Innes, F. M. The Political Outlook in Pakistan. Pacific Affairs. December, 1953.

Kennedy, W. P. M. The Office of Governor General in Canada. Canadian Bar Review. November, 1953.

Lower, A. R. M. Conservatism: The Canadian Variety. Confluence. December, 1953.

Markose, A. T. Growth of the Administrative State in India. Indian Journal of Political Science. October–December, 1953.

New Parties in South Africa: The Liberal Schism. Round Table. December, 1953.

Schenkman, A. S. Higher Education in India. Far Eastern Survey. February, 1954.

Siddiqi, M. The Role of Islamic Tradition in Pakistan. Confluence. December, 1953.

Srivastava, G. P. Marxism: its Alternative in India. Indian Journal of Political Science. October–December, 1953.

Sydney and After: Next Phase of Commonwealth Economic Co-operation. Round Table. March, 1954.

Windmiller, M. Ghandian Socialism in India. Far Eastern Survey. March, 1954.

Winter, C. G. American Influence on Canadian Nationhood. Washington, Annals of American Research, 1954.

Western Europe

Acis, J. Problèmes d'Organisation dans les Services Administratifs. Revue Administrative. September–October, 1953.

L'Algérie. Écrits de Paris. December, 1953.

Barberis, C. Sviluppo e Spirito della Proprietà Fondiaria in Europa. Civitas. December, 1953.

Belfiore, E. Informazione e Documentazione Politica in Italia. Civitas. December, 1953.

Bousquet, G. H. How the Natives of Algeria Become French Citizens. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. October, 1953.

Campbell, P. Discipline and Loyalty in the French Parliament during the Pinay Government. Political Studies. October, 1953.

———. The French Parliament. Public Administration. Winter, 1953.

Carcelle, P. Le Contrôle de l'État sur les Finances Publiques. Revue Administrative. September–October, 1953.

Champeix, M. A Propos de la Réforme Constitutionnelle. Revue Administrative. September–October, 1953.

Chapus, R. La Loi d'Habilitation du 11 Juillet 1953 et la Question des Décrets-Lois. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. October–December, 1953.

Cole, T. Devices to Curb Incipient Bureaucracy: Lessons from Recent European Experience. Annals of the Academy of Political and Social Science. March, 1954.

Colton, J. The French Socialist Party. Yale Review. Spring, 1954.

Cuocolo, F. La Forma di Governo Vigente in Italia e in Francia. Civitas. January, 1954.

Donnedieu de Vabres, J. L'Article 13 et les Décrets-Lois. Recueil Dalloz. October 15, 1953.

Elder, N. Parliament and Foreign Policy in Sweden. Political Studies. October, 1953.

Faut-il Réglementer le Droit de Grève? Études et Documents. December, 1953.

- Fennell, D. Eine "Dritte Kraft" in der Spanischen Politik. Dokumente. February, 1954.
- Fusilier, R. Les Finances des Partis Politiques. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. October, 1953.
- Gaynor, J. K. The French Code of Military Justice. George Washington Law Review. January, 1954.
- Hoff, T. J. B. Die Sozialisierung in Norwegen. Schweizer Monatshefte. July, 1953.
- Ireland: Politics in Flux. Round Table. December, 1953.
- Italian Politics. Italian Affairs. January, 1954.
- Italy. Comitato Interministeriale per la Ricostruzione. The Development of Italy's Economic System within the Framework of European Recovery and Cooperation. Rome, 1953.
- Jansen, H. L. Le Conseil Economique et Social des Pays-Bas. Société Belge d'Études et d'Expansion. November-December, 1953.
- Johannesson, O. La Vie Politique en Islande. Revue Française de Science Politique. November-December, 1953.
- Marcellin, R. Pour une Nouvelle Politique de la Fonction Publique. Revue Administrative. September-October, 1953.
- Merikoski, V. Special Traits of Legal Protection in Finnish Administrative Law. Nordisk Administrativ Tidsskrift. No. 3, 1953.
- Miralles, M. L'Administration des Services Civils de l'Algérie. Revue Administrative. July-August, 1953.
- Morange, G. La Liberté d'Opinion des Fonctionnaires Publics. Recueil Dalloz. November 5, 1953.
- Nadelmann, K. H. Choice of Law in the Conseil d'État. American Journal of Comparative Law. Autumn, 1953.
- O'Ballance, E. The Spanish War Potential. Military Review. February, 1954.
- Le Problème de la Grève des Fonctionnaires Publics. Revue Communale de Belgique. August, 1953.
- Reymond, J-E. L'Avenir du Corps Préfectoral. Revue Administrative. September-October, 1953.
- Rivero, J. La Réforme du Contentieux Administratif. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. October-December, 1953.
- Rodgers, B. Social Security in France (I) Public Administration. Winter, 1953.
- Sandulli, A. M. L'Avocazione alla G. P. A. dei Ricorsi Elettorali Amministrativi. Rassegna di Diritto Pubblico. April-June, 1953.
- Schürmann, F. Das Recht der Gemischtwirtschaftlichen und Öffentlichen Unternehmungen mit Privatrechtlicher Organisation. Zeitschrift für Schweizerisches Recht. No. 3, 1953.
- Terrou, F. Aspects Législatifs et Réglementaires de l'Intervention de l'État dans le Domaine de l'Information. Revue Administrative. May-June and July-August, 1953.
- Tesauro, A. Fundamentals of the New Italian Constitution. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. February, 1954.
- Vito, F. La Pubblica Amministrazione e l'Attività Economica dello Stato Moderno. Rivista Internazionale di Scienze Sociali. July-August, 1953.
- Wautier, L. A. Belgique: les Établissements Publics. Revue du Droit Public et de la Science Politique. October-December, 1953.
- Central Europe*
- Armstrong, O. K. Preview of the New West German Air Force. Air Force. March, 1954.
- Fikentscher, W. Germany: Political Strikes under German Law. American Journal of Comparative Law. Winter, 1953.
- German Industry's Demands. Economist. January 2, 1954.
- Katona, G. Survey Research in Germany. Public Opinion Quarterly. Winter, 1953-1954.
- Lewis, G. W. Soviet Germany, the Unruly Satellite. Department of State Bulletin. December 28, 1953.
- Merker, R. Die Grundrechte in der Rechtsprechung des Bundes-Verfassungsgerichts. Monatsschrift für Deutsches Recht. August, 1953.
- Mommsen, W. Die Situation der Deutschen Parteien. Politische Bildung. No 38, 1953.
- La Nouvelle Armée Allemande; Réponses du Commissariat Blank à un Questionnaire. Documents. September-October, 1953.
- La Presse Politique Allemande. Documents. November, 1953.
- Redelberger, F. Die Verfassungsbeschwerde. Neue Juristische Wochenschrift. March 6, 1953.
- Samuel, R. H. The General Elections in Germany. Australian Quarterly. December, 1953.
- Scheuner, U. Die Selbständigkeit und Einheit der Rechtspflege. Öffentliche Verwaltung. September, 1953.

Speier, H. German Rearmament and the Old Military Elite. World Politics. January, 1954.

U.S. Office of High Commissioner for Germany. Internal German Affairs Division. Report of German Police and Other Agencies Authorized to Bear Arms in the U. S. Area of Control. Frankfurt, 1953.

Wirtschaftspolitische Konzeptionen. Wirtschaftsdienst. July and August, 1953.

Wiss-Verdier, A. Après les Élections. Documents. September-October, 1953.

Soviet Union and Eastern Europe

A. Z. The Dilemma of the Polish Economy. World Today. March, 1954.

Achminow, H. Die Oberschicht in der Sowjetunion. Osteuropa. August, 1953.

Bauer, R. A. Word-of-Mouth Communication in the Soviet Union. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1953.

Chambre, H. La Législation Familiale Soviétique. Revue de l'Action Populaire. November, 1953.

———. La Nouvelle Politique Économique Soviétique. Études. December, 1953.

D.L.C. The Disgrace of Djilas and Its Implications. World Today. March, 1954.

Dallin, D. J. The New Russian Intelligentsia. Yale Review. Winter, 1954.

Daniels, R. V. The Soviet Succession: Lenin and Stalin. Russian Review. July, 1953.

Djordjevic, J. Some Basic Principles and Institutions of the New Yugoslav Electoral Law. Review of International Affairs. September 16, 1953.

———. La Formation du Nouvel État des Peuples Yougoslaves. Revue Française de Science Politique. October-December, 1953.

Fedotov, G. P. The Russian. Russian Review. January, 1954.

Gardner, M. "Bourgeois Idealism" in Soviet Nuclear Physics. Yale Review. Spring, 1954.

Herman, L. M. The Pattern of Soviet Industrial Expansion. Problems of Communism. No. 6, 1953.

L'Islam en U.R.S.S. après 1945. Notes et Études Documentaires. December 8, 1953.

Just, A. W. Die Innenpolitik der Sowjetunion und ihre Aussenpolitischen Konsequenzen. Aussenpolitik. January, 1954.

Kocvara, S. The Sovietization of Czechoslovak Farming: Standard Charter of a Unified Agricultural Cooperative in Czechoslovakia. Washington, Mid-European Law Project, 1954.

Kolosov, M. The Communist Party and the Soviet Army. Munich, Institute for the Study of the History and Culture of the USSR., 1953.

Lias, G. Satellite States in the Post-Stalin Era. International Affairs. January, 1954.

Lit, T. The Proletariat vs. the Dictatorship. Problems of Communism. No 6, 1953.

La Nouvelle Politique Économique de la Roumanie. Problèmes Économiques. December 15, 1953.

Party and Government Reorganization in the USSR. Current Notes on International Affairs. March, 1953.

La Préparation de la Conférence Générale du Parti Communiste Tchécoslovaque (Novembre 1952). Notes et Études Documentaires. October 14, 1953.

Ratto, O. Sviluppo Industriali in Bulgaria. Rivista di Politica Economica. May, 1953.

Scheuerle, W. A. Grundlinien der Sowjet-russischen Finanzen. Finanzarchiv. No. 2, 1953.

The Soviet Economy: Theory, Prospects, Performance. Problems of Communism. January-February, 1954.

The Soviet Enigma: Russia's Home Front in the Cold War. Round Table. December, 1953.

The Soviet Soldier and his Loyalties. Military Review. February, 1954.

Turkevitch, J. The Progress of Soviet Science. Foreign Affairs. April, 1954.

Underhill, G. Atoms and the Red Armies. Ordinance. March-April, 1954.

U.S. Congress. Senate. Committee on Foreign Relations. Tensions within the Soviet Captive Countries: Bulgaria. Pt. I. Washington, Gov't Printing Office, 1954 (83rd Cong., 1st sess. Senate Doc. No. 70).

Utechin, S. V. New Myths for Old. Twentieth Century. January, 1954.

Wagner, W. J. The New Constitution of Poland. American Journal of Comparative Law. Winter, 1953.

Wetter, G. A. Le Développement Idéologique du Bolchevisme. Cahiers de Bruges. October, 1953.

White, J. B. The Armies of Communism. United States Armed Combat Forces Journal. March, 1954.

Middle East and Africa

Atiyah, E. What Next in the Sudan? New Commonwealth. December 21, 1953.

Carleton, A. Syria Today. International Affairs, 1954.

Charbonneau, J. Die Sahara—eine Aufgabe Frankreichs. Zeitschrift für Geopolitik. January, 1954.

Cléry, F. L'Islam qui Bouge. Vie Intellectuelle. October, 1953.

Colombe, M. Réflexions sur les Origines et le Fonctionnement du Régime Représentatif et Parlementaire en Turquie et dans les États Arabes du Moyen Orient. Welt des Islams. No. 1, 1953.

Deschamps, H. Die Politische Entwicklung der Neger. Dokumente. Sonderheft: Afrika und Europa, 1953.

Fischer, A. J. Siegt Atatürk über das Grab Hinaus? Aussenpolitik. January, 1954.

Hess, C. G., Jr. Confessionalism and Feudality in Lebanese Politics. Middle East Journal. Winter, 1954.

Jäschke, G. Der Islam in der Neuen Türkei. Welt des Islams. No. 1, 1953.

Kraines, O. Israel: the Emergence of a Polity (II). Western Political Quarterly. December, 1953.

Lewis, B. Communism and Islam. International Affairs. January, 1954.

Lewis, W. H. Libya after Two Years of Independence. Middle East Journal. Winter, 1954.

Liebesny, J. Religious Law and Westernization in the Moslem Near East. American Journal of Comparative Law. Autumn, 1953.

Philby, H. St. J. B. The New Reign in Sa'udi Arabia. Foreign Affairs. April, 1954.

President Shishekli and the Shaping of Syrian Policy. World Today. December, 1953.

Qasem, A. M. Judicial Experiment in Lybia. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. January, 1954.

Salmon, M. Le Monde Arabe Face à l'Occident. La Revue Libérale. January-March, 1954.

Scheffelowitz, J. Interkonfessionelles und Internationales Kollisionsrecht in Israel. Archiv für Zivilistische Praxis. No. 6, 1953.

Schiller, A. A. Eritrea: Constitution and Federation with Ethiopia. American Journal of Comparative Law. Summer, 1953.

Schloss, H. Disinflation in Israel. Banker. December, 1953.

Schwartz, R. D. Social Factors in the Development of Legal Control: a Case Study of Two Israeli Settlements. Yale Law Journal. February, 1954.

The Sudan Elections. Contemporary Review. February, 1954.

Tedeschi, P. Un Nouvel État: Le Royaume de Lybie. Revue Internationale d'Histoire Politique et Constitutionnelle. April-June, 1953.

Das Vordringen des Islam und die Christliche Mission. Dokumente. Sonderheft: Afrika und Europa, 1953.

Wigny, P. A. Ten Year Plan for the Economic and Social Development of the Belgian Congo. New York, Belgian Government Information Center, 1952.

Southeast Asia

Bone, R. C., Jr. The Future of Indonesian Political Parties. Far Eastern Survey. February, 1954.

Emerson, R. Problems of Representative Government in South East Asia. Pacific Affairs. December, 1953.

Indonesia in 1953. Berita Mapie. February, 1954.

Ingber, D. The Indonesian Political Scene. Eastern World. January, 1954.

Internal Order in Burma. Economist. February 27, 1954.

Roll, C. Burma: Synthese von Buddhismus und Marxismus. Aussenpolitik. February, 1954.

Sen K. Developments in Indonesia. Indian Journal of Political Science. October-December, 1953.

Sharp, W. R. Some Observations on Public Administration in Indochina. Public Administration Review. Winter, 1954.

U.S. Congress. House of Representatives. Committee on Foreign Affairs. Special Study Mission to Southeast Asia and the Pacific. Report. Washington, U.S. Government Printing Office, 1954 (83d Cong., 2nd sess.).

Pacific and Far East

Caballero, D. National Security of the Philippines. Military Review. March, 1954.

Chang, Li. The Soviet Grip on Sinkiang. Foreign Affairs. April, 1954.

Chao, Kuo-Chun. The Government and Economy of Manchuria (II). Far Eastern Survey. January, 1954.

China's Agriculture—Slow Boat to Collectivisation. Economist. February 27 and March 6, 1954.

Economic Development in Mainland China, 1949-53. Economic Bulletin for Asia and the Far East. November, 1953.

Emerson, R. Paradoxes of Asian Nationalism. Far Eastern Quarterly. February, 1954.

Gosnell, H. F. Filipinos Hold Free Elections. National Municipal Review. March, 1954.

Hittle, J. D. Japan's Predicament. Marine Corps Gazette. January, 1954.

Hsia, R. Private Enterprise in Communist China. Pacific Affairs. December, 1953.

Ito, H. Direct Taxes in Japan and the Shoup Report. Public Finance. No. 4, 1953.

Levi, W. Tibet under Chinese Communist Rule. Far Eastern Survey. January, 1954.

Nagato, M. Future Prospects for a Democratic Japan. Contemporary Japan. Nos. 4-6, 1953.

Nakagawa, Z. Ultimogenitur in Japan—ein Beitrag zur Forschung des Gewohnheitsrechts. Japan Annual of Law and Politics. No. 2, 1953.

Ostwald, P. Japan's Auseinandersetzung mit der Politischen Ideenwelt des Westens. Vierteljahrshefte für Zeitgeschichte. July, 1953.

Overdijkink, G. W. De Agrarische Revolutie in China. Internationale Spectator. February, 1954.

Pathak, D. N. Japan—the 1952 Election. Indian Journal of Political Science. October-December, 1953.

Schwartz, B. A Marxist Controversy in China. Far Eastern Quarterly. February, 1954.

Smythe, H. H. Japanese Popular Attitudes toward the Emperor. Pacific Affairs. December, 1953.

Switzer, J. S. Military Government in Japan. Military Review. April, 1954.

U. S. Congress. Senate. Committee on Foreign Relations. The Far East and South Asia. Report. Washington, U. S. Government Print-Office, 1954 (83d Cong., 2nd sess.).

Wittfogel, K. A. The Ruling Bureaucracy of Oriental Despotism. Review of Politics. July, 1953.

Latin America

Fitzgibbon, R. H. Argentina and Uruguay: a Tale of Two Attitudes. Pacific Spectator. Winter, 1954.

Gomez, L. Yeros Constitucionales. Universitas (Bogotá). No. 4, 1953.

Martins, D. H. La Responsabilidad de la Administración y de los Funcionarios en la Constitución Uruguaya. Revista de Derecho Público y Privado. April, 1953.

Moll, B. Das Peruanische Finanzwesen. Finanzarchiv. No. 2, 1953.

Republica de Venezuela: Ministerio de Justicia. Instituto de Codificación y Jurisprudencia. Jurisprudencia de los Tribunales de la Republica. Vol. 1, 1951. Caracas, Imprenta Nacional, 1953.

Stone, W. T. Communism in Latin America. Editorial Research Reports. March 2, 1954.

U. S. Congress. Senate. Committee on Foreign Relations. South America. Report on a Study Mission. Washington, U. S. Government Printing Office, 1954 (83rd Cong., 2nd sess.).

INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

Beyond Containment. BY WILLIAM HENRY CHAMBERLIN. (Chicago: Henry Regnery Company. 1953. Pp. vi, 406. $5.00.)

A substantial portion of this book deals with conditions inside Russia from the Revolution to the present. Chamberlin's account covering the 1920's and early 1930's is a repetition of what he has reported at greater length in a less biased way in books published many years ago. According to the current account, conditions are so dreary that one is led to believe that life was much better under the Czars, and the reader is not prepared for Chamberlin's incidental admissions of Russia's contemporary technological and industrial power and rising living standards. Chamberlin's purpose is to suggest that discontent among the masses and among the non-Russian nationalities inside the U.S.S.R. may be so great as to invite a policy of liberation. However, having taken his readers up the hill he promptly marches them down again, for he concedes on page 296 that for practical purposes containment is probably the only feasible course in Europe, and he declares flatly that under present conditions it would be "insane rashness" to precipitate an armed clash. However, Chamberlin offers sound advice should a clash ultimately come: to fight an intelligent political war along with a military one and to avoid the "Unconditional Surrender fiasco" of the late war.

Most of Chamberlin's book is a rehash of history, of history told more objectively in scores of other books. There is a sketch of American-Russian relations from the eighteenth century to 1945, in which we are informed that the Monroe Doctrine at the time of its promulgation was aimed not primarily at the restored Bourbons of France and Spain but at Russia, and that Thomas Jefferson, who never set foot in Russia, was "the first American Ambassador" to St. Petersburg. On pages 51 and 52 the suggestion is made that if Roosevelt had not encouraged Britain and France to get into the Second World War and that if the Western powers had simply ignored Hitler, Hitler would have invaded Russia, both Germany and Russia would be weaker today, and not only America but also Britain and France would stand secure and strong in a safe world. We are led to believe that Russia is dominant in Eastern Europe and the Balkans merely because of Yalta rather than because her position, along with American primacy in Greece, Italy, Western Europe, and Japan, represents the actual power situation in the world today, reflecting geography, armed might, and the collapse in 1918 and 1945 of traditional "balancers." There is a perfunctory account of the Marshall Plan and NATO, and a grudging admission that these measures have been effective, although Chamberlin leaves the impression that the best promise of European strength lies in the free enterprise systems of Switzerland, Belgium, and West Germany. According to Chamberlin, Russia secured "complete political domination of China" mainly because of the ineptitude (or worse) of American foreign policy. Chamberlin fails to tell us that the middle way was indigenously weak in China and that not a single leading American, not even General Wedemeyer, proposed sending American armed forces to try to save Chiang Kai-shek during the critical years from 1946 to 1949. More important than hindsight and retroactive judgments on China policy would be constructive suggestions of social policies and military measures designed to save Indochina from the Communists, but Chamberlin, who saves his ammunition for the "ifs" of history after they are safely past, conveniently ignores this.—WILLIAM G. CARLETON, University of Florida.

Japan's Role in Southeast Asian Nationalist Movements, 1940-45. BY WILLARD H. ELSBREE. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1953. Issued under the Auspices of the Institute of Pacific Relations. Pp. v, 182. $3.25.)

In this study, the author analyzes the role the Japanese occupation played in the development of nationalist movements in Southeast Asia during World War II. He first gives an outline analysis of Japanese plans for the political framework of the Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere, and traces at some length the factors which conditioned subsequent revisions of the "blueprint." The author's general thesis is that Japan underestimated the importance and strength of nationalism and failed to make full use of this force in prosecuting her administration of the occupied areas. The nature and extent of political participation in Indonesia are then analyzed, at national and local levels, as factors in enhancing national unity and centralization, in the context of the changing fortunes of the military situation. It is the author's conclusion that Japanese appreciation of the nature, strength, and importance of the nationalist movements advanced progressively as the military situation took a more critical turn for Japan. Separate treatment is given to the question of minorities (Chinese, Indians, and Karens) in the program of Japanese occupation insofar as they affected the central problem of nationalist movements in Southeast Asia.

This is a well-balanced and adequately documented work in an important pioneer field. When a series of intensive case studies covering each of the regions of the entire area covered in this study is available, we shall be in a better position to appraise more comprehensively the role Japanese occupation played in rendering the nationalist movements so revolutionary and explosive throughout the area following Japanese surrender.

A word or two, not so much in criticism as by way of suggestion, may be in order. The shattering of the old myth of the impregnability of the white man's rule, so dramatically symbolized in the fall of Singapore and the collapse of the Netherlands Indies in the initial stages of the war, was responsible, perhaps more than any other single factor, for reducing the political prestige of the old colonial powers beyond repair and for rendering the postwar return of British, French, and Dutch masters to their former positions in Southeast Asia impossible, even following the "unconditional surrender" of Japan. The reviewer feels that the author perhaps should have given more attention, in his introductory chapter, to such factors operating primarily on the international scene, against the background of which nationalist movements took on specific patterns and concrete significance.

Also, perhaps a little more systematic analysis of the sociopolitical factors already operating throughout the area at the time of the outbreak of the war should have been attempted.—TATSUJI TAKEUCHI, Columbia University.

Les Publications Officielles des Institutions Européennes. BIBLIOGRAPHIE ÉTABLIE PAR MICHEL ROUSSIER . . . AVEC LA COLLABORATION DE MARYVONNE STEPHAN. (Paris: Dotation Carnegie pour la Paix Internationale. 1954. Pp. 73.)

Monsieur Roussier's bibliography is devoted to the official publications of the European bodies striving after the Second World War to build a United Europe, and includes in chronological order of establishment Benelux, Comité de Coopération Economique, Organisation Européenne de Coopération Economique, Groupe d'Études pour une Union douanière européenne and Conseil de coopération douanière, Organisation du Traité de Bruxelles, Conseil de l'Europe, Organisation du Traité de l'Atlantique Nord, Communauté Européenne du Charbon et de l'Acier, and the Assemblée ad hoc chargée d'élaborer un projet de traité instituant une communauté politique européenne. Under each body is given a brief note as to the establishment. Roussier has attempted to be as inclusive as possible for the publications of these bodies, whether printed or mimeographed, periodical or not, administrative, technical, or popular. No systematic provision has been made by any of these bodies for the deposit of all their documents in a library, national or parliamentary, in each of the participating countries.—J.B.C.

The Multi-state System of Ancient China. By RICHARD LOUIS WALKER. (Hamden, Conn.: The Shoe String Press. 1954. Pp. xii, 135. $3.50.)

Basing his conclusions on extensive research in Chinese as well as European language materials, the author has completed a study of the state system in China during the Ch'un Ch'iu Period (722–481 B.C.), which he hopes will be useful for students of modern international relations as well as sinologists. Some may doubt whether such terms as "sovereignty" or "totalitarian" can be used to describe accurately Chinese feudal institutions of nearly three thousand years ago. None will contest that Walker has consciously underlined the well-known statement by

Benedetto Croce: "All true history is contemporary history."

Trade and Diplomacy on the China Coast: The Opening of the Treaty Ports, 1842–1854. By JOHN KING FAIRBANK. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1953. Vols. I and II. Pp. xiii, 489; 88. $7.50.)

A detailed study of the beginnings of the commercial and political penetration of China by the West, of far more than specialized interest because of the author's understanding and description of the interplay of Oriental and Western ideas, and of the Western clash with Chinese social and cultural standards—especially in the treaty ports. The research on this work has stretched over a long period of time, and Professor Fairbank has made much use of Chinese materials available to him in Peking as long ago as 1932; the small second volume is devoted solely to sources, bibliography, and a glossary of Chinese names and terms.

Canada and the Far East: 1940–1953. By H. F. ANGUS. (New York: Institute of Pacific Relations. 1954. Pp. x, 129. $3.50.)

This is an analysis primarily of Canadian policy toward the countries and problems of southern and eastern Asia, though it is framed in the broader context of general foreign policy. It deals with public opinion as well as government policy and draws upon both government documents and periodicals. The work is organized on a functional rather than a country-by-country basis and serves as a continuation of A.R.M. Lower's Canada and the Far East, 1940.

Contemporary World Politics. By NORMAN HILL. (New York: Harper and Bros. 1954. Pp. xvi, 714. $6.00.)

This well-written new volume does not develop a theory of international politics and it avoids the lengthy historical and country chapters that add bulk to so many texts. The author leads off with a description of the state system and the nature and conduct of international relations, disposes of the historical and area background in 70 pages, and then in a lengthy section entitled "Motivations and Forces" takes up a series of key topics: national interest, national power, geography, imperialism, nationalism, ideology, technology, population, etc. The final section considers the place of war in international dealings and the various attempts or proposals to limit or to eliminate it.

A Concise History of the Law of Nations. BY ARTHUR NUSSBAUM. (New York: The Macmillan Co. 1954. Pp. xiii, 376. $5.00.)

A revised edition of a book first published in 1947. In comparison with the first edition more space is given to developments in the Middle Ages and in Russia, and a new appendix is added in which the author takes sharp exception to J. B. Scott's writings on the superiority of the Spanish scholastics over Hugo Grotius.

Survey of International Affairs: 1938. Vol. III. BY R. G. D. LAFFAN ET AL. EDITED BY VERONICA M. TOYNBEE. (London, New York, Toronto: Oxford University Press. 1953. Pp. xiv, 622. $9.50.)

Still catching up on the prewar years, this volume of the Royal Institute's 1938 Survey deals with northeast Europe, the Soviet Union, the Balkans, the aftermath of Munich, and the rearmament efforts of Germany, Britain, and France.

The World the Dollar Built. BY GUNTHER STEIN. (New York: Monthly Review Press. 1953. Pp. 288. $4.00.)

The author's argument runs as follows: world stability and prosperity depend upon how and how well the U. S. manages its economic affairs, but this country has not found a way to sustain high production and full employment except by spending for rearmament (or even war); if the world is to avoid being led to economic crisis and a likely military solution to the crisis, the U. S. must be persuaded to tamper with its free-enterprise system by various methods, including "priming" by international spending and development.

American Economic Policy toward the Philippines. BY SHIRLEY JENKINS. WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY CLAUDE A. BUSS. (Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1954. Pp. viii, 181. $4.00.)

The background and present state of the Philippine economy, surveyed especially and rather critically in terms of its U. S. orientation and the favored position granted U. S. business in the islands; the author is somewhat more pessimistic of the Republic's economic future than is Professor Buss, who contributes a politico-economic introduction.

Japan and America: From Earliest Times to the Present. BY LAWRENCE H. BATTISTINI. (New York: The John Day Co. 1954. Pp. x, 198. $3.00.)

A highly condensed and factual summary of the relations between Japan and the U. S. since Perry's visits in 1853 and 1854; the author has been in Tokyo since 1946, first with SCAP and now as lecturer at Sophia University.

The Decline of Neutrality, 1914-1941: With Special Reference to the United States and the Northern Neutrals. BY NILS ØRVIK. (Oslo: Johan Grundt Tanum Forlag. 1953. Pp. 294.)

A slightly condensed Wisconsin doctoral dissertation by a Norwegian student, who examines the concept of neutrality and studies its evolution through World War I and the interwar period with specific reference to a large and a small power, the U. S. and Norway. In both cases neutrality failed; the U. S. was too big to abstain from world influence, and Norway was economically and militarily unable to support such a policy.

America Faces World Communism. BY ANTHONY TRAWICK BOUSCAREN. (New York: Vantage Press. 1954. Pp. viii, 196. $5.00.)

World War III began in Greece in 1944, U. S. policies have never really faced up to this fact because of the influence of Communists and their sympathizers upon official and public opinion, and the only hope for victory is for the U. S. to build up the entire non-Soviet world "with a view not of appeasement or containment-coexistence, but of an offensive leading to the ultimate cutting of the Soviet cancer from the world body politic."

Nationalism and Communism in East Asia. BY W. MACMAHON BALL. (Melbourne: Melbourne University Press; New York: Cambridge University Press. 1953. Pp. viii, 210. $4.50.)

An Australian political scientist, long involved with Far Eastern affairs, offers his own succinct explanation of the nationalist movements in ten Asian countries and of the effect of communism on those movements.

The Dutch Colonial System in the East Indies.

By J. J. VAN KLAVEREN. (The Hague: J. J. van Klaveren. 1953. Pp. 230. $4.00.)

An extremely detailed and chronological study, based on Dutch sources.

The Struggle for Kashmir. By MICHAEL BRECHER. (New York: Oxford University Press. 1953. Published under the auspices of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs and the Institute of Pacific Relations. Pp. xii, 211. $5.00.)

An exhaustive review of the documentation, especially UN, on this subject, plus eight months of investigation in Kashmir, Pakistan, and India, have produced a handy guide to developments within and the protracted negotiations over this contested region. The book concludes in early 1953 with no indication of Sheikh Abdullah's forthcoming displacement.

The Refugee in the Post-War World. By JACQUES VERNANT. (New Haven: Yale University Press. 1953. Pp. xvi, 827. $6.00.)

A detailed survey of a far-reaching, tragic, and often ignored problem, carried on in collaboration with various international agencies and supported by a Rockefeller Foundation grant, but bearing no marks of "official" editing. Part I treats the origin of the problem, briefly considers the work of the numerous international agencies in this field, and attempts to place the refugees in categories. The remainder of the book analyzes the position or reception of the refugee in some 40 nations.

Austria's International Position, 1938-1953: The Re-establishment of an Independent Austria. By CARY TRAVERS GRAYSON, JR. (Genève: Librairie E. Droz. 1953. Pp. xvi, 316. 15 fr.)

After a brief review of Austria's position from 1918 to 1938 and an examination of her fate under German rule, the author concentrates on a comprehensive study of her international status from 1945 to 1953. Twenty-nine documents pertinent to the topic and a bibliography are appended to the volume.

The Price of Freedom: Greece in World Affairs, 1939-1953. By DIMITRIOS G. KOUSOULAS. (Syracuse: Syracuse University Press. 1953. Pp. xi, 210. $4.00.)

Details of the Italian attempts on the Balkans in the early stages of World War II, the Nazi occupation, internal postwar politics, and the international power struggle over Greece, as analyzed by a young Greek now studying at Syracuse.

Soviet Documents on Foreign Policy: Volume III. 1933-1941. EDITED BY JANE DEGRAS. (London, New York, Toronto: Oxford University Press. 1953. Pp. xxii, 500. $8.50.)

The areas of growing Soviet concern show up clearly in this collection of official and public documents, speeches, and press releases, but much of the important material on this crucial period must still remain unpublished in whatever archives the Soviet foreign office maintains.

The Incompatible Allies: A Memoir-History of German-Soviet Relations, 1918-1941. By GUSTAV HILGER AND ALFRED G. MEYER. (New York: Macmillan Co. 1953. Pp. xiii, 350. $5.00.)

Mr. Hilger was on the staff of the German Embassy in Moscow from 1918 to 1941. During those eventful twenty-three years he took part in practically all the deals between Germany and Soviet Russia and became more or less acquainted with a great many important figures in the shifting Soviet political scene. With the aid of his co-author, Professor Meyer, he provides a lively narrative of his experiences and offers a number of interesting insights into the devil's kitchen of the Nazi-Soviet chefs.

Soviet Economic Policy in Postwar Germany: A Collection of Papers by Former Soviet Officials. EDITED BY ROBERT SLUSSER. (New York: Research Program on the U.S.S.R. 1953. Pp. xx, 184.)

Seven former Soviet officials describe the behavior of Soviet occupation armies and authorities in Germany. Various chapters deal with the dismantling of German factories, confiscation of livestock, requisitioning of grain, Soviet agricultural policies, exploitation of German uranium mines, etc.

Diplomacy in a Whirlpool: Hungary between Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia. By STEPHEN D. KERTESZ. (Notre Dame, Ind.: University of Notre Dame Press. 1953. Pp. xvi, 273. $4.75.)

A well-documented study of Hungarian foreign policy since 1918, with special emphasis on the period beginning with 1938, written by a former Hungarian diplomat. Based both on published materials and on the author's personal experiences.

The Struggle for Poland. By H. PETER STERN. (Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1953. Pp. 79. $2.00.)

A brief account of the struggle between East and West for the control of Poland, based mainly on memoirs of various participants in the struggle—Polish, American and British—and on collections of official documents.

Ukraine under the Soviets. By CLARENCE A. MANNING. (New York: Bookman Associates. 1953. Pp. 223. $3.50.)

Using primarily materials prepared by a group of displaced Ukrainian professors, the author describes in a series of twenty-five short chapters the developments in the Ukraine under Soviet rule, including not only political and economic developments but also such matters as literature, culture, and religion. He concludes with an ardent appeal for a free Ukraine.

Ukrainian Communism and Soviet Russian Policy toward the Ukraine: An Annotated Bibliography, 1917-1953. By JURIJ LAWRYNENKO. (New York: Research Program on the U.S.S.R. 1953. Pp. xxviii, 454.)

An exhaustive compilation of works (mostly in the Russian and Ukrainian languages) dealing directly or indirectly with the above topics. The author is a Ukrainian émigré scholar.

Soviet Empire: The Turks of Central Asia and Stalinism. By OLAF CAROE. (London: Macmillan & Co., Ltd.; New York: St. Martin's Press. 1953. Pp. x, 300. $5.00.)

A study of past and current developments in five Soviet Republics in Central Asia inhabited mostly by Moslems of Turkish stock. The author's avowed purpose is to "weigh old influence with new and estimate the part which these peoples are destined to play in the struggle between the Communist World and the West." On the whole, he doubts that Soviet rulers will be able to assimilate completely the nations of Central Asia.

The Allies and the Russian Revolution: From the Fall of the Monarchy to the Peace of Brest-Litovsk. By ROBERT D. WARTH. (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press. 1954. Pp. vi, 294. $4.50.)

Delving with painstaking care into a mass of materials ranging from official documents and memoirs to newspaper reports, the author offers a detailed but never dull account of the chequered relations between Russia on one side and the Allies, as well as the Germans, on the other from March, 1917 to March, 1918. His study seems to bear out his major conclusion: "Allied policy and diplomacy in the period concerned was based on an almost total lack of understanding of the forces and events of the Russian Revolution. The Allies—like the Central Powers—were primarily concerned with the efficient conduct of the war, but the idealistic reasons for which they were supposedly fighting were nowhere more glaringly contradicted in practice than by their Russian policy—in regard to both democratic and Bolshevik Russia."

The Great Powers and Eastern Europe. By JOHN A. LUKACS. (New York: American Book Co. 1953. Pp. xii, 878. $7.50.)

A study of international politics of Central-Eastern Europe from 1934 to 1945, with a brief survey covering the period 1917-1933. Includes a helpful bibliography.

Institutes of International Affairs. (New York: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. 1954. Pp. vi, 131. $1.25.)

Concise sketches of the purposes and activities of institutes existing in all countries.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

H. ARTHUR STEINER*

University of California (Los Angeles)

ARTICLES

International Politics and National Policies
General

Hartmann, Frederick H. The Renewal of Multipower Diplomacy. Antioch Review. Winter, 1953-54.

Hoopes, Townsend. Civilian-Military Balance. Yale Review. Winter, 1954.

De Instituten voor Internationale Zaken. Internationale Spectator. February 8, 1954.

* Prepared with the assistance of Mr. John H. Schaar.

Kruszewski, Charles. The Pivot of History. Foreign Affairs. April, 1954.

Marshall, Charles B. Consent and Coalition. Foreign Service Journal. January, 1954.

Problems of East-West Settlement. Foreign Policy Association, Headline Series. No. 101 (December, 1953).

Rich, S. Grover, Jr. University Training in International Relations. Association of American Colleges Bulletin. December, 1953.

Scott, F. R. The World's Civil Service. International Conciliation. January, 1954.

United States

America's Watch on Asia. Round Table. December, 1953.

Anthem, Thomas. The U. S.-Greek Agreement. Contemporary Review. February, 1954.

Brady, Leslie S. Pattern for Propaganda. Foreign Service Journal. December, 1953.

Brown, Walter L. A Substitute for the Bricker Amendment. Virginia Law Review. February, 1954.

Cabot, John M. Understanding Our Foreign Service. Department of State Bulletin. March 8, 1954.

Dulles, John Foster. Policy for Security and Peace. Foreign Affairs. April, 1954.

Eagleton, Clyde. The United States and the United Nations. New York University Law Review. January, 1954.

Finch, George. The Need to Restrain the Treaty-Making Power of the United States within Constitutional Limits. American Journal of International Law. January, 1954.

Gelber, Lionel. The Diplomacy of Leadership. Antioch Review. Winter, 1953-54.

Howard, Harry N. The Development of United States Policy in the Near East, South Asia, and Africa during 1953. Department of State Bulletin. February 22, March 1, and March 8, 1954.

Morton, Thruston B. Our Foreign Policy in Today's World. Department of State Bulletin. March 8, 1954.

Reinhardt, George C. et al. Policy: Matrix of Strategy. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. February, 1954.

Robertson, Walter S. Our Victory in Korea. Department of State Bulletin. February 1, 1954. Responsibilities of the United States in the Far East. Ibid. March 8, 1954. United States Policy toward Japan. Ibid. February 15, 1954.

Roper, Elmo. American Attitudes on World Organization. Public Opinion Quarterly. Winter, 1953-54.

Sanger, Richard H. American Policy in the Middle East during 1953. Department of State Bulletin. February 8, 1954.

Stuart, R. Douglas. Canada-United States Relations: A Businessman-Ambassador's Point of View. Department of State Bulletin. January 4, 1954.

Sutherland, Arthur E. The Bricker Amendment, Executive Agreements and Imported Potatoes. Harvard Law Review. December, 1953.

Turner, Arthur C. Strategic Criteria for a Policy of Liberation. World Affairs Interpreter. Winter, 1954.

Whitton, John B. and Fowler, J. Edward. Bricker Amendment—Fallacies and Dangers. American Journal of International Law. January, 1954.

Latin America

Cabot, John M. Forces for Change in the Caribbean. Department of State Bulletin. December 21, 1953. The Importance of United States-Latin American Trade. Ibid. November 30, 1953. Mutual Economic Progress in the Americas. Ibid. January 11, 1954.

Goodrich, Carter. Bolivia: Test of Technical Assistance. Foreign Affairs. April, 1954.

Graham, David L. The United States and Mexico: A Reluctant Merger. Yale Review. Winter, 1954.

Kunz, Josef L. The Idea of Collective Security in Pan-American Developments. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1953.

MacDonald, N. P. Latin America and the United States. Fortnightly. March, 1954.

Stone, William T. Communism in Latin America. Editorial Research Reports. March 2, 1954.

Commonwealth of Nations

Chaudhuri, Nirad C. The Western Influence on India. Atlantic. March, 1954.

Gelber, Lionel. The Commonwealth and World Order. Virginia Quarterly Review. Winter, 1954.

Jebb, Sir Gladwyn. The British Commonwealth, the United States of America and the United Nations. Reference Division, Central Office of Information (London). 1954.

Korbel, Josef. The Kashmir Dispute after Six Years. International Organization. November, 1953.

Korbel, Josef. Danger in Kashmir. Foreign Affairs. April, 1954.

Martin, Paul. Canada and the United Nations. Dalhousie Review. Winter, 1954.

McWhinney, Edward. "Sovereignty" in the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth Countries at the Present Day. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1953.

Powell, Enoch. A Policy for Britain. Twentieth Century. January, 1954.

Spain, James W. Pakistan's North West Frontier. Middle East Journal. Winter, 1954.

Watts, G. S. Canadian Balance of International Payments. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. February, 1954.

Western Europe

Baumgartner, J. J. La Sarre et l'Équilibre Européen. Documents (Paris). December, 1953.

Domenach, Jean-Marie. Une Politique Extérieure. Esprit. January, 1954.

Elder, Neil. Parliament and Foreign Policy in Sweden. Political Studies (Oxford). October, 1953.

Eyck, F. Gunther. Benelux in the Balance. Political Science Quarterly. March, 1954.

Franco's Foreign Policy; From U. N. Outcast to U. S. Partner. World Today. December, 1953.

French Assembly Debates U.D.C. International Bulletin of the European Movement (Paris). January, 1954.

Furniss, Edgar S., jr. Weaknesses in French Foreign Policy-Making. Center of International Studies (Princeton). Memorandum No. 5 (1954).

Géraud, André. Rise and Fall of the Anglo-French Entente. Foreign Affairs. April, 1954.

German Opinion and the Berlin Conference; An Interim Summary. World Today. March, 1954.

Mollet, Guy. France and the Defense of Europe. Foreign Affairs. April, 1954.

Moreau, Claude-Albert. L'Allemagne et l'Europe. Monde Nouveau Paru. No. 73 (1953).

Piéri, François. Neutralité de l'Espagne. Revue des Deux Mondes. January 1, 1954.

Silvain, René. L'Allemagne a Voté pour l'Europe. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. October, 1953.

Speier, Hans. German Rearmament and the Old Military Elite. World Politics. January, 1954.

West Europe's Tariffs and Trade. Current History. January, 1954.

Yabraes, Richard. The Germans as Partners. Antioch Review. December, 1953.

U.S.S.R. and Eastern Europe

Changes in Eastern Europe's Economic Planning. World Today. December, 1953.

Dallin, David J. What Malenkov Wants. New Leader. January 25, 1954.

Der Balkan-Entente-Pakt von Ankara vom 28 Februar 1953. Zeitschrift für Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht. October, 1953.

D'Harcourt, Robert. Russie et Allemagne. Revue des Deux Mondes. December 1, 1953.

Eastern Germany Since the Risings of June 1953. World Today. February, 1954.

Fleming, D. F. Is Coexistence with Communism Impractical? Western Political Quarterly. September, 1953.

Lewis, Geoffrey W. Soviet Germany: The Unruly Satellite. Department of State Bulletin. December 28, 1953.

Lias, Godfrey. Satellite States in the Post-Stalin Era. International Affairs. January, 1954.

Moscow's New Course. Twentieth Century. March, 1954.

The Problem of Trieste [three articles]. Contemporary Review. December, 1953.

The Trieste Dispute. World Today. January, 1954.

Turkevich, John. The Progress of Soviet Science. Foreign Affairs. April, 1954.

Middle East and Africa

Bennett, George. India and Africa. International Journal. Winter, 1954.

Carleton, Alford. Syria Today. International Affairs. January, 1954.

Dvorin, Eugene P. and Abrahams, Marvin. The Need for Studying African Affairs in American Universities. Social Science. January, 1954.

Fairchild, J. A. Turkey, Gibraltar of the Middle East. United States Naval Institute Proceedings. February, 1954.

Isaacs, Harold R. The Rediscovery of Africa [review article]. International Journal. Winter, 1954.

Lewis, Bernard. Communism and Islam. International Affairs. January, 1954.

Philby, H. St. J. B. The New Reign in Sa'udi Arabia. Foreign Affairs. April, 1954.

President Shishekli and the Shaping of Syrian Policy. World Today. December, 1953.

Quilliam, C. D. England in Egypt. Queen's Quarterly. Autumn, 1953.

Yin'am, S. The Middle East in 1953; Annual Political Survey. Middle Eastern Affairs. January, 1954.

Pacific and Far East

Barton, Sir William. Democracy and Communism in Asia. Quarterly Review. January, 1954.

Bransby-William, M. E. Nationalism in the Middle and Far East. Military Review. March, 1954.

Cameron, J. M. The Decline and Rise of the Communist International. Dublin Review. Fourth Quarter, 1953.

Fujieda, Akira and Fairbank, Wilma. Current Trends in Japanese Studies of China and Adjacent Areas. Far Eastern Quarterly. November, 1953.

Hall, Melvin. Aspects of the Present Situation in Indo-China. Royal Central Asian Journal. July-October, 1953.

Ingrams, Harold. Hong Kong and Its Place in the Far East. Royal Central Asian Journal. July-October, 1953.

Jaray, Gabriel-Louis. La Chine Communiste et la Russie. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. October, 1953.

Kintner, William R. Making an Armistice Work. U. S. Army Combat Forces Journal. January, 1954.

Kulischer, Eugene M. Teeming Asia and the West. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1953.

Lévy, Roger. Situations en Extrême-Orient. Politique Étrangère. November, 1953.

Li, Chang [pseud.]. The Soviet Grip on Sinkiang. Foreign Affairs. April, 1954.

Renne, Roland R. Agrarian Problems and Foreign Aid in the Philippines. Far Eastern Survey. December, 1953.

Colonial Areas

De Politieke Ontwikkeling der Engelse Koloniën in Afrika. Internationale Spectator. November 25, 1953.

Horrell, Muriel. An Outline of the Systems of Government and Political Status of non-European Peoples in Africa South of the Sahara. Race Relations Journal (Johannesburg). No. 4, 1953.

Landau, Rom. France and the Arabs. Behind the Headlines (Toronto). January, 1954.

Patterson, Bruce. Britain's Caribbean Colonies; Tragic, Doomed Lands? International Journal. Winter, 1954.

Richet, Charles. L'Oeuvre de la France en

Afrique du Nord. Revue des Deux Mondes. January 15, 1954.

International Economic Policy and Relations

Actes du Congrès International pour l'Étude des Problèmes Economiques de la Fédération Européenne. Economia Internazionale (Genoa). February-May, 1953.

Baster, James. Economic Aspects of the Settlement of the Palestine Refugees. Middle East Journal. Winter, 1954.

Bidwell, Percy W. The Tariff in Transition. Foreign Affairs. April, 1954.

Bissell, Richard M. To Win the Peace. Queen's Quarterly. Autumn, 1953.

East-West Trade. World Today. January, 1954.

Feis, Herbert. Oil for Peace or War. Foreign Affairs. April, 1954.

Gorter, Wytze. GATT after Six Years; An Appraisal. International Organization. February, 1954.

Herod, W. R. Foreign Trade; Must We Buy to Sell? Proceedings of the Academy of Political Science. January, 1954.

Notestein, Frank. Population Problems. International Journal. Winter, 1954.

Rippy, J. Fred. British Investments in Latin America and India; An Inspection of Comparative Returns. Inter-American Economic Affairs. Winter, 1953.

Stassen, Harold E. The Case for Private Investment Abroad. Foreign Affairs. April, 1954.

Technical Assistance Programs [a symposium]. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. March, 1954.

Waugh, Samuel C. Problems of Foreign Economic Policy. Department of State Bulletin. March 1, 1954.

World Population Roundup. Population Bulletin. January, 1954.

Young, Arthur N. Problems of a Rich Uncle; Thoughts on International Economic Disparity. World Affairs Interpreter. January, 1954.

International Law

Bindschedler, Rudolf. Switzerland; Recent Trends in International Law: I. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. January, 1954.

Borm-Reid, Marussia. Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Judgements. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. January, 1954.

Cowles, Willard B. Revision of the United Nations Charter and the Development of the Law. Nebraska Law Review. November, 1953.

Delaume, G. R. Application and Interpretation of Treatises by the Internal Courts in Franco-American Relations. Journal du Droit International. July-September, 1953.

Favilli, Vincenzo. Osservazioni sulla Posizione degli Individui nel Diritto Internazionale. Rassegna di Diritto Pubblico. April-June, 1953.

Hambro, Edward. The Authority of the Advisory Opinions of the I. C. J. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. January, 1954.

The International Court of Justice. International Affairs. January, 1954.

Hudson, Manley O. The Thirty-second Year of the World Court. American Journal of International Law. January, 1954.

Jacobini, H. B. International Aviation Law; A Theoretical and Historical Survey. Journal of Public Law (Atlanta). Fall, 1953.

———, Problems of High Altitude or Space Jurisdiction. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1953.

Lenhoff, Arthur. Reciprocity in Function; A Problem of Conflict of Laws, Constitutional Law and International Law. University of Pittsburgh Law Review. Fall, 1953.

Mancini, Antonio. La Giurisdizione della Corte Internazionale di Giustizia. Revue de Droit International de Sciences Diplomatiques et Politiques. October-December, 1953.

Phleger, Herman. The Recent Developments in International Law of Interest to the United States. Department of State Bulletin. February 8, 1954.

Reibstein, Ernst. Deutsche Grotius-Kommentatoren bis zu Christian Wolff. Zeitschrift für Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht. October, 1953.

Rolin, Henri. The International Court of Justice and Domestic Jurisdiction. International Organization. February, 1954.

Rougier, Louis. Les Traités Diplomatiques et les Constitutions. Revue des Deux Mondes. December 1, 1953.

Schwartz, Murray L. International Law and the NATO Status of Forces Agreement. Columbia Law Review. December, 1953.

Sottile, Antoine. La Pape Pie XII et le Droit Pénal International. Revue de Droit International de Sciences Diplomatiques et Politiques. October-December, 1953.

Strebel, Helmut. Die Strafrechtliche Sicherung Humanitären Abkommen. Zeitschrift für Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht. October, 1953.

International Organization

United Nations and Specialized Agencies

Aparicio, Carlos Urrutia. Puerto Rico, América y las Naciones Unidas. Cuadernos Americanos. January-February, 1954.

Bing, Harold F. The United Nations and Human Rights. Contemporary Review. December, 1953.

Dawson, Kenneth H. The United Nations in a Disunited World. World Politics. January, 1954.

The Eighth Assembly of the United Nations. World Today. February, 1954.

Gross, Leo. The Double Veto and the Four-Power Statement on Voting in the Security Council. Harvard Law Review. December, 1953.

Hurewitz, J. C. The United Nations Conciliation Commission for Palestine. International Organization. November, 1953.

Leriche, Anthony. Les Missions Permanentes auprès de l'Organisation des Nations Unies. Revue de Droit International de Sciences Diplomatiques et Politiques. October-December, 1953.

Liang, Yuen-li. Preparatory Work for a Possible Revision of the United Nations Charter. The American Journal of International Law. January, 1954.

Morgenthau, Hans J. The New United Nations and the Revision of the Charter. Review of Politics. January, 1954.

Phelan, V. C. Human Welfare and the ILO. International Journal. Winter, 1954.

Richards, James P. Personnel Policy in the United Nations. Department of State Bulletin. December 21, 1953.

Schaaf, C. Hart. The United Nations Economic Commission for Asia and the Far East. International Organization. November, 1953.

Shousha, Aly Tewfik. Activities of the World Health Organization in the Eastern Mediterranean Region. American Journal of Public Health. January, 1954.

Military and Security Questions

Bell, Coral. Korea and the Balance of Power. Political Quarterly. January-March, 1954.

Berkner, Lloyd V. Science and Military Power. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. December, 1953.

Debré, Michel. Contre l'Armée Européenne. Politique Étrangère. November, 1953.

Johnson, Howard C. and Niemeyer, Gerhart. Collective Security; The Validity of An Ideal. International Organization. February, 1954.

Stone, William T. New Approaches to Atomic Control. Editorial Research Reports. February 10, 1954.

Weyland, Gen. Otto P. The Air Campaign in Korea. Air University Quarterly Review. Fall, 1953.

Regional Organizations

Adenauer, Konrad. Les Buts de la Communauté Européenne de Défense. Documents (Paris). December, 1953.

Armengaud, André. L'Intégration Économique Européenne et la Communauté du Charbon et de l'Acier. Politique Étrangère. November, 1953.

Bowie, Robert R. The Process of Federating Europe. Department of State Bulletin. February 1, 1954.

Briggs, Herbert W. The Proposed European Political Community. American Journal of International Law. January, 1954.

Champion, Harold. Colombo Plan; Third Year. New Commonwealth. January 4, 1954.

Dulles, John F. A Report on the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Department of State Bulletin. January 4, 1954.

Fay, Sidney B. Cooperative Policies in Europe. Current History. January, 1954.

Mendershausen, Horst. First Tests of the Schuman Plan. Review of Economics and Statistics. November, 1953.

Pordea, G. A. Pactes Régionaux et Sécurité Collective. Revue de Droit International de Sciences Diplomatiques et Politiques. October-December, 1953.

Rapport du Comité d'Études de l'Organisation Atlantique. L'O.T.A.N. et le Réarmement de l'Occident. Politique Étrangère. November, 1953.

von Merkatz, Hans Joachim. Jurisprudence de la Communauté Politique Européenne. Monde Nouveau Paru. No. 73 (1953).

DOCUMENTS

General and Miscellaneous

[First Anniversary of the Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation between Turkey, Greece and Yugoslavia.] Review of International Affairs (Belgrade). February 1, 1954.

Food and Agriculture Organization. Report on the Activities of FAO under the Expanded Technical Assistance Program for 1952-1953.

Report of the Director-General. Rome, FAO, 1953.

———. The Work of FAO, 1952-1953. Report of the Secretary-General. Rome, FAO, 1953.

GATT. A New Proposal for the Reduction of Customs Tariffs. Geneva, GATT, 1954. (Sales No. GATT/1954-1.)

International Labour Office. Report of the Ad hoc Committee on Forced Labour. Geneva, ILO, 1953. (UN Doc. E/2431.)

New Zealand. Department of External Affairs. Annual Report . . . 1 April 1952 to 31 March 1953. Wellington, 1953. (Pub. No. 133.)

Organisation for European Economic Cooperation. Progress and Problems of the European Economy. Fifth Annual Report of the OEEC. Paris, OEEC, 1954.

Special Refugee Survey Commission to the Near East. A Survey of the Arab Refugee Situation; Interim Report. Department of State Bulletin. January 18, 1954.

UNESCO. International Instrument for the Removal of Obstacles to the Movement of Persons Travelling for Educational, Scientific and Cultural Purposes. Paris, UNESCO, 1953.

United Nations

All entries under this heading bear the imprint of the United Nations (New York), 1953, unless a different place or date is shown.

Economic and Social Council. Consultative Activities Undertaken by Non-Governmental Organizations Granted Category B Consultative Status . . . Report . . . 9 December 1953. (Doc. E/C.2/374.)

———A Study of Trade Between Asia and Europe. . . . Geneva. November, 1953. (Doc. E/CN.11/373.)

———Recommendations to Governments Concerning the Application of Special Measures for the Protection of Minorities. . . . 9 December 1953. (Doc. E/CN.4/Sub.2/154.)

———Technical Assistance Activities under the Expanded Programme. Status Report as at 30 November 1953. 6 January 1954. (Doc. E/TAC/28.)

———Administrative Committee on Coordination. Report. . . . 26 October 1953. (Doc. E/2512.)

General Assembly. Budget Estimates for the Financial Year 1954. Draft Report of the Fifth Committee. 6 December 1953. (Doc. A/C.5/L.264.)

———Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories. Report of the Fourth Committee. 17 November 1953. (Doc. A/2556.)

——— Resolutions Adopted by the General Assembly at its Eighth Session. . . . January, 1954. (Doc. A/2630.)

——— Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions. Personnel Policy of the United Nations. . . . 14 November 1953. (Doc. A/2555.)

——— International Law Commission. Report . . . on the Work of its Fifth Session. 1 December 1953. (Doc. A/2589.)

Secretariat. Non-Self-Governing Territories. Summaries and Analyses of Information Transmitted to the Secretary-General During 1953. 2 vols. (Doc. ST/TRI/Ser.A/7 and Add.1.) Special Study on Social Conditions. April, 1953. (Doc. Ibid., Add. 2.)

——— Department of Economic Affairs. Economic Survey of Asia and the Far East, 1953. Bangkok, 1954.

——— Economic Survey of Europe in 1953. Geneva, 1954.

——— International Flow of Private Capital, 1946-1952. 1954. (Doc. ST/ECA/22.)

——— Progress in Land Reform. Analysis of Replies by Governments to a United Nations Questionnaire. 1954. (Doc. ST/ECA/21.)

——— Department of Public Information. How to Find Out About the United Nations.

Secretary-General. Publication of Documents Concerning the Drafting and Application of the Charter; Preparatory Work with Regard to the Possible Holding of a General Conference . . . Memorandum . . . 16 October 1953. (Doc. A/C.6/343.)

——— Report . . . on Personnel Policy. 2 November 1953. (Doc. A/2533.)

Security Council. Report . . . by the Chief of Staff of the Truce Supervision Organization Submitted . . . 23 October 1953. (Doc. S/3122.)

United States

Unless otherwise indicated, all entries under this heading bear the imprint: "Washington, Government Printing Office, 1954"; and the congressional materials are those of the 83rd Congress, 2nd Session.

Commission on Foreign Economic Policy [The Randall Commission]. Report to the President and Congress . . . January 23, 1954.

Congress. House. Committee on Foreign Affairs. Special Study Mission on International Organizations and Movements. . . . Report. . . . House Report No. 1251.

——— Special Study Mission to the Near East. . . . The Arab Refugees and Other Problems in the Near East. Report. . . . House Report No. 1250.

——— Special Study Mission to Southeast Asia and the Pacific. Report . . . January 29, 1954. [Committee Print.]

——— Committee on Rules and Administration. Select Committee to Investigate the Incorporation of the Baltic States into the U.S.S.R. . . . Hearings. . . . 83rd Congress, 1st Session [but pub. in 1954].

——— Senate. Committee on Foreign Relations. The Far East and South Asia. Report of Senator H. Alexander Smith . . . on a Study Mission to the Far East. January 25, 1954. [Committee Print.]

——— Mutual Defense Treaty with Korea. (1) Hearings . . . January 13 and 14, 1954. (2) Report. . . . Exec. Report No. 1.

——— South America. Report of Theodore Francis Green on a Study Mission. [Committee Print.]

——— Tensions within the Soviet Captive Countries: Bulgaria, Part I. 83rd Congress, 1st Session. Senate Doc. No. 70 [1954].

——— Subcommittee on the United Nations Charter. (1) Review of the United Nations Charter; A Collection of Documents. Senate Doc. No. 87. (2) The Problem of the Veto in the United Nations Security Council. Staff Study No. 1 [Committee Print.]

——— Committee on Government Operations. Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations. Waste and Mismanagement in Voice of America Engineering Projects. Report. . . . Senate Report No. 880.

——— Subcommittee on Korean War Atrocities. Report. . . . Senate Report No. 848.

——— Committee on the Judiciary. Amendments to Trading with the Enemy Act. Hearings . . . July 20-22, 1953. 83rd Congress, 1st Session. 1953.

——— Proposals to Amend the Treaty-Making Provisions of the Constitution: Views of Deans and Professors of Law. 83rd Congress, 1st Session. 1953. [Committee Print.]

Department of State. The Far Eastern

Commission; A Study in International Cooperation: 1945 to 1952 [by George H. Blakeslee]. 1953. (Pub. No. 5138.)

Foreign Ministers Meeting: the Berlin Discussions January 25–February 18, 1954. (Pub. No. 5399.)

International Development Advisory Board. Conclusions and Recommendations . . . Report . . . Regarding the United States Participation in Technical Cooperation Programs for Underdeveloped Countries. 1953.

Library of Congress. The United States and Europe 1951–1952. [Annotated bibliography of relevant books and articles.] Washington, Library of Congress, 1953.

President. Report to Congress on the Mutual Security Program for the Six Months ended December 31, 1953. March 8, 1954.

POLITICAL THEORY, RESEARCH, AND METHODOLOGY

The White Umbrella: Indian Political Thought from Manu to Gandhi. BY D. MACKENZIE BROWN. (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press. 1953. Pp. xv, 205. $3.75.)

This book contains excerpts from the most representative Indian writings on politics from ancient to modern times. Professor Brown contributes an historical-cultural background, a concise analysis of the nature of Indian thought, an introduction to each group of selections, and a set of useful notes. Much of the old writings consists of instructions to practicing politicians, especially kings. Much of the modern writing, inspired by the struggle for freedom, is political propaganda, albeit of high caliber.

One of the services this book can render is to disabuse our contemporary Kiplings of the idea that East cannot meet West. The fundamental nature and the range of Indian and Western political thought are remarkably similar in many respects throughout the ages. There are idealists and Machiavellians among the Indians. There is, for instance, little of the much vaunted Asian spirituality, peacefulness, or forgiveness in the admonition of the Santi-parvan: "One should bear one's foe on one's shoulders as long as time is unfavorable. When, however, the opportunity has come, one should break him into fragments like an earthen jar on stone."

Professor Brown wisely warns that there may be a discrepancy between Indian political thought and contemporary political practice. He might also have warned that these brief excerpts cannot give a complete picture of their writers' thoughts. This is particularly true of the moderns whose inner conflicts between ancient Indian and modern Western influences are not reflected in the book. An advantage of the brevity of this volume is that teachers of theory may be induced to make it required reading. For it is high time for us to realize that the West has no monopoly on political thought and that the politics of the East are not any more mysterious than those of the West.—WERNER LEVI, University of Minnesota.

French Corporative Theory, 1789–1948: A Chapter in the History of Ideas. BY MATTHEW H. ELBOW. (New York: Columbia University Press. 1953. Pp. 222. $3.75.)

Ever since the autonomous organization of national production, as proposed by the Italian syndicalist and former I. W. W., Rossoni, was perverted into Mussolini's system of state-controlled, joint labor-management corporations, the term corporatism has fallen into disrepute—a disgrace which Pétain's similar experiment did nothing to alleviate. Some recent writers have been trying to cleanse the term of its fascist taint and to demonstrate the long and honorable tradition of corporatist thought. In his German Theories of the Corporate State (New York, 1947), Ralph H. Bowen did so with distinction, tracing the anti-revolutionary romanticist tenets of what may be called "the third camp," equidistant from both laissez-faire and Marxist étatisme, back to St. Thomas and forward to the well-known encyclicals of Pope Leo XIII. Now a disciple of Professor Bowen has attempted to accomplish the same task for Pétain's predecessors who, after the French defeat of 1871, turned to the circle of German corporatists around Bishop Ketteler for inspiration (as, in his field, Ernest Renan turned to ideas of German education). Like all writers in his subject, Dr. Elbow is troubled by the haziness of corporatist theory, a haziness typical of similarly well-intentioned blueprints of a classless social order, as for instance Guild Socialism. The attempt to bring some sort of unity into the diffuse prehistory of French "Social Catholicism" (prior to 1918) takes up three-fifths of the book, with the too little known La Tour du Pin as the central figure. Unfortunately, a few intruders complicate an already complex story. One of them is Georges Sorel, whose shortlived connection with royalist traditionalism was at best tenuous. The author of Reflections on Violence, who believed in a dynamic capitalism as he believed in a vigorous proletariat, should have been kept off the corporatist roster on which the author rightly places Georges Valois, Sorel's apostatic follower. To the motley crowd of French corporatists (among them birds of such different feather as the ex-leftists Déat and Doriot, royalists like Maurras, fascists like Colonel de la Rocque, and ex-liberals like Paul-Boncour), Marshal Pétain's état français of 1940 looked like the fulfillment of their dream, only to disappoint them as Il Duce disappointed his Rossonis. The question that remains to be asked, but which the author, with scholarly caution, refuses to answer, is whether the consistent failure of the corporatists is not due more to some basic fallacy in the very doctrine of corporatism than to the refusal of the bureaucrats to keep their hands off the economy. Its propagators, to be sure, are for the most part not trying to hoodwink labor but are honest seekers after a way out of the class struggle. But they also reflect, particularly in the Third and Fourth Republics, a mentality characteristic of a static if not stagnant economic situation; they are social quietists in a crisis which, today more than ever, demands bold measures if France is to be saved, for her own sake as well as for the sake of Greater Europe.—JAMES H. MEISEL, University of Michigan.

Heresy, Yes; Conspiracy, No. BY SIDNEY HOOK. (New York: The John Day Co. 1953. Pp. 283. $3.75.)

Many thoughtful people are convinced that the domestic Communists in our midst constitute a threat to our national security. But many of these same people are concerned about how the growing number of loyalty programs, legislative investigations, sedition trials, and private purges aimed at this threat are to be reconciled with the freedom of speech and belief which is supposed to be guaranteed by our Constitution and which is essential to the functioning of our democratic system.

It is to this problem of reconciliation that Sidney Hook's latest book is addressed. The best statement in the book is this one: "From time to time certain phrases catch the public fancy. . . . Repetition gives them a patina of familiarity so that their use soothes the understanding instead of challenging it. Gradually these phrases begin to be employed in all sorts of contexts until they function not as summaries of thought, but as substitutes. . . ." Unfortunately, the balance of the book is a prime example of what this statement describes. It is built upon a repetition of terms and phrases long used in this area as substitutes for thought.

Freedom of belief and expression should be preserved for "heresy," says Hook, but not for "conspiracy." This distinction certainly has a "patina of familiarity," but what does it mean? The heresy which is to be protected, we are told, consists of "unpopular ideas or opinions" and includes "Communist ideas." But what is a conspiracy? "A conspiracy . . . is a secret or underground movement which seeks to attain its ends not by normal political or educational processes, but by playing outside the rules of the game. . . . The signs of a conspiracy are secrecy, anonymity, the use of false names and labels, and the calculated lie."

This definition may seem a somewhat imprecise tool to apply, but it works fine. It just happens that Hook's definition of a conspiracy is also his description of the Communist party, so that he comes inevitably to the conclusion that, while a man may entertain and express Communist ideas, he may not join the Communist party¹ without becoming a conspirator.

But doesn't this conclusion rest upon an assumption of "guilt by association?" Hook views this phrase as one of the substitutes for thought which he so abhors, but recognizes that it describes a process of reasoning which our courts have occasionally condemned. This, however, merely provides the occasion for another distinction and the only touch of novelty in the book. Asserting, erroneously, that the judicial condemnation applies only to imputing "criminal guilt," Hook introduces a doctrine of "moral guilt" by association which justifies noncriminal sanctions, both governmental and private.

The last half of Hook's book is devoted to explaining why the Communist party member is unfit to teach, but his argument is built upon unsupported assumptions.² All party members who are teachers have abandoned their intellectual independence and committed themselves to preaching party doctrine in the classroom. What is the evidence of this universal commitment? There are "official instructions" to that effect—an article in The Communist in 1937 and a resolution adopted at a party convention in 1936. How does Hook know that all members are aware of these instructions? They were "addressed to the general membership" in publications which "all members are expected to read." And even if all present members are aware of instructions published sixteen years ago, how does Hook know that all will obey? The party expects all members to obey and "weeds its ranks carefully."

¹ For an exposition of Communist ideas by one who was not a Communist party member, see Sidney Hook, "Why I Am a Communist," The Modern Monthly, April, 1934, p. 143.

This book is offered by the publisher as "a tough-minded philosophy to guide American liberals."—VERN COUNTRYMAN, Yale University.

Communication and Persuasion: Psychological Studies of Opinion Change. BY CARL I. HOVLAND, IRVING L. JANIS AND HAROLD H. KELLEY. (New Haven: Yale University Press. 1953. Pp. xii, 315. $4.50.)

The Yale psychologists who did the communications experiments reported in this book state in the preface their hope that "as the program develops political scientists and economists interested in the formation and modification of values will also participate." This hope will probably be shared by political scientists who read this book carefully.

The use of the controlled experiment in social science is an exciting advance and its value is well demonstrated in these studies. Unfortunately, the early chapters deal with questions which, however important to learning theory in psychology, will seem trivial to political scientists. The candidate for public office would probably like to know whether his influence is increased or decreased by changes in the order of his arguments but the relevance of the problem to political science seems slight. The experiments reported in the later chapters, however, are significant for political science both in method and in findings. Several of the experiments bring to mind political situations which might be studied under equally rigorous conditions. Examples of findings relevant to political science are those on relationships between opinion change (and resistance to it) and group membership. People's motivation to retain membership in a group is shown to increase their resistance to communications contrary to the standards of the group. Such findings should interest students of electoral behavior, especially those interested in the role of political parties and other organizations as reference groups for the recipient of political propaganda.

Along with the findings on group membership there are data which will intrigue the political scientists who have delved into personality theory in psychology. For example, the high degree of "persuasibility" found among people considering themselves "socially inadequate" will bring to mind the writings of Fromm and Reisman dealing with the personality determinants of political behavior. Other personality characteristics shown to be positively related to "persuasibility" are low self-esteem, inhibition of aggression, and depressive tendencies.

These and other findings will probably bring some "we knew this all along" replies, but the methodologically discriminating reader will feel considerable security in the knowledge gained through such meticulous research procedures. The solid information it provides about one aspect of political behavior is its major argument for the research procedure used. Whether or not the findings are "significant" for political theory can only be judged by studying them. If we accept the position that political behavior can be studied scientifically, we now have two clear directions in which to proceed. This book describes research of a highly intensive nature and probes the processes of persuasion, learning, and opinion change. Refined cross-section attitude surveys are of the extensive nature designed to describe major characteristics of large populations. Each has a polished methodology which political scientists would do well to master.—GEORGE M. BELKNAP, Michigan State College.

² Both Hook and I are repeating ourselves here. He has made the argument before. Hook, "What Shall We Do About Communist Teachers?," Saturday Evening Post, September 10, 1949, p. 33; Hook, "Should Communists Be Permitted to Teach?" New York Times Magazine, February 27, 1949, p. 7; Hook, "Communists in the Colleges," New Leader, May 6, 1950, p. 16. And I have criticized it before. Countryman, Un-American Activities in the State of Washington (Ithaca, N.Y., 1951), pp. 381-86.

World List of Social Science Periodicals. (Paris: UNESCO. 1954. Pp. 161.)

A Register of Legal Documentation in the World. (Paris: UNESCO. 1954. Pp. 362.)

The World List includes periodicals which publish original studies and articles by specialists. It does not include legal periodicals or those dealing with certain subjects closely connected with social science, such as history, philosophy, and social geography. The title of each periodical is listed in the original language and in the case of less familiar languages in English also. For each periodical there is a brief descriptive note in French and English. The Register contains only a listing, either in the original language or in French, but includes all the types of publications (statutes, court decisions, reviews, etc.) used in legal study.

Political Science in India. By S. V. KOGEKAR AND A. APPADORAI. (Delhi, India: Premier Publishing Co. 1953. Pp. iii, 110. Rs. 5/.)

This volume contains much evaluation and an extraordinary amount of information, including bibliographical listings of Indian publications, descriptions of courses of study—with prescribed readings—in selected Indian universities, and an outline of topics on which student and faculty research is being done.

Reason in History: A General Introduction to the Philosophy of History. By GEORG WILHELM FRIEDRICH HEGEL. TRANS. AND EDITED BY R. S. HARTMAN. (New York: The Liberal Arts Press. 1953. Pp. 95. $75.)

This small volume is designed to introduce the beginning student to the Hegelian view of history. After an introduction by Professor Hartman, which states admirably the background of Hegelian thought, brief selections from The Philosophy of History are given. The classics published by the Liberal Arts Press make a fine list for those who may be teaching intellectual history at the undergraduate level.

David Hume's Political Essays. EDITED, WITH AN INTRODUCTION, BY CHARLES W. HENDEL. (New York: The Liberal Arts Press. 1953. Pp. lxiv, 166. $75.)

A selection of eighteen political essays from Hume's Essays Moral, Political, and Literary, together with a lengthy introduction and a selected bibliography.

The Pursuit of Happiness. By HOWARD MUMFORD JONES. (Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1953. Pp. xi, 168. $3.50.)

In five lectures in the William W. Cook Foundation series, the author traces "the glittering generality" of "pursuit of happiness" through early American documents and individual statements; takes a turn at what the courts have said about happiness; finds in classical philosophy and in Puritanism, respectively, the "spectator theory of happiness for the aristocrat" and "the prosperity theory for the Christian merchant"; analyzes the concepts of happiness in Cooper, Emerson, and William James; and finally finds that in the twentieth century happiness is in the area not of law but of psychology, and is sought not in the way of the country gentleman or the merchant prince but in personal adjustment to the environment.

Essay in Politics. By SCOTT BUCHANAN. (New York: Philosophical Library. 1953. Pp. xiii, 236. $3.75.)

The essay is concerned with the intricate complex of corporations of various sorts which make up much of the life of the nation and which constitute in fact many unrecognized governments sharing in sovereignty and power over the people, but which are lacking in coordination and in responsibility. The need, it is contended, is to recognize them as bodies politic and to give them federal republican forms of government and thus revitalize the significance of the consent of the governed.

The Present as History: Essays and Reviews on Capitalism and Socialism. By PAUL M. SWEEZY. (New York: Monthly Review Press. 1953. Pp. viii, 376. $5.00.)

Some essays and a number of book reviews published over the past 15 years by an economist of Marxian views who is attempting to illustrate here how many present developments are in the stream of history.

Man and Modern Society: Conflict and Choice in the Industrial Era. By KARL DE SCHWEINITZ, JR. AND KENNETH W. THOMPSON. (New York: Henry Holt and Company. 1953. Pp. xii, 849. $5.25.)

A valuable collection of readings designed for general education courses. The emphasis is political and economic. The theme is that the great issues among men today result from the impact of new forces on the old ideological and institutional framework. The effort here is to display both the framework and the contemporary problems.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON POLITICAL THEORY

FRANCIS G. WILSON

University of Illinois

History and Criticism

Aalders, G. J. D. Date and Intention of Xenophon's Hiero. Mnemosyne. VI/3. 1953.

Adams, Arthur E. Pobedonostsev's Religious Politics. Church History. December, 1953.

Allen, Walter. Sallust's Political Career. Studies in Philology. January, 1954.

Altheim, Franz. Römische Religion als Idee. Gymnasium. 61/1-2. 1954.

Arcila Farias, Eduardo. El Siglo de la Ilustración en América. Revista Nacional de Cultura. November-December, 1953.

Bader, K. S. Volk-Stamm-Territorium. Historische Zeitschrift. December, 1953.

Bierer, Dora. Renan and His Interpreters: A Study in French Intellectual Warfare. Journal of Modern History. December, 1953.

Boller, Paul F. Washington and Civilian Supremacy. Southwest Review. Winter, 1954.

Borchard, Ruth. Mill: The Man and the Thinker. Contemporary Review. February, 1954.

Borgese, G. A. Dante and His Time. Dio-genes. Autumn, 1953.

Brock, Peter. The Birth of Polish Socialism. Journal of Central European Affairs. October, 1953.

Brody, Alexander. Jacob Newton Cardozo: American Economist. Historia Judaica. October, 1953.

Brüning, Walther. Historicismo, Naturalismo, Apriorismo [Ernst Troeltsch]. Notas y Estudios de Filosofía. October-December, 1954.

Chaix-Ruy, J. Vie et Pensée de Benedetto Croce. Les Études Philosophiques. April-June, 1953.

Charanis, Peter. Economic Factors in the Decline of the Byzantine Empire. Journal of Economic History. Fall, 1953.

Clarkson, Jesse D. The Background of Fabian Theory. Journal of Economic History. Fall, 1953.

Collins, H. P. Decline and Fall of Pompey the Great. Greece & Rome. October, 1953.

Cura, Alijandro del. Sentido de la Existencia Creada en Santo Tomás. Estudios Filosóficos. January-June, 1953.

Curti, Merle. Human Nature in American Thought: Retreat from Reason in the Age of Science. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1953.

Demorest, J. J. Sainte-Beuve et Pascal. PMLA. December, 1953.

Didier, Noël. Henri de Suse, Évêque de Sisteron (1244-1250) (II). Revue Historique de Droit Français et Étranger. 31/3. 1953.

Díez del Corral, Luis. El Rapto de Europa. Revista de Estudios Políticos. July-August, 1953.

Eaton, Leonard K. Eli Todd and the Hartford Retreat. New England Quarterly. December, 1953.

Fichtenau, Heinrich. Karl der Grosse und das Kaisertum. Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung. LXI/3-4. 1953.

Fitzsimmons, M. A. Brownson's Search for the Kingdom of God: The Social Thought of an American Radical. Review of Politics. January, 1954.

Frisch, Morton, J. Lincoln's Philosophy of Politics. Prairie Schooner. Winter, 1953.

Fuks, Alexander. Notes on the Rule of the Ten at Athens in 403 B. C. Mnemosyne. VI/3. 1953.

Geismar, Maxwell. Le Drame de Jack London. Les Temps Modernes. January, 1954.

George, Charles H. A Social Interpretation of English Puritanism. Journal of Modern History. December, 1953.

Geyl, P. Thomas Carlyle. De Gids. November, 1953.

Goldberg, Harvey. Jaurès and the Theory of International Relations. Historian. Autumn, 1953.

Gómez Rubio, Anna M. Hidalgo y la Emancipación. Estudios Americanos. December, 1953.

Goretti, M. Bernardo di Mandeville nella Storia del Pensiero Giuridico-Etico Inglese. Studi Senesi. LXIV/1-2. 1952.

Harding, Joan N. An American Thinker [Paul Elmer More]. Contemporary Review. January, 1954.

Hartman, Robert S. (Editor and Translator.)

Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel: Reason in History. (Liberal Arts Press, 1953).

Heydt, F. A. von der. Las Reducciones del Paraguay. Estudios Americanos. December, 1953.

Hibbert, A. B. The Origins of the Medieval Town Patriarchate. Past and Present. February, 1953.

Hiebel, Frederick. The Modern View of Hellas and German Romanticism. Germanic Review. February, 1954.

Howe, Irving. Joseph Conrad III: The Political Novels. Kenyon Review. Winter, 1954.

Huth, Otto. Atlantis—Utopie oder Wirklichkeit? Universitas. November, 1953.

Infesta, Ramon. El Pensamiento Político de Martí. (Universidad de la Habana. 1953).

Ingham, Kenneth. The English Evangelicals and the Pilgrim Tax in India, 1800–1862. Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society. 1 and 2, 1953.

Kaufman, Walter A. Hegel's Early Anti-theological Phase. Philosophical Review. January, 1954.

Klinkhamer, Mary Carolyn. Historical Reason for Inception of Parochial School System. Catholic Educational Review. February, 1954.

Koch, Adrienne. Hamilton, Adams and the Pursuit of Power. Review of Politics. January, 1954.

Koenig, Arthur E. Dostoevsky's Testament: The Diary of a Writer. South Atlantic Quarterly. January, 1954.

Krook, Dorothea. Mr. Brown's Note Annotated [Hobbes]. Political Studies. October, 1953.

Kurz, Harry. America and Vigny's Ideas on Government. French Review. January, 1954.

La Pierre, J. W. Remarques sur la Théorie de la Personne Publique chez Thomas Hobbes. (Paris, 1954).

Laver, Rosemary Zita. St. Albert and the Theory of Abstraction. Thomist. January, 1954.

Lerner, L. D. Bunyan and the Puritan Culture. Cambridge Journal. January, 1954.

Levi-Provençal, E. Du Nouveau sur le Royaume de Pampelune au IX^e Siècle. Bulletin Hispanique. LV/1. 1953.

Macchioro, B. G. Saggi Sulla Rivoluzione di Febbraio: Alfonso de Lamartine e la Nascita della Repubblica. Nuova Rivista Storica. May–August, 1953.

Marvall, José Antonio. La Formación de la Consciencia Estamental en los Letrados. Revista de Estudios Políticos. July–August, 1953.

Marconi, Momolina. The Pathos of the Mediterranean Religion. Diogenes. Autumn, 1953.

Martí, José. [Various Articles.] Anuario de la Facultad de Ciencia Sociales y Derecho Público. 1953.

Mason, S. F. Science and Religion in Seventeenth Century England. Past and Present. February, 1953.

Matl, Josef. Dostojewskij und unserer Zeit. Universitas. November, 1953.

Mead, Sidney E. American Protestantism during the Revolutionary Epoch. Church History. December, 1953.

Meyer, Ernst. Neuere Erkenntnisse und Forschungen auf dem Gebiete des Römischen Staatsrechtes. Die Welt als Geschichte. XIII/3. 1953.

Mitford, T. B. The Character of Ptolemaic Rule in Cyprus. Aegyptus. January–June, 1953.

Morau, P. Thucydide et la Rhétorique. Les Études Classiques. January, 1954.

Moreau, Joseph. Platon et la Connaissance de l'Âme. Revue des Études Anciennes. July–December, 1953.

Moulin, Léo. Les Origines Religieuses des Techniques Electorales et Délibératives Modernes. Revue Internationale d'Histoire Politique et Constitutionnelle. April–June, 1953.

Moulin, Léo. La Primauté de l'Exécutif et la Notion de Collégialité dans les Instituts Religieux. Revue Internationale des Sciences Administratives. 1953, No. 1.

Nagley, Winfield E. Thoreau on Attachment, Detachment, and Non-Attachment. Philosophy East and West. January, 1954.

Nemo, M. Humanisme de Jean-Jacques Rousseau. Bulletin de l'Association Guillaume Budé. December, 1953.

Nibley, Hugh. The Unsolved Loyalty Problem: Our Western Heritage. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1953.

Nulli, Siro Attilio. Erasmo e il Rinascimento. Belfagor. November, 1953.

Paul, David. The Borgia Phenomenon. Twentieth Century. February, 1954.

Pearson, Lionel. Real and Conventional Personalities in Greek History. Journal of the History of Ideas. January, 1954.

Peck, A. L. Plato's Parmenides: Some Suggestions for its Interpretation. Classical Quarterly. July–October, 1953.

Peppard, Murray B. Ernst Jünger: Norse Myths and Nihilism. Monatshefte. January, 1954.

Peterson, Merrill D. Parrington and American Liberalism. Virginia Quarterly Review. Winter, 1954.

Raefs, Günter. Platon und Aristoteles im Abendandischen Bewusstsein. Gymnasium. 61/1-2. 1954.

Riesman, David. The Social and Psychological Setting of Veblen's Economic Theory. Journal of Economic History. Fall, 1953.

Roth, Cecil. The Two Cradles of Jewish Liberty. Commentary. February, 1954.

Santoro, M. Pace e Guerre nel Pensiero di Erasmo. Giornali Italiano di Filologia. VI/4. 1953.

Sayce, R. A. Baroque Elements in Montaigne. French Studies. January, 1954.

Schachermeyer, Fritz. The Genesis of the Greek Polis. Diogenes. Autumn, 1953.

Schroeder, Max. Ralph Waldo Emerson in der Geschichte seiner Zeit. Sinn und Form. V/6. 1953.

Schuman, D. W. Goethe and Friedrich Carl Von Moser. Journal of English and Germanic Philology. January, 1954.

Seager, Robert II. Ten Years before Mahan: The Unofficial Case for the Navy, 1880-1890. Mississippi Valley Historical Review. December, 1953.

Shackleton, Robert. The Moslem Chronology of the Lettres Persanes. French Studies. January, 1954.

Siebert, Ferdinand. Der Deutsche Anteil an der Vorbereitung des Risorgimento. Archiv für Kulturgeschichte. 35/3. 1953.

Simons, Madeleine A. Rousseau's Natural Diet. Romanic Review. February, 1954.

Smelser, Marshall. George Washington and the Alien and Sedition Acts. American Historical Review. January, 1954.

Staveley, E. S. The Significance of the Consular Tribunate. Journal of Roman Studies. XLIII/1-2. 1953.

Stringham, L. Les Contradictions de Pascal. Bulletin de l'Association Guillaume Budé. December, 1953.

Strout, Cushing. Faith and History: The Mind of W. G. T. Shedd. Journal of the History of Ideas. January, 1954.

Sullivan, Richard E. The Carolingian Missionary and the Pagan. Speculum. October, 1953.

Talmadge, John E. Georgia's Federalist Press and the War of 1812. Journal of Southern History. November, 1953.

Tecoz, H. F. L' "Arte Regia" di Socrate. Rivista di Filosofia. October, 1953.

Tejada, F. E. de. Los Fueros Como Sistemas de Libertades Políticas Concretas. Arbor. September-October, 1953.

Thomson, S. H. Pro Saeculo XIV. Speculum. October, 1953.

Thorndike, Lynn. Mediaeval Magic and Science in the Seventeenth Century. Speculum. October, 1953.

Tierney, Brian. Ockham, Conciliar Theory and the Canonists. Journal of the History of Ideas. January, 1954.

Terno Galván, Enrique. Concepción del Mundo e Ideas Políticas en la Obra de Dostoyevsky. Revista de Estudios Políticos. July-August, 1953.

Valsanzibio, Silvestro da. Aristotele e l'Aristotelismo nel Giudizio di S. Lorenzo da Brindisi. Sophia. January-March, 1954.

Vincitorio, Gaetano L. Edmund Burke and Charles Lucas. PMLA. December, 1953.

Wagner, Vern. The Lecture Lyceum and the Problem of Controversy. Journal of the History of Ideas. January, 1954.

Wallace, Elisabeth. Goldwin Smith, Liberal. University of Toronto Quarterly. January, 1954.

White, William. [Various Articles.] Historical Magazine. December, 1953.

Williamson, Chilton. American Suffrage and Sir William Blackstone. Political Science Quarterly. December, 1953.

Wisniewski, B. Protagoras et Héraclite. Revue Belge de Philologie et d'Histoire. XXXI/2-3. 1953.

Legal Theory and Public Law Issues

Beutel, Frederick K. The Lag Between Scientific Discoveries and Legal Procedures. Nebraska Law Review. November, 1953.

Bozza, F. Ius Quiritium. Studi Senesi. LXIV/1-2. 1952.

Capograssi, Giuseppe. Die Konfliktsituation des Heutigen Juristen und das Problem des Ungerechten Gesetzes. Humanitas. January, 1954.

Carone Dede, Francisco. El Derecho, El Estado De Derecho, El Derecho y la Revolución. Universidad de la Habana. November, 1953.

Dana Montañó, Salvador M. La Constitución Nacional Argentina de 1853. Revista de Estudios Políticos. September-October, 1953.

David, S. Appunti su Goethe Giurista. Studi Senesi. LXIV/1-2. 1952.

García Gallo, Alfonso. El Desarrollo de la Historiografía Jurídica Indiana. Revista de Estudios Políticos. July-August, 1953.

Garrison, Lloyd K. Are Congressional Investigations a Threat to Civil Liberties? American Bar Association Journal. February, 1954.

Goodspeed, Stephen S. Facultades Extraordinarias in Mexico. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. December, 1953.

Graham, Howard J. The Fourteenth Amendment and School Segregation. Buffalo Law Review. Winter, 1953.

Jordano, Juan-Bautista. El Jurista Ante de la Crisis de la Cultura Europea. Arbor. September-October, 1953.

Kelsen, Hans. Teoría Pura de Derecho y Teoría Ecológica. Revista de Estudios Políticos. September-October, 1953.

Kruse, Hans. Besatzungsmacht und Freiheitsrechte. (Göttinger Beiträge für Gegenwartswissen. Bd. 7, 1953.)

Leflar, R. A. and Davis, W. H. Segregation in the Public Schools—1953. Harvard Law Review. January, 1954.

Lewis, Leon P. The Development of a Common Law System in Connecticut. Connecticut Bar Journal. December, 1953.

Marx, Emily. Freedom for the Thought That We Hate. Dickinson Law Review. January, 1954.

Pius XII. An International Code for the Punishment of War Crimes. St. John's Law Review. December, 1953.

Pound, Roscoe. The Rule of Law and the Modern Welfare State. Vanderbilt Law Review. December, 1953.

Rocca, Emilio Nasalli. Juristas y Pensadores en los Orígenes del Estado Moderno. Arbor. December, 1953.

Sarfatti, M. Roman Law and Common Law: Forerunners of Unification. International and Comparative Law Quarterly. January, 1954.

Schlitzer, A. L. The Catholic Lawyer and Divorce Cases. Notre Dame Lawyer. Fall, 1953.

Shigekazu Nishiyama, Essays presented to. Hosei-Kenikyu: Journal of Law and Politics. September, 1953.

Snee, Joseph M. One for the Money, Two for the Show; The Case against Televising Congressional Hearings. Georgetown Law Journal. November, 1953.

Speiser, E. A. Early Law and Civilization. Canadian Bar Review. October, 1953.

Vecchio, Giorgio del. On the Political Character of Law. Notre Dame Lawyer. Fall, 1953.

Vecchio, Giorgio del. Truth and Untruth in Morals and Law, with an Introduction by Roscoe Pound. Iowa Law Review. Fall, 1953.

Special Study and Analysis

Adams, Walter. Competition, Monopoly and Countervailing Power. Quarterly Journal of Economics. November, 1953.

Albonetti, Achille. Metodi di Produzione, Classe Dirigente e Progresso Economico. Civitas. November, 1953.

Alston, W. P. Are Positivists Metaphysicians? Philosophical Review. January, 1954.

Appleby, Paul H. Managing Complexity. Ethics. January, 1954.

Arendt, Hannah. Tradition and the Modern Age. Partisan Review. January-February, 1954.

Babel, A. Le Levain dans le Pâte: Réflexions sur le Problème des Élités. Revue Internationale d'Histoire Politique et Constitutionnelle. April-June, 1954.

Bagal, Jogesh C. Mile-stones to Our Freedom Struggle [India]. Modern Review. November, 1953.

Barton, William. Democracy and Communism in Asia. Quarterly Review. January, 1954.

Barzun, Jacques. The Battle over Brains in Democratic Education. University of Toronto Quarterly. January, 1954.

Bidney, David. The Ethnology of Religion and the Problem of Human Evolution. American Anthropologist. February, 1954.

Borkenau, Franz. A Thomist on Leninism. Twentieth Century. February, 1954.

Bozzini, Franco. I Poteri del Presidente della Repubblica. Nuova Antologia. January, 1954.

Brazeal, B. R. Some Action Imperatives for a Democracy. Phylon. Fourth Quarter, 1953.

Brown, Harcourt. Classical Science and Literary Innovation. Diogenes. Summer, 1953.

Cameron, J. M. The Decline and Rise of the Communist International. Dublin Review. Fourth Quarter, 1953.

Charters, W. W. Jr. Social Class Analysis and the Control of Public Education. Harvard Educational Review. Fall, 1953.

Chauviré, R. Aldous Huxley. Bulletin de l'Association Guillaume Budé. December, 1953.

Collins, James. The Problem of a Philosophy Perennis. Thought. Winter, 1953-1954.

Cook, Thomas I. The Political System: The Stubborn Search for a Science of Politics. Journal of Philosophy. February 18, 1954.

- Crozier, Michel. Les Intellectuelles et la Stagnation Française. Esprit. December, 1953.
- Davis, Robert Gorham. The Quest for the Grand Moral Synthesis. Commentary. February, 1954.
- Democracy. [Various Articles]. Politeia. V/1-2. 1953.
- Donahue, Charles. Heresy and Conspiracy. Thought. Winter, 1953-54.
- Dore, R. P. The Tokyo Institute for the Science of Thought. Far Eastern Quarterly. November, 1953.
- Dray, William. Explanatory Narrative in History. Philosophical Quarterly. January, 1954.
- Edel, Abraham. Some Relations of Philosophy and Anthropology. American Anthropologist. December, 1953.
- Eichler, Herman. L'Obbligazione Sociale della Proprietà. Nuova Rivista di Diritto Commerciale, Diritto Dell'Economia, Diritto Sociale. VI/9-12. 1953.
- Farrell, James T. Some Observations on Tradition in America. Confluence. December, 1953.
- Fitzgibbon, Russell H. Argentina and Uruguay: A Tale of Two Attitudes. Pacific Spectator. Winter, 1954.
- Goudge, T. A. The Concept of Evolution. Mind. January, 1954.
- Guérard, Albert. The Tribune of the People. Southwest Review. Winter, 1954.
- Harbold, William H. Bertrand de Jouvenal on the Essence of Politics. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1953.
- Haya de la Torre, Víctor Raúl. Toynbee Frente a los Panoramas de la Historia. Cuadernos Americanos. January-February, 1954.
- Heiler, Friedrich. How Can Christian and Non-Christian Religions Co-operate? Hibbert Journal. January, 1954.
- Hess, C. G. and Bodman, H. L. Confessionalism and Feudality in Lebanese Politics. Middle East Journal. Winter, 1954.
- Heuss, Theodor. Forces and Elements Forming a Political Style. Journal of Politics. November, 1953.
- Howe, Irving. Stevenson and the Intellectuals. Dissent. Winter, 1954.
- Hueck, Alfred. Problème des Mitbestimmungsrechtes. Juristische Studiengesellschaft Karlsruhe. Heft 7, 1953.
- Jeffreys, M. V. C. The Conditions of Personal Freedom. Educational Review. November, 1953.
- Jerrold, Douglas. Professor Toynbee, "The West," and the World. Sewanee Review. January-March, 1954.
- Kandel, I. L. Textbooks and Revolutions. Educational Forum. January, 1954.
- Kantor, Harry. Aprismo: Peru's Indigenous Political Theory. South Atlantic Quarterly. January, 1954.
- Kaufman, Arnold S. The Nature and Function of Political Theory. Journal of Philosophy. January 7, 1954.
- Kirk, Russell. New Towns and Rotting Houses in Fife. Southwest Review. Winter, 1954.
- Koebner, Richard. Semantics and Historiography. Cambridge Journal. December, 1953.
- Koestler, Arthur. Politische Neurosen. Der Monat. December, 1953.
- Kohlschmidt, Werner. Nihilismus der Romantik. Neue Schweizer Rundschau. December, 1953.
- Kuehnelt-Leddihn, Erik von. The Catholic Temper. Confluence. December, 1953.
- LaCroix, Jean. Sens et Valeur de l'Atheisme Actuel. Esprit. February, 1954.
- Lane, Robert E. Businessmen and Bureaucrats. Social Forces. December, 1953.
- LaPierre, J. W. Le Pouvoir Politique. (Paris, 1953, pp. 108.)
- Lewis, Gordon K. The Metaphysics of Conservatism. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1953.
- Loewenstein, Karl. Les Systèmes Politiques et le Problème de leur Diffusion. Revue Française de Science Politique. October-December, 1953.
- Loewenstein, Karl. Political Systems, Ideologies and Institutions: The Problem of their Circulation. Western Political Quarterly. December, 1953.
- Lombardi, F. Pensiero "Teologico" e Pensiero Umano. Rivista di Filosofia. October, 1953.
- Lunn, Arnold. "A Generation on Trial." Dublin Review. Fourth Quarter, 1953.
- MacDonald, Dwight. A Theory of Mass Culture. Diogenes. Summer, 1953.
- Malick, Clay P. Some Reflections on Labor, the Economy and the Public Interest. Labor Law Journal. February, 1954.
- Maulnier, Thierry. L'Ironie de Jean-Paul Sartre. La Table Ronde. January, 1954.
- Mayo, Bernard. Ethics and Moral Controversy. Philosophical Quarterly. January, 1954.
- Mills, C. Wright. The Conservative Mood. Dissent. Winter, 1954.

- Mohrmann, Ch. La Latinité Chrétienne et le Problème des Relations entre Langue et Religion. Paideia. July-October, 1953.
- Moore, G. E. Wittgenstein's Lectures in 1930-33. Mind. January, 1954.
- Morse, Richard M. Theory of Spanish American Government. Journal of the History of Ideas. January, 1954.
- Niebuhr, Reinhold. The Cultural Crisis of Our Age. Harvard Business Review. January-February, 1954.
- Nikam, U. A. Algunos Caracteres de la Filosofía Hindú. Notas y Estudios de Filosofía. July-September, 1954.
- Padmore, George. Behind the Mau Mau. Phylon. Fourth Quarter, 1953.
- Pamplume, Louis. Gabriel Marcel: Existence, Being, and Faith. Yale French Studies. Fall-Winter, 1953.
- Picard, Max. Ist Freiheit Heute Überhaupt Möglich? Neues Abendland. February, 1954.
- Polanyi, Michael. On the Introduction of Science into Moral Subjects. Cambridge Journal. January, 1954.
- Politics Taught in the University. [Various Articles.] Universities Quarterly. November, 1953.
- Poulet, Georges. Timelessness and Romanticism. Journal of the History of Ideas. January, 1954.
- Pujals, Esteban. La Filosofía de la Cultura de Christopher Dawson. Arbor. September-October, 1953.
- Regenbogen, Otto. Humanismus in Geschichte und Leben. Gymnasium. 61/1-2. 1954.
- Rieff, Philip. George Orwell and the Post-Liberal Imagination. Kenyon Review. Winter, 1954.
- Riezler, Kurt. Political Decisions in Modern Society. Ethics. January, 1954.
- Rizzo, Franco. Croce, De Sanctis e l'Estetica Marxista. Nuova Antologia. December, 1953.
- Roa, Raúl. El Mensaje de Benedetto Croce. Cuadernos Americanos. November-December, 1953.
- Rochefoucauld, Edmée de la. Les Idées Politiques de Paul Valéry. La Revue de Paris. February, 1954.
- Romero, Francisco. El Filósofo y su Experiencia. Cuadernos Americanos. November-December, 1953.
- Röpke, Wilhelm. Machiavellismus und Realismus in der Internationalen Politik. Die Neue Rundschau. 64/3. 1953.
- Rosenberg, Bernard. The Economics of Self-Congratulation. Dissent. Winter, 1954.
- Ross, Ralph Gilbert. Democracy, Party and Politics. Ethics. January, 1954.
- Sauvy, Alfred. On the Relations between Domination and the Numbers of Men. Diogenes. Summer, 1953.
- Schelsky, Helmut. Zukunftsaspekte der Industriellen Gesellschaft. Merkur. January, 1954.
- Schlesinger, Arthur M., Jr. The New Conservatism in America. Confluence. December, 1953.
- Schroers, Rolf. Politischer Jargon. Frankfurter Hefte. December, 1953.
- Silberner, Edmund. Anti-Jewish Trends in French Revolutionary Syndicalism. Jewish Social Studies. July-October, 1953.
- Simpson, Richard L. Pitirim Sorokin and His Sociology. Social Forces. December, 1953.
- Snell, Bruno. Dogmatismus und Wissenschaft. Die Neue Rundschau. 64/3. 1953.
- Stamps, Norman L. Reappraisal of American Political Institutions. Southwestern Social Science Quarterly. December, 1953.
- Taubes, Jacob. On the Nature of the Theological Method [Tillich]. Journal of Religion. January, 1954.
- Toynbee, Arnold J. La Prochaine Étape de l'Histoire. Revue Politique et Parlementaire. January, 1954.
- Tugwell, R. G. The Protagonists: Roosevelt and Hoover. Antioch Review. Winter, 1953-54.
- Tyler, Robert L. The Everett Free Speech Fight. Pacific Historical Review. February, 1954.
- Van Bergh, Hendrik. Der Politische Fanatismus. Deutsche Rundschau. 80/1. 1954.
- Van den Haag, E. Égalitarisme aux U.S.A. Preuves. January, 1954.
- Weil, Eric. Tradition and Traditionalism. Confluence. December, 1953.
- Wein, Hermann. Toward Philosophical Anthropology? Etc. Autumn, 1953.
- Williams, Donald C. Of Essence and Existence and Santayana. Journal of Philosophy. January 21, 1954.
- Wilson, Robert E. A Businessman Looks at Education. Association of American Colleges Bulletin. December, 1953.
- Wolf, Eric. La Formación de la Nación: Un Ensayo de Formulación. Ciencias Sociales [Pan American Union]. August, 1953.
- Wriston, Henry M. The Voices of America. Foreign Affairs. January, 1954.
- Zizzamia, Alba. Catholicism and Internationalism: a Papal Anthology. Thought. Winter, 1953-1954.

SELECTED ARTICLES AND DOCUMENTS ON METHODOLOGY AND RESEARCH IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

HERBERT A. SIMON

Carnegie Institute of Technology

Philosophy of Social Sciences

Bernard Jessie. The Theory of Games of Strategy as a Modern Sociology of Conflict. American Journal of Sociology. March, 1954.

Brown, Robert. Explanation by Laws in Social Science. Philosophy of Science. January, 1954.

Deutsch, Karl W. Game Theory and Politics. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. February, 1954.

Ford, James A. On the Concept of Types. American Anthropologist. February, 1954.

Grunberg, Emile. Notes on Historical Events and General Laws. Canadian Journal of Economics and Political Science. November, 1953.

Hield, Wayne. The Study of Change in Social Science. British Journal of Sociology. March, 1954.

Langrod, Georges. Contribution a l'Etude de la Terminologie Administrative. Revue Internationale des Science Administratives. 1953, #2.

Research Methods and Organization

Almond, Gabriel A. Research in Comparative Politics: Plans of a New Council Committee. Items. March, 1954.

Alpert, Harry. The National Science Foundation and Social Science Research. American Sociological Review. April, 1954.

Carper, James and Doob, Leonard W. Intervening Responses between Questions and Answers in Attitude Surveys. Public Opinion Quarterly. Winter, 1953-4.

Foley, Donald L. Census Tracts and Urban Research. Journal of American Statistical Association. December, 1953.

Katona, George. Survey Research in Germany. Public Opinion Quarterly. Winter, 1953-4.

Phillips, Philip and Willey, Gordon R. Method and Theory in American Archeology. American Anthropologist. December, 1953.

Motivation and Personality

Bird, Charles and Monachesi, Elio D. Prejudice and Discontent. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. January, 1954.

Davidson, Helen H. and Kruglov, Lorraine P. Some Background Correlates of Personality and Social Attitudes. Journal of Social Psychology. November, 1953.

Eisenstadt, S. M. Conditions of Communicative Receptivity. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1953.

Eisenstadt, S. M. Reference Group Behavior and Social Integration. American Sociological Review. April, 1954.

Getzels, J. W. and Guba, E. G. Role, Role Conflict, and Effectiveness. American Sociological Review. April, 1954.

Guest, Robert H. Work Careers and Aspirations of Automobile Workers. American Sociological Review. April, 1954.

Klausner, Samuel Z. Social Class and Self-Concept. Journal of Social Psychology. November, 1953.

Radke-Yarrow, Marian and Lande, Bernard. Personality Correlates of Differential Reactions to Minority Group-Belonging. Journal of Social Psychology. November, 1953.

Riegel, O. W. Residual Effects of Exchange-of-Persons. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1953.

Opinions and Attitudes

Barkley, Key L. Attitudes of Civilian Females toward War as Developed and Held during Peace and during War. Journal of Social Psychology. November, 1953.

Hyman, Herbert and Sheatsley, Paul. The Political Appeal of President Eisenhower. Public Opinion Quarterly. Winter, 1953-4.

Hyman, Herbert H. and Sheatsley, Paul B. Trends in Public Opinion on Civil Liberties. Journal of Social Issues. 1953, #3.

Lumsdaine, Arthur A. and Janis, Irving L. Resistance to "Counterpropaganda" Produced by One-Sided and Two-Sided "Propaganda." Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1953.

Mahler, Irwin. Attitudes toward Socialized Medicine. Journal of Social Psychology. November, 1953.

Meresko, Robert; Rubin, Mandel; Shontz, Franklin C.; and Morrow, William R. Rigidity of Attitudes Regarding Personal Habits and Its Ideological Correlates. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. January, 1954.

Rabson-Rubin, Grace. Several Correlates of a Conservatism-Liberalism Attitudes Scale. Journal of Social Psychology. February, 1954.

Roper, Elmo. American Attitudes on World Organization. Public Opinion Quarterly. Winter, 1953-4.

Sarnoff, Irving and Katz, Daniel. The Motivational Bases of Attitude Change. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. January, 1954.

Scott, William Abbot. Attitudes toward Participation in Civil Defense. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1953.

Showel, Morris. Political Consciousness and Attitudes in the State of Washington. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1953.

Wiebe, G. D. Some Implications of Separating Opinions from Attitudes. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1953.

Group Behavior

Bell, Graham B. and Hall, Harry E., Jr. The Relationship between Leadership and Empathy. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. January, 1954.

Borgatta, Edgar F. and Bales, Robert F. Interaction of Individuals in Reconstituted Groups. Sociometry. November, 1953.

Cleary, E. J. and Pollins, Harold. Liberal Voting at the General Election of 1951. The Sociological Review. December, 1953.

French, John W. The Validity of Some Objective Personality Tests for a Leadership Criterion. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. January, 1954.

Goguel, F. Geographie des Elections Sociales de 1950-1951. Revue Française de Science Politique. April-June, 1953.

Halpin, Andrew W. The Leadership Behavior and Combat Performance of Airplane Commanders. Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology. January, 1954.

MacRae, Duncan, Jr. The Role of the State Legislator in Massachusetts. American Sociological Review. April, 1954.

March, James G. Husband-Wife Interaction over Political Issues. Public Opinion Quarterly. Winter, 1953-4.

McCurdy, Harold G. and Eber, Herbert W. Democratic versus Authoritarian: A Further Investigation of Group Problem-Solving. Journal of Personality. December, 1953.

Sellers, Charles Grier, Jr. Who Were the Southern Whigs? American Historical Review. January, 1954.

Simon, Herbert A. Notes on the Observation and Measurement of Political Power. Journal of Politics. November, 1953.

Culture and Institutions

Adler, Franz. A Quantitative Study in the Sociology of Knowledge. American Sociological Review. February, 1954.

Bauer, Raymond A. and Gleicher, David B. Word-of-Mouth Communication in the Soviet Union. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1953.

Bendix, Reinhard; Lipset, Seymour M.; and Malm, F. Theodore. Social Origins and Occupational Career Patterns. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. January, 1954.

Guttsman, W. L. Aristocracy and the Middle Class in the British Political Elite, 1886-1916. British Journal of Sociology. March, 1954.

Prothro, E. Terry and Melikian, Levon. The California Public Opinion Scale in an Authoritarian Culture. Public Opinion Quarterly. Fall, 1953.

Riessman, Leonard. Class, Leisure, and Social Participation. American Sociological Review. February, 1954.

Richardson, Lewis F. The Submissiveness of Nations. British Journal of Statistical Psychology. November, 1953.

Strauss, Murray A. Subcultural Variation in Ceylonese Mental Ability: A Study in National Character. Journal of Social Psychology. February, 1954.

Value Theory and Social Policy

Baumol, William J. Economic Theory and the Political Scientist. World Politics. January, 1954.

Burgess, W. Randolph. Federal Reserve and Treasury Relations. Journal of Finance. March, 1954.

Cohen, John. The Ideas of Work and Play. British Journal of Sociology. December, 1953.

Galbraith, J. K. Economic Preconceptions and the Farm Policy. American Economic Review. March, 1954.

Gamba, C. The Role of the State in Underdeveloped Areas. Economic Record. November, 1953.

Thurstone, L. L. The Measurement of Values. Psychological Review. January, 1954.

Wage Policies of the WSB: A Symposium. Industrial and Labor Relations Review. January, 1954.

OTHER BOOKS RECEIVED

- BARKER, SIR ERNEST. Age and Youth: Memories of Three Universities and Father of the Man. New York: Oxford University Press. 1953. Pp. viii, 347. $5.00.
- BENNETT, M. K. The World's Food: A Study of the Interrelations of World Populations, National Diets, and Food Potentials. New York: Harper and Bros. 1954. Pp. vi, 282. $4.00.
- BLUM, WALTER J. AND KALVEN, HARRY, JR. The Uneasy Case for Progressive Taxation. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1953. Pp. viii, 107. $2.50.
- BRANDT, KARL IN COLLABORATION WITH OTTO SCHILLER AND FRANZ AHLGRIMM. Management of Agriculture and Food in the German-Occupied and Other Areas of Fortress Europe: A Study in Military Government. Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1953. Pp. xxxiv, 707. $10.00.
- BURNS, ARTHUR F. (ESSAYS BY). The Frontiers of Economic Knowledge. Princeton: Princeton University Press. 1954. Published for the National Bureau of Economic Research, New York. Pp. ix, 367. $5.00.
- CHAMBERLAIN, NEIL W. AND SCHILLING, JANE METZGER. The Impact of Strikes: Their Social and Economic Costs. New York: Harper & Bros. 1954. Pp. viii, 257. $4.00.
- CHASE, STUART IN COLLABORATION WITH MARIAN TYLER CHASE. Power of Words. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Co. 1954. Pp. xii, 308. $3.95.
- CHRIMES, S. B. English Constitutional History. London, New York and Toronto: Oxford University Press. 1953. 2nd ed. Pp. 201. $2.00.
- CONTEMPORARY CIVILIZATION STAFF OF COLUMBIA COLLEGE, COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY (SELECTED AND EDITED BY THE). Chapters in Western Civilization. New York: Columbia University Press. 1954. Vol. 2. 2nd ed. Pp. 516. $4.00.
- CZERWONKY, HUGO E. Freedom from Insecurity. Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1953. Pp. ix, 198. $3.50.
- DEUTSCHER, ISAAC. The Prophet Armed: Trotsky, 1879-1921. New York and London: Oxford University Press. 1954. Pp. 540. $6.00.
- DURKHEIM, EMILE. TRANSLATED BY D. F. POCKOCK. WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY J. G. PERISTIANY. Sociology and Philosophy. Glencoe, Ill.: The Free Press. 1953. Pp. xxxii, 97. $2.50.
- FLORENCE, P. SARGANT. The Logic of British and American Industry: A Realistic Analysis of Economic Structure and Government. Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press. 1954. Pp. xiv, 368. $5.00.
- FOSTER, WILLIAM Z. The Negro People in American History. New York: International Publishers. 1954. Pp. 608. $6.00.
- GATES, PAUL WALLACE. Fifty Million Acres: Conflicts over Kansas Land Policy, 1854-1890. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press. 1953. Pp. xiii, 311. $4.50.
- GIPSON, LAWRENCE HENRY. The Great War for the Empire: The Culmination, 1760-1763. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. 1954. Pp. lxviii, 313. $7.50.
- GOULDNER, ALVIN W. Patterns of Industrial Bureaucracy. Glencoe, Ill.: The Free Press. 1954. Pp. 282. $4.50.
- HALL, A. HAMER. The Fundamentals of World Peace. New York: Philosophical Library. 1953. Pp. 112. $3.00.
- HANDSAKER, MORRISON. Seasonal Farm Labor in Pennsylvania: A Study Prepared by Lafayette College for the Pennsylvania State Department of Labor and Industry. Easton, Pa.: Lafayette College. 1953. Pp. xii, 243.
- HAYEK, F. A. (EDITED WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY). ESSAYS BY T. S. ASHTON, L. M. HACKER, W. H. HUTT, AND B. DE JOUVENEL. Capitalism and the Historians. Chicago: University of Chicago Press. 1954. Pp. vii, 188. $3.00.
- HOLLEY, I. B., JR. Ideas and Weapons: Exploitation of the Aerial Weapon by the United States during World War I; A Study in the Relationship of Technological Advance, Military Doctrine, and the Development of Weapons. New Haven: Yale University Press. 1953. Pp. xiii, 222. $3.75.
- International Conciliation: January-June 1953*. Nos. 487-492. New York: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. 1953. Pp. vii, 314. $7.5.
- JOHNSTON, B. F. Japanese Food Management in World War II. Stanford: Stanford University Press. 1953. Pp. xii, 283. $7.50.
- LEBOURDAIS, D. M. Nation of the North: Canada since Confederation. New York: Frederick A. Praeger. 1954. Pp. ix, 270. $5.00.
- LEFLER, HUGH TALMAGE AND NEWSOME, ALBERT RAY. North Carolina: The History of a

- Southern State*. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press. 1954. Pp. xii, 676. $7.50.
- LEWIS, ROY AND MAUDE, ANGUS. Professional People in England. Cambridge: Harvard University Press. 1953. Pp. viii, 283. $4.00.
- LOGAN, RAYFORD W. The Negro in American Life and Thought: The Nadir 1877-1901. New York: The Dial Press. 1954. Pp. x, 380. $5.00.
- LONGRIGG, STEPHEN HEMSLEY. Iraq, 1900 to 1950: A Political, Social, and Economic History. London, New York and Toronto: Oxford University Press. 1953. Pp. x, 436. $6.15.
- MALIN, JAMES C. The Nebraska Question, 1852-1854. Lawrence, Kansas: James C. Malin. 1954. Pp. ix, 455. $4.00 paper.
- MENDE, TIBOR. World Power in the Balance. New York: The Noonday Press. 1953. Pp. 188. $3.00.
- MOLONEY, JAMES CLARK. Understanding the Japanese Mind. New York: Philosophical Library. 1954. Pp. xix, 252. $3.50.
- NEUFELD, MAURICE F. Labor Unions and National Politics in Italian Industrial Plants: A Study of the Development and Functions of Grievance Committees in Italy. Ithaca: Institute of International Industrial and Labor Relations, Cornell University. 1954. Pp. xiv, 146. $2.00.
- PANIKKAR, K. M. Asia and Western Dominance: A Survey of the Vasco Da Gama Epoch of Asian History, 1498-1954. New York: The John Day Co. 1954. Pp. 530. $7.50.
- RATNER, SIDNEY (EDITED WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY). New Light on the History of Great American Fortunes: American Millionaires of 1892 and 1902. New York: Augustus M. Kelley, Inc. 1953. Pp. xxvii, 106. $3.00.
- ROGOFF, NATALIE. Recent Trends in Occupational Mobility. Glencoe, Ill.: The Free Press. 1953. Pp. 131. $4.00.
- SHANNON, A. H. The Racial Integrity of the American Negro. Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1953. Pp. 262. $3.25.
- SMUTS, ROBERT W. European Impressions of the American Worker. New York: King's Crown Press, Columbia University. 1953. Pp. ix, 62. $1.50.
- SPENCER, SAMUEL R., JR. Decision for War, 1917: The Laconia Sinking and the Zimmermann Telegram as Key Factors in the Public Reaction against Germany. Ringe, New Hampshire: Richard R. Smith Publisher. 1953. Pp. 109. $2.50.
- STREET, JAMES. The Civil War: An Unvarnished Account of the Late but Still Lively Hostilities. New York: The Dial Press. 1953. Pp. 144. $3.00.
- STURMTHAL, ADOLF. Unity and Diversity in European Labor: An Introduction to Contemporary Labor Movements. Glencoe, Ill.: The Free Press. 1953. Pp. 237. $3.75.
- TAYLOR, PHILIP E. The Economics of Public Finance. New York: The Macmillan Co. 1953. Rev. ed. Pp. xxii, 565. $5.50.
- TRUEBLOOD, ELWYN JUDSON. The Dawn of the Post-Modern Era: Dimensions of Human Life in the Last Half of the Twentieth Century. New York: Philosophical Library. 1954. Pp. xii, 198. $3.75.
- TYRRELL, WILLIAM G. (ED.). Social Studies in the College: Programs for the First Two Years. Curriculum Series. Number 8. Washington: National Council for the Social Studies. 1953. Pp. viii, 124. $2.00.
- ULRIKSSON, VIDKUNN. The Telegraphers: Their Craft and Their Unions. Washington: Public Affairs Press. 1953. Pp. v, 218. $3.75.
- VUCINICH, WAYNE S. Serbia between East and West: The Events of 1903-1908. Stanford: Stanford University Press, and London: Geoffrey Cumberlege, Oxford University Press. 1954. Pp. x, 304. $4.75.
- WALKER, ROBERT A. AND CAVE, FLOYD A. How California is Governed. New York: The Dryden Press. 1953. Pp. x, 251. $1.95.
- WILLIAMSON, GEOFFREY. Changing Greenland. New York: Library Publishers. 1954. Pp. x, 280. $3.95.
- WITTMER, FELIX. The Yalta Betrayal: Data on the Decline and Fall of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Caldwell, Idaho: Caxton Printers, Ltd. 1953. Pp. 136. $1.25.
- WRIGHT, ARTHUR F. (ED.). Studies in Chinese Thought. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. 1953. Pp. xiv, 317. $4.00.

NEWS AND NOTES

PROFESSIONAL CONFERENCES

NEXT ANNUAL MEETING OF THE ASSOCIATION

The Fiftieth Annual Meeting of the American Political Science Association will be held September 9-11, 1954, at the Sherman Hotel in Chicago. The Chairman of the Program Committee is Professor Stephen K. Bailey, Wesleyan University; the Chairman of the Committee on Local Arrangements is Professor C. Herman Pritchett, University of Chicago.

Pomona College was co-host with the Citizenship Clearing House to a Southern California Conference on Preparing College Men and Women for Greater Participation in Practical Politics, held at the Mission Inn, Riverside, California, February 19-20, 1954. The members of the conference included some sixty college administrators, professors of government, political leaders, and newspaper editors selected by an advisory committee consisting of Professors Totton J. Anderson, of the University of Southern California, David Farrelly and Ivan L. Hinderaker, of the University of California at Los Angeles, Robert L. Morlan, of the University of Redlands, Don Muchmore, of Long Beach State College, and John A. Vieg, of Pomona College, who served as chairman. A Southern California affiliate of the Citizenship Clearing House is now in process of being organized.

The Citizenship Clearing House Unit for Eastern Pennsylvania held a student conference on "Student Participation in Party Politics" on March 19 and 20, 1954. Principal speakers at the conference were: Professor Stephen K. Bailey, of Wesleyan University and Mayor of Middletown, Connecticut; George Leader, Democratic candidate for Governor of Pennsylvania; and Lloyd Wood, Republican candidate for Governor of Pennsylvania. A portion of the conference was devoted to section meetings in which there were panel discussions participated in by students, faculty members, and political party leaders.

A special conference on the Middle East was held at Grinnell College, March 4-8, 1954, under the sponsorship of the Grinnell Institute of International Affairs. Leading participants included the following: S. E. Gerard Priestley, British author and historian; Taraknath Das, professor of political science at Columbia University; Abdul Hamid Ghaleb, alternate Egyptian delegate to the United Nations; M. S. Sundaram, First Secretary, Education Department, Embassy of India; Syed Amjad Ali, Ambassador from Pakistan; John Durnford Jernegan, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State; and Abba Eban, Ambassador from Israel.

Specialists in several fields recently examined the relationship between Antioch College's courses in economics, political science, and law, and the school's study-plus-work program. Among the several hundred employers and alumni who attended a centennial conference on the Yellow Springs campus at Antioch to evaluate "Work Experience in Higher Education," February 11, 12, and 13, were: Charles Gant, program analyst, National Science Foundation, Washington, D.C.; J. Alan Ofner, industrial relations division, Argonne National Laboratories, AEC, Chicago; Truman Safford, attorney, Curtis, Morris and Safford, New York; Frederick Beckman, supervisor, Department of Mental Welfare, Columbus, Ohio; John O. Harper, attorney, Cory, Durfee, Martin and Brown, Springfield, Ohio. Chairman of the panel was Heinz Eulau, associate professor of government at Antioch. Separate discussions were held in thirteen other fields of major concentration. Students and faculty members participated in all, as panelists or in the audience. Antioch was the first liberal arts college in the country to adopt a study-plus-work program.

Under the plan, students regularly alternate classroom courses with jobs secured for them in thirty-three states.

The Third Institute on World Affairs and International Cooperation will be held at the Pennsylvania State University during the main summer session, 1954. The Institute will have as its theme "The American Impact Abroad—Its Effects on International Cooperation and Understanding." Professors Elton C. Atwater and R. Wallace Brewster, of the political science department, are serving on the all-university committee supervising the Institute.

